the peace;" yet they all knew that at elections it was a common practice to hire "roughs" for the very purpose of committing violence. Next he came to bribery. A man who received a bribe for his vote took a bribe for that which was given to him by his country for its welfare. If a man took a bribe to vote according to his convictions he still proclaimed that his country was not worthy of being served without money, and if he took a bribe and voted against his convictions he asserted that his country was not worthy of being truthfully served. In the one case he was extortionate, and in the other sordid and faithless. The extensive bribery which prevailed at the last general election was the result of bribery at the previous general election. The voters had learnt how to require money and how to conceal all trace of the bribe up to the Member being returned—they had reduced bribery to a system. By maintaining the present law they could not make them ignorant of the system, but, under the Ballot, those who had accepted bribes would not again be trusted. Whatever might be said as to the necessity of doing away with open voting, the case was much stronger when they came to intimidation. A man might give a hint that he had a right to dispossess a tenant or to withdraw his custom from a tradesman, and no law could prevent it. It was well known that at many elections female influence was employed, and ladies became canvassers; and the common feeling he believed was that female canvassers got few votes, but the result of their pleading was to prevent men from voting by hints of losses. If there was one thing which more than another should induce them to do away with open voting it was to deter females from canvassing, which deteriorated the female character and the tone of female influence among our countrymen. He now came to consider the effect of direct open voting on their representative interests. The first effect was to prevent persons, who were qualified, from putting their names on the register at all. The next effect was that it prevented many persons who were on the register from recording their votes; and a great many of those who were on the register did not exercise their franchise. The House of Commons ought to be elected at least by those who possessed the franchise—it should represent the mind of the electors, but if they found—as they did find—that a very large portion of the electors never voted at all, they were bound to come to the conclusion that the House of Commons was not in that condition which the theory of the constitution designed that it should be. It could only be supposed that these persons abstained from voting from the fear of the intimidation and coercion to which they would expose themselves by coming forward to vote. The same effect was observed in America. He admitted that the Ballot existed in the United States, but the Ballot which existed there was not the Ballot which he wished to see in this country. The system in America was the Ballot with open voting. He desired the Ballot with secret voting. He, therefore, designedly used the word "secret" before "ballot," as there were two kinds of ballot, open and secret. The consideration he had last referred to was well worthy the attention of Conservatives. In proof of that he referred to a petition from some electors of Ayrshire, who complained of violence, and declared that unless they received protection nothing would induce them to give their votes again. If, then, votes were given under the influence of bribery and intimidation, and not according to truth and uprightness, were they not bound to come to the conclusion that the candidates who were returned by so imperfect a system were neither those who were designed by the constitution, nor those who would be returned were secret voting the practice of the land? He almost shrank from touching on the bearing of this question on individual political liberty. The man who was offered a bribe and declined it, who lost his shop or his farm by refusing to vote as his landlord wanted him, or who exposed himself to any other sort of intimidation, had to make a heavy sacrifice for his liberty, and it was both impolitic and unjust to impose so high a tax on the freedom of the individual. There were men, certainly, who did not shrink from paying that tax to the full extent that they might retain their liberty; but there were, unhappily, many who yielded to a temptation to which they ought never to have been subjected. The question of a man's moral nature—his sincerity or insincerity—was therefore very much bound up with this question of secret voting. It was absurd to establish a system which exposed a man to the temptation of voting one way in order to escape oppression or to supply his pecuniary needs, while in his heart he wished to vote in another way, and at the same time to expect him to discharge his duty as an elector honestly and uprightly. What the friends of secret voting desired was to push out the secret bribery and wickedness that now existed, and substitute in their place a secret act that had no wickedness whatever. What did he propose, then, in asking their Lordships to assent to the Resolution? He did not seek to interfere with the freedom of any man. Any one who wished to express himself openly in favour of a particular candidate would be at liberty to do so, both previous to the day of election and on the day of nomination. His antipathy was not to the open expression of opinion, but to the bribery and intimidation which accompanied open voting. He did not wish for the system of the United States, which was the Ballot with open voting; nor the system of Victoria, which was the Ballot with a subsequent exposure of the voters on a scrutiny; but he desired the system which existed in the other Australian colonies where the vote was secret both at the time and for ever after, and although the people might think it tautology to speak of the "Secret Ballot," yet he had called it so advisedly, as there was a Ballot not secret. With regard to the objections which had been urged against the system of secret voting, he wished to make a few remarks. The first objection was, that secret voting led to secret lying—that men would promise to give their votes to one candidate and actually vote for another. Now it was very well known that promises of votes were given long before the election took place, and it often happened that a man who gave a promise of his vote under certain circumstances might change his mind and wish to give his vote for a different candidate. In such a case it was difficult to reconcile the voter's conscience with his promise. He therefore thought that on the day of nomination all candidates should be compelled to absolve all voters from their promises. The argument that secret voting would promote lying, might be used against every law and obligation, and the higher the law the stronger would be the temptation to lying. It was said, for instance, "Thou shalt do no murder;" "Thou shalt not steal;" but if a man was guilty, or supposed to be guilty, of the crime of murder or stealing, and was reproached for it, he would, of course, tell any number of lies. That argument, therefore, would tell against the very best law that ever was made, or could be made. Another argument made use of was that secret voting was for the protection of cowards and of those who gave and received bribes. On this point he would call the attention of their Lordships to a fact in the history of their Lordships' House. On the 6th of March, 1733,—the 7th of George II.—it was moved that for the better securing the freedom of election in electing the Peers of Scotland, the election should be by way of ballot. There was a majority of thirty-three against that Resolution. But there was an able and earnest Protest against its rejection by thirty-four Peers, headed by the Duke of Marlborough, and the arguments therein put forward were so cogent that he begged leave to read some extracts from it. In the debate upon the Motion the Duke of Argyll had objected to the Resolution, not upon its merits, but because he thought that as a clause in the Act of Union declared that the election should be taken by open voting he was precluded from voting that it be taken otherwise. In the Protest, however, the minority gave as their third reason for their dissent, “Because in an election of this nature the method of voting by ballot appears to us infinitely preferable on many accounts; for as it is well known, there are several alliances amongst that body of nobility, many of the Peers may be put under great difficulties, their alliances drawing them one way, and their opinion and inclination another way; it is also possible that by pensions from the Crown, or by civil or military preferments, some of them may be under obligations to a Court, and be reduced to the hard necessity (under the power of an arbitrary Minister) either of losing their employment, or of voting against their nearest relations, and their own opinions also. We apprehend that no election can be called perfectly free where any number of the electors are under any influence whatsoever by which they may be biased in the freedom of their choice.”

Lord Teynham

The people at large had the same feelings as the Scottish Peers of 1733. The Ballot was as much required to protect the virtuous English peasant as the virtuous Scottish Peer. On what ground did they expect that the secret Ballot would answer the expectations of those who supported it? Here we would refer to authorities. Wood, in his Oxonenses, was in favour of the ballot. Relating the history of James Harrington, a remarkable character of that day, who had a large number of followers, he said, “This gang had a balloting-box—by which they decided who should be their rulers, than which choice nothing could be invented more fair and impartial.” Going back to ancient days, he found, in a tract supposed to be written by Andrew Marvell, in the reign of Charles II., the following passage:—

“And certainly Rome, nor Athens, had never attained to their grandeur and reputation but for the Ballot. By this only art, we had almost said, Venice preserved itself against the world for 1,300 years. Persons were elected for their virtues and accomplishments, and the public purse was protected against the influence and power of the country.”

If the ballot had that power in Venice, who would say that there was not a necessity in this country for some such protection of the public purse? In 1698 an embassy was sent from England to Venice, under the direction of the Earl of Manchester; and Mr. Cole, who accompanied the Embassy, and resided some time in the country, said, “All voting in the Great Council is done by ballot, without any mistake, or any sort of confusion or disturbance; and it prevents bribery, faction, animosities, and those ill consequences which they might otherwise produce.” Might not similar blessings be expected to result from the adoption of the Ballot here? But he need not to go to Venice or to Scotland, he would come to their Lordships' House. In March, 1703, there was a Bill before their Lordships' House for taking, examining, and stating the public accounts of the kingdom. Three Commissioners for carrying the measure out were to be named by that House; and it was wisely resolved that they should not be of either House of Parliament, nor in any public office or employment, nor accountable to the Government; and also that they should be chosen by Ballot. The mode of voting was by their Lordships putting their ballots into a glass, which was carried round, beginning with the lowest in the House; the ballots were then examined, and the result was reported by the Duke of Richmond to the House. If that was a wise course to be pursued in the election of Commissioners who were to have the control of the public accounts, why should not the Ballot be adopted in the election of Members of the other House, which had so much to do with the public expenditure? The Ballot was no novelty. In the State Tracts of the time of William III., vol. i., there was a letter written by a member of the great Convention holden at Westminster, in which it was stated that it was then customary, in the borough of Lymington, in Hampshire, to elect Members by Ballot; and the author added:—

“This method I know to be a great advantage. It prevents animosities, and assists that freedom which ought to prevail at an election; for it can be by no means discovered how an elector gave his vote.” If the Ballot worked well then in Lymington, why should it not do so now in all the boroughs and counties of the kingdom? All efforts had hitherto failed to stem the tide of corruption and intimidation at elections, which was well known to their Lordships. He contended that the Ballot would put down intimidation, corruption, drunkenness, bribery, and other evils. The facts which he had adduced proved that it had been successful within and without that House. If their Lordships thought that it would not be successful, it was their duty to provide some other remedy for those admitted evils. The noble Lord concluded by moving to resolve,

“That it is expedient in the Election of Members to serve in Parliament that the Votes of the Electors be taken by secret Ballot.”

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE had listened with great attention for an hour and a half to the address of the noble Lord, but he was at a loss to understand how the noble Lord made out any connection between the evils he complained of and the remedy he advocated. He had told them, on the authority of some old entries in their Journals, that the Ballot was an old institution of their Lordships' House, and he quoted some precedents from the Journals of the time of William and Mary; but he (the Duke of Newcastle) apprehended that the ballot he found entered there had no more to do with secret voting than the ballot adopted in the House of Commons in appointing Committees, or that which took place at the opening of every Session, when the Queen summoned them to attend to hear the Speech from the Throne, and when, in order to prevent over-crowding at the bar, Members were selected for precedence by the chance of the ballot. That was the ballot alluded to in the Journals of the House, and not the secret voting by ballot. The noble Lord had endeavoured, but probably with small success, to catch some votes on the other side of the House by telling them that the secret ballot, if adopted, would tell as much in favour of the Conservative party as any other. He (the Duke of Newcastle) believed he was perfectly right. He did not oppose this Motion on party grounds, or because he believed it had any democratic tendency at all. He believed there was at least as much intimidation on the democratic side as there was on the side of any body of landlords in the kingdom; and if there were no other objection to this measure, so far as political parties were concerned, they might all agree to vote for the measure. He did not look at it as a party question, but as a moral and social one; and, moreover, as a political question, but in a sense quite apart from party considerations. The noble Lord quoted a vast number of examples of the working of the Ballot, and in so doing had skipped from the Republic of Venice to the borough of Lymington; but in the three great examples he had produced as to the efficiency of the Ballot, he was at a loss to understand what kind of ballot he really advocated. There were three great examples of the working of the system of vote by Ballot. The first was that which obtained on the Continent of Europe, and more especially in France; the second, so commonly quoted, that in use in the United States of America; and the third, that recently adopted in the Australian colonies. The noble Lord did not touch much on the French system; but he must be permitted to ask the noble Lord whether, when he was advocating a greater degree of popular freedom, he would point to France, where the Ballot had never been adopted with a view to resist the influence of the Government, but where at this moment, under the influence of the Ballot, a despotic Government existed inimical to freedom of discussion and the liberty of the press? As regarded the United States, the noble Lord had taken a different course to that adopted in the other House. He entirely threw over the United States, and he believed rightly, for the Ballot in the United States was not the Ballot in the sense that we spoke of it. It was no secret Ballot in America, but voting by ticket. He believed that in one of the States of America the secret ballot was once adopted, but it only lasted for a year, and was repealed in the year following, and did not now exist; and he thought the reason of the failure obvious. He believed that in a race of British origin the Ballot would never be found to work either successfully or without much greater attendant evils than those it was intended to rectify. The noble Lord said that the Ballot he advocated was that in use in the Australian colonies; but then he said he did not approve of the Ballot in the colony of Victoria, but as adopted in some other colonies. But opinions in favour of the Ballot in the Australian colonies were by no means of so decided a character as the noble Lord would have their Lordships believe. If the Australian colonies believed that they had found a successful Ballot at all, it was in Victoria. The noble Lord said he did not like this Ballot on account of the possibility of a scrutiny afterwards; but that was what the Australians believed to be the very virtue of the scheme. Were we, however, to conclude that the example of as many years in the Australian colonies as they had had experience of generations in the United States was to be their guide? It might succeed in Australia; but at present he could not say it had succeeded. They must look at the different state of society and of circumstances altogether, and recollect the utter absence of those great vested interests that existed in this country, and that were

Lord Teynham

rs.
lend er, ful
to
to nt ot, be ed he ry luat
to he er,
n,
it-
he nnat ld
nt, in ic-
be ad de ot ge ut
of
to re

nearly balanced. Then there would be no secrecy at all. The noble Lord had dwelt on the evils of intimidation and bribery, and said that no law had been able to reach intimidation, although legislation had been to a certain degree successful in the suppression of bribery. The majority of noble Lords present remembered the period that had elapsed since the passing of the Reform Bill in 1832, and he would ask them whether at this moment bribery was more rife than intimidation was then, and whether the intimidation of thirty years ago was not reduced to an immense extent? The noble Lord had said that no law had touched it; but something had, and that something was the moral feeling of the country and its improved moral sentiment; and if they allowed these motives to operate they would be far more effectual than either the ballot-box or any other scheme. As regarded bribery, it was provable to demonstration that under the system of the Ballot they gave increased facilities to bribery. To accept the Ballot would be to put the business of the elections into the hands of the lowest attorneys of the place, who would receive £2,000 or £3,000 to carry an election, and the candidate would say, "If you return me, I will pay a certain further sum to you: but if I am not returned you shall not have it;" and he had no doubt that this last stage of bribery would be worse than the first. Their Lordships would forgive him for not going further into this subject; for it was one with which everybody was familiar, and the arguments in reference to it they must have all heard frequently. There was one point, however, to which he would advert. One of the most important elements in the constitutional government of this country was responsibility; and if the Ballot—the secret Ballot—were adopted it would deprive the electors of their proper responsibility. He considered that the vote of every man must be looked upon in the light of a trust. He did not mean a trust in the strict legal sense of the word, for undoubtedly it was not a trust in that sense; but he thought that the vote of every person was given to him for the public good, and that if the voters stood alone, of all connected with the system of government, in not being subject to public opinion the whole value of the system would be lost. Their Lordships were themselves responsible to public opinion, and he was quite sure that the public would see with regret, and possibly with displeasure, any attempt to introduce the Ballot into their proceedings. He thought it would be as displeasing to the public as to their Lordships themselves. Responsibility was one of the great features of constitutional government, and he believed that publicity was an essential element of responsibility; and if they were to do away with publicity they would strike a great blow at freedom itself, and do that which would lead to the demoralization of the land. He believed that the advocates of the Ballot were seeking that which they could not obtain by the means proposed. Let them bring the force of public opinion on the evils of intimidation and bribery. A great deal had been done in that direction already, and more would be done by persevering in the same system. He believed that in this way they might—though perhaps not in our lifetime—bring about a state of society in which a man might be able to vote without the smallest fear of any tyrannical influence, and this would do far more to remedy existing evils than by throwing the cloak of darkness over the proceedings of the voter and leaving him to rely on secrecy for his safety. He was confident that their Lordships would reject the proposal which had been made.

On Question, their Lordships divided:—Contents 5; Not-Contents 39.

And a Question arising whether certain Lords had come into the House after the Question was put, not having heard the Question put,

The Tellers were heard thereon:

And THE EARL DE GREY declaring, That he had so come in, the Numbers were reduced accordingly—Contents 4; Not-Contents 39.

And the Question was Resolved in the negative.

CONTENTS.

Belper, L.	Strafford, L. (V. En-
Llanover, L.	field .) [Teller .] Teynham, L. [Teller .]

NOT-CONTENTS.

Canterbury, Archp.	Cathcart, E.
Campbell, L. (L. Chan-	De La Warr, E.
cellor .)	Derby, E.
	Hardwicke, E.
Newcastle, D.	Malmesbury, E.
Somerset, D.	Saint Germans, E.
	Winton, E. [E. Eglin-
Bath, M. [Teller .]	town .] Salisbury, M.
	Everaley, V.
Amherst, E.
Carnarvon, E.	Carlisle, Bp.

The Duke of Newcastle

Chichester, Bp.	Montagu of
	L.
Aveland, L.	Overstone, L.
Chelmsford, L.	Saltoun, L.
Churchill, L.	Somerhill, L. (M. Clau-
Clifton, L. (E. Darn-	ricarde .)
ley .)	Sundridge, L. (D.
Colchester, L.	Argyll .)
Denman, L.	Talbot de Malahide, L.
Digby, L.	Templemore, L.
Ebury, L.	Truro, L.
Egerton, L.	Wensleydale, L.
Foley, L. [Teller .]	Wynford, L.
Lyveden, L.

Resolved in the negative.

SELLING AND HAWKING GOODS, &c., ON SUNDAY BILL.

SECOND READING.

LORD CHELMSFORD moved that the Bill be now read a second time.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, the noble Lord would doubtless agree with him that with regard to a measure which had already excited considerable public interest, it was most inadvisable that there should appear to be any intention of passing it without affording ample time for consideration to those who would be affected by its details. He would therefore suggest that, following a course which was sometimes adopted, the second reading should now be taken pro forma, with the understanding that the Committee on the Bill should be fixed for some future day, when, if necessary, the principle on which it was founded would be open to consideration.

LORD CHELMSFORD willingly agreed with the suggestion, and consented to postpone the Committee on the Bill until after Easter. His only anxiety was to pass such a Bill as would be likely to prove valuable.

EARL ST. GERMAN, as a Member of the Committee which had sat in 1850, recommended the perusal of the important evidence taken at that time to the noble Lord by whom the Bill had been introduced. He also took the liberty of suggesting that he should place himself in communication with Sir Richard Mayne and some of the metropolitan magistrates who administered justice in the Sunday trading most largely. If his noble and learned Friend thought he would very materially to improve his measure.

Bill read 2^d.

House adjourned at Half-past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, Half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, March 19, 1860.

MISCELLANEOUS.] NEW WRITS ISSUED.—For Londonderry City, v. Sir Robert Alexander Ferguson, baronet, deceased; for Clare, v. Colonel Luke White, void election.

PUBLIC BILLS.—2^o Bankrupt Law (Scotland) Amendment; Titles to Land (Scotland) Act (1858) Amendment.

THE ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS ON THE TREATY.

VISCOUNT CASTLEROSSE (the Vice-Chamberlain), appeared at the bar of the House and said,—Her Majesty has been pleased to receive most graciously the joint Address of both Houses of Parliament, and has returned the following Answer:—

I thank you for your loyal and dutiful Address.

It is most gratifying for Me to receive your assurance, that after having considered the Treaty of Commerce which I have concluded with the Emperor of the French, you are prepared to take steps for giving effect to a system intended to promote a beneficial intercourse between this Country and France, and to afford an additional security for the continuance of Peace.

BEVERLEY ELECTION.

REPORT.

House informed, that the Committee had determined,—

"That James Robert Walker, esquire, is duly elected a Burgess to serve in this present Parliament for the Borough of Beverley.

"And the said Determination was ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House."

House further informed, that the Committee had agreed to the following Resolution:—

That it was proved to the Committee that Thomas Whitfield was bribed with £6 by Nathaniel Kempley and with £2 by Benjamin Mope.

That Edward Milner was bribed with £5 by Nathaniel Kempley and Jacolina Wilkin.

That John Needham was bribed with £2 for himself and £2 for his son by John Smiles Vickers.

That John Raspin, Francis Clerk, Robert Richardson, and David Leadley, were bribed with £3 each by John Dales; but it was not proved that such bribery was committed with the knowledge and consent of James Robert Walker, esquire, or his agents.

VOL. CLVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

Report to lie upon the Table.

THE SIX-POUND FRANCHISE.

QUESTION.

MR. STEEL said, he wished to put the Question, of which he had given notice, to the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, if Tenants who pay £6 rent and upwards in any city or borough, but whose Landlords compound for the Poor Rates, will be entitled to vote under the New Reform Bill; and will Tenants who pay the like rent of £6 and upwards by quarterly or monthly payments, who hold from year to year, be also entitled to vote; and, if not, how can these parties become so entitled?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I beg leave to state to the hon. Gentleman that tenants who pay £6 rent and upwards will be exactly in the same situation as those who now pay £10 under the Reform Act. With respect to those paying £10 rent, if their names do not appear on the rate, they are not entitled to vote, but have the privilege of asking to be put on the rate, and on becoming liable to the rate, continuing to pay the same rent, they become entitled to vote. The second question I cannot answer precisely. I think it is rather a question for the revising barrister.

OFFICERS OF ARTILLERY.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether, taking into consideration the importance attached at the present day to artillery throughout Europe, there is any intention to place the Officers commanding the British Artillery in the principal stations abroad and at home, including Aldershot, in a position compatible with their duties, by giving them the rank of Brigadier-General?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he was not sure that he quite understood the hon. and gallant Member's question, but he could state that the position of Artillery Officers was under the consideration of the Government.

THE EASTER RECESS.

QUESTION.

MR. SPOONER said, he wished to ask when the Government propose to adjourn for the Easter Recess, and when they mean to resume business again?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: No doubt, Sir, hon. Members, having been called together this Session rather earlier than usual, will be glad to have as long a Recess at Easter as can be conveniently given. But I am obliged to say that the period for adjournment must entirely depend on the progress of the public business now before us, some of which is of a very urgent nature, and certain Bills must be passed before Easter. Therefore we are not able at present to say on what day we shall recommend the House to adjourn.

TURKISH MEDALS.

QUESTION.

MR. COLLINS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War when the Turkish Silver Medals which have been received from the Ottoman Government will be issued to those Officers and Non-Commissioned Officers who are entitled to the same who are now serving in Regiments of Militia?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that the vessel in which these medals were sent from Turkey having unfortunately gone to the bottom, he could not state when they would be distributed.

VOLUNTEER CORPS—ADJUTANTS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL GREVILLE said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War if it is the intention of the Government to sanction the appointment of paid Adjutants to each Regiment of Volunteers?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, it was the intention of Government to appoint Adjutants to the Volunteer Regiments.

CUSTOMS ACTS.—REPORT.

Resolutions reported.

"That, on and after the 1st January, 1861, in lieu of the Duty of Customs now chargeable on the article under mentioned on importation into Great Britain and Ireland, the following Duty shall be charged, namely:—

	s.	d.
Hops, until the 1st January, 1862 the cwt.	20	0
Hops, on and after the 1st January, 1862, the cwt.	15	0"

"That, in lieu of the Duties now payable upon Ships with their tackle, apparel, and furniture, there shall be charged upon all Ships foreign-built, of wood, and upon all ships built of wood in any of Her Majesty's Possessions abroad, on the Registration thereof as British Ships, at any port or place in Great Britain and Ireland, the Duties of Customs following, that is to say,—

Mr. Spooner

	s.	d.
For every Ton of the gross Registered Tonnage of such Ships without any deduction in respect of engine room or otherwise	1	0"

Resolutions agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. MASSEY, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Mr. LAING.

THE ANNEXATION OF NICE TO FRANCE.

QUESTION.

MR. KINGLAKE said, he rose to ask the noble Lord at the head of Foreign Affairs the question of which he had privately given him notice, but, as he felt it necessary to make a short statement to the House, he would, in order to put himself in order, conclude with a Motion. He had never risen to address the House with feelings of greater pleasure than at that moment, for he rejoiced to be able to say that, unless he had been deceived by some inexplicable hoax, the news from Nice was of the most gratifying description. They had been told that the people of Nice were anxiously demanding to be annexed to the great Empire of France, and that, though there might be a small group of persons in that country who perversely and malignantly showed a desire to remain attached to the throne of the King of Sardinia, yet it was not reasonable that such an insignificant portion of the population should be permitted to indulge in that malignant species of loyalty. But within the last hour and a half he had received a telegram to the effect that the Municipal Council of Nice had determined by vote to remain annexed to the Kingdom of Sardinia, and they had also declared that if France would insist on the principle that their remaining annexed to the Kingdom of Sardinia was incompatible with the safety of the French frontier, then the Municipality of Nice anxiously prayed that their country might be allowed to form an independent State. The telegram went on to say that a deputation had proceeded from Nice to Turin to carry this decision to the foot of the Throne; and it was further added that the thanks of the Municipal Council were voted to three Members of this House, one of whom was the hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. S. FitzGerald), and the other was his hon. Friend the hon. Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel). He hoped he might be permitted to congratulate his hon. Friend on this event, for he thought it must be extremely gratifying to him that the son of one whose voice had once exercised a vast influence on the votes and the character of this House, and through the House on the whole of Europe, should have the honour to have the thanks profered him of a free people. The question of which he had given notice was one which he had ventured to put to the noble Minister for Foreign Affairs, with a view of determining the course he might take with regard to his pending Motion. It was natural and proper that a great deal of anxiety should be shown by the hon.

 Members of the House as to the course he was about to take on that Motion. But the fact was, that these affairs with regard to the annexation of Savoy and Nice were so continually passing into new phases, that it was extremely difficult for any Gentleman charged with the duty of bringing forward such a Motion to know the exact time and the exact form in which it was desirable to submit his views to the House.
 He must say, too, that the communications they received from Her Majesty's Government from time to time considerably varied.
 He did not say that at all in any taunting spirit, because it might be quite consistent with truth and with the absence of divided opinions that one thing should be true on Tuesday and another on Friday. On Tuesday they were told by the noble Lord at the head of the Government that he had every reason to suppose that the opinions of the other great Powers would be sincerely asked and sincerely abided by by the Emperor of the French; but on Friday the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary said that which went far to dissipate their hopes. These alterations made the form of his Motion a very difficult one.
 All he could say was that he hoped and trusted, and had reason to believe, that he should be able to submit his Motion to the House in a form that would strengthen the hands of Her Majesty's Government. If he found, however, that the course taken by Her Majesty's Government was not such as to enable him to put his Motion in that form he would not shrink from putting it in such a form as the justice of the case demanded. But he would frankly add that he should feel much relieved by any hon. Gentleman who would undertake the charge of that which, by accident rather than by his own seeking, had been reposed in him. The question he wished to ask the noble Lord was—first, Whether Her Majesty's Ministers had received the appeal which it was understood had been addressed, or was intended to be addressed, by the Swiss Government to the great Powers of Europe on the subject of annexation; and next, whether Her Majesty's Government would give the statements contained in that note due consideration before they replied to the despatch which had been received from M. Thouvenel; and lastly, whether Her Majesty's Government would put themselves in communication with those other Powers to whom the Swiss Government had notified their address, in order, if possible, to come to some common concert? He then begged to move the Adjournment of the House.

SIR ROBERT PEEL seconded the Motion.

Motion made and Question proposed,
 "That this House do now Adjourn."

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: In answer to the first question put by the hon. Member —namely, whether the note from the Swiss Government has been received, I have to state that no note from the Swiss Government has yet been received.

With regard to the other two questions, which relate to the future course which Her Majesty's Government will think fit to adopt, I have to appeal to the House for their forbearance. I stated the other evening that a despatch of great importance had been received from the French Government. Since that time we have received the intelligence which has reached my hon. and learned Friend—namely, that the Swiss Government has determined, after an appeal to Paris and Turin, to send a note to all the great Powers of Europe with regard to the projected annexation of Savoy to France. In these circumstances, I say, I ask the forbearance of this House to leave it to Her Majesty's Government to deliberate freely and carefully on the answer they will return to any communication made to them. It cannot but be that the answer given in this House would not be confined to this House, or even to this country; but it must go forth all over Europe that answers are given from day to day on the different phases which this negotiation assumes, and the result must be most prejudicial to the public service and most embarrassing to Her Majesty's Government. The time will arrive when the whole conduct of Her Majesty's Government will come before Parliament, and I must therefore ask the indulgence of the House if I decline to answer these questions.

Motion for the Adjournment of the House put and negatived.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL moved that this Bill be now read the second time.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. DISRAELI said :—Sir, I understand that the promoters of this Bill claim for it the merit of simplicity. Simplicity in the operations of nature is admirable, because there we see adequate means adapted to the end proposed, without complexity; but in matters of legislation simplicity is a quality of an ambiguous character, because if we find that the means are not adequate to the end then it is not simplicity at which we arrive, but rather imperfection and incompleteness. Now, what is the end proposed by this Bill? The end is, "to amend the representation of the people in England and Wales." Are the means adequate to that end? My first impression, when I took up this Bill, was that it might have been drawn up four or five centuries ago. Except the land on which we tread, and masses of brick and mortar, I do not see any property referred to as a qualification for exercising the franchise, and that in a country where for more than a century the people have been doing nothing but creating and accumulating various properties to an incalculable amount. The claims of intelligence, of acquirement, and education are not noticed. The bill, indeed, is of a mediæval character, but without any of the inspiration of the feudal system or any of the genius of the middle ages. It proposes to itself three principal objects, which I suppose I may consider three principles. It is to extend the suffrage in counties and in boroughs, and to effect some redistribution of Parliamentary seats. These certainly are objects well worthy the attention of the House, but there are objects almost as important connected with the exercise of the franchise, and with the better representation of the people of England and Wales, which, singular to say, are not alluded to in this Bill. It has been thought that, besides extending the possession of the franchise, it was one of our first duties to consider whether, by a more perfect registration, and by affording greater facilities for polling, the exercise of the suffrage might not be rendered far more valuable and far more advantageous to the community. I may remind the House that in the Bill which I had the honour to introduce to the notice of the late House of Commons there was a proposition, carried into effect by numerous clauses, to establish a self-acting registry. There was a scheme perfectly worked out, which would have so multiplied polling places that the Ministers of that day felt justified in asking the House to declare that the payment of travelling expenses to a voter should thereafter be illegal—a provision which would greatly have checked that corruption of which we all so much complain. But in this Bill to amend the representation of the people, so limited are its conception and the objects of which it treats, that I do not see any allusion to these primary and absolutely necessary topics. The general aspect of the Bill is highly unsatisfactory. Its omissions are its principal features. The qualifications from which it draws its franchises are of a limited character, and some important topics connected with the exercise of the suffrage are entirely omitted. That is the general aspect of the Bill; let us now consider it in some detail.

Lord J. Russell

The Bill has three principles. It extends the franchise in counties, and in boroughs, and it effects a redistribution of Parliamentary seats. I will first touch upon the arrangements which are proposed with reference to the borough franchise, and for this reason, that in the somewhat meagre statement with which Her Majesty's Ministers introduced this measure that was the only part of the Bill with regard to which they laid down any principle of action; and, therefore, there we have an opportunity of ascertaining to a certain degree the principle on which the Government has acted in that reconstruction of the constituency which is one of the principal objects of this measure. Now, Sir, when upon another occasion I laid down on the part of my colleagues the principle on which we had acted in reconstructing the constituency of this country, I ventured to observe that our sole object had been to confer the franchise upon those persons to whom we thought that high privilege might safely be intrusted, and who would, we believed, exercise it for the general welfare of the country, and, therefore, I said that in making the propositions which I then laid before the House we had not stopped to calculate what number of persons they would enfranchise. The point which we placed before us was the fitness of the recipients. We did not embarrass ourselves with calculations or alarms as to the number who might receive the suffrage, so long as we were persuaded that those upon whom it was to be conferred would be classes who would accept it as a high privilege, and to whom it might safely be intrusted. That is the principle upon which Her Majesty's Ministers have proceeded in framing this measure. On the contrary, the noble Lord, laying down the principle upon which he has acted, said that he had to consider what would be the number added to the constituency of the boroughs by the different methods which were under his consideration. He said, "If I had taken a rating of £9 I should only have got so many. If it had been £8 it would have given me so many more, but I don't think enough, and I have, therefore, for boroughs fixed upon a particular figure, which will give some 257,000 votes. I think that is enough, and I do not think the House will have any opinion that it is too much."

I object to that principle. In proposing to confer the franchise upon those who do not now possess it we ought to look to their fitness; we ought not to consider how we can obtain a certain number of additional votes, and then ask the House to support our measure because the number is one which may not alarm them. I say that, if instead of 257,000 there had been 557,000 men who, in the opinion of the House, were fit to receive the suffrage, the suffrage ought to have been given to them; and, at the same time, I assert that the fact that the number to be enfranchised is only half the number at all that the class proposed to be admitted to the franchise by this measure is one upon whom the suffrage ought to be conferred. I am not now giving any opinion on the policy of the proposition before us; but it appears to me that the founding a recommendation to extend the franchise merely upon a calculation of numbers is an unsafe and dangerous proceeding.

What is the addition which the noble Lord is about to make to the borough constituency? Here are his figures. The present constituencies of the cities and boroughs of England and Wales may be placed at 440,000, including freemen, and the noble Lord makes a proposition by which they shall be increased to 658,000. Let us consider what is the character of the present constituencies, and then let us see what is the character of the addition which is to be made to them. There is no fallacy so great as to suppose that, because a man is registered and votes under a ten-pound household qualification, he therefore lives in a ten-pound house. Reflection and observation, especially after the debates of the last twelve months, have impressed that pretty generally upon the conviction of society. In the existing body of 410,000 housekeepers—I deduct the freemen—all classes almost in Her Majesty's dominions are included, from the patrician resident who, perhaps, pays a rent of £1,000 a year for his dwelling, to the weaver and the dock-labourer of the Tower Hamlets who exercise the franchise under the lowest degree of qualification. But between Grosvenor Square and the Tower Hamlets, or rather between the classes which they represent, there is scarcely any class in England that is not included in the existing borough constituencies. All the mercantile class, all the professional class, all the various classes of retail dealers—classes of different political opinions, of different religious opinions, of different habits, of different social standing—at present exercise the franchise in cities and boroughs. To these 410,000 persons, whose feelings, whose position, whose opinions, whose habits are all so varying and so contrary, the noble Lord, under this Bill, proposes to add 248,000, who are all from the same class, and whose opinions, feelings, and habits are identical. Let us consider what will be the effect upon our present constituent body, with its various elements, of the introduction of a class so purely homogeneous. It may be said that raising the constituent body, considering the question only numerically, from 440,000 to 658,000 is not a very great experiment; that it is, as the noble Lord has told us, an increase of only one-third. But it appears to me that if we accept that calculation, we shall embrace a fallacy which, may greatly mislead us. What we have to consider is, what will be the probable effect of the proposed extension of the franchise upon the present borough constituencies. As it happens that the proposed new elec-

[First Night.]

will produce what, generally speaking, be described as no effect whatever the present Metropolitan Constituents and as, of course, they will produce effect upon the constituencies of the counties, we must deduct the amount of those constituencies from the existing constituent body before we can attempt to state what will be the effect of the new upon the old one. If we deduct 100 electors, which is the amount of metropolitan constituencies and the constituencies of the Universities, from the existing constituent body, we shall find that the number of the remaining is only 288,000; making a deduction of 20 per cent from the addition which the noble Lord proposes there will remain 100; and, therefore, we have to consider what will be the effect upon the new constituent body of 288,000 of a homogeneous class of 203,000 coming in competition with it at public elections. Even that mode of putting the question which is an accurate and a true one, hardly conveys a complete idea to the mind of the manner in which the new electors must necessarily act upon our cities and boroughs; because, to ascertain what will be the effect of 203,000 voters, all of one class, bound together by the same sentiments and the same habits, upon 288,000 electors of different opinions, influenced by different feelings, and regulated by different habits, we must recollect that, as shown by the returns which the Government have placed before us, in six boroughs out of those among the most important in the country—the constituency is trebled, it is doubled, and in 48 the addition is at least one-half of the present electoral body. It results, therefore, that one-half of the boroughs of England and Wales will, so far as we can form any calculation, be under the influence of the new class of voters. I give no opinion at all upon the policy of the measure; my object is to put before the House the real state of the facts, and to show what may be the probable results of the proposed extension of the franchise. Let us now consider whether the participation upon whom the noble Lord is anxious to confer this great political power is a class who are incapable, or who are likely to exercise it. Are they a class who have shown no inclination to combine? Are they a class incapable of organization? Is it the reverse. If we look to the history of this country during the present century, we shall find that the aristocracy, or upper classes, have on several very startling occasions shown a great power of organization. I think it cannot be denied that the working classes, especially since the peace of 1815, have shown a remarkable talent for organization, and a power of discipline and combination inferior to none. The same, I believe, cannot be said of the middle classes. With the exception of the Anti-Corn-Law League, I cannot recall at this moment any great successful political organization of the middle classes, and living in an age when everything is known we now know that that great confederation, which ultimately proved so triumphant, owed its success to a great and unforeseen calamity, and was on the eve of dispersion and dissolution only a short time before that terrible event occurred. [An ironical cheer from Mr. Bright.] I can only say that my authority is one of the most eminent members of your own consideration. But the fortune of the League does not affect my argument, which is founded on the fact that the working classes have shown on various occasions, and for long continuous periods, powerful organization, discipline, and combination quite equal to those of the upper classes; but that the middle classes, with the exception of the Anti-Corn-Law League, have not, in my memory, conducted any great political confederation to a successful issue. Then the class to which you are about to give this predominance, is perfectly capable of organization; and from the days of the Luddites to the present period, the tradition of frequently secret, but always well-disciplined, organization has been preserved among the working classes. It is said that the working classes are exceedingly intelligent and educated, and therefore likely to appreciate the possession of the franchise. But these are reasons why you should take care in legislating on this subject, that you do not give them a predominance. What has been the object of our legislative labours for many years past but to put an end to a class legislation which was much complained of? But you are now proposing to establish a class legislation of a kind which may well be viewed with apprehension.

Mr. Disraeli

It is highly necessary, in dealing with this subject, and in attempting to confer the franchise on the working classes, that you should not establish by that means a class legislation with which, considering its power and probable consequences, no class lation that has hitherto, though only partially, prevailed can for a moment be compared. It was obvious policy that while attempting to introduce the working class to the exercise of the franchise, should counteract the tendency to this domination, by giving a variety of franchises, and by effecting a natural counterpoise to consequences which all must create. This was attempted in the Bill brought forward last year, and how were the propositions contained in that Bill met? They were called "fancy franchises," and that was considered an error. Alliteration tickles the ear, and is a popular form of language among poets. It is, I believe, the characteristic of rude and barbarous poetry; but it is a bad argument in legislation. I thought it a remarkable circumstance, after hearing much of the objection to "fancy franchises," that the present Bill was not brought on the table of the House before a distinguished Liberal rising in every quarter on the opposite benches proposing the introduction of what was pronounced last year as "fancy franchises." Let us see what you mean by "fancy franchises." We never had an opportunity of arguing the question last year because the Bill was not allowed to go to the Committee. I will take a "fancy franchise"—a franchise dependent on the occupation of a house, and which is commonly called the "lodger franchise." Gentlemen speak of the lodger franchise as if lodging were a casual circumstance in our social life; that it might be well as not to give a lodger the franchise; that he was very likely to be a respectable man, but that, after all, it was not a matter of any great importance. Now, lodging is not an accident of our social life: it is a condition of our life. The richer the country gets, the greater its trade, the more numerous will become the lodger class. Just as the retail trade takes every year larger numbers the shopkeeper must have a shop, either as a magazine for his goods or as a means of exhibiting his goods. The larger the shop, the more numerous is the house to his social wants; and so, just as the country grows in wealth and trade, the shopkeepers will feel the necessity of filling his house with commodious chambers; and in this way the lodger class comes into existence with ample or sufficient means, and with the habits that make men respectable in this country. They are educated, and feel a sense of responsibility in the performance of public duties. When you give a vote to the mere householders, surely those who really occupy the house, and are infinitely more wealthy, and frequently much better educated, ought not to be debarred from a trust of which they are worthy. What is the use of calling it a "fancy franchise?" It is not a "fancy franchise," but a real franchise; as real as, and more likely to be worthily exercised than, the householders' franchise, which, according to a limited and barbarous notion, you consider the only proper franchise.

The payment of direct taxes might well be a basis of the suffrage. You are now in this country substituting, in a great degree, direct taxation for indirect taxation. The careful and limited substitution of direct taxation for indirect, which has gone on now for some years, is a matter, no doubt, of the utmost importance, and highly advantageous to the country, but it is a system which, if pursued without great prudence and caution, would make the Finance Minister who proposed it the Necker of this country. It is a process connected with great consequences, and at a moment when you not only propose to confer the franchise but predominate power on a class that does not pay direct taxation, I hardly know any qualification which could be more properly recommended than a suffrage based on the payment of direct taxation. It will be answered, though momentous consequences may depend on a class enfranchised on this basis, it is a mere "fancy franchise"—but it is unnecessary to pursue the subject further, because every one must feel what a silly and unmeaning phrase that is.

I have placed before the House some critical remarks with respect to the borough franchise. I think the noble Lord made a mistake in founding his proposition on a mere consideration of numbers. I think the noble Lord ought to have considered, in the first place, fitness, and not numbers. Following his principle, this appears to be the consequence, that the noble Lord is about to introduce a body homogeneous in character and interests of upwards of 200,000 into our boroughs, in addition to what is really not more, so far as the question of their influence is concerned, than a body of about 288,000. Then, in one-half of the boroughs in England the new constituency will be able to command the seats, and by so doing you are changing the depositary of political power to a very great extent, and are, in fact, conferring power on a class,—a result, which your recent legislation, during the last ten years, has endeavoured in every way to avoid. I cannot, therefore, approve this mode of increasing the suffrage in boroughs. I do not think this proposition ought to have been brought forward, unless accompanied by means through which the elements of the constituency should be more various in character, and unless a counterpoise to the predominance of any particular class were established. I know it may be said that the result of the last election was favourable to the introduction of the working classes into the constituency by the mode of reducing the franchise. It is difficult to say what was the result of the last general election. That is a matter of very considerable doubt; but there is no doubt that the noble Lord took a prudent course when he took a prompt one, and called for the opinion of Parliament at the moment of its meeting. What might have been the opinion of Parliament after sitting a few months longer I leave the House to judge. The opinion of the country on this question of admitting the working classes to the suffrage was given in no decided, but rather in a hesitating, manner; and I think the opinion of the country was this, that it was desirable that a certain portion of the working classes—those who by their skill and conduct had proved themselves worthy of the electoral privilege—should be admitted into the constituency under certain conditions, which would guard the community from the predominance of that class. That, I believe, was the real verdict of the country.

[First Night.]

But it is a mistake to suppose that the working classes at this moment have no share in the representation. I must consider the freemen of England as a part of the working classes, though they are always treated with such contempt by some hon. Gentlemen. Moreover, the result has shown that in the metropolis the great body of the working classes are in possession of the franchise; and that they also possess the franchise in many of the most important northern boroughs no one questions. I do not suppose that you can estimate the share of the working classes in the representation at less than one-ninth or one-eighth even of the existing constituencies. But when hon. Gentlemen lay it down as a principle that the working classes ought to enjoy the franchise we must remember that working men are not confined to towns alone, and that there are others who also have a fair right to consideration. The superior class of rural labourers and of working men in the country, if you look at their knowledge of their pursuits, their general conduct, and the great skill which is required in their daily duties, need not shrink from a comparison with the workmen of the towns. If you are to recognize the claims of skilled mechanics, you must equally take into consideration the claims of English woodmen, English shepherds, English gardeners, and some of the higher class of labourers in husbandry. It is impossible to deal with the question in a general way, and, therefore, you necessarily have to make a selection of the working classes, in order that their voice and influence may be heard. It follows that you must have limitation, that you must have qualification; and I say that the only effect of the noble Lord's Bill will be to give a predominance, in half the boroughs of England, to a class who, if they act in conformity with their antecedents, will evince decision, combination, discipline, and will probably return to this House a body of men who will exercise a great and, perhaps, a controlling influence over the Government of the country. Now, are you prepared to sanction such a course? Is it a course to be justified—I will not say on the principles of political expediency, but—on the principles of political justice? I contend that it is not, and therefore I cannot agree that the method by which the noble Lord proposes to admit the influence of the working classes in the election of Members of Parliament is a wise and well-considered one. I think he ought to have increased the borough constituencies by various means, and not merely by this perilous monotony of process; and while he might have introduced the most skilful mechanics among the working classes into the constituency, he might have done it under conditions which would not have neutralized the voice of all the various classes comprised in the present borough constituencies.

I proceed now to consider the next principle on which this Bill is founded—namely, the reduction of the county franchise. I, for one, have never opposed the creation in the counties of an ample constituency. Believing that the influence of the land is most beneficial for the preservation of our constitutional liberties, I have been always anxious that the great landed proprietors in this House should come here supported by the voice of a numerous constituency, and should be at the head not merely of their tenantry, but of their neighbours. I have always felt that that would add to their influence and power, which are of the utmost advantage to the State. But in increasing the county constituencies one condition should be observed. The persons thus enfranchised should be fairly connected with the chief property and the chief industry of the county. A constituency is not connected with the chief property and chief industry of a county if, for example, the county suffrage is possessed by some town which may be a new community developing itself by means of some special interest of its own, or some decaying borough without any sympathy with the property and pursuits of the county. I don't think also that the condition I have just laid down is observed when the inhabitants of a great borough teeming with a population which has overpassed the old parliamentary limits affixed to the town in 1832, but connected with that borough by every tie and duty, social and political, are permitted to send out their hordes of electors, who ought to have votes for the borough of which they really form a part, to elect a county member having little sympathy with their local interests and feelings. I don't think that main condition is observed when at any time, but especially at a time when you are establishing the franchises of England more and more upon occupation, you allow freeholds in towns to become the great manufactories of split votes, by which, at a general election, bands of voters are enabled to pour forth, and elect Members of Parliament for a district with which they have no local sympathy and no common interests. In the Bill I do not find any means adopted by which that great injustice can be rectified. The noble Lord, though his measure is a small one, can, however, condescend to details where the county suffrage is concerned. For example, I find that Clause 4 will effect disfranchisement on a large scale, by enacting that the occupation of a building jointly with land is not to confer a right of voting, unless the building be of £5 annual value. That clause is a new one, and would disfranchise a large number of voters in the rural districts. The noble Lord has a terror of disfranchisement, which with adroit misrepresentation he opposed in the Bill submitted last year, while proposing it in every measure of his own; but when simplicity is the order of the day, the noble Lord, though he will not establish a just franchise in the counties, adopts a sweeping measure of disfranchisement, applying only to rural voters.

Mr. Disraeli

The county franchise as proposed in the Bill will greatly reduce the influence of the landed proprietors and of the landed interest in this country. I object to any such reduction, and I will tell the hon. Member, who seems alarmed or annoyed by that expression, why it is I object. I look round upon Europe at the present moment, and I see no country of any importance in which political liberty can be said to exist. I attribute the creation and the maintenance of our liberties to the influence of the land and to our tenure of land. In England there are large properties round which men can rally, and that, in my mind, forms the only security in an old European country against that centralized form of government which has prevailed and must prevail in every European community where there is no such counterpoise. It is our tenure of land to which we are indebted for our public liberties, because it is the tenure of land which makes local government a fact in England, and which allows the great body of Englishmen to be ruled by traditional influence and by habit, instead of being governed, as in other countries, by mere police. Well, Sir, believing that the proposed reconstruction of the county franchise has a tendency to diminish the just and salutary influence of the land of this country, I highly object to the noble Lord's plan.

Now, the third principle upon which this measure is founded, is the re-distribution of Parliamentary seats. Let us see whether the application of that principle be a just and wise one. There are two schools of opinion upon this subject. There is the school of politicians who would entirely reconstruct the borough system of England, and who would not only entirely reconstruct it, but I may say would entirely subvert it. They are of opinion that what should be obtained by public parliamentary election in this country is a declaration of the opinion of the mere numerical majority of the population in the country, and they would subvert the present system and reconstruct it on a scale which would obtain that result. That is what I call the American system, and it works sufficiently well in the United States. The population of the United States greatly exceeds that of community; it is sustained by the table territory; there-islative Assembly, or on the principle of they have a first-rate that principle. But to England. If we a majority as the test system, we are very ntries in our popula-a representative as-at principle, all we a third-rate assem-of politicians is of ion of course is an tion. Nobody would y that. It is an ele- s property is; but in try, highly civilized, ial organization, they represent all the inte-, and they are essen-ave a representative his principle you will, in England the most ization in the world, esentative body, that f Commons. These No one pretends that as invented to obtain a system which in that description of is cherished and pre-cient machinery has which produces a de-stand the scheme of Birmingham and his artled the country a y act consistently on le. But those who inciple must be ruled tions, and must pro- All they conclude in seats is this: When dical revision of the country that new and ve arisen not duly lowing the example—not merely Parlia-ut the precedents of he exercise of their fer upon these new presentation, and in-stom of this country, t the number of this, increased, they hold e which they can take is to deprive exti degree of their re; fore it was a sound Government adop these wants, when of the least imp country should co of the means by be obtained. So that example I ap the noble Lord ha Lord has carried far enough. If t those who think t is indefensible, he great change; bu English principle, there are no abst you can even par ough which enjoy ing Members to tl that the noble Lor noble Lord ought chisement precede are a few boroug land whose claims be denied. But i the spirit of our C boroughs in the n enfranchising othe we should study t throughout the wh one or two counti tion is inadequate interests of a diff racter. There is a ing, extending ov interests—agricult those of another po where manufactur and it is advisable rests which are no should be called int Lord, however, go

[First Night.]

I object to his : First of all I thin plete fallacy in e ture to call cumul already represente from the Govern they have so acte that principle in tl man has £100,000 vote, and on very know that althoug fortune, and you g the humblest dwe he has an indirec munity which ase protects his prop do that for Manchester and Birmingham which you do not do for the wealthy individual? Hon. Gentlemen are sent here to represent the opinion of places, and not the power of places. Does anybody suppose that if the interests of Manchester were assailed they would only be defended by the two respectable Representatives who sit in this House for that borough? Not at all. We know that there would be scores and scores of Members, not confined to one side of the House, who would support the interests of Manchester; and, therefore, I entirely disapprove of this principle, which appears to be perfectly unconstitutional, and which would change the character of this House, because, if representation is to be meted out according to population and property, you would soon have very few places indeed represented in this House, and representation would be confined entirely to large manufacturing and commercial cities and large counties.

I admit that in the Reform Bill of 1832 you did confer on some counties a third Member. But the circumstances under which that was done could not be drawn into a precedent, but if it were one, as I shall perhaps be told, it would be a very bad one. In the Reform Bill of 1832 it was necessary to increase the county Members. There were some counties in which you exceeded the number of voters which authorized the conferring of two Members, and yet which did not reach that number which permitted division, and this plan of having a third Member was consequently had recourse to. But some of those counties we now know have reached an amount of population which authorizes division, and it would be better, if you wish to increase the county representation, to divide those counties than to have recourse to this system of cumulative members, which cannot be defended, and which is entirely opposed to the spirit of the Constitution.

But there is another ground on which I think it is equally objectionable. It would appear to be the happy practice of the Constitution that almost every class and every interest, and every great institution is represented, and though under our constitution in that sense the minority may be represented, still when a constituent body is formed the majority ought to decide, and the minority in that sense ought to have no claim. It is the custom of the country, and that is a very strong reason; but beyond that the principle is based upon all our constitutional precedents and practice, and it would appear to be a principle which can also be upheld on sound political reasons, even abstractedly. The noble Lord in 1854 proposed that the minority should be directly represented in this House. In my opinion a more unconstitutional course could not have been suggested, for there is only one proper way by which the minority of a constituent body should be represented, and that is by becoming a majority. The noble Lord has now proposed, not directly, but indirectly, to secure a representation to the minority in several places in some cities and some counties. I entirely object to that; but it is done, although indirectly, in this Bill, and there are some counties and some towns to which a third Member is added on that principle. We have complained of late years of a want of distinct parties and of distinct principles in this House. So far as I can learn that is a want which will in a very short time disappear. I think we shall soon have distinct parties and distinct principles on both sides; but if anything could be devised which would introduce into this House a timid and temporizing spirit, it is the political and parliamentary machinery that recognizes the representation of the minority of a constituent body in Parliament. A want of conviction and a want of energy and spirit in public life would be the consequence, and therefore I entirely disagree with the second object which the noble Lord wishes to obtain by thus dealing with the redistribution of seats. It appears to me that the principle of the redistribution of seats, as the noble Lord applies it, is unsound. It can satisfy none of those opposed to the English element of parliamentary life who want to reconstruct the House of Commons on the American principle, while at the same time it fatally alters the only sound principles upon which the disfranchisement of boroughs ought to be permitted—namely, that of conferring a representation on interests not already represented.

I have now touched on the three principles of this Bill. What is the course we ought to take with respect to it? That is the question. It is a very bad measure. That, I think, is the universal opinion. In fact, I believe I do not know more than two individuals whom it perfectly satisfies—namely, the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary and the Member for Birmingham; and the Member for Birmingham, with that candid audacity which

[First Night.]

lises the pernicious nd the dangerous ready told us that used than he shall tain a much more if we reject this g, we know what said by the noble Parliamentary Retending the franvers in a responsi-
es brought in a Bill inst extending the deal with the subranchise might be ended, in a way,
l to the country.

can form an estits in my posses-
of 1859 the fran-ore extended than I am not against

Nor, if it is ne-
subject at all, am ion of seats; that liamentary repre-
ew sufficiently res in counties and ies increased, bebe increased in a ngthen the Cen-
think the means istence by which ned, and by which t have an increas-
their opinions in other hand, the co—so important
e liberties of the interest might be

Therefore, so far
s of this Bill are am not justified lk the application
est objectionable.
the Bill on its pportunity of committee. What will

That will be dech will allow all consider the res those who need is importance. I r to intimate what or my friends in

I am not at all pose anything my-not sure whether measure may not,

considering the circumst it was introduced and p with the noble Lord a Government. Indeed, limited and Parliamenta sequences of this Bill, i the Conservative party very great alarm. I do boroughs of England t livered over to one clas and opinions and habit do not think those 100 presented, generally spe of the Conservative pa by this House of a vas
bers who now adorn it, weight and responsibility though they do not sit o as myself, I should not a national calamity.

sorry to see the just influ of the Whig party curtail of the best securities for good government in this a change takes place i tion of this country, handed to a party, on
of the House they sit, to exercise that power o
on American principles. thing when such change power should be handed spect the traditions of who will be faithful t claims; therefore I sh this serious blow, so party is concerned, and which twenty years a have expected such a shall, therefore, not e reading of this Bill, but when the House is in what propositions will it, even in the opinion opposite, who have alre disposition to make A not injurious to the interests of the country.

It has been said of English statesmen that they are more remarkable for their active qualities than for their prudence, and I am not surprised at that. Man is rather an active than a contemplative creature, and it is the privilege of few to have the power of prediction. I think on the whole it is better for England that public opinion has been rather in advance of Parliament than that it should be the reverse. One remark has been to make this Assembly a practical one, and though we may have occasionally blundered, it is abounding in resources of men, money, and military material, and so enamoured of glory that it has freely bartered freedom for fame, no longer conceals its thirst of general empire. As far as Europe is concerned, the prospect is much more dangerous than in the days of the Great Monarch; for in the days of Louis XIV. Europe was full of military energy; Europe now is prostrate and spiritless. As far as England is concerned, the prospect is infinitely more dangerous than in the days of the French Republic and the old French Empire; for France was then our implacable foe; France is now our unswerving friend. France then menaced our hearths; France now decorates our citizens. France harassed our trade then by a continental blockade; France now facilitates commercial intercourse by treaties of amity. There is nothing to keep the English people watchful or awake. Superior to rapine, hardly condescending to force, France is building up a colossal despotism by all the arts of the most advanced Liberalism—by universal suffrage—by secret voting—by electoral districts. Will you never be warned? Is this the time and the condition of affairs when you should attempt feebly, but in the same vein, to imitate these political schemes? Is this the time when you should still further deviate from that old, that free, and that aristocratic, constitution which has formed the Empire of England and framed the liberties of Englishmen? Sir, I must say that is not my opinion. The noble Lord the Secretary of State, since the night when he entered into the fatal pledge on this side of the House which has placed his Government in consequence in a position of great embarrassment, has been called upon to preside over an office of the State very different from that which he then contemplated. The noble Lord is in receipt every day of information which may well make him look grave, and the perusal of which cannot but teach him that it is a great thing for a Minister that he can fall back upon the ancient institutions of a country which have proved their power to stem any storm. Well, Sir, that being the case, I will not relinquish the hope that before we are summoned to go into Committee, a relieved House of Commons and a grateful people will learn from the noble Lord that this unnecessary, this uncalled-for, and this mischievous, measure has been withdrawn.

MR. LEATHAM said, he should not have risen had he not been aware that the

[First Night.

in a voice in the legislature, and a voice which was equal to that of the gigantic constituency of Salford. What were the arguments which the noble Lord advanced for the retention of the privileges of these small boroughs? He yielded to no Member in that House in most profound respect and most hearty admiration of the noble Lord, and it was therefore with great diffidence that he ventured to differ from him. But, did he not understand the noble Lord to imply that it was to the petty boroughs that they must look for their statesmen? Did he not imply that the large boroughs sent up persons absorbed in trade, and the petty boroughs persons absorbed in agriculture, and that it was from the petty boroughs that sprang that divine race, ignorant of both of commerce and agriculture, to whom it seemed Providence had committed the care of this great agricultural and commercial country? But the noble Lord's argument was not altogether original. He thought they had heard something like it before, and that it proceeded from the other side of the House. He thought the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks had startled them on a previous occasion by telling them that if the House were to be composed alone of the representatives of great interests, the Government of Her Majesty must revert to the despotism of 1640, and that the wisdom of the Court would usurp the place of the representatives of the people. But he altogether denied that large constituencies only sent up persons who had not the ability or the leisure to conduct public affairs. When he heard that assertion his eye wandered involuntarily to the Treasury bench, and, passing over the noble Viscount at the head of the Government, who till recently represented a large constituency, but who for personal convenience no doubt contented to represent Tiverton, it fell on the noble Lord himself (Lord John Russell), who, sitting for the greatest commercial city in the Empire, was the first to tell them that commercial constituencies did not send up statesmen. Next to him sat the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), whom he thought all would admit to be a statesman, and who represented one of the most influential constituencies in England, the University of Oxford. Beside him sat another right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Milner Gibson), representing the large borough of Ashton; then came the President of the India Board (Sir C. Wood), representing the populous borough of Halifax. Amongst them also was the Secretary for War (Mr. S. Herbert), sitting for the great constituency of South Wilts, and there was the Home Secretary (Sir George Grey), who till recently sat for Herefordshire, and in addition there were the Attorney General (Sir Richard Bethell) and the President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Villiers), who represented the important borough of Wolverhampton; and the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Cardwell), sitting for Oxford city. It appeared to him then that the great boroughs and cities and counties vied with one another in sending up statesmen to Parliament, and if they did not send up more it was not because they had no disposition so to do, but because there were no more statesmen to send. The noble Lord defended small boroughs, because twice in the course of a century great statesmen had been unfortunate enough to quarrel with large constituencies, and lose their seats. And the noble Lord had great respect for the feelings of the people of Little Peddlington, but had no compassion for the hundreds and thousands of electors throughout the country who had been keenly smarting under the sense that they were not sufficiently represented. He (Mr. Leatham) submitted whether it would not have been more statesmanlike to have dealt with this great question without reference to Parliamentary majorities. On one memorable occasion the noble Lord and his friends followed this course, and the result was a great accession to our constitutional dignity, and a place in history for the noble Lord. Possibly Her Majesty's Ministers might have lost some portion of the confidence of that House, but they would have gained the confidence of the country, and they would eventually have passed a great measure not only of reform but of justice and of security. He feared that hon. Gentlemen had been to a certain extent misled by the representations which had appeared in the public press, that the people cared nothing about reform. This assertion had been made with a feverish anxiety of reiteration which convinced him that those who uttered it had but little confidence in its truth. No, the people of England were anxiously watching that House, and it would be well not to arouse passions which were slumbering. At that moment great prosperity prevailed, and there were no symptoms of agitation; but when there was a recurrence of those periods of disaster with which

[First Night.]

Providence saw fit from time to time to visit them, would that be a time to deal with this grave, and with what would then be this perilous question? He should have thought that the time when the demand for reform was couched in moderate and respectful language, when the desire for it was still a desire and not a passion, and when the hand of the people was extended in entreaty and not in menace, was the very moment granted by Heaven for passing a great measure which the people would receive as an evidence, not of weakness, but of good will, and would accept with gratitude for the privilege bestowed, and not with exultation over the right extorted. He regretted that Her Majesty's Government had not felt it their duty to introduce such a measure. He regretted it because the work which engaged them to-day would engage them again to-morrow, but still more, because a great opportunity for securing the confidence of the people had been flung away. So long as that House pursued such a policy as was recommended by the right hon. Gentleman opposite — a policy of apprehension, suspicion, and distrust, so long would they have to deal with a suspicious and distrustful people; but if they once took the nation fairly into confidence, instead of creating the evil which had been anticipated, they would add new life to the State, new lustre to the Crown, and glorious centuries to the history of England.

Mr. H. BAILLIE said, that unlike his right hon. Friend, the Member for Buckinghamshire, he was so far from desiring the withdrawal of the Bill, that he hoped the time had at length arrived when the House would be able to pass a Measure of Parliamentary Reform satisfactory in the present, and, above all, of a permanent character, that we might get rid of the scandal which had for some years past been exhibited of the first and leading statesmen of the country bidding against each other for political power. It was far better, in his opinion, that the constitution should be placed upon a democratic basis, than that a system of agitation on the subject should be carried on, not by reckless agitators, but by the first statesmen in the country. Such a state of things tended to destroy all confidence in the stability of the institutions of the country, as well as in the honour of public men of both parties. The noble Lord said last year that the great object of a Reform Bill should be to give satisfaction to the working classes measure of the Bill involved. First, the red franchise; second, franchise; and representation from constituencies. franchise, the 1832 was a was supposed, that every man must be in the property. The give up that practice; for it cost voter paying boroughs had his labour. T Baillie) could not of reasoning to draw a line between a £6 house and a £5 house or equally labour of realized property same rate of same privilege whatever between one lived in a was dear, while were to give implied by the they ought to tions. There opinion, the franchise proposed Birmingham stages over the in the first plan nature, as the assuredly be; not liable to alteration in it was a very in therefore the only alternative rather give his proposition for upon rating, territorial, which large towns, out the advantage household suffrage in all the met most of the cities and boroughs in the smaller find persons in

Mr. Leatham

£6, and ing them dispos-
ts. As ten the ent was ed that in the ras said classes
in the ominate hat the political desirantation e object ned by sidering n mind ing for e after to lose fluence inchise,
e value it take tion of hat al-
ret. It
tain to or anyon the ore the old and Europe; what of arter of r which
n. If a k place Austra-
f gold, anchise ld suf-identity lly dea £10
e £10
o ready n their e house above e lower l to en-l further t it de-ranchise er point or the Bill of the late Governme the different classes of th be represented. With resp fer of the right of repr small boroughs to larger ec noble Lord appeared to be steps of the right hon.

Member for Buckingham last Session that the an boroughs ought not to b because they enabled gr prietors of influence to non who would not find their w of Commons if they had large bodies of their fellow Mr. DISRAELI: I n
such statement.

Mr. BALLIE had und
hon. Friend to refer to A in point. For his own p did not believe any Ref give satisfaction which d chise these small borough hon. Gentleman the Men inghamshire seemed to b opinion, because he state occasion that if he shoul introduce a Reform Bill contain clauses for the dis nomination boroughs, so st had been the condemnati those places in the Hous
It had often been said t vernment placed themselv tion when they undertook question of Reform. That what must be said of the n the head of the present G having formed with grea Administration composed ing every political opinion, self, like another Franken control the monster his created, and compelled to from the principles of whi the statements he made totally and entirely dis could not be a stronger p rious effect which the con of this question was calcu than the influence which to exercise over the minds our public men, and he ther under the auspices of He sent Ministers a safe and tion of this great and difficu be attained during the pre Mr. BAXTER said, it
cessary for him to reply to for Inverness-shire (Mr.

hon. Gentleman was in favour of household suffrage and the abolition of small nomination boroughs, and though he (Mr. Baxter) considered that he himself was something of a radical, he could not go much further. It was a remarkable sign of the times that this great Conservative party, attached as it was to the principles of the constitution and averse to any considerable changes in our institutions, had, notwithstanding a few critical observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks, not thought it their duty to give an united opposition to the Reform Bill of the Government. It appeared to him that that policy of the party was not only an acknowledgment of the general good working of the Reform Act of 1832, which conferred great benefits on the country, but an indication that they were not now inclined, whatever they might have been in past times, to offer any obstinate resistance to measures of gradual and rational progress. He should be glad to receive their aid in passing a Bill such as Lord Grey in 1832 said "should have a tendency to give new vigour to the constitution of the country, and make it in point of fact what it was in theory—a fair and full representation of the people." The great masses of the people were now happy and contented, and they hoped to obtain an increase of political power, but not, as in times past, through excitement and agitation, but through the good sense of the upper and middle classes, as reflected in the House of Commons. Physical force chartism and revolutionary ideas had gone down, and given place, as he firmly believed, not to indifference in regard to the privileges of free men, but to a firm confidence that political rights would be surely though gradually conceded to the people. It would therefore be wise, just, and politic on the part of the legislature to extend the franchise. They all knew what an amazing progress had of late years been made in the education of the people. All classes had advanced very materially, and he did not believe that any Gentleman could have mixed with the people without perceiving the progress which had been made in their condition. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) had represented the present measure as an extremely hazardous experiment, and had said that to extend the franchise to £6 householders would be to transfer the whole political power in one-half of the boroughs from the shop-keeping classes to the class immediately below them.

Mr. Baxter

He (Mr.) doubt wh place. E of this co in classes man had took place had state agitation the middl binations. meant no then he (l agree wit middle cl combining former t carry the and Corp tholic Em measures been mai the middl fore follo proposed class. S be the cas man who artisans, as intelli shopkeepi that the occasiona newspaper political themselves doubt, pr element i porters of another a ponents— was of a that it turb the its accour telligible but he w when it w reformer, from a C would bric additional constitutio But its va were pass settle the period, pr tury to tleman (M deal of cre in the Bill of his Government. Those franchisees might very probably have conferred the right of voting upon certain classes who were extremely well qualified to exercise it; but the right hon. Gentleman forgot the answer which had so often been given to his scheme—its liability to abuse, and the facilities it would have afforded for the creation of fictitious votes. The lodgers' franchise, he might remark, was not a fancy franchise at all. No doubt theoretical objections might be adduced to a simple rental qualification; but there were many parts of the Constitution under which we happily lived of which the same thing might be said. Nevertheless the rental qualification was found in practice to work well, and he (Mr. Baxter) was Tory enough to be disposed, in this respect, to let well alone. One of the Members for the Tower Hamlets had pointed out the other day the inequality of the mode in which the Bill would operate; and he said that he would rather resign his seat than vote for a Reform Bill that would add so little to the number of his own constituents. But there were inequalities in the present system; and the Bill did not make, or even increase, those irregularities. They were a necessary incident in a rental qualification. He regretted that a £6 franchise in the boroughs which he represented would not include that higher class of artisans whom he was so anxious to see members of the electoral body; but he would not on that account oppose or even impede a measure which would certainly have the effect of enfranchising that class in all the chief seats of manufacturing industry. He would then say a few words on what he conceived to be the omissions and the defects of the Bill. He hoped the noble Lord would consider before the Bill went into Committee the propriety of altering the clause relating to the county franchise, as to render it necessary that every county qualification should have upon it a house of the value of £5; because unless that step were taken the great landowners would be enabled to enfranchise their retainers and dependents in a manner not calculated to add strength to the institutions of the country. He regretted that the noble Lord had not seen his way to grapple with the question of the redistribution of seats. One word with respect to the Ballot. Without in the least believing that the Ballot would be a panacea for all the corruption that took place in so many constituencies, he failed to feel the force of the a system wh. stitutions in t ber for Pon shown in his time ago th and he (Mr. E personal obse brought into c of America. stories about elections; bu might tell aga tyranny of mol ever to do wit In the United real liberty th Men were th wheels of pa Englishman w the States it admitted, that in political m There was a ticket. Tho colours, and t hands, or, as w stuck then. in went to the p secret voting. the Ballot has simply as a rapidly as pos secrecy. In so of the mob (t ferred as aris was used no but against w servative sect prevent the s tem of secret the redistribut anticipated by hon. Member Lord talked as all the small even in the r for Birmingham lost, which w find seats for pon to incur more popular bates on the the present C who he hoped Lord with his very eloquent as the only m constitution f House of Co empowering aristocrats likely to take a proceedings at an age able to go through training; and he t by a reference to am, Mr. Pitt, Mr. and Sir Robert Peel. theory, it was in- ta. He found that 854 contained a list ighs which returned o Parliament, and in his Bill of that y or altogether to appened that Dod's tion gave the ages o represented those inety-five hon. Gen- ively only one that ; six were under ; under forty; and completed their half is easily accounted s had each but one, ata left; and they r own relatives; so o spare for rising Mr. Baxter) hoped d would no longer more complete re-

To few statesmen much to strengthen hich our social and sted as the noble ous liberty, all must him; and he (Mr. is measure, with all o a law (as he hoped ld be regarded by is having detracted ided to his political t the favourite argu- who advocated this ce wise to deal with ces, for it was said, ublicous times would ey came, as sooner e, no one could tell nded, or in what manded. He was ake the House with o the consideration ey might see who- ld pass, they were relieved from any called on to accede w rejected or mate- rightly understood this measure it took a second step, and a large step, in advance towards the severance of the representation of the people from the property of the country; it proposed to increase the influence of numbers and decrease the influence of property, and he viewed with a feeling akin to dismay the fact that Parliament was called upon to legislate on that principle for the second time within less than thirty years. Undoubtedly, that was the result, if not the principle, of the first Reform Bill, and let it not be supposed that in saying this he had any desire to offer an adverse criticism on a measure to which, whatever might be the objections originally urged against it, the country had long since sworn allegiance, which had been accepted as the constitution of the country, and which men fondly hoped would bear some analogy, in point of duration at least, to the constitution which it had displaced. But a quarter of a century seemed now to be taken as the extreme measure of the duration of constitutions, and, as had been prophesied, in the lifetime of those who had framed the constitution of 1832, the Conservative party had to stand up for its preservation. As the borough constituencies now stood, they numbered about 400,000 electors, and, excluding the houses which gave the titles to those 400,000 voters, it appeared from the returns that there were within the Parliamentary boroughs about 300,000 houses above the value of £6, that is, 300,000 houses of the value of £6, but under £10, per annum, of which number 100,000 were under the value of £7 per annum. Deducting from that twenty-five per cent for the number of houses which, from some cause or other, did not constitute a franchise, 225,000 electors would be added to the list, of a class entirely below the £10 householders. This certainly was a considerable step towards the severance of representation from property, towards increasing the influence of numbers and diminishing the influence of property; and, as he had said, it was the second change in the same direction made within the last thirty years. The effect which continuous changes of this sort would have on the minds, and habits, and conduct of the people must not be put out of sight in considering this question. "Change," said the judicious Hooker, "is a great ill. It amazeth men, and causeth them to doubt whether anything be of itself good or evil, and whether all things are not rather as

Then look at the downward course of, advocat their legislation in the appointment of had alu judicial officers. In 1777, a Committee in Wes appointed by the Assembly out of the land sh Senate had the power of appointing the five ye Judges. In the regular course of the lieved working of democracy, the people de- to agru manded the right to choose their own State.
Judges, and the Judges were now elected charact by universal suffrage in State districts and opinion in judicial districts, new courts being anti-re stituted—a Court of Appeal and a Supreme not for Court. In 1777 the payment of Mem right of bers of the Legislatures does not appear that th have been suggested; but in 1821 it was advance thought that a sum, not exceeding three elevates dollars a day, should be allowed to mem- out the bers; and in 1846 the three dollars were adoption made certain, and a dollar allowed for induce every ten miles as travelling expenses. In lands t the constitution enacted by convention of them." 1846 would be found the traces of an sion sho agrarian law; by the 14th and 15th that not clauses of the first article of the Constitu- till it, tion, it was provided that no lease or grant tution c of agricultural land, for a longer period no sale than twelve years, in which any rent or no leas service is reserved, should be valid, and twelve and that all charges or fines reserved on alien- was a r ation should be void. It might be said ciple co that this was not an agrarian measure, these w but rather a law to regulate the relation could be of landlord and tenant, as the landowner of a co could let the land for twelve years. But ours, an observe, this is not one of the ordinary acts vanced of the Legislature. It is made by this describe special convention a part of the constitu- result c tion; and let them turn to the debates misman which brought about the carrying of those of polit clauses, and they would find their real York bu purport and object. The debates in both little or the Conventions of 1821 and 1846 were voted, a most instructive volumes for English who, for statesmen and politicians. "Mr. Brown them an voted against the first section, not because Every t he was not friendly to the principle, but Of this because he regarded it as humbug to second v incorporate in the constitution provisions dore Pa which were not necessary." With respect and a fe to the style of the speeches, they would man in find that the high tone of debate of the no speci earlier periods was not afterwards of learn maintained. He had not selected the passage acute ob on account of its style. Mr. Brown went on to say, "It was in direct opposition to the great principle which had animated all the people of this country, that of the free right of alienation of property. It was a wild project, which no man in his senses out of an anti-rent district would

Mr. Holt

"You
fifty men and, if y December the peop
Democrat Whigs.
suffrage t

men who tell us how to vote, who make all the most important laws. Do I err in estimating the number at 150? I do not like to exaggerate. Suppose there are 600 men, 300 in each party; those 600 manage the political action of the State in ordinary times."

And what was said of Boston was true of New York. Was that a desirable state of things to arrive at? Humiliation enough we had sustained already when political parties were seen bidding against each other for the support of the extreme democratical section. But should we descend to the lower depths of American and democratic politics, and, on a change of Administration, for example, see a general dismissal of officials from the highest to the lowest? Observe next the influence of universal suffrage—for we shall not stop at household suffrage—on the conduct of the Executive of the United States? In reference to their foreign affairs, if the daily journals were to be credited, the conduct of American Administrations towards foreign Powers received its colour on many occasions, not from the genuine opinions of the Government, but from the prejudices and passions of the masses. Of course, there was frequently a struggle on the part of the Government to keep right, but the result often was that their action was dictated by the people. Then as to the home administration, every officer, as he had said, even down to the schoolmaster and the porter, was dismissed at every change of Government, and a new set of officers was introduced. What trading in politics must there be for such a state of things to exist! It could only arise from a few men driving the electors to the poll and then selling them for appointments in the incoming administration. Then as to the bearing of pure democracy on the administration of justice. He was far from saying that in America the Judges did not duly discharge their duties. He had no recent evidence on the subject; but human nature was human nature; and when Judges were elected by the people for short terms, it was not, at all events, a satisfactory state of things. In England we had determined that our Judges, when once selected, should be above the reach of the Sovereign, above the reach of removal for anything but proved misconduct. Let Judges be liable to be displaced and they became subservient. This was human nature. Then as to its effect on the conduct and character of the members of the Legislature—the dollar for ten miles of travelling—what was the effect of that? The electors chose men of their own class, who were to have not only so many dollars a day, but so many dollars for travelling expenses. Let the House conceive the effect of Members coming to the bar or to the offices of the House to state their mileage, and to give in estimates of their actual or constructive distances of travelling. It was very well to say that we in England should spurn such things; but there in America was a kindred race working out the political system we are invited to follow to its proper results, and the Legislature there has voted itself so many dollars a day for remuneration and so many for travelling expenses. He might here again quote Theodore Parker:—

"In political office, if you are a senator from California or Oregon, you may draw 'constructive mileage,' and pay yourself two or three thousand dollars for a journey never made from home, and two or three thousand more back to your home. So you filch thousands of dollars out of the public purse, and you are the 'hon. senator' just as before. You have got the money, no matter how. You may be a senator from Massachusetts, and you may take the 'trust fund' offered you by the manufacturers of cotton, and be bound as their 'retained attorney' by your 'retaining fee,' and you are still 'the hon. senator from Massachusetts,' not hurt one jot in the eyes of the controlling classes. If you are Secretary of State, you may take 40,000 or 50,000 dollars from State Street and Wall Street, and suffer no discredit at all. At one end of the Union they will deny the fact as 'too atrocious to be believed;' at this end they admit it, and say it was 'honourable in the people to give it,' and 'honourable in the Secretary to take it.'"

He did not accept this as conclusive evidence of the corruption existing in the political system of America; but, at all events, either the Legislature or society was so demoralized that one of the foremost writers of that country ventured to make this serious charge. Then, what was the effect of the American constitution upon legislation? What was the course of taxation? The State-tax of New York and the city-tax, were, he believed, collected under one head—quite apart, of course, from the federal taxes—and these local imposts amounted not to 8s. not to 10s. per cent, but to 2 per cent per annum on property. The New York correspondent of The Times, in a letter published in that journal on December 20, 1859, said:—

"But these shortcomings are confined to one side of the account. On the other side the show of municipal taxation does great credit to the wealth of the city. The taxes and assessments of the gross valuation.

[First Night.

taxation upon an estate um."

o was clear from New York Herald, held in his hand,
taxable property,
ion from the year
city of New York
amount of taxable
l was 251,000,000
ed in 1859 to ut the rate of tax-was one half-dollar 1 1859 upwards of 3, so that while the y was twofold, the
is more than three-it it important to private letter from rochant at Birming-
for some years at cribing the nature
erty-tax, he adds—onal property is hard iculously unfair in New of course more fairly

high followed when property taxed those not advancing in the are giving the power he property, and at ment was teaching
not only how def-
out of income-tax,
be created in order come tax. Was it n would be lost on given? Soon there
o exempt incomes on the payment of but a life income," l dependent on my s a fee. How hard same duty!" The able that, with the hould wonder if it
that case he must a plea for the ex-incomes. It would do that a majority on property, seeing st not be mulcted, 1 for small incomes, ve charge upon proomes relieved, with ted, with indirect inishing, what dif-
between the income tax and the 2 pc

in New York?
cracy when once rection has fairly sible to stop—for was to advance.
taken place amon
and race when th this course. Th the American con
take so low a bas even for their F
there was an Up freeholders, elec yet, when once o about reforming vering property giving preponder they found it imp
point short of un its consequences.
pointed out were one hesitate up kind. Upon a
hon. Baronet the E. B. Lytton) he mocracy was lil surrendered wha
But that was li truth, for not onl render anything allowed anything had once been of then, before the
made by this l ther there shou cation. He was that this prop question for a qu
was that period
ing of a constit
but little in th tion. He stood 1832, and he net
ing the forebodin nence, that those carrying that ar
time, after an in years, come forw scheme, which t last for another little probability that period; bu tamper with ec
that your amend years was a ter
It would still change, and the grew by what it require further

was able to confer upon them. As regards the Whig party, their losses had been yet more extensive. The present Lord Carlisle, long after he had filled the higher offices of State, was for many years, from 1841, excluded as Lord Morpeth. Far more impressive was the notorious and melancholy fact that Lord Macaulay, thrown out of Parliament in 1847, was forced to retire from the Cabinet by his unmerited exclusion, and that the State for ever lost his talents as a Minister. To crown all, the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Home Department was excluded from the House of Commons in 1853 and in 1854, although very soon after a state of affairs arose, in which some distinguished persons having left the Government, a costly war, involving the fate of Europe and the honour of the country, his financial sound to say exclusions he med by the Parliament. ay that Par-on would not if they had proposition nder the Re- although an g the opin- n ineffective a House of ought to be go into the ble anomaly. tion of how

More than noble Lord. a first place ats of Sud- as to com- mentary and f placing in ction, those ling to sub- qual to this le Lord, by nance, might rwards con- e might re- remedy, but xtend a dis- as weakened not in any evil. As it eats, it does of doing so. t is, but, on the contrary, extends it. and-twenty seats which a cal capacity, whatever qu from. Only five of which by seats of such a char pretended that the counti Members will be added, o to which new Members w likely to be open to the g didates. The counties ' open to those who have them, and the large tow are locally connected wi are ready to become the House. These points i proof; but they admit an When the right hon. Ba tary for the Home Depart a seat in 1853 and 1854 of reflecting men and to community—would he ha proposing to stand at a ' the counties to which t what it takes away from twenty boroughs? Woul slightest interest, or woul felt it, upon hearing that or Manchester, or Leeds about to happen. But at and-twenty boroughs to be might he not have come least a reasonable chance The noble Lord destroys twenty avenues by whic ability may reach the Ho as he removes five-and-tw and only forms five whic class. He adds, therefore, of all others he was bou to, or to mitigate. Mr. C aware that to form an ad the Bill, other topics shou It ought to be compared 1852, 1854, and 1859. considered how far it tal corded judgment of any Cabinet. Its origin in th ought to be scrutinized. tion in our history to whic to be weighed. He woul topics so full of moment not only from a sense of them, not only from a w House, but because no m ranted in touching them u to oppose the second rea He had not risen to op reading of the Bill. He vent its being read a seco had imperfectly submitted which would not land them by that process in the great numerical difficulty—how, with the adoption of the numerical principle, could they prevent the towns from obtaining an unfair share of the representation? There was another reason why he objected to the Bill, and that was that its tendency would be, by lowering the franchise, virtually to throw the representation of many large and important towns into the hands of the mob. He did not use that term in an invidious or offensive sense; he merely meant the least wealthy, least educated, and least independent portion of the community. Before taking a step of that kind they ought to pause. If it was necessary to reduce the borough franchise to £6 why not base it on direct taxation? This might be done by extending the operation of the present house tax from £20 to £6. A scheme of this kind would have peculiar advantages. It would, in the first place, couple the possession of political power with the payment of Imperial taxation. It would enable them to get rid at once of the whole expense of the registration courts, the receipt given by the tax-gatherer serving as the voter's claim to be registered. The moral effects of the system would also be beneficial. There was reason to believe that very extensive fraud was now perpetrated in order to conceal the real value of a £20 house, and enable the occupier to escape the payment of the tax; but that temptation would in a great measure be removed by the plan he now suggested, namely, by materially lowering the escaping value. This scheme had been received with considerable favour by persons of all shades of political opinion in the part of the country to which he belonged, and it had this additional recommendation,—that by bringing the great mass of inhabited houses within the scope of the house-tax, though at a reduced rate, (for it might be reduced to £6 and £4, instead of £9 and £6, as now), when applied below the present minimum, it would become no inconsiderable source of revenue. With reference to the county franchise, he contended that by placing it so low as was contemplated by this Bill they would materially change the whole character of the constituency. He complained that they had not been furnished with any sort of returns from which they could acquire any adequate notion of the extent to which this Bill would lead them. It would be almost madness to adopt the changes introduced by this Bill without more specific information than had yet been laid on the table. The country was apathetic, because contented with the existing Parliamentary system; but, because the country was apathetic, don't let the representatives of the country be so, or legislate in regard to this measure with blinded eyes. The further they proceeded from the landmarks which the sagacity of their forefathers had set up the more uncertain and dangerous became the ground, and in admitting the working classes to the exercise of the suffrage, they ought to take care that the rights at least of our most important interests, those namely, of property and intelligence, should be preserved. They were about, in order to obtain an object, which was a good object in itself, to open a new spring, and they could not tell whether the waters of that spring might turn out sweet or bitter waters. He should not oppose the second reading of the Bill, reserving the full right to adopt in Committee such modifications or alterations as might appear necessary.

MR. BRIGHT said: Mr. Speaker, I am, in one respect, in the same position as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire. I do not rise for the purpose of proposing that the House should divide against the second reading of this Bill; but I differ from the right hon. Gentleman very much in another particular. I shall not, in the observations I am about to make, endeavour to convince the House that this Bill is a very dangerous, if not a fatal measure. On the contrary, I wish to discuss it in the spirit of a person who is very anxious for a sound and useful measure of Parliamentary Reform, and willing to make considerable allowances for the difficulties which the Government and the House must feel in dealing with the question. I think the second reading of the Bill, although not to be opposed, offers an occasion which it is very desirable the House should avail itself of, to discuss the question not only in its principles, but in its details, and, in fact, I think that the principle of a Bill of this nature is rather to be found in its general details than in any particular clause. From observing what has been said in the House to-night, and also what is said out of doors upon it, it is quite clear that the Bill is met by two kinds of objectors. The one consists of persons who object to it, because it goes much too far, and there is another class which objects because the Bill does not nearly go so far as they would wish it to

[First Night.]

of the counties the representation is almost as good as dead. It is not the electors of the counties who elect, but a few large landowners. There are few contests, and there is no bribery. Corruption, as it exists in some boroughs, is hardly known, but coercion has done its work. True, those who pay nothing for their seats must feel it to be a matter of pleasure, in contradistinction to those who have to pay; but there is no doubt that a great bulk of county electors have not even the liberty to sell themselves. If one half of the constituencies of counties be in this position, we all feel that, with regard to pretty nearly half the boroughs in the kingdom, coercion and corruption do their work, and that a real bond fide honest representation is not obtainable from the population in these small boroughs. If that be so, then, I want to ask hon. Gentlemen who are alarmed at this Bill—I speak as I usually do with great moderation; the House knows that I should be glad of a much more extensive measure, but any advice which I shall give to the House on the subject will be dictated not by any opinion I may have with regard to what I wish if everybody agreed with me, but what I consider at this moment it is possible and wise for Parliament to grant—I say, do hon. Gentlemen opposite generally believe that a million of voters among seven millions of men is a satisfactory state of things? Is it safe or is it wise? The hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke from the Bench opposite a short time ago (Mr. Rolt) really appealed to the House as if the sky were about to fall. He asked you where you were going to. He asked when you intended to pull up—"pull up" was the phrase he used—a phrase which we all understand. I can tell the hon. and learned Gentleman that if he talks of pulling up, there are two can play at that game, and that he will find himself pulled up a great deal sooner than the great bulk of the people of England will be pulled up, when it is proposed to add 300,000 or 400,000 electors to the present limited number you have on the lists. Besides, as the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Buckinghamshire, in speaking last Session, told the House—he was then rather wild in his statements, it would appear—the Government was in extremis, it was necessary to get votes, if he could, on this side the House—he told us that he was going to add at least half a million. The then Chancellor of the Exchequer went so far as to say that his proposition would double the constituencies of the kingdom. I do not say he did not believe this himself—there is no very accurate return, and there is very little information in regard to his "fancy" franchises, and therefore nobody could tell; but I am sure that his speech was so far from the reality that the result would have entirely disappointed him, as it would the House and the country. Now this Bill of the right hon. Gentleman would have given, according to his statement, 500,000 voters. This present Bill promises rather less, but I think it is likely to do considerably more, not than he promised by his Bill, but than what he would have effected by it. Now, we are told by the hon. Member who spoke last (Mr. Liddell) of the great increase that would arise in certain places, and the right hon. Gentleman, with great fidelity, stated certain facts which had appeared in some leading articles of The Times during the last few days upon the subject. We all know there is nobody in the world so capable of discerning mares' nests as those who conduct The Times newspaper. They make it out that every one who has now a vote is to be put under an extinguisher, that you will never hear any more of them in the large boroughs, and that the new constituencies will be the only constituencies left. Now, what is the case at present with some of the largest towns in England? Take the borough of Liverpool. There you have a borough with 80,000 houses, but you have a constituency of only 18,000 electors. Manchester has 70,000 houses and 19,000 electors. Birmingham has 50,000 houses and 9,000 electors. Do you mean to say that this restriction upon the right of voting is tolerable, or that it will be tolerated? Is it a thing you can justify by any kind of logic? Or can you say it is dangerous to enfranchise a large additional number of them without uttering a most fearful libel upon the great body of your countrymen? If you have a great people whom you have excluded from the franchise, and you open the door by this Bill, you will have a greater number of electors. But have we argued, have we clamoured for the Bill? Have we convinced all the country, and finally Parliament, unless we expect some constituencies are to be greatly enlarged? If you choose to divide the towns as I have elsewhere proposed, the constituencies would be less large; and probably some inconveniences which arise from large favour of this Bill. Therefore they do not believe in the peril you describe. If you turn back, and I dare say the right hon. Gentleman has turned back, to the discussions of 1832, you will find that every conceivable argument against reform was then brought forward by Sir Charles Wetherell and Mr. Wilson Croker. It will be found that calculations were then made that the voters between £10 and £25, being more numerous than those above them, would constituencies; and nkers, clergy, manu-l traders and profesrior in number to a o them in other re-hus be handed over ost dependent classes about to be made.

ard of any of those d, I have been in a
-I have represented have never found any of the richest classes swamped. For ex-use of Coventry, the my right hon. Friend.
freemen, and 1,200
ever heard it alleged Coventry swamped the that my right hon.
Friend his colleague
irly the householders t ancient city. The his is a childish fear. n for it. It is the
and monopoly. But ass you are about to inions differ just as among the people er in their prejudices, hey are divided into
of religion, politics, just as the classes

above them are divided; and they are subjected, as we know, to the influence of association, to the influence of character, to the influence of wealth and opinion, and to all those powers that direct and influence the course of society and every individual in society. As to swamping, hon. Gentlemen opposite ought not to be much afraid of swamping. Well all know that half-a-dozen landowners will swamp a whole county. That is a notorious and an admitted fact; but we never yet heard that in a large and free constituency there has ever been an instance of a party in it being able to swamp the fair and legitimate influence of the other classes associated with them in the franchise. The other class of arguments against the Bill is that it is not extensive enough. Here I find it much more difficult to argue with them. I think that is a very rational objection after the figures I have stated. In the boroughs of England and Wales the adult men, according to the Parliamentary returns, are about one million and three-quarters. You have now 440,000 electors. You are about to add 160,000, making the number 600,000. You will have therefore in the boroughs of England and Wales about one man in three who has a vote. But looking to the United Kingdom, there are 6,000,000 of families, and only 1,000,000 voters. After this Bill, allowing it will raise the number to a million and a half, and it is much more than the truth, you will still have left four millions and a half of adult men out of the twenty-two and a half millions of population, without any votes whatever. Yet you call yourselves a constitutional Government, governing by means of Parliament; you blame the noble Lord for the course he is taking, when he asks you to come up to a point which will still leave twenty-two and a half millions of men, women, and children, who have no vote in the election of Members of Parliament. Surely that will bring comfort to the hon. Gentleman who spoke from the Opposition side of the House. That parsimony in giving votes is a mistake on the part of the Government; this distrust is unfounded; the character of the population would justify the House in taking a more liberal view, and proceeding further than the noble Lord has proposed that we should proceed. But if this be only a partial act of justice, I think I may say there is a large amount of acquiescence in favour of the measure. I am not able to refuse it, when from 300,000 to 400,000 in boroughs and counties will be admitted by it to the franchise, because the number admitted is not double. With regard to the measure of free trade, we took a considerable step in 1842; again in 1846 we took another step; again in 1853 we took another, and now at length the great work is accomplished. This admission to the franchise will give a large amount of satisfaction, but the time will come when for these twenty-two and a half millions of people you will again have to open your door and admit some further number to a participation in the rights that the constitution would seem to offer far more generously than the House seems to wish to do. With regard to these kingdom. If the premises occupied are above the value of £50, the rate-paying clause does not apply at all; but with respect to those premises that are between £50 and £10 in yearly value, the condition is to be introduced. I object altogether, when you are establishing an occupying clause that will range from £10 to the highest amount of rental, that you should draw a line at some point and say, with rs, that itating, at you to all inchise.

o Comow that . I do
pposite
in the nditions
. fit to remises

I have rovision ounties.
ch, and person tion for ipation, g other resides, s of the £5, the
; let off
and put and say
be Act.
ink the respect ay that ess the ld be of
do not low £6 ow it in o have a s of £3, p a £10
s fields, onstitu-
the pers of the
us to inon Paronsider-ll, and I use in a in land, aintain

his family than a man occupying a house of the value of £2, or £3, or £4, and working as a labourer on a few acres of land. I contend that the £6 householder in a borough is a much more independent man. I do not know whether it is a provision in the Scotch Bill; but, if so, it would admit a class of voters the most dependent in the kingdom, and totally different from the class which the Bill would introduce into the boroughs in Scotland. There is another question—the payment of rates. I ask the House and the noble Lord, when they are giving the franchise to a £6 and £10 occupier, respectively in boroughs and in counties, why not allow it to be sufficient that the man should be on the rate-book, and rated, so that his name should be transferred from the rate-book to the electoral list, without making it necessary to prove that on the 20th of July he paid the rates due on the 5th of January preceding. In the borough in which I live this particular restriction has very little result; the embarrassment is inconsiderable, and therefore I do not speak of it because I have seen in that borough great perplexity or great disfranchisement from it, but from what has taken place in the metropolitan boroughs especially, and others which I could name, there is no doubt whatever that that condition, which, after all, is of little or no avail in making your constituencies more select, is a condition of great embarrassment. It very often puts men off the list, not of the poorest, but others, who from some accident have not their rates paid. It is just one of those irritations which every elector seems to feel rather as a shabby contrivance for depriving him of that which Parliament has professed to give him. There is only one other point to which the noble Lord's attention has been called, and which, I believe, the Bill was not intended really to be defective in, and that is with regard to what is called the compound householders. Now, some years ago—I think in 1851—Sir William Clay, when a Member of this House, passed a Bill to facilitate the claims of persons whose rates were compounded for by their landlords. I proposed to the House a clause at the end of that Bill, which I think was put in on the third reading, to meet a case in the revising barrister's court which had disfranchised very many. It was held that if the landlord paid the compound rate, say 75 per cent, or whatever sum it was the parish authorities had agreed to receive,

[First Night.]

[the full rate ing of the Rel those tenants result of that ough of Man-persons were the succeeding acted upon in all, many were overscers, like shing to give r trouble—dis-the law, but I for its neglect the majority of re upon the re-
is own rates.
who pays the nant's name is en they come ers from their ne of the land-
find the names tenants, under ft off the list

What I pro-ord should, by l into this Bill, s of all tenants
s. And then, hether paid or paying clause
will find their rate-books to eat number of rto, altogether not done, this will be in a nothing more you come to d, you will find as been in the out a question discussed very
on. Member for cept this, let oment deceive that, because sistency which admired, but in plored, has ab-
in this Bill, yet high is already r will not have
ry short time.
ughs in which re to be made very much in onties, except and your rich

men have these bor-
and also feeling wi-the great the one si-
great nu-now abou-
case with enfranchis-fettered political men in th-believe yo-indeed yo-are at you-coercion a-—I believ-
be driven have, as I and less r-the Hous-
ment. If demption Lord gave which the
the Govecepted, wthis Bill, Governme-
I say us, who really tensive m-sands and are anxiomay come Reform, I do this at I ask the Rolt) doe-House aga question
hon. Gen-inghamshin this Ho-House, ha-they shouter, in ord-
question,
hands of the City of democrati-ration to affection ttinguished you can I
He has gi-
and exam-
hon. Gent-was one

changes and wishful to go with very gentle footsteps, and not to go too far, I should say the noble Lord in this measure, has brought forward a Bill, which considering the circumstances of the country and the wishes of the people, it is not only your duty, but your obvious and pressing interest honestly to accept. And I would give it without any reservation. Make the changes which I have suggested, which are not changes in principle, but merely changes which will make it more acceptable to the beneficial to the le more quali-tleman says population so er hope the reach their it; but I say to have lived ast twenty or t here made

.] The right
r much about ul manor in ends so much se very little re now legislate and the live amongst neashire, for I know some-
e other day,
ed the war-James Watts
perhaps the
lom. I want s shown the e which they looms of the wants of all

There was variety and re-end of it I d gone round ieling thing er every man produced all goods, in all be one man who, by the itted to vote [Laughter gentlemen, of or and cheers Surely these ig else than id if the spi-
nan exhibits ent like this

be prevalent on his side of the House, I dare to tell him he is taking an infinitely more dangerous course than I am taking in any proposition on this subject I can make. The hon. Gentleman, if he were to speak, would tell us, no doubt, that the people do not want this measure. There is no turbulence. I admit there is no turbulence; but there is something better than that. I have seen and have been in a stormy sea. It is a very grand spectacle, and sometimes very appalling, but there something not less striking to the man who can contemplate the sea, and watch the calm and majestic advance of the tide. The turbulence and passion of 1832 are now passed. Nobody rejoices more than I do that we can discuss this question under circumstances very different from those under which the Bill of 1832 was discussed. There is no howling wind, no imminent convulsion; but there is the steady, the ever growing, the irresistible tide of public opinion; there is the consciousness among millions of your countrymen that Parliament does not adequately represent them, and is not just to them; and, silently, but surely and inevitably, this opinion is marching on to its triumph. The very footprints in which these Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench trod not long ago are now swept away, and the point which you occupied not long since on this question is submerged and gone. I ask you not to resist this growing and gathering opinion. By a concession even so small as that which it is the object of this Bill to make, you will show that you have a generous confidence in your countrymen—you will show that you believe in the constitution of your country, that it really means a representation of the people, and you will show further what I hope you will prove by your Votes upon this Bill, that you are willing the institutions you boast of so much, and pretend to love so much, shall repose upon the goodwill, the intelligence, and the virtue of your countrymen.

MR. KNIGHTLEY said, he objected to this Bill on the ground that it went too far in one direction, and not far enough in another. The hon. Member for Birmingham had just said that disfranchising small boroughs was the marrow of reform. For his own part, he wondered that he did not say to the Bill, "Go! get thee gone: thy bones are marrowless!" The great evil in our present representative system was that as many Members were returned in numer-

[First Night.

in boroughs, as the of them would prevent the state of the poll being known until all the polling was over. The present Bill, however, did not attempt to deal with that subject. He also wished to touch upon a point of very considerable importance—the extension of the suffrage. He was not now going to say whether £6 were too high or too low; but what he wanted to know was, why they were to declare that which was very good sauce for the borough goose to be not fit for the county gander. Why was this difference between £10 and £6? He admired the self-sacrificing consistency with which the right hon. Members for Oxfordshire and the University of Cambridge (Mr. Henley) adhered to their opinions upon this point; but what could be said for the consistency of hon. Gentlemen opposite, mostly sitting below the gangway, and who assume to themselves the modest title of liberal and enlightened statesmen? Identity of suffrage was their cry for Session after Session; but the moment it was shown that identity of suffrage must lead to a very large increase in the rural representation, and about 130 Members should be taken from the boroughs and given to the counties, "a change came over the spirit of their dream," and they ate up their former words with a voracity that was quite appalling; and when the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire, speaking last year as the organ of the Government of the Earl of Derby, proposed to place the inhabitants of towns and of the county on perfect equality in every respect, that just and equitable proposition was made the subject of an attack by the noble Lord the Member for London, and who being followed by almost every Member of the Liberal party defeated the Government of the noble Earl and destroyed their Bill. And how did the present measure propose to deal with the question? Supposing three houses were situate in one street just at the edge of the borough—one at £6, one at £8, and one at £10 per annum, the one at £6 being within the precincts of the borough and the other two beyond it. The occupier of the £8 house would find his neighbour occupying the £10 house had got a vote, but he would find his neighbour occupying the £6 house—an inferior house to his own—had a vote also, while he himself had none. He asked the Government, in the name of common sense, on what possible principle it was just that the £8 occupier so sit-whole of that expenditure had therefore to be provided for, and must sooner or later be a charge upon the country, and he felt justified in saying that they would require an additional Vote of £500,000 in addition to provide for it. He did not blame the right hon. Gentleman for this excess, but this he said, that if the Government had any idea of this excess they were bound to have stated it to the House when they brought forward their financial measures, because it was impossible to say what the decision of the House would have been if they had known of this excess, with regard to the reduction of the paper duties, or any other of the measures introduced in their Budget. He voted against the Budget, not from any aversion to the principles of free trade, because when hon. Gentlemen opposite talked of recent conversions to the principles of free trade he had only to say that he believed his conversion took place at the same time with that of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he believed he was as earnest a Free-trader, as he was. But then free trade, like other good things, depended on the manner and the time in which you applied it. It was, in short, a thing of time and circumstance, and he repudiated altogether the assertion that in adopting such a financial scheme Parliament was following in the steps of Sir R. Peel. In the first place, the fame of Sir R. Peel as a financier did not rest on the policy of free trade, that belonged to others; and Sir Robert Peel would be the last man to take credit for that which did not belong to him; his distinction consisted in applying those principles at the right time. He protested therefore, and ever should protest, against the name of Sir Robert Peel being associated with the principles of a Budget the failure of which he (General Peel) confidently predicted. He foresaw that at the end of the present year there would be an enormous financial deficit. The right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer was perfectly right in only taking his income tax for one year, because, at the end of that year he would have greatly to alter its proportions. No one could be more opposed than was Sir Robert Peel to an income tax in time of peace. But he had no doubt his right hon. Friend flattered himself he would be able to meet this deficit by a great decrease in the naval and military establishments next year. He said as much in bringing forward his Budget; but the House ought to pause Hon. econ ought and c Mem ago w again

[First Night

General Peel

and th the w over t Estim berate giving they and c mates prepa
for th
would promi
rest t this c Powe had n meet but l
He w accou whett a muc for we no ob say th
was n
Mr assur
that h meeti too w mates which might were met l gard
that servic pecta
be ab raised would serve,
that ten y Acco
300 n
the w taken what

159-60, and had 21,601 10,000 13,000 of cre- 0, also Friend. allow- 10 men made in 10 men. as less ch pro- y there and of g then er, the troops actually excess. known y those Bombay oops in nancial ie Esti- There 100 for 92,000 ntioned o make as the of the militia in pro- r army. r an in- miscel- rith all d to be 92,000 But this ken for rariably hat the allow of inancial a saving ere was Vote of ent that ould fail ould be ial year. thought at they the ex- hat the troops would go to China earlier than they had done, for it turned out they would not be there within the present financial year. He must decline at that hour of the evening to follow the right hon. and gallant Member in his criticism of the Budget. Including the present Vote and the sums contained in the army and navy Estimates, about two millions and a half had been taken for the China war. No one objected to the amount of the Vote; on the contrary, it was pronounced to be not large enough; and he hoped therefore the House would agree to it. They had not taken into account, he owned, the Native troops belonging to the East India Company at Canton. These would no doubt eventually have to be paid for, and there would be a charge made by the East India Company to the Treasury for that purpose. He was speaking at present, however, only of the sums within the present year's Estimates. He was not disposed to indulge in prophecy with respect to the cost of the Chinese war, though various prophecies had been indulged in. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Whiteside) had alluded to something like £10,000,000.

MR. WHITESIDE: No, I said as much would be spent as was expended in the Persian war.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that more than was spent in the Persian war had already been voted. As he had said, he would only assure the right hon. and gallant Officer that he had looked through the accounts with the greatest possible care, and he was confident that there was not only enough for the troops, but a surplus to provide against any deficiency.

MR. PALK said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman if any estimate had been taken for the depôts of those regiments now quartered in India that were about to return to this country, and which, on their reaching England, would be placed on the English establishment. He wished also to know whether any estimate had been taken for the Portman Street barracks, for which contracts had been entered into in pursuance of the recommendations of the Committee of last year, and also whether any estimate had been taken for the fortifications which had been erected at Plymouth and Devonport within the last year.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he regretted that the good old rule had been departed from of not going into Committee after 12 o'clock, when this Vote was passed the other morning. There never was

[ARCH 20, 1860]

it for for such a
; and assure the n
stance experience di much estimate of t if the tillery, which blish or 12,000 st would looked upon t nts of the regular ar s that the regular a great

that ANNEXATI
overniently NOTI
Royal THE MARQ
a sub- it had been h great day of certai militia tended to mo red of Savoy and Ni ilarity as to a fact wl less of that certain i rd the specting the nd the and Nice to I When the last autu
only of the Emper year Lord the Se f arti- Affairs. It led to of their Lords corps first discussion
f that inquiry touchi rd the question he g one but the pape
se en- matter beyon anent meant merely y had the notice-pa
stages day for movin coun- of the earnest
d the had been ma
qually head of the er Ar- place," who from public service of the ducing gener h was the subject w it was ing. Under Artil- he would be period tions, which n, the recommend t highly able to steer corps matters and l ferent which, in his ained he would no
s that whilst there under puted to his bodied mischief. H t were certain rules
not be private and c peace, he felt sure renew opinion wer calling thought a g

among the supporters of the Ballot. I did not, however, expect that his Bill would be treated with the consideration to which it was entitled. The Bill was founded on a principle calculated to give the electors protection at the polling booth which was eminently required and to secure, at election, the absence of which would be a blot on the national escutcheon. When he looked back at the names of the members by whom he had been opposed to this question he experienced mingled feelings of astonishment, satisfaction and regret. He was astonished at the vast amount of talent which had been arrayed against him, and satisfied at the miserably weak arguments to which it had been reduced. When he enumerated the names of the Lords and hon. Gentlemen who had raised this question, the House would see how fearfully overmatched he (Mr. Stansfeld) must be. Among those who supported the Ballot were the honoured Viscount Palmerston, Lord John Russell, Sir J. Graham, Sir G. Grey, Mr. Stansfeld, Mr. S. Estcourt, and Sir James Lewis, men of undoubted talent and logical powers, and all practical statesmen; yet, having looked through the speeches in Hansard, he declared on the second day of the debate, to the surprise of those who had not found one word in them all. It was with reluctance he was obliged to add that he had not the perusal of their speeches produced in him the impression that they were statesmen, that the thoughts of these speakers were apart from the question, and that they were opposed to the wishes of the voter for some other mode of voting than that which they alleged in support of the Ballot. Their arguments reminded him of an attempt made by the hon. Member sitting near him (Sir F. Stansfeld), when defending a poisoner, to persuade the jury that the death of the victim had been caused by the acidity of the pips of which had generated the acid in the system of the prisoner. But the jury, of course, were hidden out of court. Just that same pip argument was used against the Ballot by those who used it had the effect of addressing not an unbiassed assembly a great part of which was hostile to that House by the influence of the aristocracy through the mechanism of open voting which was being defended. The speeches of the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Palmerston) of which he had made ample notice of nothing but the fact that he could discover nothing. The noble Lord voting was not secret voting was not secret voting was not secret voting. He said it was not yet on many of himself. They mean? Some of the noble Lord could the Ballot was used in a permanent and a "No, no,"—"Public Companies of the Bank of England also at Dulwich county constabulary some exception to the assertion that the noble Lord also franchise was a was entirely re the hon. and but which the noble Lord than argue his own satisfaction the world know of reasoning re by Peter in the to prove to John that was a should gentlemen, to a blind and obstinate himself and Sir but this plain natural mutton hall Market, a both if you vote. The noble Lord Peter might be category. Ad sake of argument, trust, the condition the electors should ferently without without hope of assist the discharge all. On the other cause it hindered according to the vented tens of going to the place more from the public register. As for was it? A rippled, but no small tradesman ed upon his vote.

"You take my life,
When you do take the means by which I live"— and he carried on his shoulders the responsibility of his own ruin. He now came to another of his formidable opponents—Sir George Grey.

MR. SPEAKER: It is contrary to the rules of the House to mention any Member by name.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he would bow with submission to the correction, but he mentioned Sir George Grey as one of the speakers in a Debate which took place fifteen years ago.

MR. SPEAKER: What the hon. Member said was, "I now come to Sir George Grey." That is not the correct way of referring to a Member of the House.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, that perhaps he ought to have stated that he alluded to a Debate of fifteen years ago, in which Sir George Grey was one of the principal speakers.

MR. SPEAKER: I have reminded the hon. Member of what is the rule of the House, and am sure that with his Parliamentary experience and practice he will keep within it.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he would refer to the right hon. Gentleman as his right hon. Friend who had been opposed to him some fifteen years ago, when a Motion with regard to the Ballot was brought forward by Sir Henry Ward. The right hon. Gentleman had previously voted for the Ballot, and then he voted against it, the reason he assigned being that his first constituents were in favour of the Ballot, and his second constituents were opposed to it. That might be a valid reason for his right hon. Friend, but it appeared to be a strange foundation for legislation. Another assertion of the right hon. Gentleman was that the upper classes had become more politically virtuous. Where did that political virtue exist? In 1852 there was no perceptible increase of it, while in 1859 it was nowhere to be seen. Yorkshire did not return a favourable answer, and the view under the walls of Gloucester cathedral was still more unfavourable. He next turned to his right hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham). There was nothing particular in the arguments of that right hon. Gentleman; they were the same as those to which he had already referred; but he was bound to say that his right hon. Friend had done good service to the Ballot, in the first place by the manly manner in which he had stated his belief that the popularity of the Ballot was a growing popularity, and then by his exposure of the intimidation exercised by a Whig Lord Chamberlain over the Royal tradesmen in a Westminster election. One case of that sort was of infinitely more importance than any amount of rhetoric, and he hoped the time was not far distant when his right hon. Friend would be found in the same lobby, on the Ballot question, with his able and popular nephew and Colleague. The next opponent to whom he would refer was the Secretary for War. The speeches of that right hon. Gentleman against the Ballot consisted mainly of the exploded jokes and witticisms of the Rev. Sidney Smith, whose playful fancy nobody could doubt, though nothing could be more unsound than his arguments, which had been confuted over and over again. He cheerfully made the right hon. Gentleman a present of the facetious canon's arguments, retaining to himself a single sentence, to be found in a letter addressed to Lady Grey, who had complimented the rev. gentleman on his writings against the Ballot. "Aye," he replied, "but it will come, let me write never so wisely." Another right hon. Gentleman—in the latter days of the late Administration (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt)—had girded up his loins and charged the Ballot home with original sin; an argument which, if it was not convincing, possessed at least the charm of novelty. He confessed he had nothing to say to it. The present Home Secretary (Sir G. Lewis) had selected America for his battle-field, and sought to establish a case against a secret Ballot in England by proving that the Ballot was open in the United States. The right hon. Baronet made a good speech but built up his edifice on a rotten foundation. He assumed circumstances which were not facts, he assumed that the advocates of the Ballot had relied on the mode of voting in America as the mode they desired to adopt in England. Nothing of the sort; but what the advocates of the Ballot in England wanted was, not the open Ballot of America, but a secret Ballot, such as existed in Australia. He now came to the noble Lord the Member for the City of London (Lord John Russell). The noble Lord had tried all kinds of fence on the subject of the Ballot. He was opposed to the Ballot at one time because it would not keep a secret, and at another because it would keep a secret. His temperature on the Ballot question was as variable as that of our climate; his ballot barometer was never steady, but always moving up and down, from "fair" to "stormy." In a speech to the constituency of Stroud, in 1837, the noble Lord said, "that in 1832 he proposed the plan of the Reform Bill, and the chief heads of that plan were adopted by the Committee of the Government. The plan originally embraced no proposition with respect to the Ballot or the duration of Parliament, but in the course of consideration proposals were made on those subjects and adopted; and in the plan he ultimately submitted to Earl Grey's Government he suggested that the Ballot should be adopted, and that the duration of a Parliament should be five years." This proposition of the noble Lord was defeated, he believed, by the narrow majority of one. At the general election in 1833 the noble Lord, having been in favour of the Ballot in 1832, made the following declaration:—

Mr. H. Berkeley

"Great as he apprehended would be the inconvenience of the Ballot, yet, if it should be a question that he must either adopt it or see the tenantry made to vote contrary to their opinions, he would at once renounce his former opinions and come round to the Ballot."

It was not for him to say what amount of evidence the noble Lord required for his conviction, but in 1839 the noble Lord stood forward as a witness to the existence of intimidation. The noble Lord seconded the nomination of Mr. Heathcote at the Huntingdonshire election on the 2nd of May, 1859. The noble Lord stated, "That the hon. Gentleman proposing Mr. Heathcote said, that the question who was to be the Member must be decided by the opinion of the majority; he should wish nothing better than the opinion of the majority should prevail, and then Mr. Heathcote would be seated. But had there been no interference with the opinions of the electors, and were there not cases in which, their opinion being one way, foreign dictation had been introduced to bias them to pursue another way?"

Thus the noble Lord the Member for London, who had declared that if he were convinced that intimidation existed he would vote for the Ballot, stood forward and proved the intimidation. Was he not, therefore, justified in saying that the noble Lord's ballot barometer varied very much, and the noble Lord scarcely appeared now to have made up his mind? He had now pointed out the nature of the opposition he had met with in that House, and, with respect to the opposition out of the House and in speeches delivered on hustings, it was not his intention to dilate at any great length. He trusted, however, that he should receive consideration from hon. Gentlemen, as it was an up-hill battle that he had to fight. One of the most bitter opponents to this question had been The Times newspaper; but, while he admitted the great power of that journal, and the great ability which it could afford to command, he must at the same time say that the perusal of its writings on the subject of the Ballot was highly satisfactory to the friends of that measure. The other day he was in Yorkshire, and met a Conservative gentleman of great property. That gentleman told him that he was formerly opposed to the Ballot, but was now a convert to it, and the happy change, he said, was effected by The Times newspaper of which he was a great admirer, but the stupid articles in The Times against the Ballot convinced him that nothing could be urged in opposition to it. He might bring The Times into court, and cite it as one of his witnesses. Those who read the imbecile leading articles against the Ballot might remember such passages as these:—"Does Mr. Berkeley put faith in the existence of the screw?" and "Does anybody know anybody who ever required the Ballot for himself?" Then let The Times newspaper answer itself. Here was a paragraph which appeared in The Times of the 29th of April, 1859, on the North Shropshire election:—

"Sir Baldwin Leighton, the Liberal-Conservative candidate, has retired from the contest at the eleventh hour, and the Hon. Rowland Clegg Hill, the former member, and Mr. Ralph Ormesby Gore will be returned without opposition. The well-known business habits of Sir Baldwin, as well as his liberal views with regard to reform, church rates, and finance, had secured him a great amount of independent support; but the 'screw' was put on the farmers so ruthlessly by some of the great landowners that the popular candidate had to succumb."

Consequently he ventured to say that (he Mr. Berkeley) did put faith in the screw, and so did the Editor of The Times, and that he knew thousands of men who wanted the Ballot, and so did the Editor of The Times, and some of these men appeared to live in Shropshire. But would any sane man pretend that there was a doubt about the use of the screw? If any man doubted it, let him examine the canvassing-books of election agents: he had produced their books on a former occasion as used in boroughs and county elections, and there would be found valuable pencil-marks,

{COMMONS}

screw was before the the modus
 at after the ock, stating persons on and positive into conthose who
 by persons rology, also,
 was invoked
 agent, by huntaman no would run ack of foxrneys knew is, the diffiwhich they
 to their ten-glish instru-ect he would the House respect. It the Speaker
 ced the ob-
 lay, when all urning, and an, who had e people of have weight acaulay, ad-Edinburgh in sity for the ption, when ble to severe s for it had £500, but imidation by o they would of property.
 inent autho-
 to deal with against him, tenant who d Macaulay ventive ever that nature d the voter,
 hat he liked
 been his aim
 , and there evidence in es than was er Majesty's voting had revolution.
 anarchy and , there was
 and intimation, which exist in the a should say li of the Ballo leave this in for Pontefra practical acq

 but let his ho ponent—the Way). That most remarks tion. His z ethnological, metaphysical whether the tralia he con succeeded in gument with laws of natu
 The flowers though beaut of scent. T their bark, b
 their leaves.
 in growing o
 of the cuckoo
 the harbinger those regions in the dead reproduces he try—the an lobsters there boiled—no, ber's expres boiled, and plain facts to sonal observ the lower to he said, "I countrymen, Australia for there becom
 the moral law being rever Ballot work against it he Member ove Childers) as unable to cop
 if he could st afforded an example, the best men w
 and that the electoral law lesson ought
 try. In orde of our Austr
 The Times n
 were :—

House for that indulgence which was given to a new Member, one who had but rarely addressed. There were two great and crying evils in the working of the existing system which he believed the Ballot would effectually meet—intimidation and Bribery was the greater moral evil, and was confined within narrower limits than intimidation, and would, he believed, be put an end to entirely, confined to a few small boroughs; but intimidation, he feared, would continue to a greater or less degree as long as the electoral system existed. The species of intimidation which it was most difficult to cope with was that which was called the landlord's influence. He was a landlord himself, and confessed that there was a species of influence which it appeared to him a landlord might fairly exercise, and which he himself had not hesitated to use. A tenant said, "My landlord is an honest and an honourable man, I know he has given up his mind to political affairs, he knows more of these matters than I pretend to do, I will follow him in the poll," that was a feeling which he did not discourage, for he regarded it as honourable to both parties, and it was the influence which the Ballot would in no way affect. But when the influence of a landlord was improperly exercised, how powerfully it might be brought to bear to coerce the tenant. Take the case of a tenant at will. The tenant had lived all his life in the locality where he held his farm, and could not remove to any other part of the country with any prospect of success, consequently at every election, if the landlord chose to influence him, he was at his mercy. It had been so with the landlords of the present day, but they were improved in their moral notions than the landlords of former times, they would not have anything to do with intimidation. He knew that was true in regard to many; but in too many cases the landlords, if they did not interfere themselves, left their agents to do what they thought fit, and shrink from doing personally. He had in his eye at this moment a case of a very clever busy agent who ran about among tenants whenever a contested election was directed, directing how they should vote, telling them if they did not vote according to the views of the landlord, that he would be short, using the influence of the landlord in a most improper and tyrannical manner. ["Name, name!"]. If he quoted in support of his argument they credit, for he had ing by mentioning connected perhaps ouse. He believed mentioned a tenant

rder of the agent,
e actually dispos-
I find himself after off than the other
tate—for the agent ing and injuring a be difficult, if not ainst. Therefore,
s influence, though
be mitigated, was
d, was not dimin-
that the influence
widely extended,
tes in various parts were able by their
to turn almost all neir favour. What f proceeding when offer himself as a
The first thing
rs to all the great ne district, asking
ass their tenants,
he received his y depended. Were r were they chil-
sk the permission
he might even votes? Yet he lich the landlord,
o, actually refused
o ask his tenants sorry to say that now referred was himself a liberal.
o refusal was ad-
leman now sitting sition) side of the n him if necessary.
he alluded, having
I that he did not tended candidate,
h him in political without intending to you, I must may not be can-
" And this in
! It would seem ked upon the act
its without permis-
a crime as that next to murder.
deasants. At al-
that upon the an-
to the landlord to canvass his of success, vourable th at once or g his only be the votes of whom the E have shut

Such a syst good one, a was one th form Bill of that time th
the landlord let in a new were especia
and he thou of 1860 th
100,000 mo
In the cou nected it w the existing unknown u surely they also unknow namely, the extent, he regard to putting a st did not thin to purchase in his favou be likely to principle of them when would ever the Motion Protestant
the ground
able to a co-
lie religion thought it were told th in Ireland
—the influ-fluence of ceive a man to be placed voting, than upon his vo of dispose the priest involving pr
case of dis
the other.
he contende
safeguard;
confidently
the depende himself, and which would cause him to do so. In Australia, he could assure them, that the greatest corruption existed, even after the Bill was introduced. It was a subject of debate in the Legislature, and the talk of discussion in every newspaper. It stated that certain persons had been appointed magistrates entirely because they were election agents of a particular party. He knew an instance where a most respectable man was made a magistrate, because he was an active electioneering agent, his friend, whose servant this person considered himself rather elevated in society, because he had a justice of peace to clean his boots. He did not agree with what had been said by the hon. Member for Bristol (Mr. H. Berkeley) about the prosperity of Australia since the introduction of the Ballot. It was true that the country was prosperous; but it was so because it produced annually gold to the amount of £12,000,000, and other articles to the value of £3,000,000. But notwithstanding this, many capitalists had drawn their investments on account of the insecurity of the Government. Now, as to the secrecy of the Ballot in Australia, the machinery seemed to have been contrived with considerable ingenuity at the same time it seemed to be very far from perfect. The tickets were marked on the outside with the number of the vote; they were then unfolded by the returning officer and placed on their back. It seemed to him to be very easy to tamper with the tickets. And he believed that for a trifling sum the way in which votes were given could readily be got at. Besides, it was necessarily provided that in the case of a petition, the tickets were to be opened up as to ascertain how each voter voted. He considered what a painful position a man would be in who had said he had voted for one person, and who had voted for another. And yet it would be the law which had placed him in that position. As far as secrecy was concerned, the Bill would certainly be a failure in England, for an Englishman seldom kept a secret, and an Englishwoman still more so, and as a man would be sure to tell his friends how he voted, then the secret would be out. It was also stated in the pamphlet he had referred to, that at the last elections in Victoria there was scarcely a case of intimidation. Now, he held in his hand a letter from a candidate to his constituents, who had been successful, who therefore did not write under a not so applicable to them as the larger ones; but he hoped that in the supplementary Reform Bill which must sooner or later follow that of the noble Lord, the small boroughs would be totally extinguished. The Ballot excited deeper interest throughout the country than any other part of the reform programme, and two-thirds of the Liberal party in the House were in favour of it, although the Ministers had unfortunately sided with their natural enemies in regard to it. He thought that the time when they were setting free the trade of the country was an appropriate time for setting free also the constituencies, and thus wiping off the blot which disfigured our representative system, and greatly enhancing its value.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON:—I have more respect for the House than at this hour

"to go on refining,

"And think of convincing when they think of dining."

I wish to assure the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Berkeley) that his speech of this evening, which I cannot say was more argumentative than those he has addressed to us on former occasions, has not at all altered my opinion on the measure he proposes. I was in hopes when my hon. Friend began to quote the speech I made on a former occasion he would have had the goodness to go through that speech, and though I had not convinced him, I was in hopes that the arguments, sound as I believe them to be, which I then used, would have convinced other persons who heard them read. But my hon. Friend, having told us his mind was impenetrable to any arguments directed against the proposition which is the hobby-horse on which he is riding to fame, omitted to quote them. My hon. Friend found fault with an assertion which I had made, that the franchise was not a right but a trust, and with me for arguing that, as it was a trust, and not a right, it ought to be exercised in the public view, and under a sense of responsibility. My hon. Friend treats that doctrine with great contempt. I only wish him to consider a little the consequence of the opposite doctrine. If the franchise is a right, the man is entitled to do what he likes with it. That doctrine goes in fact to legalize bribery. The voter may justly say, "This is my right, and I am entitled to dispose of it as I please, and to make any profit out of it which I can." But, as long as it is to state that he did not bring forward the question as the organ of the Committee which sat on the subject, but on his own account, thinking that the time had arrived when an alteration of the law should take place, and when it could be made in a deliberate and proper manner. It would be in the recollection of the House that when the Bill came down from the House of Lords it was determined to admit gentlemen of the Jewish persuasion by a Resolution, and the Resolution was to be renewed if necessary, from year to year. The Earl of Derby, being then Minister, stated that a general election being pending, the sense of the country should be taken as to the policy of continuing that system by which the doors of that House should be opened to gentlemen of the Jewish persuasion. Now, he wanted to know what answer the country had given to this appeal at that general election. He did not believe that the question had been canvassed at a single election; the only answer, so far as he knew, that had been given was this—that they had now four distinguished and hon. Gentlemen of the Jewish persuasion returned to that House by four large constituencies. Those Gentlemen sat there honoured and respected by all, and there ought no longer to be any distinction in the oaths to be administered to the Members of the Jewish persuasion. The words "On the true faith of a Christian" should be left out of the Parliamentary oath, and the Jew ought to come to the table and take the oath in such a manner as was most consistent with the dictates of his own conscience. The object of his Bill was to remove these words from the oath and thus leave the Jew in precisely the same position in which other Members of that House stood. At the same time he confined the matter entirely to that House, leaving the other House of Parliament to indulge any prejudice they wished. The Bill would not interfere with them in any way. He begged leave now to move that the House do resolve into Committee in order to permit him to bring in the Bill.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he did not intend to oppose the Motion before the House as he did not think this matter of any very great importance; but the Motion of the hon. Gentleman certainly served to throw some light on what he might call the philosophy of Parliamentary settlements. They were told that the Act now sought to be altered was a final settlement of the question. Yet that Act was scarcely passed when an attempt was made to unsettle it. If, however, the matter were reopened it would form but a bad precedent, and henceforth no sooner would a question be settled than a movement would be made to unsettle it.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, there might be a question as to whether the matter should be disturbed; but he certainly had no objection to the introduction of the Bill. The noble Lord, however, was quite wrong in saying that any compromise had been made on the subject to which those who advocated the Jewish claims were parties when the House of Lords adopted the mode by which the main object was practically gained. They availed themselves of what the House of Lords did; but nobody who ever advocated the Jewish claims thought it a good arrangement, or became party to an understanding that the question should not be revived.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he fully agreed with the noble Lord in the understanding he had expressed, that a compromise had been come to, but it was a compromise between the two Houses, and indeed was exactly what the hon. Member for Finsbury had stated he desired, namely, that each House should pursue the course it preferred. He thought with the noble Lord, that they had a right to insist upon that settlement being carried out. He would not, however, enter into the subject at that time further than to say that he remembered being on a Committee with the hon. Member for Finsbury when the hon. Member was in a minority in his desire to alter the law which had worked satisfactorily hitherto. He gave notice that when the Motion for the second reading should be made, he should move as an Amendment that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he had only a word or two to offer on the observations which had fallen from the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Lord R. Cecil). He complained that a settlement had been disturbed. He (Mr. Roebuck) affirmed that there could be no settlement of a question, relating to the onward progress of mankind. The noble Lord was a Conservative, but he (Mr. Roebuck) begged to assure him that he was doomed to disappointment; the world was going on, but the noble Lord was lagging behind, and would see questions change, altered, and improved day by day, but never settled.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE, in reply, observed, that, to show there was no compromise, the Earl of Derby had stated in the House of Lords when a dissolution of Parliament took place, that he did not object to the Resolutions because the constituencies would be appealed to, and would express their opinion whether the Resolutions should be confirmed or rescinded.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved,

"That the Chairman be directed to move the House, That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Act of the twenty-first and twenty-second years of Victoria, chapter forty-nine, to provide for the Relief of Her Majesty's Subjects professing the Jewish Religion."

Resolution reported.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. THOMAS DUNCOMBE, Mr. BYNG, and Mr. LOCKE KING.

PORTPATRICK AND DONAGHADEE HARBOURS.

COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

GENERAL UPTON. in rising to move for a select Committee to inquire into the truth of the allegations contained in the petition of the Ayr and Maybole Junction Railway Company, presented in August last, and printed in the 11th Report of the select Committee on Public Petitions, Appendix 202, relative to the application of the grant for Portpatrick and Donaghadee Harbours, said it was desirable that the grant in question should not be made until the condition upon which it was granted, namely, the formation of a line of railway, was assured.

Notice taken that Forty Members were not present; House counted; and Forty Members not being present,

The House was adjourned at half after Eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Wednesday, March 21, 1860.

Their Lordships met; and having gone through the Business on the Paper,

House adjourned at Four o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

Mr. T. Duncombe

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, March 21, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS. — 1° Consolidated Fund (£850,000); Attorneys, Solicitors, Proctors, Certificated Conveyancers.

2° Bleaching and Dyeing Works.

3° Mutiny; Marine Mutiny; Municipal Corporation Mortgages, &c.; Inclosure.

PREVENTIVE SERVICE (SCOTLAND). QUESTION.

Mr. BLACK said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if the men in the Preventive Service in Scotland have any printed or written regulations, or instructions, delivered to them for their guidance; and, if so, whether one of these rules is that the offence of marrying shall be visited with dismissal from the service? and does the prohibition against marriage apply equally to the officers and to the men?

Mr. LAING stated, that in the above-mentioned service it was found that unmarried men were more efficient than married men in the performance of patrolling and other duties of that description, which required their absence during four nights in the week from their homes. The Inland Revenue Department had, in consequence, found it necessary to inform those who entered the service that so long as they continued in it they must remain unmarried. The prohibition did not, however, apply to the same extent to the officers as to the men in the service, inasmuch as when the former married they were transferred to some other post as soon as their places could be supplied by gentlemen who were unmarried and who possessed the necessary qualification to discharge the duties which the officers who married had previously performed.

DUTY ON RAGS.—QUESTION.

Mr. PULLER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any information had yet been received as to the amount of Duty which the French Government intended to impose on the export of Rags?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that the Government had received no further information than that which he had communicated to the House in his statement on a previous occasion. The French Government intended to propose some modification of the prohibition, but that at that time they had not made up their minds as to the amount of the duty to be levied.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.
STATEMENT.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, it might be convenient if he were now to state what the Government proposed to do with respect to those Orders of the Day which they wished to bring on before others. It was not expected the Government would be able to bring forward any of their Bills that day, but they thought it of great importance to bring on as soon as possible the Resolution with regard to the income tax in Committee of Ways and Means. He therefore wished to have that Order read, with the view of bringing it on to-morrow, and if the Resolution were disposed of he should hope the adjourned debate on the Representation of the People Bill might also be proceeded with to-morrow.

SIR FITZROY KELLY asked whether if those two subjects were not brought under the consideration of the House to-morrow they would take precedence of other business on Friday?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I cannot say positively. There is, I believe, some money Vote which it is desirable should be taken on that day.

MR. SPEAKER was understood to inform the noble Lord that, in accordance with the Orders of the House, the Income Tax Resolution could not be brought on in Committee of Ways and Means on a Thursday, unless it had been fixed that Orders of the Day had precedence of Notices of Motions.

MR. BRIGHT said, he thought it a pity to interject, as it were, the income tax in the middle of the adjourned debate on the Representation of the People Bill.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that he found by the Rules and Orders of the House that the Resolution on the Income Tax in Committee of Ways and Means could not be brought on to-morrow. The adjourned debate on the Representation of the People Bill could, however, be proceeded with, and the Resolution might be brought on the first thing on Friday.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. DILLWYN, in rising to move the Second Reading of this Bill—the object of which was to open endowed schools to the children of Dissenters, and to enable Dissenters to act as trustees, in those cases where no intention was specifically expressed respecting the religious character of the trust, such as would make the application of his principle in direct opposition to the founder's wishes—said, he had carefully considered the objections which had been raised against a similar measure which he had introduced last Session, and which had received the assent of the majority of the House. That measure was sent to a Select Committee; but, to his great surprise, the Committee under the guidance of the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir H. Cairns) introduced such Amendments as completely changed the principle of the Bill. He (Mr. Dillwyn) accordingly abandoned the charge of the Bill, and it dropped. The same Bill—or very nearly the same—was re-introduced in the House of Lords by a noble and learned Lord (Lord Cranworth) who approved generally of the principles he advocated. By their Lordships, however, the measure was contemptuously thrown overboard. Since last Session he (Mr. Dillwyn) had carefully considered the objections which were made to his Bill, with a view to meet his opponents as far as possible, and he believed the measure he now proposed would be found not liable to many of the charges which were formerly urged against it. In the meanwhile, the hon. and learned Member for Belfast had again proposed a Bill, which was substantially the same as his (Mr. Dillwyn's), as it had come out from the Committee of last year. The House of Lords had also sent down a measure of their own; and all three stood for the Second Reading that day. This was at least a proof of the great importance and great interest taken in the question. He considered that this last Bill, if it been carried as Lord Cranworth introduced it, would have been a material improvement in the law; but it had been greatly contracted in its operation, and though he did not say that still it was not calculated to do good, he contended it was a very homœopathic remedy, and did not so much as touch the grievance of which he complained. That grievance was this—that, while Dissenters were admitted to the rights of citizens, they were excluded from the management of schools, which, so far as the intentions of the founders were expressed, were entirely Catholic and unsectarian. Lord Cranworth's Bill absolutely ignored the grievance. It made no mention whatever of the disqualification of Dis-

MR. LOWE said, as this important subject had now become one of considerable complexity, it was only reasonable that at the earliest period some one should rise on behalf of the Government, in answer to the appeal that had been made to them, and state the course which they would respectfully advise the House to take in dealing with this Bill. He regretted that the hon. Gentleman who introduced this measure had not stopped at the end of the very candid and moderate portion of his speech in which he explained and advocated its provisions; and he must entirely decline, in the discharge of his duty, to follow the hon. Member into a discussion of the doctrines, the general character, or the policy of maintaining the Church of England. This question might be decided in a manner satisfactory to the House and the country on principles totally free from topics of irritation and sectarian animosity; and he should endeavour with calmness and temper to state the reasons why this measure ought not to be allowed to pass a second reading. The hon. Member for Swansea had laid down with great fairness the principles which might guide them in judging of his own Bill. The preamble itself stated that it was expedient to amend the law relating to the Government and religious teaching of many endowed schools and educational charities, so that the same should, unless otherwise intended by the founders, be open to all subjects of the realm without distinction. Now, he was quite willing to adopt that principle, and to say that those schools should be opened as widely as possible, subject only to the observance of the will of their founders. The hon. Gentleman further disclaimed any desire to touch the property which really belonged to the Church of England. Taking these two principles, then, to guide them, they might arrive at a sound conclusion as to this measure. Controversies respecting the religious intertution of endowed schools had been often brought before the Courts of Equity; and the rule adopted by those tribunals had been, not to find out what might be recommended as best for the general policy of the country, or for the particular religious persuasion of the Judges or of the Government of the day, but to ascertain in the best manner they could what was the intention of the founders. For this purpose they perused the instrument of foundation, and where the will of the founder was expressly declared, whether in favour of the some body rity,

effect stand not Equi both some who parti reign more most gion deter
That teach stren frequ child fear
"by next the r be, a fully afford
In m
of th in ot subor it; a mast Engl
diffic
that schoc
land.
want at wl state try a the s accor
they they
that King instru forth the c Mons
to be whiel
Chur
In re times of fo

Mr. Dillwyn

as he thought, with the view of giving the Church of England what was not her own, but merely as guides and means to ascertain what were the founders' intentions. He yielded to no man in his hearty and steadfast attachment to the principles of toleration, but he should not be serving the cause of religious liberty, or any liberty at all, if he were to denounce the line of proceeding thus followed by the Courts of Equity—a course at once reasonable, sensible, and moderate, and every way worthy of the great and enlightened Judges by whom it had been adopted. Had those tribunals fastened on particular expressions in the deeds of foundation, giving them an arbitrary construction of their own, not based on the common use of language, or on good sense,—had they excluded from their view what any man of sound judgment would take into consideration—namely, the collateral circumstances of the time in which the instrument was executed, they would have been rightly accused of discharging their duty ill. But having availed themselves of all the sources of information open to them, and come to a conclusion which, allowing for human fallibility, had almost universally conformed to the will of the founders, however much some might regret that conclusion, the Courts could neither be blamed for it, nor in consistency with the preamble of that Bill, which expressly avowed respect for the founders' intentions, ought the House to abrogate their decision, on the ground that it was not based on sound principles. Now, a measure on this subject was introduced last Session by the hon. Member for Swansea, and was referred to a Select Committee. Of that Committee he had himself the honour to be a Member. The effect of that Bill was this—that the religious teaching in endowed schools should not be exclusively that of the Church of England; while it did not state what that teaching should be. It was found difficult to interpret this, and gather what was really meant. But that difficulty, if not removed, was entirely superseded by the second clause, which provided that the will of the founder should be respected. The second part of the Bill, in fact, wholly overrode and neutralized the first; because these schools having one and all been adjudged Church of England schools on the ground that it was the intention of the founders that they should be so, the clause, setting up for the future a rule in no way different from that which had hitherto guided the Courts in their decisions, necessarily swept away the basis laid by the other provisions of the measure. Another hon. Member (Sir Hugh Cairns), however, much to his credit for liberality, came to the rescue of the Committee and proposed a Bill to them like one of the measures which appeared on that day's Votes, and the Bill introduced into the House of Lords by Lord Cranworth, founded on the proposal of Sir Hugh Cairns, had now come down in the shape of the Endowed Schools (No. 3) Bill. Now, the grievances out of which this controversy had arisen were two in number; one of them exceedingly serious; the other, while it involved no substantial injury, naturally caused some irritated feeling. It had been conceived by no less an authority than Lord St. Leonards—who also deserved great praise for his liberality of sentiment—that it would be lawful for the Courts of Equity to add what were called "conscience clauses" to the instruments of foundation for endowed schools—that is, clauses by which the children of Dissenters might be admitted to secular instruction without being required to conform to the worship or to learn the catechism of the Established Church. But the result of the matter, as stated by Lord Cranworth, and acquiesced in by all the other learned Lords in "another place," was, that the decision of Lord St. Leonards was virtually overruled, and it was held not to be in the power of the Court of Equity to exercise the salutary interference which was exercised under Lord St. Leonards in 1852. So that the school trustees, although, if they desired it, they might of their own motion show their tolerance towards the children of Dissenters by admitting them, yet if they refused to admit them, however great the emergency, there was no legal power of compelling them to do so. That was the first and great grievance. The second grievance arose out of the Ilminster case, where it had been the practice to appoint Dissenters as trustees of the school, and where for a long period no quarrel or difficulty ensued from their acting in that capacity. But at length an objection was taken to the appointment of a Dissenter, and the Lords Justices, reversing the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, decided that Dissenters could not be appointed trustees of Church of England schools. It certainly seems natural enough that they should not be allowed to act in that capacity; but the

ing feeling among because, though a n a person particu-
rately of a Church
though, as the hon.
tated last Session,
I some share in the
ould not covet the ols to which Non-not admitted, still office was regardinferiority, and not liberal notions of were the two misremedied. But the
hon. Member for omplish his object
ism. The providence is different from I laid on the table
g the hon. Member er, this measure is property of the ad touch it in the after establishing precedent it would work and leave the very little better
, and certainly not would be placed in table. The hon.
a division between

The first clause ols founded before Elizabeth's reign,
to schools founded
the passing of the rst year of William at period the mea-
go. Without chro-nology, it was matter that the date uld not be carried
of Elizabeth, so as rs of Edward VI.'s rell known that the se established creed
is the most valuable s were established
if by altering that e endowments from nsiderations which to schools founded
a most unfair advantage. The schools established were to be e gentleness. The h two classes of schools, the first Roman Catholic wards transferred the Church of E-posed that these taken away from

and handed over
the majority of mine. That was the hon. Gentle-did not mean to Church. If an not a title to p-Established Chi-rightly or wrong
But the hon. M-Act of Parliame-look at the orig-
property, it was the Roman Cat-
the Church of E-
question to be at but here they l-title, and the Cl-had no property
clearer right tha endowments werthe Dissenters w-them. That cl-from a different
of schools of whithe Church are Edward VI., th-doubtedly intenc-
tion according t-
of England, the
The Church of schools of King right which the namely, the int-
declared by the Equity. Next to could be no bet-tenure of 300 ye-
the founder per-
and over again
principles of res-
the most enligh-
adorned the juclause, applica-
between the fir-first year of Will-these endowmen-
have been estab-
according to th-
of England, un-language of the such was the Then followed certaining such

over, and seeing that, giving the grievances of a right to complain, he to raise questions and importance, and try passions and ended the hon. Gentleman to draw his measure, as to deal with this as which, though not so unspeakably inferior from the Estate property which it ancient and most interesting still commensurate of all the interests insaid, that the principles Bill were not only his constituents but public. As the question to be one which admit, and as he understood. Member who had declined to accede had been made to. Gentleman to withdraw felt it his duty to could be read a second time. The hon. Member commenced his speech; but it could not be antagonistic to the of the framing of the trial to keep distinct had been mixed together still more in the Member for Swansea, question upon what principles of evidence you at Church, sect, or owed school belongs; in manner the school after that point had first was a question rights of property not of England, but in all moral institutions; and second, he appealed to it had not ever been Church of England to of education to all variety which he had sent there existed no exclusion; and at son of a gentleman nation, who possessed was being educated With respect to the what principles and rules of to what an end assumed had been the Judge down in But he was any Judge be disputed the Attorney man who and who hon. Member course of the Court of founder as in Courts, was among the circumstances was had since regarded the secondly circumstances subsequent questions to duce on jeasty's other clerical Member repudiated had read fact it of the law with sects an stop to ence of respect the litigation inevitable a system that the rules for schools, blish a But he why the both had which in the language these end discovered Swansea authors of all the

VI., which were the most valuable and most important in the country, the instruments of foundation contained clauses which attached the schools to the Church of England, and therefore it was necessary to seek to effect a change in the very terms of the foundations themselves, and consequently with regard to foundations established before the first year of the reign of Elizabeth the Bill proposed to reject not only the surrounding circumstances and usage, but even the instrument of foundation itself, as evidence of the intention of the founder; and this the hon. Member defended by a reference to the source from which was obtained the bulk of the property which was employed in endowments previous to the reign of that sovereign. Could any principle be imagined more dangerous to the rights of property than that, in the case of foundations established before the reign of Queen Elizabeth, you should examine into the sources from which the King or the private individual creating the endowment derived his property, and that if it came from the Roman Catholic Church the endowment should be thrown open to all classes? Such a principle would apply to the disposition by the King or by private individuals of all property which had been derived from the suppression of the religious foundations at the time of the Reformation. It was also urged that when these endowments were created there was but one Church; that they were, therefore, intended for the benefit of the whole population; that Parliament ought to legislate to carry into effect that intention, and that as the property was incapable of being divided it was right that it should be applied in a manner conformable to the existing state of things. If the hon. Gentleman did not intend to make one law for the Church and another for Dissent, let Dissenters consider to what the application of this principle to their own bodies would lead. The hon. Gentleman had talked about schisms in the Church of England. Were there no other religious bodies in which schisms were to be found? Were there not schisms among the Presbyterians, among the Wesleyans, among the Baptists, and among other Dissenting denominations, and, according to this principle, all the property acquired by those bodies before the occurrence of these schisms ought to have been divided between the two sections into which they were split, and to be re-divided and subdivided as often as future schisms should occur. The application of this principle would be as dangerous to the foundations possessed by Dissenters as to those of the Church; and he did not believe that for the sake of the principle involved in this Bill any religious Dissenters would be willing to jeopardise their own educational institutions. The question before the House was, in truth, one between the friends of religious education, of whatever denomination, on the one side, and the political Dissenters on the other. The existing law most wisely said that you must look in the first place to the will of the founder; in the second to the surrounding circumstances and usage; and that law had been applied most impartially, and sometimes (as in the case of Lady Hewley's charities) to the loss of the Church, and to the signal benefit of Dissenters. The second section of the Bill, directing how endowments made subsequent to the first of Elizabeth were to be interpreted, was open to the same objection as the first—namely, that it established for the Church of England a rule of law which it was not intended to apply to the property of any other religious body. Having established one rule for the older institutions, they were to adopt another rule with respect to foundations established after the first year of the reign of Elizabeth. Here they were to take words of the founder in the instrument of foundation as their guide, and to exclude the surrounding circumstances and subsequent usage. He was quite at a loss to know how, if they acted on these principles they could avoid opening and disturbing many educational institutions which had always been managed in accordance with the known intentions of the founders, and which, according to the existing laws of toleration, must be thrown so entirely open as to render impracticable any religious education at all. Of the third clause, which gave to the majority of the trustees, for the time being, the power to decide upon the nature and extent of the religious teaching, he would only say that it would lead to perpetual contests, vexation, and annoyance, and would seriously detract from the value of these schools. He denied that there was any question of principle involved in the decision of the Ilminster case. That decision turned entirely upon a question of fact as to whether or not the trust for the repair of the roads and bridges was a principal and substantial part of the charity; and that question, and that only, had to de- the great as now be- arise fro or Swansea their gui which now struction island; but every cla ces were a tinct prin ify the con- most obje em. If the the adopt failing con- LORD

{COMMONS}

 t should be the speec e would not Council o ll which had a very al t lion. Gen- testant ap d the House it might he measure The right
 ous those in these c the rights original i of religious right hon sked all the very relig Churchmen of Edwar
 e they sup- back as as this was applicatio so injurious it he mus property
 ave out the to be re f the Ques- the right
 his day six upon the wisdom o the Amend- right in t ill was that pass an f property. the inten evils than it not in th d go as far an Act c in removing intentions and Dis- Edward V
 r it a griev- adaya hav not possess stances, the Church donors wo
 y repeated known th decisions. Church o ice that the High Chu ny religion Rome? V at dictate; actuated and learned Protestan
 The Bill open the ng than it senters?
 Dissenters sion, who 's evidence, attack m ty was na- miserable dealt with good, sou ion. Were the Disse n this, and must kee eased, con- other. H rules now hot and c ad adopted would go rry out the another t the advo- ment. E intolerable this Bill those gen- Protestan trary, that to pass a

the loss of the other clause, to which he attached great value on account of its having received the unanimous assent of the Bench of Bishops.

MR. BEECROFT said, his hon. Friend and Colleague had referred to the free school at Wortley, in the borough of Leeds. He had been requested by some of his constituents to put the House in possession of the facts of the case. The original number of trustees was five, and when two only were left they were to elect three new ones. At present only one trustee survived, and he could not fill up the trust except through the intervention of the Vice-Chancellor's Court. He had submitted the names of four highly eligible Churchmen for the approval of the Judge. The Dissenters, however, wanted the names of two of their co-religionists to be substituted; but the sole surviving trustee objected to this, because the school was endowed exclusively by Churchmen, and the inference was inevitable that the donors intended the management to be in the hands of Churchmen only. In confirmation of this view he would, with the permission of the House, read an extract relating to one of the benefactions. The donor, Langdale Sunderland, was thus described:—

"He was captain of a troop of horse, in the service of King Charles I., and Oliver Cromwell's harpies made him pay £878 to preserve his estate from being plundered. Langdale Sunderland, of Aikton, Esq., headed and maintained 500 men at his own private expense, against the usurper Cromwell, whose men he drove into Pomfret Castle and harassed them many times, in which loyalty he actually spent £1,500 a year in supporting the just cause of King Charles I., without the least reward for himself or his progeny."

He appealed to the House whether there could be a shadow of a doubt as to what were the intentions of this benefactor. He might observe that the children of Dissenters had hitherto been admitted to the school, and there was no desire whatever to disturb this arrangement.

MR. WALTER said the junior Member for Leeds had assumed that the only object of the promoters of the present Bill was to extend to Dissenters the benefits of endowed schools, and that, consequently, those who opposed it were obviously disinclined to grant to Dissenters that which they were fairly and justly entitled to demand. That, he apprehended, was not a correct statement of the case; at all events, it did not accurately represent the view which was, from but t. trol t. belief the b. equit. and a benef. appea dren schoo religi and, as jo as m teach the d But Mem found that to co name of R. be ot overr and a schoo mom the h longi perm to d the the the defini given shoul teach Lord the l porta wider defon that the n put t no ob to o until sente they in the regar the s Chur move picture, I think of us probably one of the daughters and Mr. Oastler. "My God, Sir have been a face of our daughter story girl, and is any feeling for of her working for thirty-seven der years, think ! I have it in hands are often rn off their feet, ged to work, the being sometimes ce by beating on ds. For God's let us listen to do not want to appeal to you as fathers, I appeal ask you for God's in this horrible r says he is sure ittee on this Bill. certain that if I trynten we shall the measure will at majority, and heads upon our "We have deas placed under he helpless, the of ourselves, of grent." The appeal to you now id, and I. their al to you in per ill listen to their measure for their

Mr. Lowe

that as he had uestion from the honour of a seat ie should be al-ervations. In nittee of inquiry chers and dyers. considerable op- a Committee, a The Report of 1855, contrary dvocates, was in ow made by the The hon. Mem- tt) subsequently with the evils was opposed and the result Committee this Con Youghal, shire (Mr were me Youghal from the was also tings in upon a pr son subse from it o shire. ma'ely th ponents o — the C into a Bl mittee. form to d ingly frar cipating t would be Committee taken by Report o taken into port, fran was adop for Bolton but the I due weigl stated th any legis compelled the waste daily labo It was n tion of th by the n gestion of stances, assent to in order t humane the House this matte the Ten l be the law House, fr establishr that an i place bot the educ factories been enac if they sl would str chequer's be gone.

Scotch bleachers were in favour of the Bill, on the ground that it would compel the merchants to come to them sooner with the work, so that they would not have to do it in so short a time. Another point made by the hon. Member for Manchester was the processes. He said the Inspector might interrupt the cotton spinner without doing harm to his goods, but that was not the case with the bleacher. Now, bleaching and dyeing consisted of various processes. He went into some bleaching works at Salford belonging to Mr. Hayward. It was a large establishment, and the foreman went with him through the whole of the works. He spent a considerable time there, and noted down every one of the processes, and when he got to the end of one, he said to the foreman, "Could you leave off here, and begin again to-morrow?" and the foreman replied, "Yes, at any time." And that he said of all the processes. If it were really true that they would spoil any of the processes, that was a matter for consideration, but he did not believe that that was so. The hon. Member for Manchester would have the House suppose that although long hours for work were formerly used, yet that was a state of things that had passed long ago. Now he (Mr. Cobbett) wrote to Scotland for information to place before the House respecting this point, and he had received a reply that morning, containing a note of the time of females and young persons, for the fortnight ending the 17th March, 1860, at the works of John Sandieman, Esq., in the dyeing department:—Monday, the 5th March, 17½ hours; Tuesday, the 6th, 15½ hours; Wednesday, the 7th, 15½ hours; Thursday, the 8th, 15½ hours; Friday the 9th, 15 hours; and Saturday, the 10th, 7 hours. The next week the hours of work were as follow:—Monday, the 12th, 17½ hours; Tuesday, the 13th, 15½ hours; Wednesday, the 14th, 13 hours; Thursday, the 15th, 15½ hours; Friday, the 16th, 15½ hours; and Saturday, the 17th, 7½ hours. There were also notes of the work at several other establishments, but he would not detain the House by reading them. This showed that the recommendation of the Committee of 1857 had not been attended to by the masters. The hon. Member for Manchester said he took the average of the whole year, and found that hours of labour were ten and a half; and a manufacturer who came before the Committee said they were acting unfairly in taking the worst times,

```

; COMMON

```

the
dou
call num was fini
was peri care wer fro hall pos spe
be som reas
The
the wou rati
The
the ren
mo emp for pas
in wor pro exe sup sho I
was sho whi
the ble
the pri neit nec
for I
opp pos
a c givi tive in t
to
the
the ing Mei cou cou see

The then wou
rath
The
the ren
mo emp
for pas
in wor
pro
exe
sup sho

was shown which the blest the the prin neither need for opposi
posi
a c give tive
in t
to
the

ing Mel cou
cou
sec

now' circumstances under which it became necessary to despatch troops from Calcutta to China when he was up the country, and he at once left his camp and came down in order that he might be at the spot whilst those preparations were going forward, knowing that no one but himself could effectually forward those preparations. It was possible that Lord Canning might have made arrangements before he left Calcutta, giving entire authority to his military colleague, Sir James Outram, by which any difficulties that he apprehended might arise would be averted. But what he wanted to know from the noble Duke was, whether he could state that adequate provision had been made for the supply of the troops going to China, and for keeping them supplied when there. In 1842, as far as he could remember, provision was made for supplying 10,000 men for twelve months.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET replied, that he had read with much pain the sufferings of the troops on board the Great Tasmania; but he begged to say that the Admiralty were in no degree responsible for the state of the provisions on board that vessel. [The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH: I did not say they were responsible.] The noble Earl had referred to what had been done in 1841 and 1842, when provisions were sent out to Hong Kong for the troops sent there from India. Provisions were in the first instance sent to Hong Kong for 7,000 men, and afterwards for 12,000. Subsequently provisions followed from time to time to meet the growing requirements of the troops. What had been done in the present case was this. As his noble Friend had said, there was great difficulty in obtaining supplies in India for long voyages. The best meat salted in India would not keep for a long voyage, and the biscuit made in India was also very inferior. For the vessels sent from India with discharged soldiers sufficient European provisions could not be obtained, as these had been previously purchased for the use of other ships, and therefore the Great Tasmania was obliged to have recourse to provisions which were undoubtedly of inferior quality. As to sending out provisions for the supply of the troops in China, he might state, in the first instance, that the navy were amply provided for, and had supplies which would last them till December next, and enough had been sent out to meet any casualty; therefore, as re-

But was from not in delay as, in t De- arose arded. d the

{ LORDS }

a would ould be e army, om this for the nd care
f provi-
lmiralty y three mption.
member
, Singa-
the dis-15,000, ot keep e quite ce, not ut from as about ety pref events
d every which ad been ry large ent out troops ombay,
a cured
art been er large ape for Madras.
r those supply
ad been lace the rdships, no rea-

GH ex-with the
it would rmanent
t means upply of rich the a need.
for what n sent.
ed, that
th those d, were

ES

l Read-

LORD TE reading of lition Bill, render un-
tain declar-
said that a omitted from other House their Lords could not b clause, to t ferred, he object was to attend and althou litical hum flicted on removed so perfections tained a de this Bill to its second declaration noble Lord
The Bill ha public dinn
of, the eve Sussex pre then expres tion had e yielded to applying to not to relig was framed the compo
The conse
not been l Acts were down the f
of the Qu tists, the o
upon the these am been made he had lat to the Hon
and in oth by this de coming me their fellow
services.
the time t existed; i first requir ecclesiastic poration A essed of tion ran in

" I, A. B. presence of

upon the true faith of a Christian, that I will never exercise any power, authority, or influence which I may possess by virtue of the office of [] to injure or weaken the Protestant Church as it is by law established in England, or to disturb the said Church, or the Bishops and Clergy of the said Church, in the possession of any rights or privileges to which such Church or the said Bishops and Clergy are or may be by law entitled."

Now, some Dissenters objected to the needless introduction of the words "in the presence of God," as profane; but the great objection to it was that the words were ambiguous and ensnaring to the conscience; and some doubted whether, having taken such an oath, they could with an easy conscience petition for the abolition of church rates, on the ground that such abolition might be considered as tending to injure and weaken the Established Church and others who could enter a corporation with a good conscience, and petition against church rates, thinking that their abolition would be an addition to the strength of the Establishment, might have it unjustly imputed to them that they had violated their oaths. In conclusion he would say that, on the ground put they should not exclude from office those who were qualified for it, and in the interests of morality and religion, he asked their Lordships to agree to the second reading.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that the noble Lord who had moved the second reading of this Bill stated, as a recommendation of the measure to their Lordships, that it had passed through the Commons without any dissent. That, to his (Lord Chelmsford's) mind, was not a strong argument in its favour. It would have been more satisfactory to him if there had been a difference of opinion on and a discussion of the Bill in the other House. In fact, he had spoken to one or two Members of Parliament on the subject, and he was disposed to think that the Bill had slipped through the Commons without observation. Under these circumstances, he thought their Lordships ought to consider the Bill on its merits alone. It would have been more satisfactory, too, if the noble Lord had entered into some explanation of the circumstances which had rendered this Bill necessary. It was not desirable to legislate except on a pressing occasion; either there ought to be some grievance, which called for a remedy, or the proposer of a measure ought to show that some substantial benefit would result from it, in order to justify the interference of the House; but he ventured to think that there were no circumstances whatever to recommend this Bill to their Lordships. In 1828, when it was proposed to repeal the Corporation and Test Acts, very considerable alarm was excited in the country. Sir Robert Peel—at that time Mr. Peel—who was Secretary of State for the Home Department, in order to allay apprehensions and smooth the passage of the Bill through Parliament, proposed the declaration in question. The clause in which it was contained began by a recital, which was inserted in the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, and then proceeded to exact from all persons admitted to any office of magistracy or place, trust or employment, in the government of any corporation, a declaration to this effect:—

"I do solemnly and sincerely, in the presence of God, profess, testify, and declare on the true faith of a Christian, that I will never exercise any power, authority, or influence, which I may possess by virtue of the office of [], to injure or weaken the Protestant Church, as it is by law established in England, or to disturb said Church, or the Bishops and Clergy of the said Church, in the possession of any rights or privileges to which said Church or the Bishops and Clergy of said Church are or may be by law entitled."

The object which Sir Robert Peel had in view was not to guard against aggression so much as to obtain from every Dissenter, on his admission to office, a record and acknowledgment of the predominance of the Established Church. The declaration was accepted by Lord John Russell, who moved the Bill in the House of Commons after careful consideration;—that noble Lord stating that in his opinion the declaration did not impose any restrictions on religious liberty. The declaration was considered very essential at the time it was introduced into the Act. Sir Robert Peel was of opinion, that if the measure of 1828 had proposed the simple repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, there would have been an overwhelming majority against it; but he thought that the insertion of this declaration would induce many persons to waive their objections. The Dissenters, therefore, having obtained privileges under certain conditions, now sought to retain the privileges, and to get rid of the conditions. If their Lordships consented to such a proposition, they would create an evil precedent which might be used on future occasions to disturb national settlements of still greater importance. What were the grievances of the Dissenters? What could induce Bill? He

them. The consequence sents were questions in rned. That r their Lord-a declaration as that any honestly and o weaken or ch, ought to
to take it.
; objections,
f Dissenters,
as themselves introduced.
thirty years
rd. If these luminance of y would not declaration;
in the way of e Established to adhere to Bill on these as calculated ich a way as to that settle-
i was agreed
of; secondly,
moved it had e existence of medy was ree by passing l be removing way of some sposed to inahed Church.
move as an he read a onths. ow") for the
his day six

TLE said, he
; the second
he noble and at down coun-ho moved the nd adduced no (the Duke of
he had heard ord no argudment. The resentation of s of Commons
l did not slip On the contrary, when the

at a late hour, debate adjourne
day was express
On that day th wickshire (Mr.
his objections t supported by a
own or on the o
the Bill was res division. His said he could n be gained by mitted that it n
very great or is might be many the Established claration might in the way of a Church, but in t himself knew th
able gentleman cipal office on and yet he was any influence w him against the ther he took th
law at present Every officer u
to take this dec
did take it, and exempting them
ties. But it ha municipal office a magistrate, a in their case.
who held imp Crown, and had influence preju by an Act of Ir councillors in a power of suppo
blished Church, before a magis ration. No o scenes when t
could help noti irreverence, bec
that it was a Dissenters wer offices, and it w jeet in view. H submitted that a formidable p national engagi show that any never to be a force of his as Test; and Corp
there was grea

introduction of Dissenters would be very injurious to the Established Church; but those fears had been entirely dissipated, and the experience of thirty-two years proved that, apart from the declaration, no such danger existed; and that fact ought to operate in removing the conditions and restrictions that were imposed at that time. This Bill was carried through the House of Commons last year against an adverse minority, and was brought up to this House with a clause for repealing the provision by which it was forbidden to carry the insignia of municipal offices to places other than the Established Church. That involved a matter of feeling which he could well understand, and he thought the promoters of the present Bill had done well to omit that clause. The omission having been made, the Bill had obtained the unanimous sanction of the other House, as no division was taken upon it; and he confessed he had hoped that no such objection would have been taken as had now been offered by the Amendment of his noble and learned Friend.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I agree with the noble Duke in thinking that the immediate practical effect of this Bill would not be very considerable; but I do not consider the question involved in it is of that trifling importance which he deems it to be. There is no doubt about it; the declaration which this Bill seeks to repeal was intended at the time the Act was passed, and has ever since been considered as a positive and formal declaration from all parties taking office under the Crown, in whatever capacity, that they looked, and that the Legislature looked, upon the Established Church of the country as a national establishment. The noble Lord who introduced this Bill has failed to mention any particular grievance under the operation of the present law or any particular hardship arising from the existing system. The noble Duke who has just sat down founded his argument mainly on two considerations. First, he stated that, however incredible it might appear, there were certain persons among Dissenters who felt the operation of the Act as a great grievance, and as a stumbling-block in the way of conscience; and he says that he himself knows personally an individual who had been deterred from accepting a municipal office in consequence of an objection which he entertained to making the declaration required of him on that occasion. The noble Duke added that that person was not disposed to make any attack or encroachment on the Church Establishment. Now, if that be the case, I cannot conceive what possible objection he could have to say, in accordance with the requirements of the law, that he had no such disposition or intention. While, on the other hand, if the noble Duke were mistaken, and the individual in question, and other conscientious Dissenters, could not make such a declaration, that was a good reason why the declaration should not be unnecessarily or carelessly repealed. But, my Lords, it is impossible that Parliament can be called upon to legislate for the abandonment of an enactment which, though small in extent, is, nevertheless, not unimportant in principle, merely because certain gentlemen, having no intention to do a certain act, refuse to declare that they have no intention to do it. The noble Duke supplies another argument against the Bill; he says we know that practically the annual Act of Indemnity covers the case of a large portion of those now subject to this declaration. If it do so all persons who would object to make it are entirely relieved from the difficulty which is supposed to be thrown in the way by their declaration. But the fact is, that the annual Act of Indemnity applies to certain offices and not to others, but the noble Duke makes no distinction between those cases. The declaration is in certain cases required to be taken within a period of four or five months after entering into the office; and, in the meantime, the annual Act of Indemnity may be passed for the relief of the persons concerned, for Parliament may pass or withhold it as it may think fit, and in that case these parties would be covered by the Act. But there are other cases in which persons are not able to enter upon the discharge of the duties of their office without having first made the declaration. Now, I observe that the framers of the Bill have carefully inserted a proviso that the declaration shall be repealed in all cases, whether the declaration is to be made previously or subsequently to the commencement of the execution of the duties of the office, and, therefore, the passing of the annual Indemnity Act would have no operation. My Lords, I will not argue the question at any length, because it is not, I think, one of great practical importance. But my objection to the Bill is this—I consider it to be one of a series of measures which are being industriously brought forward and who are the influential place that the same sects of ted mainly tive in the ring it for- avowed in- ed Church, ge that if ts as have measure of an appa- ure to the oduce ; so ng, if not rity of the ent, Par- the argu- ught to be lablished ts. Such supposing est degree , and not rizing and hose prin- out, but will never

{LORDS}

TER said, other Pre- take part no conver- f his right frain from The declar not assent 3ill. The est weight which the had dwelt ech, when on of cer- en to use it present condition s to place Dissenting had been was first tion of a and which g to him s Dissent- y that the ed was in re consti- law established in ter were l certainly v

THE Ld the empti spoke ver from that espoused. the Chure might be the Archb of Oxford right rev. sent to sup of which t. sentatives. tion migh case was opinion al necessary thought tl to that es ships shot blished Cl affections (ment, and liberality o of the dis senters for he had hi obtained t lowing the tions to se ration. L tended the all municij of the Jew The declar stances, to perhaps, n required, l ought to be

After a f Lord TERN

On Ques of the Mot Contents 2 23.

Campbell, L. (collor.)

Newcastle, I Somerset, D

Camperdown De Grey, E. Saint Germs

Sydney, V. Belper, L. Cranworth,

THE TIMBER DUTIES.—DRAWBACK.

QUESTION.

MR. ADAM said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in consequence of the Repeal of the Timber Duties, any drawback will be allowed on Ships in the builders' hands, either finished or in process of building; and, further, whether any drawback will be allowed on timber which has paid the duty, but has not yet passed into consumption?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there was no intention of allowing any drawback either on ships in the builders' hands, whether finished or unfinished, or on timber which had paid duty, but had not yet passed into consumption.

IRISH BUSINESS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he would beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland when he proposes to proceed with his measures for the improvement of the constitution of the Irish Poor Law Board, and for the amendment of the Law with regard to Landlord and Tenant?

MR. CARDWELL said, he intended to introduce the Bills so that they should be in the hands of Irish Members before Easter; but he would have to give way that night in favour of the Reform Bill. Another Bill which he also wished to bring in, that it might be circulated during the Easter recess, was a measure for the amendment of the law relating to medical charities. He trusted that he should be permitted to introduce these Bills applicable to Ireland on Tuesday morning in order that their second reading might be proceeded with after Easter.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. PAULL said, he regretted to stand in the way of the resumption of the debate on Reform; but the subject to which he was about to invite attention was one that might be discussed with much public advantage. The House had recently come to the conclusion that the right of private Members to address interpellations to the Government and call attention to subjects of pressing importance on the Motion usually made on Friday for adjournment till Monday was a privilege which, though liable to be abused, it was desirable to pre-might attempt would be made to diminish the limited opportunities which they at present possessed for asking questions or making Motions of pressing importance.

MR. HORSMAN said, he could not attach much authority to the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock upon this question, because he had been entirely wrong with regard to it, and in nothing had he been more wrong than in representing to the House that the

Take practice which now prevailed upon Friday evenings was a new one. He ought to know that down to the year 1848 that might have been done every day in the week which could now be done only on Fridays. Until that year, upon the Order of the Day being read, any Member might get up and delay the public business in the manner now complained of. That was put an end to in 1848, and since that period other opportunities of making Motions enjoyed by private Members had been taken from them. Formerly, upon going into

Committee of Supply, there were two such opportunities,—one was upon the Motion "That the House resolve itself into a Committee of Supply," on which question every Member of the House might make a Motion and go to a division; the other upon the Question put by the Speaker, "That I now leave the chair?" on which again any Member might make a Motion and go to a division. Both these opportunities had been given up. Now only one division could be taken before going into Committee of Supply, and after such a division no Motion could be made by any other Member. The real fact was that, as other opportunities of putting Questions to Government and bringing forward Motions had been given up, more of such Questions and Motions had become concentrated upon Fridays, and hence the practice which was now so much complained of as irregular.

It was impossible that in a House constituted as that was irregularities should not occur; and it had been stated from the Chair, and also in a letter from the late Sir R. Peel, read upon one occasion by the present Speaker, that it would be hopeless to attempt to tie the House down in all its proceedings to an adherence to strict form and method. No doubt the privilege of bringing forward Questions on Friday evenings was sometimes injudiciously exercised; but the time occupied by such matters did not on the average exceed two hours; and he thought that the facilities for the despatch of business which had been afforded

{COMMONS}

ast few course, to t for the business ;
 . The interest in ter with they migl tempted proposal o find op should be a public not agree Kilmarnock peech of alteration at down vate Mem
 otion of wards the ck than was frequ
 s, which but if the s of any for St. I ions be ment woul
 nge the to make lthough avoid a n his pro Member f is hon. that the I
 of the day last,
 S. Est- important division. not know hat this present o at diffi- first atten shorten were no I Governme
 usiness, the Hous
 ere with usual tim fembers have reach is which ortance. SIR JO said as tended to House of a divis which a he would lthough St. Ivo's eat con- He could time of Member f expect tice shoul
 frequent most inco private only serve fficulties he though
 recom- than remi nutes for res his MR. BL him, after did not hon. Baro for St. the matte ho right character.
 bers on vernment
 the Go- benefit w cussions the Moti
 2. The selves as practice porting it Fridays was a di
 days for leges of ding the thought t
 , Notices to try an 1 Thurs- in various w raised and learn ent had totally mi
 aired, of ject appe

sible facility in passing with the utmost rapidity the measures brought forward by Her Majesty's Government. That was a view of the case he (Mr. Bentinck) was certainly not prepared to adopt. So far from it, he thought all the measures of the Government should be amply discussed. He for one was not prepared to forego the privileges of an independent Member, and if the House now went to a division he trusted the independent Members would assert their rights. There was a practice which had sprung up of late, to which he was decidedly opposed—that of limiting the privilege of debate to hon. and right hon. Gentlemen occupying the front benches. He claimed the same privilege for men of perhaps less importance and less ability who sat in other parts of the House; and he trusted that independent Members would not sanction the principle under which they were told that so-and-so was to speak and so-and-so was to answer him. For himself he would not submit to the practice.

MR. STEUART said, that much time was lost in the early part of the evening by Members of the Government not being in their places to answer Questions of which they had received notice.

MR. PAULL said, that after the appeal which had been made by many hon. Friends, he should be sorry to run the risk of an adverse division; and therefore he begged leave to withdraw his Motion.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he begged leave to remind hon. Members that the Government of the day, of whatever party it might be composed, had no other interest than to forward the transaction of public business. With regard to the proposal of the hon. Member he would only suggest that whatever arrangements were adopted, it should be considered merely as an experiment, and be confined to the Session in which it was proposed. He was himself opposed to the Motion of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Bouverie); as he thought it was inexpedient to interfere with the right which private Members possessed, on the Motion for Adjournment until Monday, to express their opinions upon subjects of passing and immediate interest; but he did not think that the present proposal had such a tendency.

Motion made, and Question,

“That Government Orders of the Day shall take precedence of Notices of Motions upon Thursdays instead of Fridays,” put, and negatived.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—SECOND READING.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. SECOND NIGHT.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [19th March], “That the Bill be now read a second time.”

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. STANSFELD said, it had been asserted that there was a want of interest upon the part of the country on this question of Reform; but, whatever truth there might or might not be in that assumption, he thought it would be conceded by hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House, that the supposed apathy of the country had been sympathetically responded to by a lukewarm and half-hearted opposition, such as probably never was offered to a measure of so much importance by those who professed to disapprove of the principles upon which it was founded. The right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire said that the effect of the measure would in all probability be to hand over a considerable portion of the boroughs to the dominant and exclusive influence of the working classes; he warned the House against the powers of combination and the very intelligence of those classes; and he endeavoured to alarm the House by the parallel which he drew between the probable consequences of the measure, if passed, and the state of things in a neighbouring country, where they witnessed the most immoral of all despotisms erected upon the basis of universal suffrage and vote by ballot; and having pointed out these evil consequences, and drawn that parallel, the right hon. Gentleman was satisfied to wash his hands of responsibility, and to throw it all upon the shoulders of the noble Lord who introduced the Bill. As far as he (Mr. Stansfeld) was concerned, he was one of those who had faith in a large extension of the franchise, and desired to aid in its accomplishment. His constituents entertained the same strong and ardent convictions on the subject; and, as he was mainly returned to the House on the strength of those opinions, he trusted he would be excused stating the grounds upon which he approved the Government measure. Practically speaking, the Bill of the noble Lord, as far as the borough franchise—the extension of the franchise—was concerned, fulfilled the pledges of the Government, and answered the expectations, if it did not franchise of his country, more than formerly; and feeling convinced that what they recognized as an improvement would be certain in time to be attained, they seldom thought it worth their while to demand it with any great clamour. That was the reason why (said Mr. Mill) there was so much of quiet on the subject of this question of Parliamentary Reform at the present moment. He (Mr. Stansfeld) thought it was those who hesitated the most as to this change, who ought to consider it their good fortune that the question came forward for settlement when the tide of public opinion was at so low an ebb, that so moderate a measure was likely to be accepted. He might object to it on that ground, and wish to defer the settlement in order that a more sweeping change (which delay would render inevitable) might be introduced—but he did not, because he thought it better that the question should be settled while the public mind was in a state that might be easily satisfied. He desired not defeated enemies, but converted opponents; and he supported the Bill, because it would make converts, disarm prejudice, and dispel alarms. And as the repeal of the corn laws in half a generation had made free-traders of almost all parties, so he was convinced, if this measure passed, in the course of a few years they would be all more or less Reformers. He was more and more convinced that that which was called public opinion, and which was higher than any political machinery, and was based on the active and enlightened intelligence of the country, would continue, under the widest possible extension of the franchise, to overrule and control our legislative and administrative career.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, the progress of the debate up to this time has been both curious and instructive. We are considering a measure upon one of the most important subjects that can be submitted to the consideration of Parliament; a measure which has been submitted to us by the Government; we are now in the second night of the debate, and up to this moment I have waited in vain for any hon. Member to rise and speak really in favour of this Bill, or for any Member of the Government to rise in his place to defend it. The first Gentleman who addressed us from that side of the House was the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham). That hon. Gentleman is no doubt a great

[Second Night.

lection, and there-
the want of the his view this Bill as a step in the a followed by other side of the House.
usage to the same
complaining of the ost of them declar-
to look upon this t settlement of the specially complain-
more extensive re-
and expressing an later that question
re consideration of he evening of the ember for Birming-
ressed us, and he nguage. The hon.
ition is at this mo-nglish O'Connell—
that he made allow-f the Government,
tolerate the Bill,
ficulties of the Go-
usual candour, he was content to gain ive steps, and he measure as one of rior results. I may rt to what fell from en he spoke of the Messrs. Watts at rring to the large mployed there, was ke a "clap-trap"
the House upon
g the franchise to ersons. I was at right hon. Friend
i) that he had re-
gnificent building, ation with the large
s, from whose lan-
as a feeling of deep at the lodger fran-ite Government had he hon. Gentleman
s formed no excepous speakers. He onsiderable ability,
ess, he told us, as
eman has told us, d the Bill as a step nd that he accepted
hope at present to
I was surprised to
on of this Bill is,
rable Bill. I can only account forward and either to be Cabinet or attention be affairs. I c the introduc think it is while it is p it should be am sorry th

has been so ject has th
been to him had the ran during the l
the great m troduced, th
it. During Lord, like u finding out defects, or I did hope, his lot aga difficult sub a large and he would h all parties all desire settled—a sure, corre
evils—a me worthy of t emanates.
I agree with just spoken
I think it posal. I a the disfran Bill differs extent, fro of the lat worth while Bill, or to
In fact, th
the point Governmen
that the fir and this ap
all. I, the gard this m posal, whic whelm the country by believe, wil Bill as it serious con temple.
tion of Her matter. I

be corrected; but my opinion at present is that the returns from the boroughs, which we ought to be able to trust, and which we are called upon to believe, are really altogether delusive. I believe the whole House is under the impression that bond fide information is to be derived from the columns of these returns as to the addition to the number of the constituencies in towns which, under the operation of the present Bill, will take place. The noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs evidently based reliance upon them, and made them the basis of his calculations in his opening statement. The hon. Member for Birmingham took a similar course, and my right hon. Friend near me, as well as the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken, and who has fixed the additional voters which will be created by the Bill at 200,000, acted upon the same information. Now, there is a number of the larger boroughs, particularly those connected with trade and manufactures, in which the number of voters registered is materially smaller than the number of £10 houses. That circumstance is attributable to many causes, but, I believe, mainly to the non-payment of rates and taxes; but no notice has been taken in the papers to which I am referring, or, indeed, in the present debate, of the fact that there are forty-four boroughs in which the number of £10 voters on the register is greater than the number of £10 houses. I could not at first understand this anomaly; but it arises in a very simple way. I find, for instance, that in Pontefract there are upon the register 689 £10 voters, while there are only 411 £10 houses set down in the return for that borough. I find, also, that in the borough of Newark the number of £10 voters is stated to be 663; the number of £10 householders only 551; while at Midhurst the number of the former is set down at 429, that of the latter at 284. The reason why we have the matter thus presented is, that this return does not contain a statement of the number of houses according to their letting value of £10 in the towns which I have mentioned, but only of those houses estimated at that value for the purposes of rating. That is, I believe, the solution of the point. If that be the error, it should be corrected. I cannot say what the difference may be, but there is a discrepancy, and it will, therefore, be at once seen that this return is highly delusive as a guide to the formation of an opinion with respect to the number of voters who will be placed on the register under the operation of this Bill. The difference will, I think, be found to be not less than 25 per cent on the gross amount; and it is quite idle, therefore, to contend that, by lowering the franchise, as is proposed, you do not add considerably more than 200,000 voters to the number in the borough constituencies. Now, my main objection to this proposal of the Bill is, that it will be found to have an inevitable tendency to overwhelm by mere force of numbers intelligence and property; but I ask the House to bear in mind that the preponderance of voters of that particular class will be very much larger than has been stated. I have spoken only of forty-four boroughs; but what I have just named applies to almost every borough, for there is hardly a town in England where the actual value of the property and number of the houses of £10 value is not much greater than the number at which it is estimated for the purpose of rating. Having made this explanation, I would ask, is it wise or prudent to give cause for that discontent which must pervade the more respectable classes—the middle and higher classes—by a measure which will give to those, who, without any disrespect to them, I may say are the least fit to be entrusted with the predominance in our representative system? Is it possible for any man to say, if you pass this Bill in the shape it now stands, that it can have any other effect than to throw the representation of England into the hands of one class, and that class the least entitled to monopolize that power? And while expressing my opinion upon this part of the question, the House will perhaps permit me to call its attention for a moment to that which has been said by Lord Grey in the able essay on Reform which he recently published, and which bears very strongly on the proposal which we are now considering. Lord Grey writes as follows:

“ Assuming that the existing constitution of the House of Commons cannot remain unaltered, I am persuaded that the best and safest course will be to attempt a complete revision of our representative system, rather than the introduction of minor changes founded upon no fixed principle and arbitrary in their character and extent.”

I think the noble Lord opposite can hardly deny that these words are extremely applicable to the present measure. I would ask him, with my right hon. Friend near me, “ Will you never be warned ? ” I would call upon him to bear in mind what M. de Tocqueville has written with respect to the United States, where, he tells us, [Second Night.

ing system, inence are lves from passage in hed author ible Lord's ys:—

ocratic Go- shed in the s in Europe contrary, its most disap- berty which action which is, generally d and of real ing a rash is to cause ple of the e some in follow that are not. I under the Act, there in which, d the high ion is now ids of one evil should resent Bill it to which will read to Friend the J. Walsh), the Parlia- ich lately respect to ent system on. Friend xists a large ical amount to be found and educated ywhere form carceoly any- are shut out all influence member two r my notice, town during the Conser- enter upon optician, a ble scientific be observed, respectable onservatives, ill, been able her instance was that of a tra firm in the parish he had attended he, 'I have not at slightest interest Neither Colonel represents in the sentiments or feel the squares and g streets in this be tives, but I know swamped by the l attempt to obtain would be vain, a concern in electio

Now, I think Birmingham w airable to pus the evil whic This is not a majority in a be Liberal or (respectable bod be completely Grey and Sir aspective public other branch o in my opinion, for it appears t with so import sent, desirable the result of th mentary system of the public b the character o rence to the c John Walsh ex

"The exigenc treme difficulty the agency of the into sections and sure, appear to fo tencies and self-o

What does L says:—

"It is an alarm the character of Commons that it late years that M oidedly against th those who have v scrupled in priva ing themselves in

Now, Sir, if r believe what w society in Lond passage of Lor circumstances when my hon Radnorshire, in consistencies which public n pressure of ev

well to appoint a Committee of the Privy Council, consisting of men of all parties, deliberately to examine the whole question, to see what might be safely conceded on the one hand, what withheld on the other, so that the Ministers of the Crown might be able to bring in a Bill that would be passed at once by Members on all sides of the House. I know not how far the noble Lord may have considered this suggestion of Lord Grey; but Lord Grey points out in his book that, although not acted upon to the extent of bringing together men of opposite parties in the same Committee, it was followed in 1850, when the constitution for the Australian Colonies was deliberated upon by the Privy Council, on whose recommendation the Government of the day framed their Bill, which afterwards became law. I state that on the authority of Lord Grey's work as a precedent worthy of the noble Lord's attention, and I hope he will consider whether, before we proceed to legislate, we ought not in this instance to have a preliminary inquiry. We all wish to see a settlement of this question—a settlement upon fair and equitable grounds; and I cannot refrain from expressing a wish which may, perhaps, be deemed visionary and absurd, namely, that it were possible for us on the great subject of Parliamentary Reform to forget for a moment that there are two sides in this House, and that the words Whig, Tory, and Radical were never heard. I wish we could regard ourselves as a body of English Gentlemen having a common object, to consult simply on what is practically best for the good of the country, without reference to party motives or interests. If we could by any possibility approach the question in that spirit, let me ask the noble Lord how many Members in this House would advocate this Bill; and whether the great majority would not view it, as so many of us now do, with serious alarm, founded on the belief that it will throw a monopoly of the representation into the hands of one particular class? Let me revert to that absurd expression, which I hope we shall hear no more—"the fancy franchises." I confess I was amused to hear more than one hon. Gentleman the other night anxiously praying us to recollect that the lodger franchise is not one of these fancy franchises. Now, we all remember the origin of that expression. It was first employed last year, when hon. Gentlemen opposite were praising our Bill in private and speaking against it in public—when they could find no valid argument against its principle, and were therefore driven to the resource of designating our proposed new franchises by this ridiculous epithet. One of these was the lodger franchise, and I still retain the opinion that the best and broadest proposal ever submitted to this House on Parliamentary Reform was to extend the franchise to respectable lodgers. There you would at least have had an addition to the existing constituency—an addition, not of men belonging to one class, but to all, the great majority of whom are eminently fitted by education and position to exercise the 'suffrage with safety to the country. Another part of the subject to which I beg to call attention is the adoption of rating as the basis for the franchise. I retain my opinion that rating is the best basis for the franchise here. The Government have adopted a rating in the case of their Irish Reform Bill, and also in that of the Scotch. I do not know why they do not adopt it in the English Bill; because I deny that the inequality of the assessment is an argument against the principle. This inequality is a defect of the existing law, and we are now told that the Home Secretary has in his office a Bill to correct that defect. I cannot, therefore, believe that this inequality will be allowed to remain much longer. But I wish to warn Gentlemen on both sides against an error into which I strongly suspect they are apt to fall—namely, that if we adopted a £6 rating franchise, that would be a protection against numbers, and would practically be equivalent to an £8 rental. I believe it would be no such thing, and I found my opinion partly from a knowledge of the working of the law, partly on the proofs we have in the papers before us which detail these inequalities. It is there shown that the difference between the rating and the rental ranges from a minimum of four per cent in such towns as Tamworth and Shrewsbury up to a maximum of 34 per cent in other places. What, then, would be the result if you adopted a rating franchise? Undoubtedly this inequality would be corrected. There would be a pressure between rival parties to place the greatest number of voters they could on the rate-book, and in the end the inequality would be speedily redressed. Well, having these objections, or rather the one strong objection I have expressed to this Bill, it may be asked, "Why are you not to oppose the second

[Second Night.

believe that the sentiments expressed in it were shared by any considerable number of Gentlemen in this House. On the contrary, I believe that there are very few hon. Members who do not think it is absolutely necessary that this question should be disposed of, not by attempting to set it aside or shelve it, not by endeavouring to shut the doors against all those of the working classes who are now excluded from the franchise, but by the admission of a portion at least of them to the exercise of the suffrage upon the principles embodied in the Bill now before the House. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich, has said that there is only one principle in the Bill, that of overwhelming property and intelligence by mere force of numbers; but he did not attempt to prove his position from the returns which are before the House, or from facts which are within his own knowledge. He assumed the truth of his assertion, and then quoted a speech delivered by the hon. Member for Birmingham, not in this House, as a proof that he ought to oppose the Bill, because in it he had said—and I have no doubt said truly—that this was a result which he did not wish to see brought about by any Reform Bill. The right hon. Baronet did not adopt the suggestion of his leader, that the Bill should be absolutely withdrawn, nor that of the hon. and learned Member for Gloucestershire, that it should be at once rejected, but he said, "Refer the Bill to a Select Committee of the Privy Council," according to a plan recommended by a noble Friend and relative of mine, whose authority on political matters I greatly respect, and who thinks more deeply than most men upon these subjects, but whose suggestion to attempt to remove this question of Parliamentary reform out of the arena of politics, and refer it to a Committee of the Privy Council, like the plan of a constitution for one of our colonies which would afterwards come before Parliament, has always seemed to me a most Utopian scheme. The right hon. Baronet has, however, adopted it to its full extent, and he says now that if the Government will between this and the Committee upon the Bill adopt that plan, if they will appoint a Select Committee of Privy Councillors, Members of this House, Gentlemen of different opinions, he has no doubt that a Bill will be produced round which all the other Members of the House will rally, and which they will at once adopt as a [Second Night.

could not help
 t hon. Baronet
 'hat sentiments
 be rankling in had not struck Gentleman the duced his Bill discomfiture of avoided if this the Government
 hon. Gentleman fairly admitted,
 et did not, that es, namely, the
 in boroughs, its he redistribution
 t; but then the cted to the meamplicity. Now,
 y is one of its
 at deal has been ranchises," and he Member for sensitive with need not have t first applied to lovernment, but which were pro-Bill which was se by my noble
 ell) during the berdeen. It was f reproach, but nate franchises
 e Constitution.
 hises I will only
 ation we thought
 inciple of repre-
 ehise which we
 of the land, but so as to admit nstitution a far llow-countrymen
 ht of suffrage.
 see fancy fran-apprehend that to a great deal
 and as we could ter by the direct ed by this Bill,
 duty to recom-
 adoption of such iter into the dis-
 ranchise, which,
 which have been this debate, is a Committee, and ling of the Bill.
 en notice of his mendment upon

prove a permanent settlement of the Reform question which does not admit, by means of a reduction of the franchise in boroughs, a large portion of those who are now excluded. Is no account to be taken of the increased intelligence and the progressive improvement of the working classes? The right hon. Baronet said the time might come when the education of the working classes would be sufficient to justify a proposal such as that we now make. He has taken a warm and active part in promoting education. Is he so desponding as to say that no great advancement has been made in the intelligence and education of those classes who will be included in the operation of this Bill? I was much struck by an observation made by the late Mr. Robert Stephenson at a public dinner given to Sir William Armstrong by the inhabitants of Newcastle, at which I took a part, as connected with that neighbourhood. He was speaking of the early struggles of his father in connection with the locomotive engine, and he said:—

"The difficulties which my father had to contend with were not so much material as mental. He overcame matter long before he overcame mind and his most laborious and difficult task was the formation and instruction of a body of workmen capable of assisting him in the execution of his designs."

And he proceeded to say that such, since that period, had been the growth of intelligence among the working classes that a great portion of the credit attached to the construction of the Armstrong gun was due to the workmen who had been employed on it. Are these to be considered men who would be dangerous to the constitution, and who would overbear by their numbers intelligence and property? I do not believe that any such result would follow the adoption of this Bill. No doubt, in five or six boroughs a large increase will be made to the existing constituent body; but, taking the whole of the boroughs together, the increase in each will not be such as to change essentially the character of the constituencies. The right hon. Baronet has impugned the accuracy of our returns. Those returns have been prepared with great care, and I believe they are substantially correct; at any rate they enable us to make a good approximate estimate of what will be the probable increase in the register by the operation of the Bill. But the right hon. Gentleman finds that in three boroughs —

[Second Night.

Midhurst, the are considerably 10 householders.

I believe may doubt is a dewhile they give boroughs which to mention the disfranchise, for ex-
of 300 scot-and-rents for the dis-the right hon. Ba-here are 282 of

But to return.
admission of the action of the bo-locally adopted by the vote which it
adding of the Bill Government. No not contain a proof the borough general accept-right hon. General criticised the provisions, though this is a mistake; and he engaged the House that the Bill attached to this franchise that the House not a dwelling-
the annual value disfranchise many votes. I cannot say we have not now not have them if county franchise
is to be disfranchise the right
the misapprehension applies to the clause; but if he says that they are

The right hon.
at large boroughs
of their own are as part of county they have really a great number in the suburbs of Members of their properly belong, the county constitution to readjust the so as to include the right hon. Gentleman county voters would difficulty and conflict. The right hon. Gentleman, I should like to Man-in it

the who t is t be opuhim-nity
s of how they [em-for [emests defer menis to too, arry inonal ;
ade
for ition this said l of here rity ;
ma-
give it is ight l for with fer, ght,
hare
ider Jenects ren-
here
the
the de-
not ces, will lan-ber Bill,
and im-ot a Jen-

"There is a wish—I would once have said a very general wish—that instead of the household suffrage being founded on value, it should be founded by preference on rating. I am not at all surprised that more than one hon. Gentleman has received this observation with marks of assent and sympathy. I confess myself that I was always much biassed in favour of that idea. It appears to me that if you could make—to use a common phrase—the rate-book the register, you would very much simplify the business of election ; but, when you come to examine this matter in detail, in order to see how it will act, you will find that it is involved in difficulties—great, all acknowledge, and I am sorry to be obliged to confess, to my mind insurmountable. For the purpose of securing the advantage of having the rate-book the register, you must, of course, leave perfect discretion to the overseer. The overseer has an interest in raising rates, people may say ; or he may be a very hot political partisan. Are you prepared to leave to the overseer the absolute discretion of appointing those who are to exercise the suffrage ? Some will say, We must have some check. But what is a check but an appeal ? And if you appeal, you cannot do better than appeal to the revising barrister. If you have an appeal to some other parochial officer, you appeal to an inferior tribunal to that which you now enjoy ; and, indeed, unless you permitted the overseer to be unchallenged, you could not make the rate-book the register. But even beyond this, there are other difficulties which you will find most perplexing. Notwithstanding the Parochial Assessment Act, the rating of this country is most unequal ; and it is only those whose business it has been to examine into this subject in its minute details, who can be aware of the preposterous consequences which would arise from adopting a rating instead of a value qualification."—[3 Hansard, ciii. 982.]

I think he overstated the objection as to the discretion to be left to the overseer, against which, perhaps, precautions might be taken, but I entirely agree with him as to the inequality of rating. The right hon. Baronet seems to think that we ought to have waited until the inequalities of rating were corrected by the Bill which has been prepared by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. But a Bill of that sort cannot be carried without considerable opposition, and even when carried it will be some time before it can be brought into operation throughout the country ; so that, in fact, waiting for that Bill means putting off the Reform Bill till another Session, if not longer. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli), having criticised the three main principles of the Bill, went on to express a hope that the measure would be withdrawn, and contrasted the present condition of the political world with its state when the Reform Bill of the late Government was proposed. He treated this as a time of very great political anxiety and danger. I am not going to touch on the present state of Europe, but I ask the

{ COMMONS

he Bill of	was in
l war was	right
ubt it is	forgot
savouring	tleman
not at all	make i
a success-	though
eks after	frage t
t the very	ment;
ar broke	presen
w long it	what
Most se-	render
ined that	sure.
ar. Un-	for the er a short	this E
dden ter-	the ri
a Govern-	sat do
nd if any	of Ref
i this Bill	tion w
te of Eu-	look t
een much	respon
however,	the d
[will ask,	looked ntry now	taken
, that this	measu
ever was	their c
was more	that t
passionate	allude
inquit and	Birmin
instances	indeed
than the	appeal
e present	measu
nce of all	for th
f the Bill,	author
Committee	culiarl
ject emi-	defend
t if it re-	in the
nt, it will	where
fears of	freely.
from ad-	his ob
eyond the	presen
nope, too,	Memb
l satisfac-	rather
untrymen	opport
share in	had t
so doing	his pl
ty of our	his ow
	and e ight hon.	simple
had mis-	measu
d against	specie
the right	estima
right hon.	came
hey called	consti
ischierous	plied
he second	Unite
leman did	the re
ld be pos-	lover
a principle	was
ication of	it cam
, this Bill	of it.

statement of universal suffrage, that would not be accepted as a good argument by a practical legislative assembly, because, if it were worth anything, it would be good for arriving at universal suffrage at once, instead of advancing towards it step by step. He, therefore, raised the issue on a more legitimate ground, and, seeing it to be necessary to declare that the institution to be reformed did not at present work well, he boldly stated to a large assembly at Huddersfield that Parliament did not represent the people of England. To show his hearers how Parliament needed reform, he said, "We do nothing else there but sit in listless apathy, voting away the millions which you toil for." Now, the hon. Gentleman might speak for himself when he talked of listless apathy; certain it was that on Supply nights, when these millions were voted away, he was not very frequently in his place. Only the other night, when the hour for declamation being over, and the general debate in which he had taken part at an end—the Military Estimates, which the hon. Gentleman so frequently assailed, came up for consideration, he left the House. The statement which he made to the people of Huddersfield, that one class voted away millions of money supplied by another class, was not a fair representation of the existing Parliament; but it exactly described the sort of Parliament which the hon. Member wished to substitute. To the people of Liverpool the hon. Member described Parliament as a Parliament of the rich, taxing the poor to spare themselves. Now, was this anything like the truth? In the first place it was calculated by Mr. M'Culloch that even the existing constituency was double the number of the payers of income tax, there being 500,000 persons paying on incomes down to £150 per annum, while the present constituency comprised 1,000,000 persons; so that, to carry out his own proposition, that direct taxation should be the basis of representation, the hon. Member must disfranchise one-half of the existing constituency. But was it true that this was a Parliament of the rich, taxing the poor to spare themselves? The hon. Member must have known that the reverse was the fact; and not only in direct, but indirect taxation, the richer classes paid in mass, and per head, and according to their income, far more than the proportion contributed by what were called the working classes. To arrive at such a conclusion the hon. Gentleman of the principal necessary in the cal-proportionate num-

 working classes,
 and the latter tion. He must in the average as, and shut his recent legislation to rest chiefly on classes, the cal-
 all these points
 direct and indirect wage of a working like 11 per income of other at 16 per cent.
 ed his argument
 is argument was
 of his conclusion,
 ly, as to the nee hon. Member for himself a of the working derley) had been ent as the hon.
 time Parliament on specifically for ing classes under acts. What part in that legisla-
 role of those dis-
 ed all such pro-
 ly as yesterday,
 efore the House
 its to bleaching
 elf, thinking pro-
 ly do for him to while the Reform
 olved not to vote
 another occasion,
 cribe the House
 ple of Birming-
 in my place in stolid phalanx of arty; and if you men pay into the y and their fami-
 reasury, you will e times as much as much, and I e mark if I said
 e they pay in."
 of foundation in
 (r. Adderley) be-average sample nd he was—what eyes of the hon.
 owner; he paid
 ion, his share of England

garded Man-make d with l have which ry test xclude y who arcely low as l give on of rd exgham
He
it year it recalled among wed to lready where s sold, lly de-
fringe to buy ad the d such es dis-
y, and quali-pociety.
There
ch the y had speech

ing the te body
t a safe activity
of the

could
of the
at the f the There
could riends.
o con-
ing to works hard id not argest all his

acres? The working man who had just invested the result of his economy in a savings bank valued the protection of property more than the millionaire of the Funds; and no man was more conservative than the working man when he found that the country was thriving and he was better off every day. It was among the working classes that the Conservatives wished to spread the roots of the constitution, but in doing that were they not specially to beware of such misrepresentations as they had just heard—of the arguments of those who said a Reform Bill was good for nothing except as a step towards universal suffrage—and of giving a monopoly of power to the most discontented classes, who had nothing to lose, and who were the facile tools of demagogues and dupes of misrepresentations such as he had had the satisfaction, at all events, of bringing before the attention of the House? He hoped that, while passing the second reading of this Bill, as a matter of principle they would in Committee introduce such corrections as would check its more democratic tendency, and moreover enable them to avoid several constitutional innovations which it proposed. The principal of these innovations was the accumulating seats in populous localities, instead of spreading the representation equally over every part, so as to include every interest. It had never been, since the first days of Parliament in this country, the principle of the Constitution to accumulate Members in populous localities. The principle of the Constitution, from the very earliest days of Parliament, had been to give every part of the country a voice in that House. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey) had argued that if there was no case for having three Members in a locality there could be no case for having two. But from the first institution of Parliament it had been the custom to give two Members to all shires, cities, and boroughs, the idea being that each should have a voice in Parliament, the larger localities and the smaller having the same. It was a dangerous innovation to accumulate a number of Members in certain populous places and leave other parts of the country unrepresented. He hoped that the details of the Bill would be carefully considered in Committee—that bald numerical principles would be warily tested—that the pedantry of laying down certain tenures as county qualification, and others as fit for boroughs, would be scouted as nonsense, and that amendments would

[Second Night.]

the Peop

ing through the
That was a ver
ur representati
n, a great and benefited much that had of them. Thus ho were fully c ible share in t which consisted
na. In revisin m he thought t
ely in 'recomm
on ten years s er. He now a f the particular by the noble
h that object.
t that if there
for any meas
it was recom
re grounds, it sidered measur from lassitud asure dictated l oublesome eng
ily contracted.
aint that was representative se could object
art of the Bill
ment was amply

It would dou
s, and in many le did not obj representative o
never flattered
ys told them he learn politics,
to them; and,
the working c
the least fear hise proposed b ved there was hat meant bet
se; and althoug fembers might present the ef ether than its
. there was the
sion of the res ntlemen opposi
. they would m tion of their cl ncies. It had ims of a some as contrasted
re had been suc
ncy. But he whether this n

ment of the question. The noble Lord was to redress yet what was his other by side with his liberal vision of the suffrage there d, he might almost say a sure of disfranchisement. scape from the belief that was creating greater an- found. Associated with the franchise that, un- umstances, would satisfy t Reformer, there was a istribution of seats; and e, paltry, falling off was noble Lord doubled the encies, which now com- ir population, wealth, and t sufficiently represented; force of their argument, re nothing to satisfy the was not a mode of settling He had understood from n the last Parliament that in, first, a measure for anchise, and next a mea- chisement—that was, to istribution of seats in a e. He wished the noble d to that intention; but, , the two subjects were r in a Bill which must the noble Lord's pro- tlement of the question. tension was much greater 352, because, when the given to the occupants there were many grades e the £10 householders ut the returns before the that in the large towns pying houses under £10 y superior to the classes . thus, if they chose to might swamp the other s. He merely mentioned ow liberal and extensive of enfranchisement. If ad been combined a pro- ure of disfranchisement, ave been consistent with ght have had an opinion d perhaps not a favourable would have been a con- and one which gentlemen elves Reformers, and who had been opening their uestings and political meet- f Reform, were bound to an which those who had not been titled to have tak- Bill must the settle The Bill wisely wi franchise more imp He believ ham was the great tion of se this coul- Indeed, t it did no proposed 7,000 inh to distrib swarming he was a the noble satisfied he tender must inde to that i he justly such a pr of the q- jection w Bill. He was, he l of the bo the hone largest oc ed by a of Salfor and nearl double re the noble under the be left w number c 10,500. down to swarming in prosp borough Lord's B tituents Reform q him in a He was pretended vanced E way in le to plunge might be fore have furnished kind might be carried too far, and he did not think such rude modes of cutting Gordian knots entitled those who resorted to them to the praise of being great statesmen or of conquering great difficulties. The right hon. Member for Droitwich had adverted to a suggestion thrown out by the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden) on his return from the United States, recommending a division of certain constituencies into wards, each to return its own Members. He attached great importance to this suggestion, and thought it well worthy the consideration of Parliament. When Parliament flooded these enormous areas with a vast mass of voters it created monster constituencies. Now, all those who had acquired experience of such constituencies agreed that, in proportion as the number of voters was increased beyond a certain point, the value which each individual voter attached to his vote was diminished. The voter felt himself to be a unit in a vast mob. Another objection to these huge, unwieldy constituencies was that it was impossible for a Member to make himself properly acquainted with them. The people who returned him knew nothing about him. The result was that the nomination of the Member fell into the hands of some self-constituted association or club, which formed itself into a sort of electoral college, which found the candidate and prescribed his political creed—they corresponded with him upon public subjects—and were, indeed, a species of middlemen between the Member and his constituency. Now, that in his (Mr. Massey's) opinion was a most pernicious state of things; and he thought that in any proposal for the re-arrangement of our representative system it was of the first and last importance that these men should be deprived of the pernicious influence they had hitherto exercised over the larger constituencies. In these vast areas one side would be Conservative and the other Liberal. The same difference would, indeed, be found between one part of the borough and the other as between one part of a county and the other. He had hoped that in a well-considered measure suggested by the matured judgment and experience of the noble Lord some means would have been provided, he would not say of mitigating, but of obviating the palpable evils that must accrue from creating these enormous constituencies. Why not adopt in boroughs the principle laid down in the great Reform Act with regard to counties? They as-

[Second Night.

stating in savings banks was between 9,000 and 10,000, and below £50 almost double the number. From his own knowledge of the class of savings-bank depositors in Scotland, he believed scarcely one in three of them would be admitted to the franchise under a £6 house qualification; while in Cambridge, which he represented, about one-sixth would be added to the constituency by a savings-bank qualification alone. That being so, he asked the noble Lord why he had omitted such a qualification from his present Bill. Concurring as he did in the second reading of the Bill, nevertheless he could have wished that some Resolution had been proposed, not necessarily antagonistic to the Bill, in which it should be laid down as the opinion of the House, that unless the omissions to which he referred were supplied, the measure would not be satisfactory to the country. With respect to the lodger franchise, he presumed that after what had been said, even on his own side of the House, the noble Lord would feel it necessary to insert a franchise of that character. He, however, took the opportunity of giving notice that on going into Committee on this Bill he would move a Resolution to the effect, that in any Bill for the extension of the franchise, it being desirable to admit to its exercise classes whose wealth, prudence, and intelligence eminently entitled them to the privilege, it be an instruction to the Committee to consider how many persons belonging to several classes, which he would not at present trouble the House by enumerating, should be admitted. They consisted of classes proposed by the noble Lord, with the addition of others who would not come in on other franchises, such as the lodger franchise. The result of the extension of the franchise proposed by the Bill would, he believed, be to treble the existing number of electors in the case of some boroughs, and to double it in others; its general effect being likely to be to overwhelm intelligence and property in our representative system. We should, in fact, under the operation of the Bill have constituencies in many boroughs in which electors, who represented only one-fourth or one-fifth of its rateable property, would have the power of entirely swamping the remaining members of the constituency. But there was another objection to the £6 franchise, and that was, that it was calculated to prove unequal in its operation, inasmuch as it would, in some boroughs, admit to the exercise of the franchise num-

[Second Night.

is, while in others le them from that how the proposal
work in boroughs,
se of Cambridge,
Mr. Steuart) had

The valuation
D; the constituthough the real 1,600. In the
the noble Lord, as were given as
even five times.
f the noble Lord
would be added 1,400; but his out twenty-seven number. This
(Mr. Steuart's)

Supposing that constituency of would represent to about £9,000.
property of the more than four
mt. Other bo-tuated to Cam-
re might mention
ited by the hon.
n of Committees
ident from those constituencies in not represent in than a fourth or held by those t in their power ot be just that l bear some proaxation? Again, was possible to dge a man must house which he for £4. Sup-£6 house in the latter and there se for £4; had a worse citizen?

rt at £6 if they
nt. They would 5 franchise next go on till they age; and if they y stop till they ge? Again, was as between the
? Was the num-
the former at all ber given to the ation being con-
present stood a popula turned lation 330. candid of this and of further Steuar

aggrav system hoped dified be affi strong the thi the Go the eff improb be to d
of the
the F hand politic
ter. '
would Exche
ber for for Ro
the re
had wi in char
able e Gentle Treaty respect
of the
he was its les most d most e able p mittee.
Ma.
right h wich h Goverr
membe the B
he (Mr
if the tinguis a Bud
would the mi
Let th done d passed passed.
now in

ly just almost empire.
 of mafected, orn per urning ess by ooking
 ially,
 . more in any e, preght to repre-
 n who ow far e than main-
 in the step in le this
 He did
 ; it for ion, he ept it, til this
 ; many ssure.
 tice of id 40s.
 'rise of
 ough,
 , with ot see ould be a free-nd yet perties Then li refe-Mem-
 . He
 ; a fair
 nament
 The
 never ke the e con-
 be both e law e being ss, and no had ties on y took e their olitical secure or evil

connected with requiring rates to be paid before a certain day, which was, that in boroughs where parties were nearly balanced there were always a number of unprincipled electors pretending to be short of money, but that if their partisans would pay their rates their votes would be all right; and thus bribery of the worst description was committed, and the evil influence on neighbouring electors was very great, for they were frequently taunted with being foolish enough to pay their own rates, whilst, if they had held back, they might have had their rates paid for them. With regard to the redistribution of seats, he agreed with the hon. Member for Salford, that it would have been better to have left it alone, and to have introduced it in another Bill. He begged hon. Members not to misunderstand him; he was very far removed from wishing equal electoral districts; he had sooner than that remain as they were. But there was a medium. The noble Lord the Member for London had admitted that it was not such a change as ought to be made; but the question which arose was whether they should make an alteration which could be carried or one which could not? The hon. Member for West Gloucestershire had pointed with horror to the time when they might in this country resemble New York. Now, New York might be in the very depths of poverty from the description of the hon. and learned Gentleman; but when he (Mr. Crossley) visited the country, he must say that with all its bad laws (and there was much both in the American franchise and in the payment of Members with which he did not agree), he could not shut his eyes to the fact that one might walk about for weeks and months without meeting with a beggar or a person in want. On the contrary, New York had increased in trade with a rapidity which we could scarcely conceive, and had become proportionately enlarged in size. He did not think, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman had been successful in pointing with alarm to the United States. It astonished him to find that hon. Gentlemen connected with the agricultural interest were so much more afraid of the working classes than manufacturers were. Should any riots occur, whether was it easier for the rioters to injure the factories, by breaking the windows and the machinery, or to throw stones upon and injure the land? He thought the land would not run away; but that if any risk were run, it would be by those whose goods and chattels were of a more British description. He believed there was a good feeling and sympathy on the part of landowners as manufacturers, the preference being that the latter, from their position, had much better opportunities of judging of the character of working men by constantly coming into contact with them. He thought it was Lord Crossley who said "Dine together." Now, he need not act upon that motto literally, but their intercourse with the working men, and yet manufacturers must come more readily into contact with them. He (Mr. Crossley) had had opportunities of being acquainted with working men; he had dealings with them, and he knew them both in bad and good times, and he was bound to say that he had witnessed much fair dealing, uprightness, and respectable conduct amongst that class of men as he had found in any other with which he had to do. He had seen their liberality in times of great distress—their kindness and liberality towards their fellow-men—their abundance of kindly deeds—their bedside of suffering and sick men day and by night, seeking no reward in this world, save that which was of more value to them than money—their satisfaction of doing that which they felt to be right and just. Therefore, he had no objection, after his experience amongst working men, in voting for the second reading of the Bill, which would certainly take away the stigma of class legislation. He told there was no agitation upon the subject, but if hon. Gentlemen would visit places where working men obtained newspapers, and were well informed, they would find there was a very strong opinion on the question. They were much interested at what had been done in the House of Commons during the last few years. They had scarcely believed that landowners would take off the duty on foreign goods, remove many duties which pressed upon the working man, and impose an income tax upon themselves. Generally speaking, they felt satisfied with what the House of Commons had done for the people, but they were unable to see how they were not permitted to have as much to do with the representation. They wanted their fair share. They did not want to have no monopoly in their favour. They wanted to be treated as fellow-citizens, having their all in this country, and were entitled to have some voice in the government. This was the feeling

[Second Night.

Mr. F. Crossley

at good men did all in ny down. That was not n- proceeding. In the pr of through Committee th he means to prevent the u it, of one class in the rep ed Allusions had been mad he this question. What v il; of the noble Lord on tha ad he was sincerely desir tu- liamentary Reform ou nd the House might proce ow legislation required by ill had not the hon. Memb ex- the other evening in ill House plainly told ther he stead of settling, would lo- question?

Mr. BRIGHT: All
le I said nothing of the ki he remark to the subject ste ment of boroughs, and all point the Bill would not w- I did not mean, and he would effect an unsettl m- the suffrage.

MR. KER SEYMER
sir understood the statemen hi- ber at the time, and nt- that, if the hon. Gentle ng ately to commence an a ad franchisement of borou he no settlement of the he Why, the hon. Memb
nt. tinctly avowed that th he everything, for had be n, in his opinion, the distr ed was the very "pith a as liamentary Reform?" ad opinion of the hon. Gen an they expect that this I he settlement of the ques us not think that even th sir franchise was quite settl on Gentleman was concern to idea running through th ny —number—number wa ed (Mr. Seymer) said, fitn un- The hon. Gentleman s ad 1,000,000 of persons ot ni- possessed the franchise, ia- opinion, proved his c we Seymer) said it did no at- how many were exclud no fit to possess the franch er were admitted if they an the small towns and r to would be many millions ise enfranchised by this l sch evident that if they fell of the hon. Member for Birmingham they would shortly come to manhood suffrage and electoral districts. But then the hon. Gentleman seemed to have some idea of an indefeasible right to the franchise. That right had never been admitted in this country, and he hoped it never would. He thought that they had gone low enough in establishing virtually household suffrage. The facts that had been lately proved in the case of the Wakefield election showed that they had lowered the franchise to a class of persons who looked upon it as conferring upon them a right to use it for pecuniary emolument. The hon. Member for Birmingham, painfully aware of the contrast between the corrupt boroughs and the county constituencies, very adroitly turned on the last and said, "Oh," you cannot be bribed, because you are not free to sell your votes." Now, he replied to that assertion of the hon. Gentleman by saying that the county electors were perfectly free to sell their votes if they had the inclination to do so; but such a thing as corruption was unknown in the counties. He did not mean to take too much credit for their freedom from corruption. The rural constituencies were spread over a wide area, and there were no corner public-houses in which bodies of the electors could meet and be bribed. As to the county electors being anything like slaves to do alone the will of their landlords, he utterly denied the assertion. If the landlords' influence were paramount in the county which he represented he would not hold a seat at that time in the House, because it so happened that the principal landed proprietors there were supporters of the policy of Her Majesty's Government; but amongst the people generally of the counties there was a strong Conservative feeling existing, and that was the reason why the hon. Member for Birmingham did not like the county constituencies. The people of his county sent him into that House to tell the hon. Gentleman that they were utterly opposed to his views of policy, both foreign and domestic. They sent him there to tell him that with all his ability and honesty of purpose, they considered him to be a most dangerous politician. The hon. Member for Birmingham was kind enough, in the course of his speech, to advise them to trust their fellow countrymen. He said, "Why not trust the people?" The hon. Gentleman in one sense certainly did trust the people; he trusted largely in their ignorance, when he addressed them was paid for the majority of the d the possession al qualifications tleman summed s," inasmuch as the occupier the nce, good taste, its, which quali- of the franchise. great distinction rith that of the ney franchises" air own account, fered as a sub- the franchise to ought that some were perfectly ly the effect of existing in the not extend the classes who had to it. The law -the army and :employments- nat were repre- down to a £10 hon. Gentleman that, or take in e country. In- vet the Member .ton), advocated ment on the ex- the representa- middle classes. present Bill en- of persons, who deous class, ex- n the boroughs; ey would neither nor would those admitted, be a present borough ,000, and those would be only outside, without account of non- of residence, and he was satisfied per cent to the r this measure. , 200,000 could influence over belonged to the d not belong to be a mistake to) who would be l belong to the aken the trouble things in this respec

Mr. Ker Seymour

presen calcul
the B 10,000
of the superi the m a gen opinio read v ject of
to the

"We have v believe have es new to the tri inclose strictly
and 2.
The p return, intellig class."

The 1
trades
to £7
would which cult their dyers, joiner tinner 2 con
of por rent in engine presse mould brush leathe cutter class
from These keepe have £50 t factor drawe &c. faction
sons v cies b geneo
for the tical p
to dra

land esti-n of d to must of a ugh ales 000. were Now, idle ugh-med tions
and
the ina-
was hole still more Only ctors
and is so ases, tion, toral d the rong about id be mter
He
opor-
able,
s, for ht be hise, mous e en-ught ughs
f the
from that atisfy r the h the ised.
o in-
cups.
hich
o the had
that intel-o decisive, that they could not with any safety think of excluding any longer from the enjoyment of the franchise that class of persons. He might mention that in 1820, when the noble Lord (John Russell) began his career as a Reformer by proposing to transfer the forfeited franchise of Gramspond to Leeds with a £10 franchise, it was stated in that House that the leading banker in Leeds had written up to say, that if persons inhabiting £10 houses were to receive the franchise he would be obliged to shut up his bank. Such was the view at that time taken of the social condition of Leeds. Upon a recent occasion they had had an opportunity of contrasting the social position of that borough in the present day with what it was in the year 1820. On the occasion he referred to, Her Majesty came down and honoured Leeds by opening its new Town Hall. On that occasion Her Majesty passed in an open carriage through several miles of the streets of Leeds, thronged with half a million of people, without hearing one word of rudeness or discourtesy, and amid the heartiest expressions of loyalty. Her Majesty and the young Princesses rejoiced to witness their unfeigned and hearty loyalty. [Cheers.] He was glad to observe that hon. Gentlemen opposite believed in the loyalty of the working classes. He believed in it too. He believed that there was a conservative feeling of the best kind in the working class; and if the House had any sincere desire to render them more loyal and conservative they would extend to them the privileges of the Constitution of England. Then, being admitted within the citadel of the Constitution, in times of distress they would be found the defenders of that citadel instead of its assailants, which they would be if found outside of it. By way of explaining the great social improvement which had taken place in that borough, he would mention to the House a few facts, which would possess great interest for all who cared for the social improvement of the people. First, as to savings banks, and he would beg hon. Gentlemen to bear in mind that those institutions were almost exclusively for the benefit of the working classes, a great number of whom must be qualified for the exercise of the franchise. In the Leeds, Skyrac, and Morley Savings Bank there were open accounts—number of persons, 12,878; the amount, £339,890. In the West Riding Penny Savings Bank, of which there were eleven branches in the overwhelming necessity for it. Well, I have been endeavouring to gather from the lips of the eminent persons who have addressed us what is the case of paramount and overwhelming necessity for the present Bill, but I confess I have obtained no information upon that interesting point. The hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), in a speech of great ability, frankly and honestly admitted that there is a profound apathy on the subject of Parliamentary Reform, and he endeavoured to account for it upon metaphysical principles. He quoted from Mr. Mill to show that the English people were becoming frigid philosophers. I doubt the application of that quotation to this country, because whenever the people of England feel deeply they express their opinion strongly and warmly; when they disapproved a Conspiracy Bill they expressed their disapproval strongly. and if they wanted a Reform Bill they would speak out unmistakeably on the subject. There is a profound apathy in the country in reference to the question, and I do not think the hon. Member for Halifax helped his case when he confessed that even his inspiring eloquence had failed to excite the people of England—a strong proof of the invincible good sense of his countrymen. Nor did I hear a satisfactory reason for a Reform Bill from the lips of the hon. Member for Birmingham. He gave us a reason, indeed, perhaps the best which has been offered yet, for he said that the present Bill had been introduced by the noble Lord because when he was in Opposition he promised to bring forward some such measure.

MR. BRIGHT: I did not say that the noble Lord introduced the Bill on that account; but that the Bill took the form it has assumed in consistency with a promise he gave the House last year. That is a very different reason from the words the right hon. Gentleman has put into my mouth.

MR. WHITESIDE: The precise words used by the hon. Member were that the Bill was a redemption of the pledge given by the noble Lord when he sat on the Opposition side of the House. I submit to his better judgment that a worse argument he could not have advanced. It is but the statement of a fact. It is true, I admit, that when the noble Lord was in Opposition he did, in a rash moment, when engaged in carrying an abstract Resolution, throw out some hints as to what a Reform Bill ought to contain—an unanswerable instance of the danger of giving pledges in Opposition, which are sure to recoil upon a statesman when he gets into office. As a matter of fact, therefore, the statement of the hon. Member for Birmingham is correct, but it is no argument to prove the necessity of a Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey) also endeavoured to explain why the present measure was introduced, but I cannot say he was quite successful in giving us a satisfactory reason. He said that the Government had proposed the Bill in its present shape in order to retain the confidence of their supporters.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I did not say so.

MR. BRIGHT: The confidence of the House, not of their supporters.

MR. WHITESIDE: I thank the hon. Member for his correction, but I apprehend the confidence of the House means the confidence of a majority. That is a very politic reason for the introduction of the Bill, but it does not prove it to be a good Bill; on the contrary, it may be a bad Bill, although it receives the support of a majority. I submit that the duty of enlightened statesmen, such as I see on the Treasury bench, is not to pander to the prejudices of a majority, but to consult their own reason, and introduce measures conducive to the permanent welfare of the country. The hon. Gentleman who spoke last gave us a specimen of statistical rhetoric. He seemed to be of opinion that England, Ireland, and Scotland, were centred in Leeds. I may say, indeed, that his speech was a convincing argument against the proposal to give another Member to Leeds, for, if twenty gentlemen were to spend their lives in studying the blue or red-book which contains the history of the institutions of Leeds, they could not do so to better purpose or with greater effect than the hon. Member. But he mistook the philosophic speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bucks, where he spoke of the addition of a homogeneous mass to the existing constituent body. The hon. Gentleman seems to have thought that my right hon. Friend meant them all to be plasterers. I assure the hon. Member that was not the argument, and I think it was scarcely necessary for him to give us, with such painful particularity, the number of the useful, industrious men belonging to the various trades of Leeds, in order to disprove the statement of my right hon. Friend. That statement stands untouched by the interesting facts which the communicated to the measure like the

[Second Night.]

 a fair question to body? The hon.
 Mr. Lawson), who of the old block,"
 about that, and I observations. He not so applicable to ghis, but he hoped ary Reform Bill—me when I heard supplementary Bill introduced, all the
 be extinguished.
 with all the ardour
 with sincerity, and this final measure
 has introduced will y a supplementary
 —he does not give which will extin-d Members to Par-nall towns in the
 ember for Birming-
 , has also given us
 ent Bill, and I re-reful notice of the
 for London. "The said the hon. Memmarrow of Reform.
 ble, but rather un-
 the distribution of
 ording to the hon.
 uthority in the coun-
 ure proceeding with
 , while the finances
 state of expectancy
 ng but to unsettle
 piece of statesman-the Gentlemen on but the hon. Gentle-
 y fairly and openly,
 ods of the country
 he added this ret is impossible for permanently where it by this Bill."
 consider the merits re Bill, the whole
 e Bill"—but we are doctrine of finality, de Lord twenty-five exploded and that y valuable because o constitution that lized world, ancient such handling as I shall have the rd on the true principles of ancient the liberty of ther any politi-

 the consequen-
 He himself on doubt—as to sure in a es-namely, Irelan
 prophecy there there the work
 culate as to th tical change, I speculate on t sure from the should say it tation condu-
 sincerity—like mingham—wh Bill gives the quieting the m
 men, but to ex
 quence to dem
 sive changes.
 mingham will those who thi principle is to their country o ling to argue Member of th
 admits that h it be to recon is not one of I decline to as the hon. Gent 7,000,000 ad
 that only 1.0
 rest are exclu means by that the rest ought chise? Does ever been the since England
 the sovereign reignty of the at no time. "I are to be ad
 masses, is ag and our Const
 man asks me were admitted little to our hi when we are p however much in railroads, a
 and the like,
 of statesman
 all improved
 of our ancest cient times e knights in th

but Certainly not. There is nothing more dangerous or more unprincipled than to take a man suddenly out of the mass of the population and to make him a voter, when that same man has performed none of the functions of which the exercise of that vote is but the development. In what did the ancient system eventuate? The constitution sought for men who had the political capacity requisite to exercise the franchise and the functions connected with it; it did not matter how few or how many they were. If they were few, the few were entrusted with the franchise for the purpose of protecting the many—it might be against their own ignorance, their own prejudices, or their own poverty; but, whether few or many, it was they who had the political capacity who possessed the power, and there is no time in the history of our constitution, when mere numbers were represented because of the fact of their numbers. In process of time the copyholder came to resemble the freeholder, he got a permanent title and a tenure almost equal to a freehold, and was necessarily included within the pale of the Constitution—the long-leaseholders, too, according as they fell within the category of possessors of political capacity. The rest were not excluded, but were held to be not entitled to the franchise, because they did not possess the political capacity, the independent property and the free will which the constitution required in him who was to be entrusted with the power of the franchise. The hon. Member for Birmingham, the hon. Member who spoke last, and the Members of the Government who have spoken call upon us to admit the working classes; but what does that mean? Are the working classes to be admitted because they are the working classes? Where is a precedent for that to be found in our books—in our history? They are to be admitted if they have the political capacity. If you discover in them the independence, knowledge, and understanding which the Constitution requires they are to be admitted. It matters not how many; the more the better. When once you have discovered a class of persons who possess the political capacity to be intrusted with the making of laws for the Government of this splendid empire, they are entitled to the franchise, no matter how numerous they may be. But I want to ask Her Majesty's Ministers, how have they proved that this body to which they refer so triumphantly possesses that political capacity?

[Second Night.

ion. Member for Birming-

He told us the other ng ago he visited a great nchester, and as he saw ile fabrics heaped up the his mind that if the men production of these arti-
 led up together not one,
 be found to have a vote.
 sent is that? We are not a good stonemason, a good ood carpenter, or a good are in search of is a man ical capacity to do a poline not of their industry, terity—you must show to air opinions, what their at their political capacity. to me that they have
 and the understanding doing of a certain poline single word has been is; you have no facts, turns, you have no eleon to judge whether they
 y. But under these cir-was I bound to do? I see as well as I could inions of these men, what organization, what their l to the great questions, political economy, but of I find in reference to a at interest, that the org on the late strikes, ex-00 men. My right hon. er for Bucks says that great power of organiza-
 these persons possessed ion were entrusted with would give them suprelooked over a pamphlet received, by Mr. Potter, the organized trades, on uts, and I find there from are the opinions of the
 for it is no use for us to re must learn their opinves. The paper is inte-or proposed to explain on of the working classes elings towards their em-that the capitalists are at they do not rank very and, far from believing s would gain their votes, hat the workmen would s on their employers at rtunity. In reference to id the conduct of their

em-
 men
 and [" I mas
 Har
 eulo is at rudi
 cont
 men chal
 the acti only war but ing
 tary
 that elly mas thus
 that orge tho
 for emp
 ed
 join ber
 the
 The
 the emp labo redu to d atta is a char
 and sign refus ing duct in ai part work proce ed is ceed mast
 the dren exist
 main is, th
 to c same le

trades' unions," they declare, combine not only the best work the best men in a moral sense be found in the trade." These therefore, are held by the masters, workmen and by those of the high reality. And then they defend the principle on which trades' unions are "We only operate upon our men by moral compulsion, like that which is in your clubs, and to which Members of Parliament are subjected. If a Member displeases his constituents, do they get rid of him?" And they give an instance to the treatment of Members for Rochdale and Birmingham. Remember, this is political economy directed against free-traders and against protectionists who won't be just towards those whom they employ, and who won't give them the full compensation—their term—which they deserve for their services. During the Russian war, Mr. B. Cobden, they observe, thought it was his duty to express sincere convictions which he had a perfect right to express, and which were opposed to what was then the public weal. Thereupon all his services were forgotten, their influence on public men was lost, and there was a great probability of their regaining confidence. It does not appear, that they have any particular power over those who assume to represent the opinions in this House. The whole is quite a manual of political economy taught in Mechanics' Institutes. Looking at this authorized public opinion, comparing the opinions there with the arguments used by the Members for Leeds and for Birmingham, the want of all argument on the bench, I ask are you justified in giving to these 600,000 organized men a vast amount of political power? Is it that an organized minority can master the will of the majority. I read in The Times to-day the lesson taught on this subject in the Canadian Assembly? You will there find a completely organized minority in a free and enlightened country prevailing over the principles of humanity as they are by their perseverance, their zeal, and their union.

"Which party has been successful?" said. In every struggle the slaveowners have the advantage. They have abolished the transatlantic slave trade, they have passed the Fugitive Bill, and they have obtained the Dred Scott decision, which declares that no person of African descent can be a citizen of the United States.

[Second

13, 1860} Address for Ret

Royal Assent.—Consolidated Fund Probate and Administration (I of Rateable Property (Ireland Amendment; Packet Service (I tracts); Administering of Poins

ELECTIONS, &

ADDRESS FOR RETURNS

THE EARL OF AIRLIE, in an Address he presented to for Returns respecting Person vote at the election of Members, the noble Earl said, that as originally drawn had like to include the number of persons assessed to the income and but he had received a communication from the Board of Inland Revenue that it would be impossible to make a Return; he had therefore withdrawn that portion of his Motion, and there would be no objection to the Address in the shape in which he had presented them; for all their Lordships would perceive the importance of having information he now sought. As it was their Lordships would shortly to consider a Bill which had introduced into the other House representation of the people very desirable to ascertain whether proposed alterations would be of service to the electoral body, and also, if they could obtain some conception of the operation of direct taxation, it appeared likely to form a part of the national system of finance. It was very desirable to see what the electors paid direct tax, and what proportion did not pay them. The Returns for which he moved would be sufficiently accurate for practical purposes, and it might fairly be assumed that voters who paid the inhabited house tax, and who occupied houses of £20, were also subjected to other direct taxes; and that a majority of electors occupying houses did not contribute to the national revenue. In not very long ago the process of the Exchequer stated that the houses rated at from £10 to £20 were occupied by persons who varied from £50 to £150 a year; then, only reasonable to suppose that the proportion of voters who did not pay taxes would be much larger.

system. Her ven the House
 hat, acting on ommission apntended so far
 of the sale and he army as to commissions to of lieutenant-id not proceed
 of promotion only proposed pal limbs. If was perfectly ld follow until e left. Now, ask, was the eed to be so this summary
 at there were very one must l, their Lord-bat ever since system both
 f commissions
 th promotion.
 ring the reign was abolished venience was the reign of stored and re-
 nce prevailed.
 n the British ituted, not for ouths into the so had got to he army, and otion, so that ght not be a if men. The rated to that ly introduced m of promo-
 an impartial hich an officer
 se was secure interest that other officers
 le would uns plan of pro-sh Army had nting officers was not only
 ny, but was in the world.
 d of was that,
 red that cer-
 commissions, at prices far at double the

Now, if the head introduced in the would do more to he had described, be devised. Hence. Suppose a ong, and the lieutenant the service— in the exercise of m, might select a shed himself in world, and nine, eight elapse be in his regiment. the regiment to it would be under major, whom it Commander-in- these were points Government would they gave effect, to the proposed point to which he ncial part of the t colonel applied did they mean to mean to tell him tion to his selling n they could give nt recognized by rmy. The Com- at the lieutenant 000, £3,000, or regulation price, notwithstanding ge sums had been ded to withhold mount he had so re an act of roba ate on great loss ice to the officers he sums they had continue till the officers were put giving the large been accustomed observations, he in the hands of nt; but he earn- they finally de a step as he had well weigh what come under the risk they would stige by adopting question missions ships' ne Baron hi sion for t reporting was in c Commiss Governm the ques Baron's idea of t tion of have bee the other occasion, the Secr was not to take general the conti abolition to enter merits or Sure he not be d ner prop country i of money prohibite pensions vent the nating, advanced Governm as the ne tion was, such as not to b evils we applicati one the denied— tant price set down Baron as charge of and far use any tice that officers of noble Ba by some, in refere valent an infantry times ex on the p But in must no

D RIPON said, natural than that ave availed him- of bringing the

; and he (Earl de not that that effect must and to follow. The ille- plas n were given were thar missions of field offi- the is said that the ten- I co ould be to injure the poin the British army. to t last person who would inst ne word against the men egimental system of sede no doubt that system und d life of our army. the ow far the changes cha be said to militate He It must be borne in app resent system officers ant d to the command of the and that the system caut n persons from other step command. The fact Brit of the regimental and re persons who had shou giments from other on c calculation did not thor ajors, many of whom that manner come from othe had not heard that Sid h this was the case upon n those in which pro dom ore directly. When (Ea system of selection reas of entirely preventing arri motion going in the men that such would be of g substitute a system of step there was nothing in crea ommissioners to pro wou Chief from promoting and egiment. The noble T fficulty of exercising glad rmous, and that if it Min uld create great dis- min must be remembered that the higher appoint- mili it was necessary to Luc e of selection. The Gov r the position of a ado a regiment was one he l re to make it neces- este m—for it was admit- mitt of great importance sum 1. He could not help wer tion was one of such and person charged with cha commanding officers evil have his power of wer d as possible. What was it if there were an unp egiment you should ploy m.

way to this officer, "I advise you to sell out. I cannot promote you. I feel it to be my duty to appoint some one else, therefore take my advice as a friend and sell out." He knew that had been done. This prevented unfit men from being promoted to the command of regiments. Let it be borne in mind too that the British military service was one of the hardest in the world. We sent our regiments to the most distant parts of the globe—to the most unhealthy climates—they had no opportunity of distinguishing themselves—Were they then to promote an officer to whom chance afforded an opportunity of distinguishing himself, over the head of an equally brave and efficient officer, who might have been quite as much or more capable, but who had not been afforded the same opportunity of bringing himself into notice? The system of selection, too, would, in his opinion, cause much jealousy, and might, perhaps, lead to appeals to public opinion—to attempts to depress brother officers in the estimation of the press and the public, and to increase their own importance, than which nothing could, in his opinion, be more pernicious. They had seen a little too much of that already. He feared that officers would be desirous of increasing their own importance at the expense of others in the same service, which would be, he repeated, a most serious misfortune. There were two courses open to them, either to adhere to the system of purchase or to abolish it altogether. A great deal had been said, and perhaps might be said, in favour of each of these courses, but with respect to the proposal of the Commission he confessed he could see nothing to recommend it, on the contrary it ingeniously united the objections to both the other plans without the merits of either, and he had never heard any man, not a member of the Commission or of the Government, who was in favour of the scheme. In his opinion it would be better to abolish the system of purchase altogether than to adopt their recommendation. It had been argued that abolishing the system of purchase as to lieutenant-colonelcies and retaining promotion by purchase in all the inferior ranks would put an end to the practice of paying what were called illegitimate prices for commissions. Notwithstanding all that had been said on this point his opinion was that there was no objection whatever to these high prices except that they were in contravention of a certain law regulation ought, in ltered. It would be egulation price, for it to an officer to carry sale of his commis-

 be a regulation price,
 or officer said he was he ought to have the y mutual agreement
 sum beyond the regus commission, he saw in the arrangement, on to it? Whom did done by common con-
 an injury, it was an promoted the greater ransactions and kept f the reason for this el lieutenant-colonels regulation price, then
 'night robbery. He
 's Government, if they oposed, not to shirk to meet existing inte-
 d all the world knew, prices beyond the ree general practice for unce, to say the least, tary authorities. In eved there had even negotiations for the beyond the regulation en carried on through e Guards. To turn who had been thereby igh prices for their say they must go out lation price would be robbery. If the Go-change in the existing ere bound to ask Par-ms of making a fair icers whose interests
 He should advise Her nt, if they wished to f purchase gradually,
 e lower end than the never paid more than
 and there would be no e ensigns, "The puboney you advanced;"
 ars they might get rid ehase without injus-
 n part, he deprecated er, and believed the led with great advan-
 place it was most ders of the army should e than they could be out going to an enormous

 in the
 of the
 It w wealth copy should under
 The
 prove sively
 was keep any thing regar armie and h army
 was closel
 of th
 with looki
 A bo sion very be ve purch
 had ing i both in the betw
 of th
 The Lord ful to cussi word positi
 to en inast
 have whiel
 (the Those
 tion
 tion.
 man
 to sa
 This
 add decis
 the
 and eonal
 and
 be,

in sion of 1840, that he should be very sorry to see the system of selection introduced into the army under any circumstances, because he thought it would lead to every possible abuse. The scheme of the Government he considered very objectionable, and he trusted, if it were not too late, that the Government would reconsider the question, and not introduce into the army any sweeping measure or hastily considered changes.

LORD PANMURE said, that an accusation had been made against him by the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) that he had had a Committee or Commission appointed for the purpose of shelving this question. He entirely repudiated that accusation. He appointed the Commission, not because he was convinced that it was necessary, in order to promote the character of the British officer, but in order to satisfy the demands that had constantly been made for it in the House of Commons. He must say he thought that Commission had taken evidence in a most extraordinary manner. For example: the whole evidence of Sir C. Trevelyan consisted of questions and answers, the whole of which were written by that gentleman himself and placed in the hands of the Commissioners, and in many cases the witness corrected the questioner.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET expressed his regret if he had said one word that would cause pain to his noble Friend, or that could be deemed an imputation upon his personal character.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly; and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter before Nine o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, March 23, 1860.

MINUTES.]—NEW WRITS ISSUED.—For Norwich, in the room of Henry William Schneider, esq., void Election; Right Hon. William Coutts Keppel, commonly called Viscount Bury, void Election.

PUBLIC BILLS.—Benefit Societies Rules Amendment; Companies (1860).

2^o Mines Regulation and Inspection.

3^o Endowed Schools (No. 3).

R NORWICH.

BE said, he was r the issue of new actice of the House,
o notice, and Mr.
o enforce that prac-
mbe) attempted to e believed he was indulgence of the tice was altogether
original privileges
use to issue writs,
of its constitution
at which related to full complement of presentation of the seats. At the pre-re nine seats vacant two for St. Alban's Act of Parliament), for Wakefield, and he were precluded ent Motion now in ing been prevented
it four, the city of
in a state of excite-re two days' fresh and, if the Motion
e hour of the night, ach the returning
course in time to ich before Monday.
move—

issue his Warrant to make out a New Writ tizens to serve in this ity of Norwich, in the hneider, Esq., and the ts Keppel, commonly e Elections have been

FITH said, he obf the writ. The s one of those that rminedly corrupt a
some very serious
gard to it, and the seemed to be aware rwich in the same
er and Wakefield.
way to punish the
i-ssue of the writ.
the late Members,
pectable Gentlemen
. But the fault of efly with the consented from the
: would call it—the
mon in the House,

that elec
He
prin mos it w to f pens wen Corr
in s it,
and,
wou
the sure
com.
spen
spen was wish of el shou rious
M obje to m tain prom
the c Tha
by a ratio had beso
with the c mitt reac corri were had
and furth
had expe inqui toral Hou
deed
Spec petit askir sente leger this late foun unde fore,

COM

ie sees any obit of a Select
; best mode of
; in connection
be thought de-

said, a Bill in the census was id would in due
The hon. Mem-would have an thought it de-nquiry before a

EEN."

TON said, he y of the Admi-
is stated in the ' January 21st,
on of H.M.S.
cabin at a time
cant, and whe-
rue, any notice the Board of

GET said, the igence of this place, and he essage to Ports-
was at the time,
was that they
o.

COLONIES.

, that he would r of the Exche-
pers sent to a
are not merely seaport of such

And whether by the Govern-inted papers so forwarded on to

OF THE EXCHE-iber had put the prehension. It ted papers were of the Colonies
ontrary, the rule
ent out to the
to their address, person to whom the nearest post er, an exception
to 23, 1860!

O Whether hi
k the Verdict the bodies o
y had died o y during the g paragraph nferred was s

- "That the
ment as stores
and unfit for the tea, pork,
an entire abse
y the lime juice
o when put on b
the ' General
t parties, so far cerned. That are entirely fr contract was s e litary officers s the circumsta
to promote ti charge."

o He would al
- Gentleman
taken to pr treatment as for which th apprehended the right h order the im cials whose c pable, and th
this lamental

SIR CHA
be remember for India cou his Council. would, of co
Council, but what steps w Great blame
some persons tainly not po punishment t

On Motion
rising, do adj

STAI

CAPTAIN L
ferring to O October, 185
commands of situations on abroad, shall five years, un
special cases, State for Wa
stood that an

period named, can be for immediate nomination; and, if any, and what, limitative appointments? The was rather hazy, and to have information on t to the service. For nt of a deputy adjutant-ed the whole of his five the expiration of that to a brigade at Alder- again be eligible, say, West Indies? Could ately on vacating one be re-appointed to an- to be any limit to these He should like also to same rule was to apply

T OF THE MILITIA.
SECTION.

said, that an order had three months ago for of certain regiments of ch were some Irish re- giments had been dis- ay, but it seemed that the 2nd Staffordshire ed their fate, and that ething for 1860-1 had latter regiment. He ether that regiment was m the proposed disem- Militia force, and the option? The colonel of elieved, occupied com- the Phoenix Park, Dub- ligible enough that he g to return; but that with the men, and as employment for them nining districts, he was why the rule laid down ere been departed from. d to ask the Secretary urther his attention has act that a new supply of issued to the 2nd Staf- giment; and whether it except that regiment disembodiment of the the grounds for such he said, he could not con- ant Officer referred to a house in the Phoenix tted that the hon. Gen- ster Vernon

ter
this had
to one ser

the it
brig
are ing oul this mu Ar
the adc we any Ro

ST
to bee lan nor day una Jan
of pro
ral
Col Bri
rec sub app ma
tur
the Co fro tha cer per tow dey we app
sor lar Ho
to

was given had ceased to exist, yet considering the present critical state of Europe, it would be unadvisable to deprive Her Majesty of the powers which that Act conferred, of calling out the Militia on the shortest notice. No doubt the Volunteers were a very fine body of men, and the movement reflected the highest credit upon the patriotism of the nation. But however useful such a force might be in case of emergency, it could not be regarded as an actual auxiliary to the Militia or the regular army. In conclusion, he would refer to a circumstance mentioned in the papers that four volunteers on Wimbledon Common had amused themselves with shooting a lady's dog, and very nearly shooting the lady herself. He thought an immediate example should be made of those persons if they could be discovered, and that they should be deprived of the right to carry arms. He felt so much respect for the body of Volunteers that he would desire to see such incidents prevented in future.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he merely rose to corroborate the statement of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire). Similar complaints had been forwarded to himself, but as the regiment which he had the honour to command was one of those marked out for disembodiment, for obvious reasons he had declined to take the matter up. It was perfectly true, as the hon. Gentleman had stated, that the lieutenant-colonel of the regiment in question did occupy a house in the Phoenix Park rent free, and no doubt he did desire to keep the regiment embodied. However, his complaint was that in disembodiment the Militia regiments no attention whatever was paid to the wishes of those who had done their duty so creditably, and more especially that the younger officers had met with such little encouragement. Such conduct tended to impair the feelings of loyalty and patriotism which the Militia had always evinced up to that time. He would ask why it was that clothing had not been issued to the regiments disembodied as well as to those still embodied? Surely it was not intended to renounce the services of those regiments altogether.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that in answer to the question put by the hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire (Captain L. Vernon) he had to state that it was true that Committees and Commissions had for some years recommended that Staff appointments, both at home and abroad, should be limited to five years, and that no been very liberal in giving any officers. But the circumstances were very peculiar; indeed, he never was an occasion when he called a call for the recognised military services. In the fate of India, when it was that the greatest blow struck at the prestige of the British Empire, our supremacy in India was maintained by the gallantry of a few officers in that country; and he thought the Government could not be too grateful for the services of those officers for their zeal and self-sacrifice in the face of the mutiny. If that was the case who by their energy, courage and self-sacrifice succeeded in the horrors of mutiny in any part of the country were still more deserving of a particular recognition, and the commanding officer of the 2nd Regiment of Bombay had the most signal service, and has been stated in several despatches. He alluded to Major General Sir James Wilson, 2nd Regiment of Bombay. The regiment was employed in the central field force of Sir General Wilson, whose services had been so valuable in placing him at the head of the force in India; and the actions engaged since 1857 were all of a nature, namely, attack on the fort of Jeerun, the storm of fortified village, the siege and destruction of Kotah, action at Chota, action at Pertabgur, fight at Parkier, field service at Topes from the 1st of May to the 24th of May, 1859. He was specially thanked for the Guzerat Horse by the Bombay Council in July, 1859, and also thanked for his services in the command of the Guzerat Horse by the Government, in a despatch from the Bombay Government, by the Secretary of State for India, dated 1st, 1859. He was again mentioned in the notice of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India, by the Secretary of State for India, by the Governor of Bombay and the Governor of India, in their Minutes dated 1st and 17th of September, 1859; the services of officers in the mutinies, and addressed to the Secretary of State for India, as published in the London Gazette, December 1859.

Fergusson

House, cannot and on the Mo-

COURTS (IRE-LAND).

He rose to ask and, when the
the Eccles(Ireland) Bill, a late Government, through the House discussed twice in the session of Parliament, that the Ecclesias as well as in which rendered
minister justice.
by General for with the Ecclesias and Ireland was calculated Church of the uptey Bill was a trading company in the Upper which all the lost it, whilst for it. That the subject by at the present and the right
hon. Member
n (Mr. White-with universal was introduced passed through was afterwards
in this House;
any hon. Member's resolution. He said that the officers too busy to it to this subcommittee in that lands too full,
he introduced in
and that there
the paper of the re they were?
last notice was be introduced were postponed they stood first and yet he found it brought on on the 13th of notice was given that day they stood 5th at the House

consequent 29th of May the Irish M Ireland for moment, on not a single these Bills
these imperferred? E right hon. G ness! Th and learned Cork (Mr. constituents
that they w
It was palt
that manne
not able to in that Ho in the other
some one v land. He Gentleman
not having
Mr. CAJ doubt desi pass some the reason brought in had no opti-tion of the the other I they stood ing when t
was in his introduce t rence which were on the
if he then in these Bi If the evenness it wot
that he co Bills.

Mr. DA not conceiv given any
question.
reasons giv duction of
There must certain per the Bill w not have 1 year, in the latter Bill give up a they posse-

MARCH 23, 1860} and Nice to France.

The Parlia- passed f Com- ent had es, and not had hought by the red by cretary d who nestion ith the ouse of e right Kilmar- ged his nan of re into nd the ed the ps, and m, and efiance ons of as de- e done f Par- t hon. iastical r) sup- Bench it hon. nd ex- ot be- by the ury for uestion ght to ight it uestion y, the l been courts, ration. (Lord l were ad re- uggest v their , Irish for Foreign Affairs if he will lay u Table of the House the Memoire rapports entre la Suisse et la Sav tralité, untranslating, if its length siderable, which forms enclosure 1 No. 9 of the Correspondence res the proposed Annexation of Sav Nice, presented to this House on th day of February ; and also the M tioned in No. 15 of the same Corr ence, having marked upon it, besi military frontier alluded to by the dent of the Swiss Confederation same Despatch, the frontier of with regard to Savoy and Switzer it was fixed by the Treaty betw Allies and France in 1814, and the of France as it will be if the whole present Province of Savoy be conc her. So early as last summer, w Foreign Office was incredulous as intention of the French Emperor to Savoy to his dominions, the Swiss (ment had the whole of their fronti veyed and mapped. They sent a the map, showing the alterations would be required in the event annexation taking place, to our l Office. They had also presented of their memoir upon the relations b Switzerland and Savoy to our Min Berne. Both memoir and map wer tioned in the correspondence rece on the table, and, as the annexa Savoy was now an accomplished fi thought the House should know wh the alterations which the Swiss (ment wished in their frontier in o preserve a neutrality guaranteed l rope. This question appeared ab assume dimensions of greater imp from what he had read in the e papers, as a report coming from that six Swiss regiments had mar take possession of Faucigny and Ch Perhaps the noble Lord would state w the report in question was true.

MR. STIRLING said, he rose the noble Lord (Lord John Russell will lay upon the table those port his Private Correspondence with H jesty's Ambassador in Paris whi referred to in the Ambassador's pul Despatch of the 5th of February which report certain observations of Walewski on the necessity of the ation of Savoy and Nice to the l Empire. The passage in Earl Co Despatch, on which his question was ed, was the following :—

Lord Elgin and the officers going out in his suite. The gallant Officer explains his object to be that there should be only one mission to China, and that Mr. Bruce should be recalled on the Earl of Elgin going out. Now with regard to that measure, in the first place, I have always understood that when an individual undertakes a special mission, besides his salary his actual expenses are to be paid. The only time when we can obtain an account of these disbursements is after the mission is concluded, so that we cannot have it in the case of Lord Elgin till after the financial year is over. It is, therefore, impossible that I should make any estimate of the expense. But with regard to the recall of Mr. Bruce, I never could have gone to Lord Elgin and insult him by telling him that it was intended as a mark of degradation to his brother that I asked him to go out to China. Lord Elgin will go for the time—a short time, I hope—that his services may be necessary; and in the meantime the regular mission will be maintained there. Lord Elgin has recently been to Paris and has had an interview with the Emperor of the French, with M. Thouvenel, and with Baron Gros, and I am happy to say we have come to a general agreement as to the instructions to be given; and I hope that before long Lord Elgin will be able to set out on his mission, and Baron Gros, on the part of the Emperor of the French, will set out about the same time; and I trust this House will not be induced to diminish the efficacy of their mission by any discussion in the meantime. The next question referred, I think, to Morocco. The gallant officer who put it (Colonel Dunne) might have seen some months ago in the Gazette, and since in the papers laid before Parliament, the securities which we have taken with respect to Tangier. The Spanish Government when they contemplated asking from the Moroccan Government reparations which Morocco was not likely to give, stated that their warlike operations could not be confined to any particular spot. We asked them that they should not attempt to take or to occupy Tangier. We said it was of great importance to us. And, therefore, while we took no part in the war, and did not mean to take any part, we could not interfere with the military operations of Spain; but we asked in the most friendly manner that if Spain should occupy Tangier it should not be permanently annexed, and that it should not be retained as a gua-

in the Lord, did not seem to be satisfied with that position, and took the ground that it was the then expected Congress which was the reason why these intimations were not attended to with the sedulous care which might have been expected upon a point of such importance. Accordingly, the noble Lord has now changed his position, and has adopted that taken by the First Minister. In order to explain and vindicate his apparent neglect, the noble Lord now says—"A Congress was expected, and there it was we thought that these questions would be settled." But the noble Lord can hardly suppose that the House of Commons will accept, as a conclusion which is to influence their judgment on this subject, the statement that these important points were to be decided at a Congress. We all know, practically, that a Congress is not a deliberative assembly. What should we think of the noble Lord, if, not having brought forward a Reform Bill, and being called upon to redeem his pledge, he were to say, "We have no such measure prepared, because we knew that Parliament was going to meet, and could do all that is necessary?" Now, a Congress was never yet called together without previous discussion by the Ministers of the different Powers of the principal questions for settlement there, or otherwise the Plenipotentiaries could do but little. A Congress is called upon to settle details and register decisions; and if in this case a Congress was expected, it is only natural that, long before it met, the utmost communication should take place between the English and French Governments, in order that an understanding should be arrived at on the chief points of difference between them. I cannot, therefore, either from the First Minister, or from the noble Lord, accept this as any excuse whatever for their still mysterious silence. The very fact that a Congress was about to take place, furnished an additional reason why, some time before it met, much more frequent, precise, and earnest communications should have taken place between the two Governments than are to be found in the papers, in order that when our representatives went to the Congress, they should be prepared for so startling a proposition as that for the annexation of these provinces. If that proposition had been made for the first time in a Congress, it could have led to nothing else than a break up of the assembly. Besides, all expectation of a Congress had vanished towards packet from abroad bringing public despatches also brings from the Minister who sends the despatches private confidential letters referring to circumstances not sufficiently certain or not sufficiently important to be placed in the formal shape of a despatch, in which communications are made of circumstances learnt from conversations, and which it would be impossible for the person who receives them to lay before Parliament without placing the agent who wrote those letters in a position that would exclude him thoreafter from all means of information which it is essential he should obtain. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has established the doctrine that my noble Friend has departed from the usual course in drawing a marked line of separation between private letters and public despatches. The right hon. Gentleman, in his argument, very easily changed the word applicable to the matter of which he was speaking. He said, "Here is a letter from Naples, and here is another from some other Foreign Court. You produce them but you do not produce the letters from Earl Cowley." But they are not letters, they are despatches; and the right hon. Gentleman should remember to apply the proper word to the proper thing. What my noble Friend produces are despatches placed upon the records of the Foreign Office. What he declines to produce are confidential letters, which it was his duty to receive, and which it is equally his duty not to lay before the House.

MR. DISRAELI: What I said was this:—That no Minister should lay papers upon the table of the House referring to private letters without producing them, if they relate, of course, to public affairs. A Minister may receive twenty private letters a-day and give no account of them; but, if in the papers laid upon the table of the House there is a reference to private letters, then the Minister is bound to produce those letters or extracts from them.

MR. HORSMAN: Sir, I was glad to hear from the noble Lord the Foreign Minister at the conclusion of his speech that the Government were about to enter into communication with the other Powers concerning the protest of Switzerland. The whole of this question about France and her territorial aggrandizement is of European interest, and we ought to know that Her Majesty's Government have not treated it as a question simply to be discussed between England and France, but one in which the joint action should be invited use of exasperating lan-

R: The hon. Member explanation of anything from him if his words understood; but he cannot, the rules of the House, of the Chancellor of the N: I was merely going when the right hon. General the use of insulting of "Order, order!"

ON MILNES said, he present circumstances not be allowed to go on. ved that the annexation Savoy to France was it was now, however, before question of public right a frontier and neutrality

He hoped the attention it would be directed to that they would consult vers of Europe in order to ty of the provinces on the

3 WOOD said, he would the opportunity at length eplying to two questions put to him in the early ng. He would first re on of the hon. Baronet 2) as to the rewards to hough he must decline to individual officers. The ome were mainly guided rds for military services recommendation of the ief in that country. The re conferred on military for the most part, of pro der of the Bath, and he very officer who had been the Commander-in-Chief ion had obtained that re ard to the Order of the bserve that the number d been recommended for to exceed the proportion our was allotted to offi n service. It had, how ed on some, and the re brought under the notice Friend the Secretary for w of their obtaining the he reduction of the num had been brought below el. Nothing, he might ore distinguished than the service valry, and ment had rank of m Service, honours w bestow he origin in t received f tained only sons when reward, w nounced it supplement junction w those per more satis for taking that despe that was delay woul

The ne and galla Sykes)—v for the rej of India w his answer whatever much grie the news cause gre of that b But he re for the rej in that fi Friend (C another di military o this year in Madras go on long the inco moved for made out as to ano two addi in their p ordered, b considerab completed

SIR JA state that Taylor me

CONDUCT

MR. KI express r charge wh Chancellor proper to

Sir, I Memue de-
of fo-
Friend
; in his or lan-er of present Savoy
I know Friend Chan-it fit to re I sit at dis-appeal ner at-
e. He leavour by sug-
hat the ay give rench.
at lan-pted to ch. e would o draw en this o time several of the ig like ers to-House.
Jovern-
y ques-
ct, but ed, and is; but defer-
of the ll their

Monday

TAX.

XCHEsolve it-Menns.

roposed
ive the

ke that opportunity of calling attention to a very serious subject in connection with the collection of the income tax which had been brought under the notice of the House by a petition from the inhabitants of one of the largest parishes in the metropolis. The matter did not interest them merely, but the whole country—for similar proceedings might occur in any parish in the country. The management of the income tax in the parish of St. Leonard's, Shore-ditch, was under Commissioners appointed by the Crown; and a surveyor was also appointed by the Crown. The petitioners stated further that a conspiracy had been entered into between the surveyor and the collectors to defraud the inhabitants and the Government. The nature of the conspiracy was that, the collector should deliver to the inhabitants notes of charge, while the surveyor should make a return of charge to the Commissioner very much less than that which ought to be made on the inhabitants in respect of their income; and that the charge so entered on the roll, having been approved by the Commissioners, then a note should be delivered demanding a higher rate from the taxpayers. Thus a difference being established between the roll delivered in to the Commissioners on the one hand, and the claim made upon the inhabitants on the other, there would be a sum which, if they could collect it, would be put into their own pockets without accounting to the Crown. In pursuance of that system the inhabitants received the usual note, stating that they had been assessed at a certain sum, while the surveyor made the roll bear a much smaller amount. The larger sum was demanded from and paid by the inhabitants, the smaller one being accounted for to the Crown, and the balance was divided between the collector and the surveyor, and appropriated by them to their own advantage. That was a most extraordinary mode of collecting the income tax, and showed that a door was open to the perpetration of fraud in any part of the kingdom, if the duties of the Commissioners, the surveyor, and the collectors might be discharged as they had been in the parish of St. Leonard's, which had presented its complaint. When these malpractices were discovered the surveyor absconded, but it did not appear that any effective measures were taken either by the local Commissioners, or by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, to follow him, and he had hitherto entirely escaped. One of the collectors, t was seized, taken d prosecuted. He ndicted for obtain-pretences, by de-

tant a sum which demand according
. That indictment way at the Central so serious a case,
ystem of fraud upon equate steps were riment to carry on efficient manner.
sted, as it ought to sel of the standing
ry for conducting it;
on a technical point
ted. No one else proper course had ing these frauds to inhabitants of the
at to the conclusion of Inland Revenue
throwing a veil over
ctions, and, in short,
ap. Any such proential to the public iously of the highest eyors and collectors
these delinquencies
ed to the uttermost.
mplaint deliberately its of the parish of their common seal.
their petition to Her
, who had had an g inquiries into its very anxious to hear sen adopted by the nd Revenue to ex-
and prosecute their
. Had those Comto prevent the renquencies? For it wer of any surveyor ng together in the ed, to take advantage
income tax payer to and exposure of his appeal against sur-
put into their own
r the sums returned ll furnished to the these circumstances nt on him to bring he House what ap-
of duty on the part
horities.
R OF THE EXCHE-
are no person could think ber fo

to a s I und
which one o ance,
any e griev ants edly l
an as paid Gove
they legall suffer more am fi
On tl the i king collac and t this reasc charg griev
the i ment tlem
by th
those to be suffe is wr guilt
the tainl office the c muel
and an u cers
is of rects in w jeops conti taxe
if th men to ch
with due desit
is th sinu
those

indulged himself at the close of his day's work with a glass of spirits and water, or a pipe of tobacco, contributed by doing so a larger proportion of his earnings to the revenue than the more opulent classes did. The same remark applied to the case of tea and sugar, cocoa, and other colonial and foreign articles of produce. The revenue derived from these indirect sources of consumption amounted in the aggregate to £36,000,000, and of this sum a much larger amount was contributed by persons of £150 a year and less, in proportion to their incomes, than the wealthier classes of the country. This fact should, in his opinion, reconcile the rich merchants and landowners to a somewhat higher rate of income tax, in order to relieve those who could so ill afford it, and who could only pay it by denying themselves the few luxuries, and even some of the necessities, to a Motion agreed to.

House in Committee.

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he should put the Resolution relating to the income tax into the hands of the hon. Gentleman in the Chair, without any lengthened explanation, because, in point of fact, in the various discussions on the Budget and the Commercial Treaty almost all the general topics which bore on the subject had been considerably dealt with. The exact state of the case was, that according to the calculations he made on the 10th of February, which he believed were the safest possible at that period, the anticipated revenue, in case of the House should vote all the regular charges, and should vote the income tax, as expressed in the Resolution he held in his hand, would leave a probable surplus of £400,000. A reduction of the tax proposed in that Resolution would result in a deficiency of probably the same amount. He should be most happy to give any explanation on the subject in answer to any observations that might fall from Members of the Committee, but he must decline at that moment to enter into a discussion of the general question.

Motion made, and Question proposed,— “That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty,

At
“There shall be charged, collected, and paid, for one year, commencing on the 6th day of April, 1860, for and in respect of all property, profits, and gains, charged or chargeable under the Act

Means— (COM

7th years of Her Ma-
 ., for granting to Her arising from property, fices, either by assess-tion, or otherwise, the
 , that is to say: Upon ual value or amount of gains (except property, ble under Schedule (B) or Duty of Ten Pence ra of the annual value erty, profits, and gains in respect of the occu-ts, hereditaments, and r Schedule (B) of the of Five Pence in Eng-Halfpenny in Scotland for every Twenty Shil-thereof."

RAHAM said, that it the operation of
 was a mere delusion.
 Committee that the
 had said in his finance only way in which be affected was by military and naval d any one suppose rcumstances, such a place? Looking at Europe, and to the ight be expected to ed or accomplished aggrandizement, no
 g at the conclusion
 ly security for peace
 nance of an armed ned state of military
 . So long as that ssitated the income Dd. It was therefore an attempt to throw people to endeavour
 the income tax would e Chancellor of the a his anxiety to carry willing to throw the nuing the tax upon
 The right hon. Gen-way a large amount
 m indirect taxation, obvious that no fur-
 be made except by
 . It had been stated he military expendi-
 ficient for this year, overnment had not
 a to pay for the out that the Chan-er trusted to some id ingenious mystifipocus arrangement
 Treasury and the f the Exchequer

country was o it on the
as, in effect,
uration, ac-
ions of the
to the pred or totally seem absurd
e should exember that the military represented me tax, and g that that rded as so as a perma-
on why next x should not it 'was the
it a part of ation. He as a war tax,
' Estimates;
full right to

was not san-at this tax and he had intention to it would be ge to bring
e. As that apor, it pro-
which was der £150 a £500; but ad come to g the large tion of that ught not to 0. His ob-persons as to the reording to a
it last year, the number es between
from £200
ey exceeded
mes between a great and f individuals ate decrease was 50 per e possessing £400 being etween £400
7,528. In incomes was xtending the exemption he asked for, to incomes of £300, the revenue would lose £231,720 under these two Schedules. With the surplus the Chancellor of the Exchequer calculated on, he would ask him whether he could not afford to make this exemption. Probably he would say he could not; but he had hoped that he would have even extended it to incomes of £200. For, in 1853, when he was holding out a hope of the income tax ceasing, the right hon. Gentleman himself extended the tax to incomes of £100. Sir Robert Peel fixed the charge on incomes of £150, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer laid it on the lower income, alleging the advantages the payers had derived from the remission of duties on articles of indirect taxation. His chief object in proposing the exemption was to decrease the pressure of the tax on persons of moderate means and precarious incomes.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he wished to warn the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Martin) that there was no chance of the income tax being reduced or ceasing. The House must not fancy for a moment that the expenditure for the navy would be a shilling less next year than in the present one. They might even make up their minds that it would be more expensive. In 1857 the navy had got to a very low state. The right hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington) had put it on a better footing. But we had been obliged to build an entire new navy. It was a wooden navy, and they had obtained some very fine ships. But what guarantee had they that this navy would be permanent? He had no notion that it would be so. Then they had to provide new guns for the whole navy; they would have to expend enormous sums in Armstrong's and Whitworth's guns. The sums charged this year would not give guns to more than one or two ships. France had six new iron frigates; the English Government was building two. If some arrangement could be made by which France would stand as she was as to ships, and England stand fast also, then the Chancellor of the Exchequer might hold out some hopes of the income tax ceasing next year. But England was compelled to build ships faster than the Emperor; England had more colonies, and it was impossible she could remain with only the same naval force as France and be in a state of safety. Then they had been told by the Secretary of the Admiralty that France had the means of —that England had not ;

 s question for the House consider. Now establish-to build iron ships would new docks for them after-ops could the Chancellor er have of reducing the f the hon. Member for Cobden) had followed up nd, when negotiating the made an arrangement that uld only possess a certain of war, then both might be immense expenditure, and some hope of the income it he believed the expendiy would be £14,000,000 in the next year. Then ships of war it was pro-iron forts all along the s a model of one in the House, and if forts like ult all round the country £12,000,000. A vote of een taken for the Chinese culous to suppose that the t an end to for that sum.
 ling 20,000 men and a hina ; could they expect ould do it ? It was use-at the income tax would ey might make up their
 ; to pay 1s. in the pound ope was in a most unsatiso one could tell to what eror of the French might he meant mischief, and aintain a strong army and

RD NORTHCOTE said, p regretting that his right Chancellor of the Exche-ed from the understanding ssing the income tax they e some greater progress in a conformity with the rule wn of voting supply before discuss Ways and Means.
 a good rule in general, articular reasons this year t have been departed from.
 d then have proceeded to s and Means with minute hat the expenditure would e making a considerable nancial system, and it was ow whether the Govern-on the small surplus esti-ancancellor of the Exchequer.
 yet taken on account of s Napier

the Army and few evenings the Chinese w but even that 1860-61, but 1859-60. T
 night, and t then afforded to his right Member for and others.
 between the
 of the Exche-
 War was evid the Budget, t quer calculate in relation to would have to and Navy Estiwould be £1, £850,000 w
 There was gr calculations o
 his own exp
 would say tha War Office c
 great caution.
 money enough
 ment, were ve
 all was right,
 were outstanc authorities at had been extr
 there was any turned out th
 not less than fore, rejoice i chequer or th could give a looked into th
 themselves th
 for was in rea Any addition Governor Ger
 would most s which his rig
 He wished al any truth in sum was to l
 the purpose o
 such were no
 that effect ou were intended £10,000,000 raised, it was should know plished, and terest which i Otherwise, if temptation, it

ever they English c any great fall with invested the coun
 deration, racter. I Excheq
 the men and Scho
 were inst
 were co cess the statemen happen mission it fell to had give which t on. Tw his right ham in connect for con abolition were ge ness, a duction he can the ret
 to the most p who st
 which for some £3,00
 that in that an £9,000
 plied to tax C
 of "

b. inco than an ex

Peto) did not agree with him in that respect. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer simply followed in the steps of his predecessor. He had done that which would enable the country to bear taxation to a larger degree than ever. He had only thrown away such sources of revenue as had bound the energies of industry. Then the hon. Baronet had expressed a fear that unfixed capital would leave this country. There was no fear of that, and as to the idea that it would be invested in foreign manufactories, the English manufactories paid too well to allow such a notion possible. There was no disposition on the part of capitalists to invest in foreign countries. An auctioneer had told him the other day that those who generally bought landed estates were men who had realized large incomes in trade and manufactures, chiefly those from Yorkshire, Lancashire, and Scotland, and as to the position of the tenant farmers referred to by the hon. Baronet he believed that no class in the country lived so comfortably as the tenant farmers, or supported their families at so little expense. But the Budget could only be contemplated as a whole, and, so considering it, he had determined not only to accept it, but to vote for the full amount of the income tax; but he felt he should not be doing justice to his constituents if he did not warn the Government that in a future year he should expect, before it was reimposed, a full and fair investigation would be entered into for the purpose of devising a more equitable mode of levying the tax.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that there were two questions that he was anxious to submit to the Committee, namely, first, whether the Committee had before it sufficient grounds for the expenditure upon which they were about to enter, namely, £70,100,000; and, secondly, assuming that such an income must be raised, whether a tenpenny income tax was the proper mode of providing the funds. The Committee should bear in mind that that was not a time of war, or any great crisis, requiring the imposition of an income tax, or rather an addition being made to an existing income tax, but the alleged necessity for this addition arose from a deficit which had been artificially and intentionally created by Her Majesty's Government. He had not thought it right in any way to oppose the arrangements of Her Majesty's Government as far as the taxes were determined, useless for withstanding his some of thrown ask, the classes the tax sort of not to be the only go. Nor did all the men objected. It was a time of increase of revenue, in a most positive manner. But parliament put it together, however, there were no equivalents, equivalents tax could not conduct. What did he do when the income tax was introduced? Peel hesitated because for five noble Lords resist that he would. And then for the many divisions Lord Hamilton concluded it was unequal always, nations in not the that Mr. by the and more tax, an better offered peace. have a

Sir Morton Peto

which
le. It
; but or that of the ad one t even
; they
of con-
my re-
as far he ob-
favour in our neigh-
ry, he
; table ght to showed nes of udge a t was l most pendiort of entive on pur-nd the ture in l with was as ling of ce be-selves stance,
h cost
and at
; contra innto the d been sy had ite the proved under re was audit ely of e only should Chan-check gentlergy in adding ult in ghby) equal that in at and

grievous expenditure regard to the Civil only effort made in
was the appointment
the Motion of the hon
with the view of red and even that the chequer had not sup
that it was the duty
do something to ob-
come tax, and he wa portion of the tax t ferred might be accoanother point, and tl
the collection of the count given by the chequer of the cost of
for this year was £4 difficult to understa now so much, when £4,300,000. He b head considerable rec
Then, again, let the useless Commissions compensations whic
called upon to pay.
so alarming as to Attorney General g
law; for it was qu charge upon the pu
a year, and they w
got off at such a tremble at any pro-
ment in the law.
was the duty of an l vising the Estimates not first reduce the i thing struck him as which our income wa
The policy of Chanquer in their financ last five or six year derstate the income.
the public income w amount of £700,000
£1,500,000; and in the Estimates given the year, and the re
when the financial there was an underst of £2,300,000. In year just concluded, under-estimate to the Under these circum-
spectfully infer that t for which year the estimated at £60,
stated; and, therefo posal for a reduction without the slightest

one class will require an augmentation on another, that it is convenient to enter upon a consideration of that proposal. But I frankly state it is my opinion, especially if found impracticable to adopt any general reconstruction, that the Government should consider in a future year the income tax continue at a high rate (time of peace), of some extension, in form or other, of a mode of mitigation, partial relief to the lower class of

There is no doubt that the subject is of great difficulty, because on the one side it is a severe tax, as it affects the lower class; on the other hand, we are on a very delicate ground indeed when we come largely on the question of mitigation, but the principle of mitigation has been applied in former years, and at a far higher point up to a higher point than the point which we now extend it, because in the time of Mr. Pitt, the principle of mitigation went up to £200 a year. Therefore, I consider it quite open within safe and moderate limits to apply the principle of mitigation. The hon. Baronet (Sir H. B. Esq.) asks on what grounds we propose an expenditure of £70,100,000 is proposed. Well, I may put the same question to the hon. Baronet. No doubt, if we make over to him the regulation of the year's expenditure, he would consent to handle it as to bring it within

But he has seen the view and the effect of the House; he knows that the Government has passed the most important Votes for Military and Naval Estimates—the votes of men in the two services—those are the votes on which the general scale of expenditure depends; and he must have seen that the House of Commons, so far from showing any disposition to make reductions in those estimates, seems to wish to increase the Government in its expenditure in the Miscellaneous Estimates we propose considerable reductions. I do not attempt now to give a more particular explanation of them than I have endeavoured to state in general to the House; but what ground is there to suppose that by means of any of Dockyard Committees or Commissions a great saving can be effected in the expenditure of the coming year under the present system? In my opinion, he must be a very sanguine man if he expects any such

I say again that it is upon the temper of the people that reductions depend. It is public opinion and the

I to propose certain estimates with regard w to the cost of the expedition. It may be t an expedition without any operations of it war, or it may lead to a war which may e continue throughout the year; and the e difficulty is to form an estimate not more g than sufficient for the first, and, at the s same time, fully sufficient for the second o contingency. We have endeavoured to form t the best estimate of that service in our s power, and have made provision for it on a s scale which is exceedingly large as compared with the scale on which any military n expedition has heretofore been provided, h because the change in the Government of r India has thrown on the Government of e this country at once a great deal of the s expenses which used to be borne, in the d first instance, by the East India Company, and which only in subsequent years came t to be accounted for by the Treasury. The r sum we shall have expended on account of t China in the present year, together with o the sums we propose to vote for the next e year, is not less than £2,500,000; and it e is also to be remembered that a very con-y siderable charge was borne by us before r both on account of troops and ships for the e service in China. That is a very large r sum; but, considering the possibility of y there being no war, I do not think we t should have been justified in asking for a s larger amount. Here we have again to apologise, not for asking too much, but n for not asking a larger sum. I have only n to repeat, I do not think the proposal of t the hon. Baronet consistent either with the r principles of prudent finance, or with the s expectations entertained in regard to the e present year.

s MR. VANSITTART confessed that,
t placing reliance upon the repeated ass surances given by the Chancellor of the e Exchequer at former periods, he, in com-t mon with the public, generally, looked for r the reduction if not the total remission of s the income tax this year; instead of which e it had been doubled. For his own part, he n protested against the course taken by the r right hon. Gentleman in laying his hands o upon and appropriating moneys hitherto , applied to certain purposes, and absorbing n them into the expenditure of the current s year. Neither could he approve the rash-o ness which had led him, instead of providd ing for the liquidation of the actual deficit e of £7,300,000, to create a fresh deficit of e nearly £4,000,000, in order to conciliate n certain gentlemen connected with the Mant chester school. He maintained, moreover,

- {COMMONS}

ic had an un-
,000 a year,
days by the How graces might have half towards ax, and one-of the war
that arrange-afforded very of his suffered the greatrecarious ins would have
o obtain the cheaper rate.
n his anxiety
hich the rich
as obliged to r man's beer
of taxation, eds of a dis-
ould find ut-esound from other.

wished to uld vote with believed the worst taxes and because of the other objectionable

ut,—“That,
anted to Her

ected, and paid,
th day of April,
roperty, profits,
under the Act
rs of Her Majesty to Her
from property, ther by assess-otherwise, the s to say: Upon
e or amount of
xcept property,
r Schedule (B)
of Nine Pence
e annual value
of its, and gains

—Ayes 132 ;

, G. S. t, G. W. P.
, hon. Col.
. W. M'G.
v.

Bowyer, G.
Bridges, Sir B. W.
Brocklehurst, J.
Brooks, R.
Bruce, Major C.
Butler, C. S.
Cave, S.
Cavendish, Lord
Close, M. C.
Cobbett, J. M.
Cochrane, A. D. I
Cole, hon. H.
Collins, T.
Cubitt, G.
Curzon, Visct.
Damer, S. D.
Deedes, W.
Dickson, Col.
Du Cane, C.
Duke, Sir J.
Duncombe, hon.
Dunne, Col.
Edwards, Major
Egerton, E. C.
Egerton, hon. W.
Farquhar, Sir M.
Farrer, J.
Fellowes, E.
Fergusson, Sir J.
Gard, R. S.
Gavin, Major
George, J.
Gilpin, Col.
Gore, J. R. O.
Gore, W. R. O.
Greenall, G.
Greene, J.
Gray, Captain
Griffith, C. D.
Grogan, Sir E.
Hamilton, Lord
Hardy, G.
Haasard, M.
Hennessy, J. P.
Heygate, Sir F.
Holmesdale, Vis
Hopwood, J. T.
Horsfall, T. B.
Howes, E.
Hunt, G. W.
Johnstone, hon.
Jolliffe, rt. hon.
G. H.
Kendall, N.
Knatchbull, W. J
Knight, F. W.
Knox, Col.
Lacoe, Sir E.
Lanigan, J.
Leeke, Sir H.
Lefroy, A.
Lindsay, hon. C.
Lockhart, A. E.

L

Alcock, T.
Andover, Visct.
Angerstein, W.
Antrobus, E.
Atherton, Sir W.
Ayrton, A. S.

Sheridan, R. B.	Walter, J.
Smith, J. B.	Warre, J. A.
Smith, M. T.	Watkins, Col. L.
Smith, Augustus	Western, S.
Smith, Sir F.	Westhead, J. P. B.
Smollett, P. B.	Whalley, G. H.
Stafford, Marquess of	Whitbread, S.
Steel, J.	White, Col.
Stewart, Sir M. R. S.	Wickham, H. W.
Stuart, Col.	Willecox, B. M'G.
Taylor, H.	Winnington, Sir T. E.
Thompson, H. S.	Wood, rt. hon. Sir C.
Tollemache, hon. F. J.	Woods, H.
Turner, J. A.
Verney, Sir H.	TELLERS.
Villiers, rt. hon. C. P.	Brand, hon. H.
Waldron, L.	Dunbar, Sir W.

MR. W. E. DUNCOMBE said, that not having had an opportunity of addressing the House on the question, he felt it to be his duty, even at that late hour to intrude for a few minutes. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had altogether failed in showing any adequate reason for changing the whole course of policy which he adopted in the year 1853. He had listened attentively to the observations of the right hon. Gentleman, but he had found that no one single reason had been given why he came down to Parliament with this extraordinary demand upon the indulgence of the House. The right hon. Gentleman told the House in 1853 that he proposed the duty on the succession of real property as a means of enabling him to abolish the income tax in the year 1860. He had enjoyed all the advantage of the succession duty, yet he had now asked for an income tax into the bargain. The right hon. Gentleman ought, at all events, to reduce the income tax to the peace rate of 7d. in the pound, instead of laying on what he would call a war 3d. A strong feeling existed among all classes in the country that this was an ambitious Budget; nay, more, that it was an unjust one. The right hon. Gentleman might have reduced the duties on tea and sugar, instead of which he had given the people cheap wine and cheap brandy, which they did not care about. It had been said that the Budget was to conciliate France, and she had shown her appreciation of that by annexing Savoy. He looked with apprehension to the measures of the Government, believing them not only calculated to entail financial difficulties at home, but distrust, want of confidence, and loss of influence throughout Europe.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he proposed to proceed ed, with delivery orders, maintain t a charge of three pence on the form

; not higher, their average value bei en into account, than of a penny latter.

Mr. CRAWFORD said, there certai sted a difference of the descript ted by the Chancellor of the Excheq ween a delivery order and a dock w t; and in consequence of that differ was prepared, in conformity with as he had heard expressed upon t ject in the City, to vote against endment.

Mr. HANKEY intimated that he wo press the Amendment.

motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCH

ER said, he proposed to insert, af words "value of Forty Shillings a wards," the words "lying in any do warehouse, or upon any wharf."

Mr. MITCHELL asked if the Reso applied to the whole system of inle nsfer, and how—it being proposed mpt all goods under the value of 40s.
ir value was to be ascertained?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCH

ER said, he proposed in the Bill art a provision to the effect that go uld not be delivered without the sta y, unless the order bore on the face hat either seller or purchaser valu goods above 40s. There would be iculty in working this provision. Th uld only require to be a general indi of value. It would be impossible mpt inland transfers in the Resolutio practically a Resolution of this ki uld limit itself by reference to the na which business was carried on; beca very on sale or transfer of property a warehouse or wharf was not usu ess in ports in connection with seagoi le.

n reply to Mr. HANKEY,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCH

ER stated that the Resolution wo apply to the delivery order of a pers iring to obtain his own property out docks.

Mr. CAVE asked if the Resolut uld apply to deliveries over the side ship, as well as from the wharf?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCH

ER said, there should be no distinct such a case. The Resolution wo ly.

Resolution agreed to.

4. Resolved, That towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty,—

“For and upon any writing or document commonly called a Delivery Order, or by whatever name the same shall be designated, entitling or intended to entitle any person therein named, or his assigns, or the holder thereof, to the delivery of any goods, wares, or merchandise of the value of Forty Shillings or upwards, lying in any dock, or warehouse, or upon any wharf, upon the sale or transfer of the property therein there shall be charged the Stamp Duty of One Penny.”

On the Resolution with reference to Bills of Exchange and Bank Checks.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER stated that he meant the Resolution to apply to all checks paid over the counter, though made payable to the drawer. But in the Bill he intended to exempt letters or orders between bankers and their customers.

Resolution agreed to.

5. Resolved, “That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty,

“For and upon every Bill of Exchange, Draft, or Order for the payment of money exceeding £4,000, now chargeable with the Stamp Duty of £2 5s., there shall be charged for every £1,000 or part of the £1,000 of the money thereby made payable the Stamp Duty of Ten Shillings.

“And in the case of any Bill of Exchange drawn in a set of three or more for the payment of money exceeding £4,000, where every Bill of the set is now chargeable with the Stamp Duty of 15s. there shall be charged for and upon every Bill of the set for every £1,000 or part of £1,000 of the money thereby made payable the Stamp Duty of Three Shillings and Four Pence.

“And Bills of Exchange, Drafts or Orders, drawn or endorsed out of the United Kingdom for the payment of money on demand, shall be charged with the same Stamp Duties as Bills of Exchange for the payment of money otherwise than on demand, according to the amount thereby made payable respectively.

“And all Bills, Drafts, or Orders for the payment of any sum of money, though not made payable to the bearer or to order, and whether delivered to the payee or not; and all writings or documents entitling or intended to entitle to the payment of any sum of money any person whatever, whether named or designated therein or not, or whether delivered to him or not, shall respectively be deemed to be Bills, Drafts, or Orders for the payment of money chargeable with Stamp Duty as if the same had been made payable to bearer or to order.”

6. Resolved, That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty,—

“For and upon every Certified Copy or Extract of or from any Register of Births or Baptisms, Marriages, Deaths, or Burials, there shall be charged the Stamp Duty of One Penny.”

7. Resolved, That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty,—

“For and upon every note, instrument, or ble reported on Monday next no- sit again on Monday next.

House adjourn

HOUSE OF I

Monday, March 26

Minutes.] PUBLIC BILL.—1st Ma rochial Places); Consolidate

INDIA.—MR. WILSON'S STATEMENT.—QU

THE EARL OF ELL asked whether the Govern pared to lay on the Table o financial scheme of which been made in the newspa recently been submitted to Council of India, and als scheme had obtained their tion. He was the more as information on those points peared to him that there wa take in the details which c newspapers. If, however, were correct, income tax wa paid by every private sold jeasty's Cavalry and Artiller non-commissioned officers would also be liable to it, a quite sure that it would no instances to be borne by the selves—at any rate they w by the difference of a few that was not all; every com in the Native army, as wel the Native Irregular Cava come within the scope of that nearly all our troops i as well as European, woul together with the people by for their own interest in o plan. And he might add, knew, the difficulty if not t of obtaining trustworthy C hear and decide appeals fr ments.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL
ing received no notice of t question, he was not prepar an explicit answer. He r observe that if his right l Secretary for India had rec cial statement to which th mainly depended upon our maritime population. No doubt some efforts had been made to give shelter to the shipping on our coasts, but those efforts had been insufficient and ill-directed. The greatest diversity of opinion existed upon various experiments that had been submitted to the public for the construction of piers, harbours, and breakwaters; but the upshot had hitherto been only a persistence in the old system — that system which had existed for 3,000 years, probably among the Greeks, and certainly among the Romans, which last people had even adopted some improvements which we had neglected. Among the plans which had from time to time been proposed for affording increased protection to shipping, there were two projects which had attracted especial attention. That of the Rev. Mr. Glover, for the erection of artificial islands at the mouth of tidal rivers, had been submitted for years past to the opinion of many eminent authorities, and no opinion directly opposed to the principle of the invention appeared to have been given; while it had received the countenance of Sir John Burgoyne, Admiral Warren, Mr. Cubitt, and a number of other highly distinguished individuals. He by no means advocated the adoption of this plan on any extended scale without previous investigation; but when they perceived by the wreck chart the enormous loss of life that took place along the coasts of Norfolk and Suffolk, which, from their sandy character, would be particularly adapted for the formation of such islands, it was not too much to expect that the efficacy of the plan should be tested by experiment, the cost of which would bear no comparison to the life and property annually thrown away on that dangerous coast. The other proposition, by Captain Adderley Sleigh, for a floating breakwater, had been patented, and received the support of Sir T. Hastings, Colonel Rutherford, Admiral Hathorn, Sir E. Belcher, Colonel M'Dougal, and a great number of other distinguished persons. The invention, surely, was worth a trial, for if one large vessel yearly were saved through its instrumentality, the outlay incurred would be more than repaid to the nation. Some years ago the people of Folkestone were very anxious to have this invention tested, and they applied to the Admiralty for a loan of anchors and chains for the purpose. If the experiment succeeded, full remuneration would have been insured; and if, on the other hand, it proved a these works £2,765,000. And the works upon which this money expended were held in such low estimation by nautical men that they were called "traps" and "wreck pools." The works at the mouth of the Tyne had already cost £300,000, and it was proposed to expend £250,000 more during the next year. Yet there was not one single man of the House to be found who would say that the money would be of lasting use. It was with great difficulty that the Government succeeded in discovering how much had been expended by the State on useless works of this kind. To the first part he understood there might be some objection, on the ground that it would take in making up the account would therefore draw it up in a simple form; but to the second part there would be no objection.

Moved, That there be laid before the House,

1. Return of all Public Monies granted by Parliament, or lent or apportioned in aid of Contributions towards the Construction or Improvement of solid Stone Piers or Breakwaters (not including works of Fortification) on any of the Shores of the United Kingdom, since the Year 1810; specifying the amount granted and expended in each Case, and the estimated Cost of each such Work according to the first Demand and alleged Expectation, and how much had been repaid by Harbour Dues or otherwise in each Case of Loan: and
2. Return of any Sums granted or expended for Experiments upon floating Piers, Breakwaters, Sea Barriers, or artificial Islands, or for otherventions for the Protection of Shipping, or for the Facility of Traffic, during the same time.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that the only objection he had to make to the Returns was that he believed that the Government had taken an enormous amount of money for labour, and could not be producing any result at the end of the Session. It was a great mistake that going back for fifty years to find out how much money had been expended in the construction of small contributions had been made in the form of trusts, where stone piers or other works were being built, and which, if asked for by the noble Marquess, would be furnished, must be all gone. He had a few words to say regarding the expenditure that had been made in the form of advances by the Exchequer Loan Commissioners. The noble Marquess was mistaken on this point. The Exchequer Loan Commissioners were not in existence until 1817. They had advanced money at that time to different towns in Great Britain for the construction of harbours and stand the Atlantic and its heavy surge, while the former had only to meet the waters of a Channel some fifty or sixty miles in width. When there was a quarry of proper stone near at hand, and nature was allowed to be the engineer, there was no doubt of success. This was the case at Portland; but wherever they attempted to make harbours by an engineer setting stone upon stone, and in a place behind which there was no river, these contrivances would only become mud traps and ship traps. Such works must be always unsatisfactory, the more so because those harbours were generally tidal harbours. Without two certain data he should never recommend the construction of a breakwater; one was the existence of a quarry near at hand; the other that the engineering should be left to nature, the inspection of the deposits of stone to be committed to those possessing a knowledge of the action of winds and floods. As to the experiments alluded to by his noble Friend (the Marquess of Clanricarde), there were two descriptions which he thought worthy of consideration: that of making a bar such as that which would be formed by a silt deposit might be tried at the mouths of many rivers; of the other, that of floating breakwaters, he would observe that if they could secure a floating breakwater, no doubt it would be very serviceable. But would the floating breakwater be more secure than the floating body behind it? The objection to this description of breakwater was that it must be held by anchors and cables, which were as liable to part as those of ships, in which case the breakwater would be driven on the fleet behind, and breakwater and ships and all would be destroyed together. An experiment might be made in a place like Lyme Regis for about £10,000, which would be sufficient to test the merits of the plan. He had thought it right to say this much on the matter as it was one to which he had paid no small attention, and on which it was desirable that naval men should state their opinions.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he would withdraw his Motion, and leave it to his noble Friend (the Duke of Somerset) to see what portion of the information he could present to the House in the shape of a return.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

House adjourned at a Quarter past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, Half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, March 26, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Income Tax ; Stamp Duties,
3^o Consolidated Fund (£850,000).

BEAULAY AND NESS FISHERY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read the third time."

MAJOR CUMMING BRUCE said, he should move that the Bill be read a third time that day six months. He contended, that, if passed, the effect of the Bill would be to confiscate the property of individuals who had as clear a right to their Salmon Fishings as any man had to his estate. The object was not to promote any public advantage, but to absorb private rights for the benefit of one or two great proprietors. If the object were public, let it be accomplished by a public Act.

Amendment proposed to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. E. ELLICE (St. Andrew's) said, he should support the Motion for the third reading. The measure would only prevent a species of fishing which would soon prove completely fatal to the breed of salmon in those rivers.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he objected to the Bill because it proposed to render illegal in two of the rivers running into the Moray Firth that which was left perfectly legal in the other rivers falling into that estuary.

MR. FENWICK said, as Chairman of the Committee to which the Bill was referred, he could state that all that the measure did was to regulate the mode in which the right of fishing should be exercised, and the Committee were unanimous in the conclusion they had arrived at on the subject.

THE EARL OF MARCH said, that if the House legislated at all upon the subject it ought to pass a general measure, and not one of an exceptional character.

MR. MASSEY thought the House was not in a position to review the decision of the Select Committee, and he hoped it would not undertake to reverse that decision.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 148 ; Noes 93 : Majority 55.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 3^o, and passed.

Ge
an A ment
ranks 1860, ment
of A bodie ranks have been Britis
Mr
had r Retur Meml
statin regim tion o not h ments
of me much had b an au regim
state the m ney, Satur
shoul
on un would prabe
to gr discus again
ample part o tice o sidera the V
to rep
might the y now
them tion r tablis appea therel
Mr
be no man would idea chang

ates his intention to move for the immediate re-appointment of the Committee on the subject. It was likely that their labours would be soon completed, and that a Bill upon the subject would be introduced in the course of the present Session.

AUSTRALIAN MAGISTRATES.

QUESTION.

at a Mr. HOPE said, he wished to ask the ight Under Secretary for the Colonies, Whether War or not he is in possession of any information Staff bearing upon a statement which has been had made that an Electioneering Agent has an been appointed a Justice of the Peace in ouse one of the Australian Colonies, he being ive at the time, and having continued after his that appointment to be, a hired servant in the fier employment of a resident in the district oved for which he has been appointed such said Justice ?

ap- Mr. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE ber. said, that no information had yet been it received at the Colonial Office on the sub- He ject alluded to by the hon. Member. These r in subordinate appointments were not submit- t on ted to the Home Government, who had no that control over them. He believed, however, scrip- that the Colonial Government of New t- South Wales had already under considera- lease tion whether they could not guard these ired appointments against party and political influences.

DIPLOMATIC ESTABLISHMENTS IN ITALY.—QUESTION.

g to LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he and. would beg to ask the Secretary of State ern- for Foreign Affairs what steps it is his in- the tention to take with regard to breaking ting up Diplomatic Establishments now existing niti- at Florence ; also, whether he intends l on to propose any and what change in the posi- land tion of the Queen's Representative at the and, Sardinian Court, in consequence of the recent aggrandizement of that State ?

avils LORD JOHN RUSSELL : Sir, I have ad- advised Her Majesty to abolish alto- ood- gether our Diplomatic Establishment at red, Florence, and Her Majesty has been pleased or to approve that step. I have accordingly The directed Mr. Corbett to consider his Mis- in- sion at an end. With regard to the Mission ghly at Turin, I some time ago raised it to a t to first-class Mission—after the annexation of The Lombardy to Piedmont. I do not know dent whether it will be necessary to make any e of further change at present.

BOROUGH VOTERS.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Returns of the number of Voters in Cities and Boroughs, at from £6 to £10, are not obtained from the Parochial Rate Books, through the instrumentality of the Poor-Law Board, and are therefore founded on statistics of rating, and not of rental; and, if so, whether such Returns, so based on rating, can afford any correct estimate of the number of Voters that a Rental Franchise of £6 would add to the Constituency?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he understood that the Rate Books had a column for gross rental as well as for rateable value; but his right hon. Friend, the President of the Poor-Law Board, could perhaps answer the question more satisfactorily.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to inquire whether the figures taken from the Rate Books, which formed the basis of the noble Lord's calculation, in estimating the probable increase of Voters to be added to the Constituency by the Bill of the noble Lord, were taken from the rental column, or the rating column?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: One column, I believe, contains the rental, and the other the rateable value.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: The noble Lord, I think, misapprehends my question, which was, whether his calculations were founded on the figures taken from the rateable value or not?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I understand not, from the President of the Poor-Law Board.

COURTS-MARTIAL.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty upon what principle Officers in the Royal Navy, tried by a Court Martial, are unable to obtain a copy of the depositions of that Court until a year has elapsed from the date of the Court Martial?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the depositions were kept back in order to allow time for allaying animosities and ill-feeling; but any prisoner under trial was allowed to have the assistance of a friend. The whole proceedings took place entirely in public, and the prisoner and his friend had the opportunity of taking notes of all the evidence.

{ COMMONS }

Savoy was of the po- for answer but there government the grati- tion should of Europe, one without that if the rn forbear- ld only con- , and would lence which Emperor of ved. This more sympa- ches behind n bestowed Whereupon it Minister, ayed, so far to high en- minding the declaration oing out of ; which had taly was at nd express- invasion of The House given; but and learned formation of g character, ot only was but that de- lly on their re Emperor. nan showed re honour to g the impa- tolerance— quarters of ied in again ention after the noble re statement so serious a to bring the the Govern- o, and with the greatest red, as the nformed the t only that determined reat Powers quired; and ulce of the	moment, emotion, written a Her Maje thereto, That des been tran noble Lo that the C filment o that desp must say indication noble Lo rules the What is the non-p are told tile critic might fol would nn and spiri mony wi lish feeli and the our sight to my m able in the peop we are of the c ment, a c a true o in the o character the enem those wh give;—t most frie and pub fear crit Emperor publicati duce a g would de least he erland— Sardinia. rope are spatch fr the spirit told that for fear t in disagi one indie a plea w ters—the vernmen discussio how tha
---	---

distant is the war? During the administration of the noble Viscount, and under the very peculiar, and, I might say, unprecedented relations between him and the French Emperor, there has been a new doctrine laid down—that we must frame our speeches, not according to what we consider to be for the interest of England, but according to what may not be hurtful to the feelings of the Emperor of France. That is a doctrine which I hope this House will at once and for ever repudiate and set at rest. As to the Emperor, his views, and our manner of discussing them, I think our course is clear. As long as the Emperor refrained from action, I think it was right and reasonable to give him credit for honourable motives, but when it is notorious to all the world, except to the Members of the Cabinet, that he is proceeding to the accomplishment of his designs, then I say it would be not merely folly but hypocrisy on our parts if we were not to characterize, as it deserves, the policy he has pursued. Silence in such a case implies indifference, if not complicity. Can it be said for a moment that because we are characterizing, as we believe it deserves, the policy of the Emperor of the French, that we are doing that which is irritating? I say we are acting in self-defence. It is the only way to bring him before the tribunal of opinion which he dreads. He cannot complain that in the Parliament of England his policy is discussed. The Ministers of England should be the first to vindicate the right of free speech which is the highest privilege we possess, and with which we will never part. At this time any attempt to suppress the expression of opinion here, when Ministers cannot defend facts, would degrade us to a state of moral weakness and acquiescence in wrong, and justify the imputation that is made abroad against us of unworthy sycophancy; and the more adulation is heaped upon the Emperor of the French from that (the Ministerial) bench, the more necessary it is that truth should be heard from other quarters of the House. It is for that reason that I vindicate in this Assembly the right of free speech, which there has been an undue attempt to fetter, and that in the exercise of my privilege as a Member of this House I denounce the recent policy of the Emperor of the French in Italy as a policy of deceit. I say that he has deceived the English Ministers, and has made them his tools for deceiving the English Parliament.

Mr. Horsman

of those telegrams which fly about the world, and have little authority, I know not; but, at all events, the House should not be misled by taking everything for certain that the right hon. Gentleman said. Then with respect to this great and important question of Savoy, I have more than once told the House the state of our information on that subject. I told the House what had passed between our Ambassador in Paris and the French Foreign Minister, and what our Minister at Turin had reported of his conversation with the Minister of France. I never considered myself bound to vouch for everything that was so reported, as to the way in which the project was to be carried out. The right hon. Gentleman says that I assured the House to its very great satisfaction not only that the Emperor of the French would consult the great Powers of Europe, but that he would be guided by their opinion. The noble Lord the Member for Leicestershire (Lord John Manners), endeavoured to extract from me an opinion whether the Emperor of the French intended to consult the great Powers of Europe in the sense of explaining to them his views with regard to Savoy, and then to act as he thought fit, or whether he meant to abide by the decision he might receive. Not being certain myself, I never could state to the noble Lord in what sense the Emperor of the French meant to consult them; but the very moment I received a despatch explaining in what sense that consultation was to be made I came down to the House and told them I thought it was intended in the sense of exposing the reasons of the Emperor of the French, but at the same time not supposing the great Powers should decide upon the question, but that the Emperor himself should decide. Well, as regards that subject I said, however, that I thought if it met with the unanimous disapproval of the great Powers — if they should feel the course the Emperor of the French meant to pursue with respect to the annexation of Savoy was an alarming step for France to take, and might betoken future aggression, I did not believe that that plan would be proceeded with. Whether I was right or wrong in that opinion cannot now be ascertained, but I know that with respect to the great Powers the Austrian Government said in the first instance that the annexation of Savoy to France was not worse, at all events, than the annexation of the Grand Duchy of Tuscany to Sar-

{ COMMONS }

on in which if war a e know be- bouring sia has said Sardinia of Sardinia a Swiss
 s, and that termina
 the French that the
 was impos- King of could inter- French
 gard to any of that e could not the lett ame weight importa
 of the four — but i d expressed respect
 in terms of land.
 right hon. has ap
 hat we are of the
 it in answer Europe.
 can assure Govern
 all ashamed several
 is produced hand,
 opinion that Powers named of it. tain be er questions to her pecially one a quest portance to an answ
 , as a free M. Tho as a free Majesty surpassing we shor
 is connected the opin eutrality of ion at l ter the de- at St. l received a have a ernaent of having e disposition decided to the neu- upon, t This, Sir, is attach e from that trality
 d to Savoy, what h
 to Tuscany, day —
 t of Europe mary i y should be- of Euro
 eany should ther th f Tuscany ; under t
 the part of the Fr
 the posses- Well, I l Duke and a nego
 rdinia ; and this Ho King of Sar- the Me to the Em- majorit
 ion on which commu
 ot, think it Berlin, ther. But, see wh ce of Switz- gether, terest to all tion wi the great hon. G t only is the thinks onfederation Emper
 rt of Savoy are co ralized, and thinks ovided that, confide

say that is a plausible pretext; is as it may, there has been den the beginning of these discussions immediately after the first debate place in the House of Lords— declaration was carried by The newspaper all over Europe—that, strong language might be used bject, there was no intention of war on account of it. The right leman the Member for Stroud man) said in one of his speeches ight be quite sure no man in this hed to go to war for Savoy; now, id been entire liberty to Her Ma- verment to negotiate on this although certainly they would threatened war—although they l less have pledged the Govern- the country to go to war, still ifferent thing, not saying any- the subject, and declaring from nencement of the negotiations ver may be the issue we will war. Sir, my opinion as I de- in July and January I have no now to repeat—that such an act nexation of Savoy is one that will ion so warlike as the French to its Government from time to ommit other acts of aggression; fore, I do feel that, however we to live on the most friendly terms French Government, and certain- ish to live on the most friendly h that Government—we ought sp ourselves apart from the other f Europe, but that, when future may arise—as future questions —we should be ready to act with l to declare, always in the most and friendly terms, but still at the settlement of Europe, the Europe is a matter dear to this and that settlement and that not be assured if it is liable to interruption—to constant fears, and rumours with respect to ration of this one country, or the junction of that other; but that re of Europe, if they wish to that peace, must respect each ghts, must respect each other's d. above all, restore and not dis- commercial confidence which is of peace, which tends to peace, ultimately forms the happiness

JOHN MANNERS: The ready eh rang through the whole House

I France had done for her in the Italian to war, then I say, on your own principles and the policy of the noble Lord, that ave England should be glad that the score ave had been settled in this manner rather on than that for the future Sardinia should on- consider herself greatly indebted to France, rho and bound up in a perpetual political his alliance with that country. France is led now acknowledged even by the right hon. m- Gentleman near me (Mr. Horsman) to und have acted in the transaction with per- try fect good faith. ["Oh, oh!"] I thought I was stating that which was admitted sta on both sides of the House the last time the for this matter was discussed. I heard it the said by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli), though I see that Gentlemen I opposite have no faith in his statements; und but that he did say so I call the right nas hon. Gentleman himself to witness. This re. House, the English people, and the Eng- hat lish press have for the last nine months ver the been exciting the English Government to his take that precise course which rendered rse the cession of Savoy inevitable, and I ow take it for granted therefore we are not ind in a position to complain of what has ing taken place. Then who is it that is to am be alarmed at the issue things have taken? eat For that, after all, is the principal point to ind be determined. The noble Lord has told in us in a manner perfectly charming, when in- we recollect the somewhat hot despatches en, he has written, and the hotter despatches on- Gentlemen in this House have desired him ese to write, that he has communicated with hes all the Powers who were parties to the bly treaty of Vienna. It is a delightful thing d i when all the Powers of Europe slumber and nia at their posts that the hon. and learned ion Member for Bridgwater should be wide awake. ["Hear, hear!"] No doubt, of hon. Gentlemen opposite fully appreciate the course he has taken. But the noble the Lord tells us that Austria in reply says— ar- what? Why, that nobody cares about the of treaty of Vienna, that when her provinces nce were wrested from her they were not ion taken by treaty, but by force of arms, lli- and that Europe looked quietly on, while the- the English Ministers almost applauded, y a and the English people welcomed with ler- enthusiasm every intelligence that was ally received of the destruction of an Austrian nce army in Italy. ["Hear, hear!"] Then, as, not only is Lombardy taken from Austria, sel- but those pet duchies over which Austria re- has exerted so much influence are also bat gone, and that patrimony which is held

{COMMONS}

to patrimony ted from the this is trans- h has tripled et year. All e sanction of the English } Do hon. the hon. and or, think that uld join in a ey had not a was dismem- isia, and you replies, "As affecting the ent rests, it then, if you ere any man t the Russian f its tranquil ble question rse you took years ago? ord appealed f Prussia is of England, sides, rather and. Well, of the Court at the noble ; answer to- sion is that, lo not insist al boundaries terest in this to take any to this, that ; matter but ; will admit d has is ne- erest of the it is sheer hat we who ter interest ary than the to continent arer to that hes. But I nterested in ; vain to the considerable s, of course, s spread in ewspaper in [should ra- ire of piety before been er day that up the pas-	sions of th thing con and the hesitate to has filled the people is in Fran here 150 dynasty. a dynasty scrupulous there are have no f never had with the certain th not come the press throughou Governme good to objects go who, whe maintain no claim this count they have believe th the matter tion up, a also given is willing persons w are the hor water (Mr. ber for St two others is my opin the Membe pression to he did not Gentleman which I a House all speech hes any one el tleman sai exhausted liament to do. What ments do either reti their reason they go for pulsion, di Did the rig No; for he that he dic France. I tleman doe
---	---

Hamilton

the grave gements Nothing
than the should be
That assi tered dow the popul
that the f
of the po
lastly, the the annex reference nicipalitie afterwards
such a n
face of E peace whe tated. O
cipes crim
be thrown rassing n tempted further ad
to seduce Faucigny of opinion her had into this r his opinio for Bridg people of did the ho noble Lor reign Aff alluded t taking an he stated,
no sympa
other Po of their o thus mani
surprise, noble Lor
been of a alienated
That nobl
in his poli since 183
Office, he Foreign C
tation to reaping t policy. T
tary now sequence closer th
with othe
ceed in hi dispassio

of those in future general dis-
cussance, serious results have after the conclusion
ing us into tions with the country
est of Eu-ent should led House athusiastic reested the esty on the

assure the slightest he present n induced ons which m thought duct with

Sir, the
was truly
ay it was because it
t firm re-
his own
ice of the arly mark
man. He discussed a person

a. Why, favour to have made quid atten-
I was the
the exist-
which I disose of in-the Em-
upon the rty to that o said that those who his matter England
question.
n. Gentle-
h a state-
because he riends the ention, for rhaps, but aboriously
o the faith

of treaties, that military considerations, and many other reasons, do make it of the deepest importance that England should prevent this unsettlement of Europe; and among other instances of that singular audacity which characterizes the hon. Gentleman, I find him coming forward to-night to give the House that which I shall venture to call a military opinion, because, speaking with that confidence which seems never to desert him, he has said that Savoy and Nice are worthless provinces. Well, Sir, when we talk of the worth of provinces of this kind for the purpose of discussions such as that in which we are now engaged, of course we allude in a great measure to military considerations. I believe that there are military Gentlemen in this House who will give strong opinions upon that subject, but when the hon. Gentleman says that a province is a worthless one, he means, I suppose, that it is worthless in a military sense, and he must forgive me if I say that upon such a question I cannot be guided by any opinion of his. [Mr. BRIGHT: I said politically worthless.] Politically worthless! I suppose that the value of a province politically depends upon the degree of strength which it may give to the nation; and the degree of strength which it may give to the nation may be, and in this case really is, a military question. I say, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman is not justified in saying that these provinces are politically worthless, unless he has so completely informed himself upon the military question as to be able to contradict all the military men in this House, and to assert that Savoy and Nice are worthless as military acquisitions. The hon. Gentleman said that there is great danger that this House will degenerate into the position of being the common scold of Europe; and I have no doubt that he thinks that his demeanour, his gestures, his diction, are exactly those which he should assume in order to dissuade the House from sinking into such a position. Having thus dealt with the observations of the hon. Gentleman I will do no more than express the heartfelt gratification with which I have heard the statement of the noble Lord. I can assure the noble Lord that it was gratifying to me beyond expression; and I feel great satisfaction in thinking that, however imperfectly I may—in the Motion of which I gave notice—have expressed the opinion which I entertained as to the desirability of our entering into communication with the great of Europe, my view was the one which has happily been entertained by Her Majesty's Government. I have only to thank the House for the kindness with which they have listened to me, notwithstanding the great difficulty which I have experienced in addressing them.

HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he did not intend to continue the discussion with regard to Savoy, but to say a few words on the income tax, which was more properly a question before the House. He meant to follow the example of the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. In 1842 he announced his intention of proposing the income tax on the Report, and on the first, second, and third reading. He should, on any day, accept the Resolution as carefully as an expression of opinion in favour of a temporary income tax, though in the House it was doubtful whether the measure might not have been against the Government. In 1842 there was a promise that the deficiency in the revenue would be made up by the tax should cease; and in 1845 the noble Lord, with zeal and vigour, that which he had displayed on every other occasion, opposed the renewal of the income tax as not being a fit tax.

The noble Lord insisted then, and he (Sir Henry Willoughby) insisted now, that it was the duty of the Government to correct the inequality of the tax if they could do so. The Government was aware that the income tax was extremely unequal in reference to the different classes of the community, and he wished to impress on the Government the necessity of removing two hardships which were assessed on persons assessed under the Act of 1842. Those possessed of houses were assessed on their gross rental, and this was clearly an act of gross injustice towards the owners of such property. In order to make the assessment fair there should be a reduction of ten or twenty per cent on the gross rental. He believed that such a provision would be consistent with common justice and with common sense. There was another question in reference to mines and the like property, which was worked by the owners themselves. In such cases they were assessed on the net rental, as he understood, were allowed a right of appeal. He wished, therefore, to know whether they would be allowed an appeal to the Commissioners? He would state the points, and he trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would say whether he agreed with him.

He stated the points, and he trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would say whether he agreed with him.

Kinglake

SIR JOHN RUSSELL, right hon. member for the City of London, said, that he was under his noble friend's other point, which I think I should give to the House. It appears to me that it is a question of Common Law, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer is to decide. It is to double the tax, which, on a moral point, is proposed to do as the right thing to require it desirable. It is formed that the act is the right hon. member's possible will. He is to remain will to me to state, put down the various amendments, considerable reduction of the tax, at the rate of a penny of the tax. The hon. Gentleman's amount was £6,140,000 whether it was March 31, coming year ending, was that the amount of 5d. Well, Sir, of income tax. Then as to the tax which is proposed to be added to the tax of the year. The hon. member stated the income tax to be added to the fourth quarter to be received the ensu- ing year to £2,250,000, which is the gate income.

as each penny of

Well, Sir, the estimated receipt for the ensuing year by the right hon. Gentleman produced in 1859 amounts, I think, to £1,000,000 of income tax. That if the right hon. Gentleman is stating the income tax as a difference on the revenue is so great that it is never evening by (Willoughby) in any way have produced the revenue emanate from new estimates we endeavoured to make as far as possible. The mode of expenditure is a mode of extravagance, and I have that explanation from him, and what he expects to receive from the income tax as now proposed on other points.

The Gentleman has said, and I trust he will do so, which he proposes in the quarters of the

It appears to me a tolerable practical arrangement in the quarters in the case. I have the same explanation to suggest that made in the present income-tax system it is a very large amount, I trust will make some difference. These are the points I am glad to hear the right hon. Genlished to express he felt at the right hon. Gentleman's scheme at the tax was looked forward to as a system of thoroughly examined and laid out, in the House might expect. It was with great regret, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman now asks that question. He, for one, is satisfied to leave the consideration of permanent imposition, as it appears would be, of the income tax to the House of Commons, to be elected in a new constituency. It was impossible to separate the consideration of the Bill from the consideration of the tax, and believing that the Reform Bill carried out as it then stood would very materially alter the constituencies of Members to that House, which had to be recognized as representing different interests, he anticipated the greatest possible alarm the future condition of the country being put in the hands of new constituencies.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said the House would not be justified in drawing an inference as to the probable produce of the income tax from what was produced in past years. Owing to variations in the collection, it was exceedingly difficult to estimate what would be produced in any one year. A million for each pound of tax was probably a near calculation, and if the tax yielded more than that the Chancellor of the Exchequer as the House ought rather to be guided than the reverse. He considered the Budget a great, though a bold one, and was most desirous to avoid a deficiency of revenue, as that seriously affected public securities. He hoped to refer the whole question referred to a Select Committee next year.

MR. BLAKE said, that the income tax as then levied, pressed with undue weight on the commercial community, and with undue lenity on the agricultural, and he would suggest that in any arrangement the trading and commercial classes should receive equal consideration with the farmer. As matters stood the one escaped, up to a certain point, while the others were assessed in the same manner.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he hoped that as regarded Ireland the income tax would not be levied on a larger assessment than was strictly required for the necessities of the State, and that on three of the four schedules at least—namely, A, B, and C, the tax should not be levied on the assessments of former years. If it were levied on these assessments a great improvement would be done, as the parties under the old schedules would have to pay not

6d. the Bill. In repl Gentleman who
HE. simply to state th
rious had made in refe ation was meant to ope scul- payer. It had ation Schedule B; and lules crease the burde ersa- hon. Member for (Sir him if an appeal pre- Schedule A for t che- He had not had elow the subject to wh ce of had alluded in su rife, felt some difficu t to precise nature of airly should be happy, che- House, to hear
reat might give an opi ween tax in proportion f re- owners of mining nder of the unfavour real happen to Schedu d D. cussion of the sub hich that the matter w the self had laboured ther that the tax fell p in more heavily than ight as all house prop Gen- aware, for on the d of that was really e the Baronet opposite no adverted to two t in Gentleman had ob
, ex- of promise with r give Now, he would pro- words of what he vast The right hon. B and that he (the Chan itate had promised th cipi- be positively take He what might happ pro- irrespective of th p in service. If he ha lous mise, it was quite uld, been the act of a e a tempted to have ugh- find, in the auth hich ever guilty of s s, at What he said at t while " I think it also w that ual measures should n of a temporary tax. B tely or chiefly that I wo
hon. to an abstract opini the own opinion is decid ient the tax, as a perman ress finances; but while e it vernment to propose t of not ask you to rely o ourselves, irrespectiv interim, as to what y

h we paid 13d. in the pound, escaped with a tax of 5d. It was necessary, therefore, not only to estimate the general amount of the tax as so much for every penny, but the amount in reference to the precise period when it was enacted. This disturbed the calculation, and presented an apparent discrepancy. In fact, the Government would obtain more than three-fourths of the tax within the financial year, owing to the arrangements under which it was paid in Scotland. If £2,250,000 were one-fourth of the whole tax, then £9,000,000 would be the produce of the whole year's tax, whereas he took credit for the whole year's tax on an aggregate receipt of £8,472,000 within the year, and of £250,000 beyond the year, making together, £10,722,000. These were the causes of the apparent discrepancies in the figures. With respect to the collection of three-quarters in lieu of one-half the tax within the year, there was no alteration in the law, and its collection was not by law uniform as it now stood. In some places it was paid quarterly, in others half-yearly, and in Scotland once for all over the whole year. The payments by Scotland were most favourable to the Exchequer, because there were the smallest average arrears, but the regulations that had to be made were such as were required by the present law and were not attended with inconvenience either to the collectors or the parties. Another question upon which he would not enter fully, but which was one of considerable importance, was the per centage allowed on the collection. There was only one change the Government proposed to make in the mode of collection, and that was to transfer the assessment of the railways from the head offices of the companies to Somerset House. Hitherto the location had been by accident. The chief station of the North-Western Railway was in the parish of St. Pancras, but the property the company held in that parish was comparatively small. It was, therefore, almost absurd that the collector of the St. Pancras district should obtain all the profit on the collection of the whole of the company's assessment. The Government, therefore, proposed to make it a matter of direct arrangement between the companies and the Government; and no doubt, as the per centage would be high, it would afford the collector a liberal commission. The whole subject of remuneration and poundage to collectors required revision, and ought to undergo that revision whenever un-try years

the us
used ;
ice is than s, the e fores he t the 1860 e par-n the unities
,000
nan's
t and Par-
them well, illions
ntry,
e has rich, npru-
which,
e the plete
t the pro-e ana not main and it Chan-idera-nt poinions
with e end
r the lor of ent of with their at ocerable laym-
hon.
crush three l that oposie year
ed by e said, e dis-
d if a
were adopted. But what do we find now? the Chancellor of the Exchequer is proposing that to the service of the should be appropriated not a sum of £400,000, but a sum of upwards of £1,500,000, which is not furnished by the revenue of the year. That was one of the chief grounds on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer assailed the Government in 1852. Then with regard to the tax, he said that no Minister was justified in proposing its continuance without providing for its final termination. What position are we in now? Here is an income tax nearly double that of 1852, and there is no one who will pretend to say there is any provision for its final termination? The third charge against the Ministry of 1852 was that they proposed a difference between the rate of assessment in Schedule A and Schedule B, but on condition that all exemptions should have an end to, and the assessment to be made on incomes of £50 a year. I was therefore much surprised to hear the right Gentleman admit that, when this important financial law should be taken into consideration next year, he would be willing to consider the policy of increasing the scheme of exemptions and of reducing the rate of assessment on the different classes. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER assented.] If you did not say that you have said something like it, although I admit I was not in the House at the time. But if it be the policy of the right Gentleman to tax the rich and poor on different principles, anything that we proposed in 1852, in point of danger compared with such a principle, shrinks into insignificance. I can scarcely describe the position of the Member for Kent, who has made a statement to-night that would justify the most compromising opposition to the financial propositions of the Government, has called our attention to the very perilous position in which this country is now placed with respect to its finances for the coming year and the possible occurrence of important political events. No one doubts that there is a serious complication—a very grave juncture, and I am only surprised that with such opinions the hon. Member for Kent is so ready to give his support to the Government, though I am not satisfied that the coming danger has created in the hon. Gentleman such a degree of opposition that while denouncing the policy of the Government he begged, in other terms, permission of the Chancellor his observations, and be received without that the Chancellor of embarked in as im-

se as any Chancellor can undertake. He is
, and I am afraid he substituting, direct taxazation to a very large laid down principles ut will lead to conse-
tier, and at the same t he is a member of a year will have to meet from £12,000,000 to that the principles on s to be supplied are to the right hon. Gentle-
e) by the representa-
who would then possess

probable taken in ments m
For my c Emperor complain appears t
are proba tionously an of his ow taxation i
to be put constitue policy wh the free s salutary i prescripti exercised a vindicatin the Franc him, and policy put and suppl
the Empe irritation
in this H
that he w
and inter
look at

LOR OF THE EXCHE-
not my language.
: Does the right hon.
let me with respect to policy put

and suppl
the Empe
irritation
in this H
that he w
and inter
look at

LOR OF THE EXCHE-
st you entirely as to the

be establi
at the pol fect unise revenue i tives of taxation,
his glory mation so monarchy of a king
Ma. L.

[: It is rather inoon-s running commentary or of the Exchequer,
m. Gentleman seldom
he said was that the
to possess the frand be ashamed of him-l any arrangement cal-
hem of the opportunity r principles on which e country was to be very serious state of are promised a finans mainly to depend on irect taxation, and at informed by the same ew constituent bodies are not to be payers

pictures v circulation the right down. I throwing which for and subst

A position more dan-ry than this cannot be have had a discussion mperor of the French is policy by what was and whether he might ritated by it, and I am ho right hon. Member e observations that he
the necessary conserrations of the Chanquer the other night, ted to the House the tent of ex

the poor.
finance th
allowable,
metic.
throwing indirect u
fact was,
tion levie
greater th financial Let them
1856-57.

height, most importance to show them that the system of financial legislation hitherto had not been partial or one-sided—had not favoured the rich at the expense of the poor, but that it had been applied, with due allowance for the difficulties which must necessarily be experienced in all schemes of taxation, in as equitable and humane a spirit as it was possible to conceive. In the course of a large personal experience among working men during strikes and at periods of great excitement he had always found one argument that exercised a most powerful effect upon their minds; and this was, when he contrasted the statements made by demagogues, about the oppressive disposition of the aristocracy, with the fact that these very classes had submitted to the income tax in order that the repeal of the corn laws might be effected, and the poor man relieved from indirect taxation of a very injurious nature.

Mr. MALINS said, he still retained the strong feeling of dislike to the income tax which he had avowed in 1853. At that time no one could have expressed more emphatic condemnation of the tax than the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and nothing could have appeared more unlikely—after the repetition of similar arguments in 1855 and 1857—than that the right hon. Gentleman in 1860, with scarcely a word of apology, should first require payment of 1s. 1d., instead of 9d., for the half year which had just elapsed, and should then, in the very year of expected release, impose an increased taxation equivalent to 57 per cent. More than that, they were told that the country could not expect to get rid of any portion of the tax at the end of the year; although in 1853 a solemn pledge had been given that the terminable annuities should be devoted to the reduction of the income tax. Such a breach of faith was eminently calculated to destroy that confidence in the professions of public men, which it was of the utmost importance to maintain. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Laing) had stated that the ratio of direct to indirect taxation had not increased, in proof of which he had instanced the incidence of taxation during the Russian war. But that was an exceptional period when the upper and middle classes, for the purpose of carrying on that contest, had cheerfully consented to bear the burden of a sixteenpenny income tax; but those circumstances were wholly changed. The right hon. Gentleman need which was exhausting the capital estate; and as the tax was in- to touch income only, it was per- clear that when the capital of the was being exhausted, the charge to be levied on the interest of the only and not on the capital. Hav- died this question deeply, he con- that he had been unable to sur- the difficulties which had defeated it, and Sir Robert Peel. He did not that they could establish a just sys- graduation, or define strictly be those accumulations of income which l or returned capital and income it- The House had launched into a sys- taxation which was fraught with ce, and he felt it his duty to point the Chancellor of the Exchequer the high he had undertaken. He had un- on a task which defeated Mr. Pitt, l undertaken a task which defeated ert Peel, for he had undertaken k of adjusting an income tax accord- the relative proportions of income .pital. The right hon. Gentleman undertaken that task in defiance of nion both of Mr. Pitt and Sir Robert he (Mr. Newdegate) hoped that the would not be satisfied with the mment of other sources of revenue that task were adequately fulfilled. d said that the country had been ed into a most dangerous system, had been launched by a coup d'état ad been launched in the dark, and ht hon. Gentleman would not think ifair if he asked for an explanation of ans by which the right hon. Gentle- tended hereafter to levy an income it should be just as between capital come. He was too well acquainted he inequalities of the income tax our in its perpetuation. The hon. er for Birmingham was much more r and honest of the two, for he was ; to make the attempt to establish uated property and income. That he ould he (Mr. Newdegate) believed, but as a matter of opinion. The House , right to continue as a source of in- a tax which Mr. Pitt and Sir Robert onsidered only justifiable as a sub- time of war, owing to the injustice asioned, which they felt themselves to redress.

CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHE-
l—Sir, I just wish to explain, after he hon. Gentleman said who has just wn, that I was certainly not aware tion Mr.

COMMONS}

 the changed
 is a the Treas
 e ut- scheme,
 dis- culties b
 insti- rounded.
 ould they gav
 ment taxation, source t t he was ma Gen- by the most So with nt of Budget, ight, cellor of o be would be x 'on merical larks Treasury
 f in- deal abo
 ; the and liber
 e he were ex Lam- they wou otion they we sub- taxes w noyance
 l not thing to respect f is a whereby l, al- number
 rried tation of ncial tary for is of not the pay export d nt to would c
 with the able busi- India, a tax tion at eared the expo
 hich and he h
 Com- senses, s ough ed in the
 is of ing a tax
 had the other
 d to duty on
 ,500 which In other and aga
 arily he had ually moving
 ade. which is f the dangerou neral posed to sys- the exp pres- Foreign small vernmen
 not to le say themselv ttee, on them ving they bot
 ome duty the other import modificat
 r

of asked for a tax which he th ed reasonably bound to pay, I 'd. the demand fairly and hon be he thought it was a tax m- incidence, he had a strong lor apply a remedy of his own of ance. He (Mr. Hubbard) co im fore, that no Minister wa ng continuing the income tax as without endeavouring to of medy against its demoralis he It was his deliberate convic ed would be no more difficulty on the evils of the tax than th
ls. arrangement of his right ad succession tax. That tax
m. more intricate calculations ia tions than would be necessa s), able income tax. It proceed to ciple of taxing the capitalize bir property on its transfer fro me to another, and that princip as available for the taxation c ir- year to year. A tax which n- yearly income ought to be j ial equitable than a tax whic as- once only in a generation.
he contended that the success ed precedent, and an example d, in the income tax, while he ry the income tax would not r tt, amount of deep and intri to tions. He trusted that anot ial not pass before the incom re- riously dealt with by the H el, they would not be tempted t is- their resolution by the op m- difficulties which Mr. Pitt a at Peel failed to grapple with he able. To his mind it was not in these days of scientific i as should be admitted that the as full of inequalities, and yet ax be declared in the same bre
ts. impossible to find a remedy. a a remedy could be found, s ue quite possible to make dis to indeed, between individuals not class, but between differer to they attempted that, he had sir would succeed. If they d ix- lieved they would fail in n rt come tax a permanent source he of the country.

LORD HARRY VANE
er. no man could have sat, as so Income-Tax Committee, of el- Mr. Hume was chairman, w on to the conclusion that the di as way of a fair and equitable

hem. With re- a wi e question was when l in themselves sider ht to interfere class nd to prohibit comm
to legislative grate was totally in- scarc
a dead letter, econo
er almost from scarc
for the sake of quite should be held of th
the laws ought, dwell force in them; wishe ed by the Le- dition ons of abstract times its of Govern- tion ot whether fool- again
nd to ruin them- implic s and morally, of sto bargains, but the ti ntially immoral Ma
proscribe them, hon.
in a gambling- the s ions in a gam- him t
to define or de- the p
to put down the to pr at philosophical gamin t was requisite and t ch bore a re- which nation. With simple ne, he was not princi ce of the facts questi verybody, that Act, l ntially in the legisla ich was vicious the p ght to be pro- lation e class of gen- India he did not be- Wage
sectable class of cle to rid than those firm
ected with the a mill.
on; and time operat e regular busi- mercie en whose busi- such as their trade had p se transactions and h y difference of Resol
in the funds. whole
d a greater de- Res
as just as the Ma.
volved greater langua
the time when and, a proscribe these tended vailed that all writte unds were de- have t heretofore stock- Gentle ed practice," The
in the Act to QUEEN referred. But the al k-jobbing was raised Eschequer

ay the might move the postp the addressed the House.

duced MR. SPEAKER r ember cellor of the Exchequ he be- of the House.

nd no THE CHANCELL
it. It QUER: Sir, this is ion to have heard the lang it did just presented by the ll was Member for Liverpool make this is a Bill for conf of the Licensed Victu

od the It is very difficult to hequer without more or less i operty with regard to the p wer of which drinking hous point managed in this cou a dis- that, as far as my op e new is very unfavourable t French the same time the Go en be- very anxious in fram of ap- view a particular and y, but to avoid anything tha absol- Liverpool, as a confis ld not to avoid, in fact, eve the interests of the Li

CHE- of those who hold lic if con- beer, by any legislatio of the beyond that which is ld the to the scope and suc could lar measures before u words pressed on us by the
was a was great authority w the the Committee of this ot en- become at some time e sub- serious consideration, ration. to deal with the whole nd for the sale of strong liq this country. Our v

by Mr. we were not able to u as, and propose a complete a that important questio as possible without pr interests involved, and

WINE we hoped, any occasio described in the term Victuallers of Liverpo per to adopt. I can a the Bill has been frar

CHE- I have described. No said, of very great practical e hon. into which no consider ved he or purely political mo he Bill It is a measure of in measure, and takes e urge from a fiscal proposa been absurd to propos

CHE- of the wine duties, in leman the public revenue, s

COMMONS;

ould ared by ine,
the red.
med
ure, ided im-n of n of ch I not iscal
is a re-
but mo-osed
the rties
and hold hose they cont to
the pars of umome far ause must ade.
y of ther rect, dea-
t, at the must ence ch I
and upon e is part men
and it is se of giti-
that not ppo-
that perance. Society acquit their souls, and to sponsibility est oppositio ment. The they object to increase t

other strong that this Bil
any legislativ spect to the sure that th
just judgmen public policy
who have ma the Bill have and in their given to the ment has be conditions fr
We cannot c importation dependent on to the consu
is one of the which the B proposition shortly and places, the cl wine are in may even lud
setting aside
of what faci
for the consu ses where it restrictive w not to be cor
it is absolute facilities for
of retail tra premises, b
The other f
we proceed
sale of wine portion to th descriptions numerous a licensed vict sufficiency of sale of stro
you desire?
of these li tainly, whe
as that nam through the appear at f entering int
the quantit should be f

the case 40,000
sale of siderably the sale
the pre-strange you look he scale
:—Beer
ie popu-
much the licensed
I should r public t greater the sale
its. On of your can have s he has
o. You
s sale of a licence r selling
s to sell
; spirits.
perance gislation
it work?
whereas irits sell ose who s spirit-and only as to sell in this to sell
all wine.
hat with the fa-
; I ask digest-
ering in-
ie. And l to the e public,
lter the ntroduce h is so
ry. By gh new ine sold ow what in this certain he most ed, and tongue ors now

sold as wine in ordinary public the British community? Why, wine is a mixture of fire and w the red wine sold as port, is m juice of the sloe, and various ducts, perhaps not so harmless, no doubt, with a considerable i some kind of spirit. We have a that it is absolutely necessary new channels for the sale of wine second proposition that I have as fundamental for any useful an measure is this—that, whatever do with regard to establishing of the magistracy and police, th ment will not be responsible for re in a new form, the evils existing sent licensing system. It is no r the magistracy, to say that whe visions of this Bill are examined, found that they have been fra spirit of ample, I might add, confidence in the general comp telligence, and integrity of the j the peace of this country—a which, I believe, they well deserv may be exceptions, there may be quarters where private interests rectly into play; but what I sta this measure proceeds on the pri you may safely repose in the m any powers which fairness of int ability of mind will enable men t in a satisfactory manner. But yo licensing system imposes on m duties which it is impossible fo discharge. It makes them judg quantity of liquor that a given human beings ought to consum absurd is that; and how absurd quality it produces! In a partic the magistrates frame a certai of the capacity of human organs digest, and dispose of strong liq if they are inclined to form estimate of that capacity, they that the number of public-house a fixed and limited number. I place the magistrates, taking view of the question, and thin with an increasing population th be increasing facilities, go on the number of licensed houses.
chester one view prevails, and ingly, in that city there is now number of these houses than the believe, twenty years ago. In on the other hand, the magistra look at the subject in the same l although the population does no

Manchester, there are 10 houses than in that town, an inequality deand personal discretion to exist. The matter is based on intelligible principle something like uniformity in all parts of the country, treatment by its equal strict as compared with London; however, is the presumption unequal, but it endeavour to heartburnings and not about to enter into mention it as one of the Government are unwilling to reproduce it in a form which does not now exist. For what I say, the system is What do the licensed pool, who oppose this the operation of the

 in that town, the ma-
 it may be remembered, alteration. In their they declare that in 1,526 licensed public-there are public-houses to be the resorts of ladies, but still annually gistrates to the number the system with which,
 as it may be, we are reluctant. It has also a tenonopoly; and it is evident there is monopoly, property is called "vested"— in the licence of every house is a property in every respect to the licence, apart from the rents which make up its value. The existence of that system is the most formidable to the exercise of police and law, and renders it almost impossible to apply that control to vested interests. Well, if I were to rear up a new class of licences given in a similar manner to similar arbitrary power is obvious, that if we accept that proposition, these are those of the licensed houses become the root and basis of a mass of vested interests, which actually obstruct the authority of the police, and the maintenance of good order and the removal of social evil. That I can see no reason why we should not have the Exchequer

decline to p which, while system of li should subje
 of discretion magistrates
 Short of th
 that we shou
 sent licensin
 we should cr pendent sim magistrates—simply to g
 trol and pun
 both by way penalty, for that we shou
 with every said thus in which the li describe its are three, a I anticipate is to give a wine not to mixes. I t that the sa
 it would n
 the domest rally speak desirable.
 that, subject
 rate licence be entitled sale of win the premis
 that part o
 comprehend th proposal wi sally admitt edly is socie
 the Bill.
 great and trol, which with strong houses wh of refreshm sold, shall
 the police,
 made liabl
 licence dut proposal is houses are derly chara orderly tra with some of them sti sold. I do
 into any de

opinion would class special ever, at to f the uses ining ages ten & light rents but ite a resort t ne- ol of y be us to ; the ex- ted. hich uses at be dis- road licen- not it is draw uses uses that ntly ting- had more with 'evil now o be i na- ting age- with er, a hort hem fore, ,000 uses elae ed a hose iven What the ured and prosecuted by those who have the monopoly of it, to the comparative neglect of the trade in victuals, which, not being the subject of a monopoly, has gone forth and become the property of a different set of parties, the social result of which is, that you have done everything in your power, by the construction of your law, to separate the business of eating from that of drinking. I do not want to enter into a discussion of the constitution of human nature, and perhaps my opinion that the functions of eating and drinking ought to be joined together, may, in the view of some gentlemen, be open to dispute, although it appears to me to be a reasonable one; but, at any rate, I see this, that persons of the upper class who have power to make arrangements for themselves take care to make provision for it through the medium of their clubs. That which I am now going to ask for the people we, who sit in this House, and those of our station in life have taken very good care to provide for ourselves. We are not content, if we want to drink a glass of wine, to be dependent upon that which is purchased from a licensed victualler. We can buy for our 4d., 6d., or 1s. a glass, half-a-pint, a pint, or whatever quantity we want; and not in London only, but in Liverpool, in Manchester, in Edinburgh, and I know not where, the upper classes, recognizing the reasonableness of this arrangement, have, by means of clubs, formed for themselves that system which, as far as possible, we have by our laws placed beyond the reach of the common people and of the middle class. Well, Sir, with respect to these eating-houses, is it not perfectly obvious that the old system of separating eating and drinking is the most unwise one that we could possibly pursue if we want to promote sober habits? People who go to eat are not permitted to drink at the place where they eat,—that is to say, there is a complicated machinery of sending out to the nearest public-house for the particular jug or glass of this or that, which imposes impediments, obstacles, and trouble that operate almost as a prohibition, and practically we know that, except in inns and hotels, in all eating-houses properly so called eating and drinking are, as a consequence of our laws, effectually disjoined. What is the consequence of that? You do not get rid of the desire for drink; you cannot quench or extinguish that by forbidding a man to get drink where he eats, but you compel

{COMMONS}

r drink	the peo
; is the	liquor t
to con-	have re
moting	to me,
devise	drunker
you by	glad to
I am	don for
so sup-	the dru
failed.	permitt
It was	drunker
a mea-	fact, it
ll is to	country
drink-	is a dru
on the	it is, I s, of a	assert t
ch ex-	where v
indeed,	where t
I may	prevails
se what	drunker
fact of	of reuni
at has	the mai
We all	a much
of very	of conti
n Eng-	sent, w
dred	victual
people	Let me
as has	Bill rel
years	who kee
h very	certain
it vice,	pelled t
o been	so come
a pro-	All tho
l, been	entitled
r, that	licences,
use ex-	Excise
tailed,	magistr
a case	Bill—we
. of the	I admit
unded.	unless y
eating	grity ar
it has	issue of
re is, I	lute vet
in the	either t
drinks.	within t
use of	is a hou
miting	persons.
ill less	such a p
ully in	tion by
' beer.	an eati
n, we	entitle t
increas-	taking t
nd has	selves e
d with	them on
, there	out a wi
ase in	you wou
beer,	under th
upon	ject of
strong	only in
is an	ing is so
ive to	eating t
er

be kept open for the purpose of selling victuals. It is necessary for that purpose that the magistrates should have stringent powers, and therefore we have given them powers which, though large, I hope the House will in the main approve. Moreover, we have given them an equally stringent power with respect to anything of a disorderly character appertaining to a house; and I propose also to give them power to object to the licensing of a house on the ground that it does not correspond with the rental or value provided by the Act, or that the tenant has been disqualified in some other place under the provisions of the Act. These, I think, are efficient restraints upon any undue facility in the first issuing of the licences. Let me now state what the Bill provides in regard to the subsequent management of houses. In the first place, the licence must be renewed from year to year, and, though it would not be just to impose upon the party who wants a renewal of his licence the necessity of going through the same process of giving notice that he had to pursue when he first obtained it; yet the Bill, duly requiring the magistrates to take the initiative, gives them the same powers, to be annually exercised, if they think fit, in the case of renewals of licences, as they are to exercise upon notice received from the party in the case of the original granting of a licence. I mention these stringent powers thus particularly because they are so large and considerable that the House ought not to confer them without having its attention drawn to them in the plainest and most pointed manner. They are justified, I think, by the nature of the case, especially in making the first trial of a new system; but they are stringent to the last degree, and, I believe, will prevent persons from applying for wine licences who are not conscious that their conduct is beyond suspicion or doubt. So much for the first issuing of the licences, and likewise for the restraints upon renewals. There is, besides, in the Bill a system of penalties. This portion of the Bill has been copied in general from the Beer Acts, which contain very severe penalties; but they have been improved and made more workable by changes of various kinds. I intend myself to propose an Amendment at the commencement of the 26th clause, of which the necessity will at once be recognized. The words of that clause have been taken from the Beer Act, and provide that everybody licensed under the Act who shall permit any person to be guilty of drunkenness or disorderly conduct in their houses shall be subject to certain penalties; but, oddly enough, the section which makes it penal to permit drunkenness or disorderly conduct does not make it penal to be guilty of drunkenness or disorderly conduct. I propose, in Committee, to make an Amendment to that effect. The House will see that I have endeavoured to make the penalties as effective as possible, but I shall propose, in Committee, to introduce a form of penalty which does not appear in the Bill as it now stands—namely, the disqualification of houses under certain circumstances as well as the disqualification of persons. This provision may undoubtedly be attended with a good deal of difficulty, as a landlord may sometimes be unfortunate in a bad tenant who has misconducted himself, and may wish to displace him by a good tenant carrying on the same trade in the same place; but, on the other hand, there has been so much evil attending the substitution of men of straw for men who have been disqualified on conviction that, upon the whole, I think it better to give the magistrates power to disqualify houses as well as persons. We have also provided that the penalties shall be absolute, without appeal, except upon the third conviction. I am persuaded that, if the penalties err, they do not err on the side of lenity. They may be thought too stringent in some cases, but that is a matter for consideration in Committee. I have now explained the general scope and effect of our Bill, and the principal provisions which it contains. As I said at the commencement, so I say at the close—I do not propose this Bill with the intention of making it the precursor of an attack upon the privileges, if they be privileges, now enjoyed by licensed victuallers or by beer-houses. That question stands upon distinct and independent grounds, and, no doubt, will some day or other call for the attention of the House. The present Bill I recommend as a Bill which will have a decided tendency to the promotion of habits of sobriety among the people, and which will have that effect both by the establishment of a far better system of control than any which now exists, and especially by offering the people the means of reasonable access to the refreshing influences of liquor in conjunction with the meals they are required to take. It is, therefore, not only a wise and judicious fiscal measure, but a measure well calculated to encourage abits of no common im-

to all their social and id Question proposed,

s now read a second

ed the Adjournment of

id Question proposed,
e now adjourned."

supported the Motion the ground that the
is imposition of certain yet received the sanc-

If the House should o those taxes, it would

Chancellor of the Exe a very different Bill had just submitted to the best way would be rat and the Bill after-important financial quesed to the House than k upon the keepers of lass. He trusted the the debate to be ad-
ordance with the usual
n had been passed in

LOR OF THE EXCHE-
ld agree with the hon.
ion if he could agree there could not be a n to suppose that this

The licences were the great social ob-
sure had in view with of wine; and it would
to a tax of this kind had an opportunity of
of granting the wine
ese circumstances, he
the adjournment.

hought that when the d a Bill of this kind w system of taxation me cause for it. The chequer said that this o promote the public mfort; but he (Mr.
hat the public them-
judges upon that subpwards of 1,100 peti-
is measure, and there etition in its favour.
d the locus standi of Exchequer that this e the public conveni-
He believed that this ired, and that ample

of the Exchequer

channels at present existed for the intoxicating liquors. They all kn in the kind of houses now propos licensed a vast quantity of illicit were sold; and those channels wou largely by this Bill. He believed the Bill was an injustice to existing i

Mr. DIGBY SEYMOUR said, in its terms a money Bill, for it to inflict a tax on refreshment hou ther wine was sold or not; and he that the objection taken by the ho ber for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. was perfectly tenable.

Mr. NEWDEGATE observed thought the objection taken was one; but whilst he was of opinion Government had been guilty of i mality, the real fact was that t abandoned a certain portion of and they wished to recoup them a new tax. The inducement to was not really that these wines sho into general use, for the reduction duty would effect what was requi Government wanted revenue, that real point, and all the restrict other things in the Bill were only to sweeten the new tax.

Mr. HADFIELD said, he thou the measure was one which requ most serious consideration. If th in the sale of beer were to be thro let that be argued; but he belie the feeling of the country was th way. He himself had presented a from his constituents, who had as in public meeting, with the Vicar field in the chair, to protest ag He thought that the Bill would the control of the magistrates over of liquor, and would prove as pern the Bill which permitted the estab of beershops. At any rate the was too important to be discussed a midnight.

Mr. EDWIN JAMES said, he opinion that no one could read without coming to the conclusion was a money Bill, though introduce the disguise of a measure for the pr of social benefit. The words of were that for making additions to t lic revenue "the following duties be charged." It seemed to him t hon. Member for the Tower Hamle Ayrton) was right in his facts, a the Chancellor of the Exchequer according to his own proposition with him in his conclusion.

tutional. He knew no case of a morning sitting being required before Easter. As far as he could calculate, there was ample time, without sitting on Thursday morning, for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to carry before Easter all the real and pressing business of the country; but if the Government chose to bring in measures in which he believed neither the House nor the country were at all interested, it was naturally a matter of grave consideration whether the business of all the Committees should be suspended, in order that the attention of the House might be given to a question of that kind. No doubt they could do their business as Committee men and all the other business, without being deprived of the Easter holidays. The truth was, there was other business before the House—nobody cared to inquire why it was introduced, or wanted to know what would become of it—and which interested the feelings of only one or two individuals; and this impeded and embarrassed the real business of the country; and now the House was called on to suspend the valuable labours of all the Committees in order that this caprice of legislation might have another opportunity of being held up to the scorn and derision of the country. The farce, he thought, had already been carried to too great a length. He was not himself of opinion that the Bill before them was a Money Bill, and he wished to give the Chancellor of the Exchequer every support in carrying the measure, but he could not agree that they should suspend all the valuable labours of their Committees in order to meet on Thursday morning.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he would remind the House that Her Majesty's Government were asked at the beginning of the Session when they would introduce their Reform Bill, and were warned that delay would be productive of embarrassment. Instead of having a great constitutional measure laid in time on the table of the House, they had been engaged for night after night in discussing the duty on corks squared for rounding, and other such like matters. This had embarrassed the business of the House, and he did not think it fair that hon. Members should now be seriously inconvenienced because the Government had delayed to introduce this great constitutional measure.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT observed, that the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire did not state what measure it was which he considered of such slight import-h he and the country regardntire scorn and derision that ow accede to the proposal for

 ing. The House would re-er, that there was a measure t year by the late Govern-reference to that despised epresentation of the people ;
 on. Gentleman must rememld the measure of such im-he not only demanded its t put hon. Members to the
 of a general election on the hoped that the House of ld have the decency to show look on the question of the of the people as trifling, erly contemptible, but assent ecessary for the conduct of orning sitting on Thursday.
 N MANNERS said, the ntleman had overlooked the measure of the late Govern-t he referred was a Bill for n of Parliament ; but, lookin which the Reform Bill of iverment had been intro-w it had been deferred night the Government themselves, easonable assumption to sup-her the Government nor the d it as important, or thought o read it a second time be-He deemed the proposal to g sitting to consider the im-ating to refreshment houses ces as most astounding. The
 ;, it was true, had treated it ming indifference with which t questions ; but it was a pro-unusual, and would be most the members of Committees.
 IMONT remarked that the mber for Buckinghamshire ntempt, not of the represeneople, but of the Bill introiverment. He had voted the Reform Bill of the late out he could not help think-present Reform Bill was not ld be forced on to a second Easter. He objected to ursday morning in order to orm Bill to be afterwards on.

GE GREY said, he would ble Lord (Lord J. Manners) rm Bill of last year, which at one, had been rejected jority of the House of Comby Herbert

mo int
 not ten wa
 by
]
 Ge up ver pre he
 and
 the an ma
 too
 the
 the sur
 to ligi
 so Re
 the wo
 the
 be Bil
 hor tha
 the Th lity
 to Ge
 wa
 of
 reg pos hac sur nes
 the cer
 the hes
 the
 the con pre
 way in usu me ent led hea
 J Go

portant, and Reform and the people were to be put aside. The hon. Member said that this was not the time to go into the merits or demerits of the Government Reform Bill. He could not say much more in its favour than it was a step—a hesitating and feeble one—in the right direction; but, anyhow, it ought to be discussed, not shelved, and he, for one, would, at any sacrifice of time or personal inconvenience, devote morning and evening to the consideration of a question which was all-important. If the Government had the moral courage to divide upon this question, he should go in the lobby with them cheerfully.

MR. SCLATER-BOOOTH likewise expressed a hope that the Government would not persist in forcing a morning sitting on Thursday on the House.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he also protested against a morning sitting on Thursday, which would interfere with many important Committees.

MR. W. E. DUNCOMBE said, that the question of the Treaty took up more time than an ordinary Budget, and after all it was only a scheme for robbing Peter to pay Paul. He objected to the proposed morning sitting, as, considering the Money Bills which must be passed before Easter, it was impossible even with that assistance to discuss so important a measure as that of Parliamentary Reform.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he would accede to what appeared the general feeling of the House against the morning sitting on Thursday. This Bill would, therefore, be proceeded with on Monday. It might become necessary in consequence to sit on Wednesday, or even on the Thursday before Good Friday, but probably the House would not object, under the circumstances, to this arrangement.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

House adjourned at One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, March 27, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—2^a Consolidated Fund (£850,000).
3^a Mutiny; Marine Mutiny.

SPAIN AND MOROCCO—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he wished to put a Question to the Govern-the existing relations h Government and the occo. He understood high had appeared in hat conditions of peace

When, a short time a noble Friend (Lord
tion upon the subject
told that overtures of le by the Spanish Gonditions were under-nity for the expenses oman Catholic bishop reside in the interior, stipulations in favour
ain, and a cession of ver and above what
by the Spanish arms,
rt of the coast of the Canary Islands. He w whether Her Ma-
were yet in possession mation with regard to een agreed to between whether those terms
he same as had been O'Donnell; or whether ny abatement. On a n the matter was dis-ess for the production
use the state of things ave rendered it inconntal to the public ser-d them; but he hoped e now in a position to portion of the corre-
ght be impossible for hole upon the table;
n their power to com-
f it which would show position in which the
the attitude of the
engaged in the war, racter of the claims ade by the Spanish
e concessions promised rish Government. The rrespondence was not he interests of Great qually so for the Go-

Already some of the published which had Moorish and Spanish respect to the origin was free to say that if ed the true version of represented the whole Government, it cer-
to be consistent with and justice for which he was always vernment credit.

spatches from th
English Consul was this very re Moroccan Minis
people and Gove
ment suffering deference to th
the English Gov conveyed throug them. Now, he
of the dignity an it would be or should be inform and desires whic ment had thus Government. I doubt that they theless it was i should learn wh
could not altoge which subsisted countries. He c bombardment of fleet. He could which had, as it lated in North French co-oper
tions in that qu
lastly, he could collection of the
the redistributio 1860, which was
two years ago,
other territorial
that Morocco sho
All these consid
ter of deep im
should have am subject. He be of this country v
ing commerce, s course of things further develop if Spain succee
of the northern tent of territory were ceded to Sp
ther acquisitions
from that mome
for evil, the en
cease to exist
and at once pas
influence of an our own interes
cially in referenc
too apparent to one moment. H our supplies for

from mand, was a course pregnant with evil, and which must lead to complications dangerous to the security of commercial enterprise, and to the authority of the Crown itself; while to disturb the system of private credit by the establishment of State Banks with the trumpety object of saving a small sum annually, was to sacrifice the greater object to the less. It was by the due use of credit, that the real development of commercial transactions was promoted; and nothing had a greater influence upon a sound system of trade than a sound system of banking. The noble Lord concluded by moving for Copies of all Correspondence between the Secretary of State for India and the Government of India, touching the Establishment of Government Banks; and for a List of all the Banks now existing in India.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he had just laid upon the table the Correspondence referred to by his noble Friend. His noble Friend said, he had not wished to enter into the question; but he had, nevertheless, indicated a very distinct opinion as to the issue of a paper currency. He would not attempt to anticipate a discussion until their Lordships were in possession of all the documents. The question was of great importance; it was surrounded with difficulty—and whatever course was taken, it would be necessary for Parliament and the Legislature of India to take sufficient precaution against the possibility of abuse. He was sorry that neither Lord Grey nor Lord Overstone was in the House; for both those noble Lords in 1857 laid down doctrines upon the subject of banking, the very converse of those which his noble Friend had to-night enunciated. Both those noble Lords distinctly held and laid down that it was the especial duty of Government to issue paper-money, and that that great power should be withdrawn from the hands of all private corporations. Without entering into the dark and almost inscrutable subject of Currency, he believed it was as much the duty of Government to undertake the issue of paper-money, as it was to regulate the coinage. For many years high authorities had recommended that a paper-issue for the Indian Empire should be adopted; and under sufficient restraints, and with proper securities, he was of opinion that the measure proposed by the Indian Government would confer a great benefit upon that country, and would effect a considerable saving in same time he was by rstood as advocating,

r the home countries,
ie power of issuing sent exercised with corporations.

ENBOROUGH, with-russ the question till ers which had been inion, from the na-
actions, that no very er-money would pro-

If the Government
ents in that manner
n those who might elves of the facilities afforded, very serious
e expected to ensue.
e whether the noble ved, in any official of Mr. Wilson, the for India, on which anxious to offer some

GYLL replied, that s copy of the speech d not yet had an oping his right hon.
for India.

urned at a quarter before o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

COMMONS,

rch 27, 1860.

—1^o Poor Law (Medical Scotland); Benefit Sont; Income Tax.

OF TROOPS.

MON.

said, he would beg Gentleman the Secre-
r how it happened
Dragoons were sent tead of overland, as the circumstances
alaya was detained
the two Armstrong tillery barracked on Himalaya, having
l owing to the ex-4th Light Dragoons,
y; and what is the xpense to which the

ryll

country will arrangement

Mr. SID-to the quest have to sta-ber last a Lord Elph Himalaya, 1
of artillery should bring goons, whic
which were We accepte following d
of it, sendi Tricate and is impossible to those tele
they were n
and it is v
their fate, t where in t
Red Sea, w of messages mained at A which, mai the Officer steamer wa
been sent broken dow Bombay and sent on. T entirely emj Malta, and infantry, w to relieve a
come home.
expense wh delay at Ale Queen's shij
no question say that I could have telegrams fr lines The
the same t
later, and, c ceived, Lord 14th Light passage, ins
had original

ANNEX

NOTICE

Mr. BAI-rose to ask water (Mr.
proposes to

specting the annexation of Savoy and Nice?

Mr. KINGLAKE: Sir, the declaration of the present views and future policy of the Cabinet which the House heard last night with so much satisfaction from the noble Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has superseded the Motion of which I gave notice on the 6th of March. I shall not therefore deem it my duty to press for the interposition of Parliament so long as I continue to believe that Her Majesty's Ministers are faithfully labouring to carry out the policy announced last night—a policy which I believe to be in harmony with the opinion of Parliament and with the feelings of the country at large.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON LUNACY LAWS. QUESTION.

Mr. TORRENS said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when it is intended to nominate the Select Committee on the Lunacy Laws, sanctioned by the House on the 23rd day of February last, more than a month ago; and whether it is intended, without further delay, to submit Reports on the Evidence already given on the Lunacy Laws before Select Committees during the two previous Sessions, with the view to legislate for the amelioration of the condition and the treatment of patients confined in Insane Asylums?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, in the absence of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, he could state that the Committee upon the Lunacy Laws was reappointed this Session upon the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole). It had taken a great deal of evidence, and his right hon. Friend the Chairman had undertaken to submit to it Resolutions which would probably be the foundation of a Report. If the hon. Gentleman would communicate privately with his right hon. Friend, he would most probably give him further information.

FORTIFICATIONS OF THE COUNTRY. QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of the Government to propose any Vote in the present year for raising by loan or otherwise any sum for fortifications beyond the sums proposed in the Army Estimates now on the Table?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON:—Sir, the House is aware that a Commission of Military Officers was appointed to consider what addition to the defences was necessary to the dockyards and for certain other purposes. The Report of that Commission is still under the consideration of the military authorities, and has not yet in a final state been submitted to Her Majesty's Government. It is needless for me to observe that there are two considerations connected with any arrangements on the subject. The one is, what amount of defensive works would be desirable, supposing the Government have an unlimited command of men to man them; and the other consideration is, what amount of defensive works would be absolutely necessary without taking a larger amount of forces than would leave a sufficient army for operations in the field independently of garrisons. These are questions still under consideration. As soon as the Report of the Commissioners shall be laid before the Government in a final shape it will be their duty to take it into consideration, and to determine what course it would be proper to adopt thereon. Whenever that is done it will be my duty to lay the Report before Parliament, and to inform the House what course Her Majesty's Government may recommend to Parliament to pursue in regard to the matters to which the Report relates.

ITALY—THE PAPAL STATES.

NOTE OF THE CARDINAL SECRETARY OF STATE. QUESTION.

Mr. BOWYER said, that seeing the noble Viscount at the head of the Government in his place, he would beg to ask him a Question which he had intended putting to the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, although he had not given any notice of it. He wished to know whether Lord Cowley has forwarded to Her Majesty's Government a Copy of a very important Note sent by the Cardinal Secretary of State in Rome to the Papal Nuncio in Paris, and if so, whether the Government will lay a Copy of it upon the Table of the House?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that as he had received no notice of the Question, he was not then in a position to answer it.

Mr. BOWYER said, he would repeat the Question on Thursday next.

HIC CON-
TION.

RNON: Sir,
call the attachment of the contracts Commissioner, and to Now, Sir, I intend to read
and bear participate in the Committee

an agreement giving another contract until the 28th have failed to
to justify this been conceded
admission of the views of the appears to your inquiry into the
the extension

committee that contractors, on the
the time when under consideration his support,
r, to the hon.
is of the Admiralty for that a contract was a intention, if ent candidates
ask it right to contract had been the Treasury of the conversation to your admiralty nor the
in the decision
renewal of the motive. Your conduct of Mr.
the First Lord censure; but to show that is cognizant of Murray, Mr.
. While most engagements engaged Government
submit for the
Mr. Churchill's expedients,
of the representative, has not of Commons,
dignity, to vote in the agreement the 20th of 70."

report which the obligation

tions enter behalf of t dress myself unjust, stri-
ctual faith,
dangerous in reference
ing Resolut House:—

"That the report and the Committee is is of opinion 26th day of sioners for I Admiral of the
and Ireland
ought to be fi
I beg to ass
I was asso
it is out of move this interest of
and I trust me from a thus putting opinions in contracts w other Meml
are, no do this House with privat
but I believ more exclu with Gover twenty-five the Corps an atmosph therefore, I the subject House. I contractors are able body o
I know how ment, and dealt with party, as a acting from bond; but my experien
of a century
stance in w
sent was n grounds ha rectly or in penalties set in the deed
stop to poin though for ance of pub
the public a

acter.
My
l they
of the e ele-
tract,
Com-scind.
assing
con-
from was to n the aving bind
o the sacri-
g the con-mis-parts which objec-
4 the stend
s and found t was ystem
r and ard's cord-
com-
I tell
ilway ecute
which m for hererence urchury to nt on eting rs:—
a Ad-
The 00 per enders
's was ractor
tract, 35,000 \n thus hon.
rne),
form
conner it
r the

hon. Gentleman was Secretary to the Admiralty when the contract was taken in 1854, and the First Lord was the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle. In 1855 the first extension was granted to Mr. Churchward. The hon. Member for Liskeard was still Secretary at that time. Now, as the hustings speech to which I alluded was delivered in 1857, it is fair to conclude that the hon. Gentleman's laudatory remarks applied to the extension of 1855, as well as to the contract of 1854. It may not be improper here to mention that in 1857, when the hon. Member for Liskeard was going to contest Dover, he with great frankness said to Mr. Churchward, that as Mr. Churchward was a Conservative he supposed he would oppose him. Mr. Churchward, with equal frankness, replied, that he should not think of opposing the Secretary to the Admiralty. Now, Sir, I have given great attention to the circumstances under which the first extension of 1855 was granted, and I cannot but think that the extension was granted by the Admiralty in the interest of the public and for the public advantage, and I think the arrangement reflects the greatest credit upon the Admiralty of the day, of which the right hon. Baronet the Member for Halifax (Sir C. Wood) was First Lord, and the Member for Liskeard still the Secretary. Then came the second extension recommended by the Admiralty of which the right hon. Member for Droitwich was First Lord. This extension was made in February, 1859, to which date I request particular attention. Now, Sir, I maintain, and I challenge contradiction, that the same reasons which operated in 1855, and which caused the first extension, operated in still greater force in 1859. This is the arrangement which the Committee recommends the House to repudiate, not on the ground of fraud, not on the ground of non-performance, nor even on the untenable ground of its being a disadvantageous bargain for the public. Then let us see on what pretence Parliament is advised to commit an act of injustice by breaking public faith with a Government contractor. It appears that after the decision and recommendation of the Admiralty in favour of the extension of the contract in 1854, and pending its ratification by the Treasury some six weeks afterwards, a dissolution of Parliament took place, and a general election followed. The Hon. Captain Carnegie, of the Royal Navy, had at that time been

{ COMMONS }

ts," as he within the tion that House at ; Gentle-test Do-say, the
was hesi-
t upon I the Com-Church-

before, in rivate se-
that then d him his offer with is assist-
f his con-
clear and says that place the
to; while ard, also distinctly
; contract

Here is ; memory
their de-
; allowed reponder-
o. Now, ler whose
on—the Church-
all quoe-
tract had admiralty smory of hall pre-bout the ission to Chairman
, and his n of my

Chairman
, and his n of my
's evidence conversa-
the Dover
tr. Church-two candi-
; renewed ?
use of any urchward's ag, was it
, f—Not at rrived at evidence
; I am at
; Captain

But, was the only clined t proves t then Men speech on tain Carr because,
made, hi
ful. Bel would a read a r
question

— " 4799.
— He obj believes thi unless he

Carnegie vote and was only Carnegie
miralty,
so he inf
told that sion had from the conversa
observe l

" 3855. the Admir that depar removed ?

And his

" In a
moved—a

Then, I
Why dic become ;
fact, inst
cret lock appears ;
one the having a Admiral
into the choose t not inqu
the corre
From his question holed we negie wo ward wo corrupt relieved-
tified, ;
first if h

" True c He's as

proved of.' Do you think that that reason squares with the one given in the first part of your speech which goes to say that he had received information obtained from a confidential agent that he would have no success?

The noble Lord astonished me by replying:—

"I assure you that when I had the honour of a seat in the House of Commons, which I had for thirty years, I was not so very precise in the speeches which I made as to whether one part of a speech would square with another."

But there was another reason which came to the surface during my examination of Captain Carnegie, and not one only, but two. Will the House permit me to read questions 3692 to 3705, both inclusive?—

3692. Am I right in supposing that you wish the Committee to understand that the Government wished you to stand for Dover, but that you were restrained from so doing by scruples with respect to the Churchward contract?

To which the reply was—

"Yes: I think you are mainly right.

"3693. Did you decline going to Dover solely and entirely because you thought you would be supported by Mr. Churchward, such support being in your estimation venal, as connected with this contract?—No, not entirely.

"3694. Had you any other reasons for not going to Dover?—I considered that I did not like to have a place pressed upon me.

"3695. Had you any other reasons besides that for not going to Dover?—Yes; I was in hopes of succeeding to obtain a seat in Parliament for another place."

The House will observe the answer to the next two questions, I being still the examiner.

"3704. Sir Benjamin Hall in the same speech gives a telegraphic message from you to this effect—'I tendered my resignation solely in consequence of a difference of opinion as to the selection of the place which I could hope to represent.' Did you send a message to that effect to Sir Benjamin Hall?—I did.

"3705. Can you say what was the difference of opinion as to the selection of the place which you could hope to represent? Did it imply a chance of success, or did it imply an objection to the means by which success was to be obtained?"

Now mark the answer:—

"I wished to select my own place, and I wished to select the place which seemed to me most likely to return me, and (mark this) most likely to keep me as its Member."

In other words Captain Carnegie wished to invest his money where it would ensure a more profitable return, and who can blame the gallant Captain for that? Thus, then, there being four reasons for not going to Dover, it is clear that the fear of the taint of corruption was only 25 per cent of the real reason, and that a fraction of a one-fourth would have entirely vanished if he had known, as he might have known, and was bound to know, that the question of Mr. Churchward's contract had passed beyond the Admiralty some weeks before there was any idea of Captain Carnegie's going to Dover. Thus the charge against the late administration entirely broke down, and therefore that against Churchward, being dependent upon it, should also have dropped through. But that would have been to admit that the Committee had been performing with great tragic importance the "Comedy of Errors." Parliamentary Committees cannot be expected to sit from the 14th June to the 11th of August for nothing, in a room bounded on the one side by the ill-smelling Thames, and on the other by a lobby redolent of the compound of villanous smells proceeding from the crowd of witnesses in attendance for nothing. Victimized ourselves, we sought to make other victims. The Secretary to the First Lord stood ready to our hands. How that Gentleman, Mr. Murray, got dragged into it is difficult to say. No one for one moment denies that he had a perfect right to converse with a Lord of the Admiralty who was bound to find a seat about what borough he should stand for. Mr. Murray's ideas, however, were in favour of Devonport, not of Dover. No one for a moment denies that he had a perfect right to converse with Mr. Churchward, a Government contractor at Dover, as to the chances of success if Captain Carnegie went to Dover. Yet, with this common-sense view of the ordinary practice, we are told that Mr. Murray is open to grave censure, because, so far as I can understand, he permitted Mr. Churchward to be more about the Admiralty than suits the fastidious tastes of some gentlemen. But surely Mr. Churchward, as long as he was a Government contractor, had a perfect right of free access to the department under which he served. I have found in my small experience contractors in daily, almost hourly, communication with their department, and always to the manifest advantage of the public. But was this a privilege enjoyed by Mr. Churchward only in the time of Mr. Murray? Why, when Mr. Churchward was unconnected with the Admiralty and was on the staff of a Conservative newspaper, he seemed to have been a sort of familiar spirit at the Admiralty, the dame damnée of the Board. He then was sent for, fêted and caressed by Admiralty dig-an extension in what Church corrupt might fit to be rather than according to should be twice at Com- is far as object, which was taken the Ad- norated. Church- tend, in e Elec- st to be Church- consider not you Church- tractor, support option? pported nal Os- differed in 1859 private ent to- Am I ot cor- 1859? is any hatham as met he told ght to whose l them and not not a pecu- ard ar- n and gentle- corrupt- ie wall t their ecting at the overn- tako a secre- e with West- would be pleased with a Report which, while it exonerated the Government, made a scape-goat of Mr. Murray. I submit that what the Gentlemen referred to at Chatham had done towards themselves is, exactly what Mr. Churchward has done for himself, he has voted and acted according to his own interests, hanging up his political views until fairer weather came. If he is to be morally gibbeted for so doing, and if a law is to be passed that shall circumflex all political renegades in its categories, these executions will be rife in "Merrie England," and Mr. Churchward may sing, with Captain Macheath,

"If laws are made for every degree,
To curb vice in others, as well as in me,
I wonder we've not better company Under Tyburn tree."

I hold that a contractor, like every other freeman, has a right to wear his politics as loosely as he pleases. If Parliament say no to that, then pass a law depriving Government contractors of their franchise for the time being; introduce such a clause in your Reform Bill, and hear what the public will say to it. But I urge the House not to take a step, one which will shake to its very foundation the confidence of commercial men in the Government. If you do take such a step as that recommended by the Committee, I ask you what man in his senses will touch a contract involving a preliminary outlay as in this case of thousands, when he knows that the House can at any time break his contract at the breath of a Minister or at the instigation of a political party. Once establish the precedent that the good faith of Government in regard to contracts may be broken, and that they may do without dishonour what a private individual dared not think of without disgrace, and our national prestige is gone, our national honesty will be little better than a delusion, our national compacts nothing but a snare. One word more and I have done. I appeal to the present law advisers of the Crown, and those opposite them who have held the same exalted position, and I ask them if they would dare, for their reputation sake, advise such a course between man and man as that which the Parliament of this mighty empire is now urged to pursue towards an individual who lies helpless at your mercy. I appeal to the other learned Gentlemen, Members of this House, who adorn alike the senate and the bar, and I ask them, will they stand by, with folded hands, to see this great injustract, he had actually promised to perform. In 1857, therefore, he remained quiet, but in 1859 he came again, applying for payment for the very same things, with one exception, and he got a promise of remuneration for the very same things which he had been refused in 1857. He did not apply for an extension of his contract either in 1857 or in 1859, but it ended with their giving him that which he had not originally applied for, besides the whole of the sum that he had asked; he got the extension of the contract into the bargain. As the thing went on, Mr. Churchward being a very shrewd man, and probably seeing that those with whom he had to deal were not well acquainted with the original transaction, took the opportunity to insist on the prolongation of his contract; but that was more than he at first asked. Now, he (Sir Francis Baring) was not there to contend that in no case ought there to be a prolongation of a contract; but he did say that before such prolongation was granted a careful inquiry should be made into all the attendant circumstances. Those who granted it, however, in this case were so little acquainted with the circumstances, that it was almost amusing. For instance, by the original contract Mr. Churchward was bound to keep six steamers for the English service; and he subsequently made a contract with the French Government to keep three steamers; but what was the way in which he performed his two contracts? One might have supposed that six and three would make nine, but it was not so in Mr. Churchward's arithmetic. He had only six ships, but he had a double set of captains, and a double set of colours; and when a steam-boat which had carried the English colour from Dover to Calais, as an English steam-boat arrived at Calais; down came the English flag, and up went the tricolor, another captain came on board, and it became a French steam-boat. He was not complaining of Mr. Churchward for doing this; but when a contract was to be renewed or prolonged, it ought to be considered that what might be a proper payment for six steam-boats should be refused, when only three, instead of six, were provided. Another point, which disclosed what really was not very creditable conduct, was this: The contract which Mr. Churchward entered into with the French Government contained a clause that, in case of maritime war, Mr.

Churchward should be bound to give two of his steamboats for the French service. Everybody must know with whom that maritime war, if it ever took place, was likely to be; and the hon. Gentleman who was Secretary to the Admiralty at the time when Mr. Churchward's contract was made, had himself declared that if he had known of that clause in the French contract he would certainly not have approved it. Mr. Churchward had been called upon for an explanation, and had said, so far as he could be understood, which was not always quite easy, that it was quite true that there was that clause; but that he had never intended to perform it. He (Sir F. Baring) was not very well satisfied with his getting out of the difficulty in that way. The matter was either not very creditable to Mr. Churchward's patriotism, or else it did not say much for his straightforward dealing. But the thing to be remembered was this indisputable fact that the Admiralty was paying for the service of six steamboats, two of which Mr. Churchward was under engagement to furnish to the French Government in the event of a maritime war. Under these circumstances there might well be some question of the expediency of the contract which the gallant Officer had so much panegyrised. The Committee thought it was a contract which had not been entered into with proper consideration. He ought however to say, in justice to the Secretary of the Treasury and the Lord of the Admiralty at the time the contract was entered into, that many of the papers connected with it, and the previous correspondence, had not been brought before them at that time, and that the particular clause by which those vessels were to be supplied to the French Government for war purposes was not known until it came out before the Committee. He (Sir F. Baring) now came to a very disagreeable part of the affair. The Committee had before them some uncomfortable facts. They had the declaration of a gallant Officer, in which he distinctly stated one thing, and on the other hand they had the declaration of two gentlemen, Mr. Murray and Mr. Churchward, who directly contradicted him. In such cases no doubt it was painful to give a judgment, and not long ago, a case had occurred in that House, which showed how men of the highest character might differ in their memory of particular things. He wished to throw no imputation on any one, but he thought it difficult even for those who read the evidence carefully not to come to the same decision as the Committee who heard the evidence and saw the witnesses. There was no doubt that a conversation took place in the manner stated by Captain Carnegie; the question was as to the nature of that conversation: the Committee undoubtedly came to a decision to the effect that they relied on the memory of Captain Carnegie, and the House would believe that they did not come to that decision without giving the subject their most anxious consideration. The hon. and gallant Officer had thrown out a challenge, and had spoken of Mr. Churchward's character. He (Sir F. Baring) was not there to go into any private attacks on Mr. Churchward's character. Mr. Churchward, at the time he (Sir F. Baring) was at the Admiralty, was connected with one of the leading journals of that time, and he certainly had access to the Admiralty, though he was not in the habit of coming to him (Sir F. Baring) and he had to remonstrate more than once upon the subject of his too constant access. It was not very easy for the Government to carry on the public business, especially when Parliament was not sitting, without some occasional communication with gentlemen of the press. When, for instance, the great Jupiter of the press was thundering at the Admiralty, backed by the gallant Admiral who sat below him, the House would agree with him that it was not always easy for a public department to avoid communications of that kind, especially in the Parliamentary recess. Mr. Churchward was a very intelligent man, and he (Sir F. Baring) was bound to say that his opinions were generally with the Admiralty of the day. He represented the Admiralty of the day, and somehow or other got a good deal of information from the department. But he was no contractor when he (Sir F. Baring) was at the Admiralty. The House might form their opinions as they pleased as to gentlemen connected with the press having access to a public office or department, but he (Sir F. Baring) thought there was a great distinction between the representatives of the press seeking for early information as to public events, and men, under cover of their connections with a public newspaper, constantly visiting the Government offices for the purpose of obtaining a particular contract. The hon. and gallant Officer claimed to have ter, for sphere could h. gallant habit of stantly what w: gretted facts cor Churchv tend to tion, bu proved and he Commit was not on the ported t election was als had ask twenty-shoed particul influenc evidence as he h of the Church place b Church actual Carnegi When l the wo the con present, Carnegi the cor with so previous Mr. Mu sations mention an offer that if sist in said ths with M strong i He was was not to take ciples t Dover? main r point: commu no one to the not deal such an

Sir Francis Baring

of con-
y well a Com-l thing a Lord business id been l taken Ve are l's mat-Dovor evident up his didate,
d, then There might d thus:
ng this ey bea Par-
id that,
bribe,
hrough
istance.
House
ness, a nt Gen-
contract.
impor-
public
other it of that efuse a Govern-ad pro-
o know is Esti-vassing Govern-
of ex-it was y had a s called.
d upon 3,000 a rnment
high rey might be told Vote for uation
rrange-trine of an ex-
ond the : authority in such matters. He had never heard this doctrine so laid down, and the House had never acted upon such a doctrine. A few years ago there was a contract entered into by our Minister at Paris for the purchase of a certain chapel there; that contract was entered into, and part of the purchase money was paid on account of the contract. What happened then? Did the House listen to the statement of the Government of that day? No, the House threw out the Vote, and declined to complete the contract. On that occasion the House went to a division, and among those who were concerned in the commission of that act of bad faith were Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Henley, Sir James Graham, Sir William Jolliffe, Sir John Pakington, Mr. Seymour FitzGerald, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Lord John Manners. These were all laymen; among the lawyers there were the present Judge Advocate, Mr. Serjeant Kinglake, Mr. R. Malins—in whose way he was sorry to interpose any difficulty, but he had probably got ready a speech on the other side for this debate—and last of all a Gentleman who had held a high official position, the late Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Whiteside. The case of the Paris chapel was in modern times:—he could quote as early and important precedents in which the House had refused to complete a contract made by the Crown. In the case of the Peace of Utrecht there were two treaties—one a political, and the other a commercial one. In the latter of these the Sovereign had distinctly engaged to reduce certain duties;—the engagements of the treaty were not as in modern times conditional on the assent of Parliament, but positive; but notwithstanding that, when the Bill for their reduction came before Parliament it was rejected by the House of Commons. After these examples, was he to be told that the engagement entered into by the Lords of the Admiralty with Mr. Churchward was of so sacred a character that when the Speaker left the chair, and the Chairman of Ways and Means put the question as to the grant of money for its fulfilment, hon. Members would be bound to say "Yes;" that they had no power to say "No;" and that therefore their voting upon it at all would be a mere farce? But had they really entered into an engagement? The Admiralty engaged to pay out of money to be voted by Parliament, and it was therefore clear that there would be no engagement except subject to the assent of Parliament.

t bid-
of the case;
ation
s the l, the ow it made make e Go-awer
e Sed the aing

ctrine
, that rgain,
rhaps,
act as not be argain
m the fraud d been btainvern-ur in

as,— orthlegal oubt,
such h he nely, amon erely
one,
tage-
e for
at if,
t the —en-
e the
to be Goig at that they 1 the ing a ourse
He
1 the ment
ained
ry to rby's
the
; but

as had been stated by the right hon. Baronet (Sir F. Baring), very few hon. Members had probably taken the pains to peruse the whole of the great blue-book which he now held in his hand; yet, without they did so, they would have no correct means of arriving at that which was at the bottom of the whole case—namely, whether or not there was good reason for the course taken by the late Government. In the first place the extension of the contract had been asked for on a ground which he did not think a good one, and on which he could not recommend the extension—on the ground, namely, that Mr. Churchward had sustained serious losses in carrying out his contract. That ground, nevertheless had been held to be a good one before the time of the transaction which was under the consideration of the House. It had been recognised by the Admiralty, and the contract had been extended on it in 1855. However, he (Sir S. Northcote) had refused to recognize it by recommending an extension on it. But he had recommended the extension on another ground.
Mr. Churchward had been anxious to improve the service. His contract had still a certain time to run, but he was unable to carry on the service as effectually as he wished to do without undertaking a very considerable expenditure for the construction of better packet-boats. It would have been unreasonable to expect Mr. Church-ward to undertake that expenditure without a renewal of his contract. It was, therefore, for the public interest that the contract should be extended. That was the ground which he (Sir S. Northcote) took at the time, and in doing so he ventured to think he acted in conformity with precedents set over and over again by successive Governments. There was one very remarkable case in which a contract had been renewed on that ground, though it did not in financial respects present anything like so favourable an aspect as the Dover contract. He referred to the contract of the Royal Mail Company for conveying the mails to the West India Islands.
The subsidy in that case was £270,000; in the present case it was only £15,000 or £16,000. The service in that case was very badly done, and great complaints were made, while in the present case it was very well done. That contract involved a dead loss of £215,000 a year, for the Post-office revenue from letters was very small; while in the present case the contract of Mr. Churchward, instead of hat which riend, and en by the nce of the t to show

ress direc-
Sir Charles
rality were a contract.
d (Mr. B.
the Admi-
which preconformity
s evidence
a. Member nce of the ok into it.
f my duty
h it." In on said he e any offi-
contract.
?] It was ection had
ood. In ion before vas asked rd that he fficial cog-
His reply
.. I pre-a." (Mr.
ill events,
l, and had
: accession
nment to was any which told as against t contract, oly this—
t with the s binding rench Go-
till 1870.
r, had no
, nor over ngs in ren to per-ne on the rench ac-
that cor-
had been ies of the he French rd, in rerovements ween this o sugges-
rovements

had originated with Mr. Churchward. This was freely admitted by Mr. Hill, assistant secretary to the Post Office, who in his reply to questions 4443 and 4453 explained the great importance of having those improvements introduced; that the suggestion had originated with Mr. Churchward, and that he considered him to have very great merit in the matter. On looking to the evidence of Mr. Page, the House would again find testimony as to the importance of those improvements; but it was also stated that if Mr. Churchward as contractor under the French Government had refused to give effect to his suggestions the British Government had no power to compel him to do so, however desirable their adoption might have been. Mr. Churchward had them completely in his power as regarded those improvements. He might have refused to carry them into effect, and had he so refused the result would have been that both countries would have been left without that acceleration in the mails which had been so much desired, and which was actually in operation at the present moment. The mail which used to leave this country for France at one or two o'clock in the afternoon, now left at seven in the morning. Letters posted in Liverpool or other parts of the country, say that (Tuesday) evening, would be delivered in Paris to-morrow (Wednesday) night, instead of, as formerly, Thursday morning, with equal advantages in the return posts. Mr. Churchward also had been able to accelerate the whole of the passage between England and France, the average rate of the sea passage being now fourteen knots an hour, instead of eleven knots, as formerly; and the House would bear in mind that these improvements had not been made in the English service, but in the French, over which Mr. Churchward had control, but over which we had none. But for him this country could not have got the benefit of that improvement; and he could not have effected it if the British Government had not given him an extension of his English contract, so as to make its termination coincident with that of his French contract. And it must also be borne in mind that they had got these great and long-desired improvements without any increase of the subsidy paid to Mr. Churchward. Other parties connected with the arrangement had received an increase of pay—the South Eastern Railway, he believed, had received £6,000 a year more from the English Government,

"Mr. Churchward spoke to me on the subject of the pending election for Dovor, and having volunteered his support, and promised me his assistance in general terms, he made an allusion to his anxiety to obtain the renewal of his contract; and he said that they were anxious to defer signing the renewal of his contract until after the election was over, but he felt that would be too hard upon him."

He had no objection to read the whole of Captain Carnegie's answer:—

"And that he would rather prefer voting for Mr. Bernal Osborne and for myself, inasmuch as he would have a friend in power, whoever was in office. He also added that he thought they wanted him to return two Government Members for Dovor, and if they did so, he should be obliged to comply with it."

He did not say how far the connection of Mr. Churchward with the election was right or proper. He was only concerned with what he did with the contract, and there was not a syllable in this statement of Captain Carnegie to show that Mr. Churchward made his conduct at Dovor dependent on what was done about the contract. Mr. Churchward volunteered his support, and when he heard that the Treasury would not sign until after the election, he remarked that that was rather too hard upon him. If there were any corruption, it was on the part of the Government, and he should never be able to hold up his head if he allowed the matter to stand as it did, that he and the Treasury were acquitted of corrupt and political motives, and the whole blame was thrown on Mr. Churchward. He had said so to the Committee, and he had said so all along, that if they considered he was persuaded to assent to the extension of the contract from any improper motives, he was ready to be censured by those who thought him capable of such conduct. He was ready to deny, as he did then deny most emphatically and to the utmost of his power that he had ever been actuated by any motives of the kind. But he asserted that if any inference was to be drawn from the evidence, it was, not that Mr. Churchward said, "I will do this if you will do that," but that Mr. Churchward said, "I am anxious to do this, but I think it rather hard it should be postponed, if it is to be done, for political purposes." There was in reality no occasion for any such conclusion, because what Mr. Churchward said was strictly and literally the truth,—that there was in his (Sir S. Northcote's) mind—and he expressed it—he did not know whether Mr. Churchward heard it, but it was quite possible he did—that there was in his mind a feeling that it would be better and wiser to defer taking any steps in the extension of the contract until the election was over. Sir William Jolliffe suggested to him that he should defer it until the election was over, and had said that he thought the matter one which ought not to be settled during a general election. But upon consideration he thought it fair and right that a matter which had proceeded so far, which had been put forward in the month of January, when there was no question of a general election, which had been recommended by the Admiralty when there was no question of a general election, which had been approved by the Assistant Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hamilton) and brought under his notice and discussed, should be settled then; and Mr. Churchward justly said, "Why throw the onus on me, when has been kept by official delays it until an election is pending, and why hang it up for a considerable time until this election is over?" The consequence was that the contract was proceeded with. But supposing he (Sir S. Northcote) had said, "I will not do anything," and as soon as the election was over, "Now I approve the contract;" would it not have been said that it was well understood all the time, but deferred to keep out the awkwardness of appearances? On the other hand, supposing he had disapproved, would it not have been said, "You knew you were not going to approve; you wanted to get Mr. Churchward's support; you knew he fully expected he was going to get his contract; you took care not to undeceive him; you let him do everything he could, and then threw him over." He could only take one of two courses. If he did not take the right, he must take the wrong. He did not say that he might not have been unwise in the course which he took, but he still thought that it was the right and straightforward course, and that it would have been cowardly to take any other. The matter having come before him at the time it did, and having been fully considered he thought it fair and right, whether an election was pending or not, that he should decide; but it was quite true that just at the time of this conversation with Captain Carnegie, he had made use of the expression that he did not wish to enter into the question until the election was over, and he thought to be un-putting it as, at least Renewal he circum-uld be no is case the red it per-e competi-five or six was noto-many alone tition that as for the admitted iously dis-est that it o the con-otive, and Committee position in al capital n. Baronet as altered ly on the l acted in their way f acquittal stified and however, less as the difference ronounced of a bribe B for the t was the ed by the e late Go-of corrupt inct asser-committee, ical party, lence that o exercise nment, in wal of this the whole upon the the words to be made by Parlia-of law; it the House doubt the ver to ren-d a dead money for t whether her a suffi- for exercising the power, and whether the fact that Mr. Churchward had used corrupt means did not justify the House of Commons in declining to ratify the contract. That question turned upon the narrowest possible issue—namely, the credit to be given to Captain Carnegie. Some of the Committee thought he was labouring under a misapprehension, and that the whole thing was a mare's nest. Of these the hon. and gallant Mover was one, and they naturally and consistently arrived at the conclusion that Mr. Churchward was treated with great injustice; and he (Mr. Laing) would admit that if he could take the same view of Captain Carnegie's evidence, he should come to the same conclusion in regard to Mr. Churchward. If Captain Carnegie's evidence were not to be believed, the whole case against Mr. Churchward was gone. But it was not a narrow majority who decided in favour of the credibility of that gentleman; it was a majority of eleven to four, and amongst the eleven were several gentlemen whose political bias would have inclined them to think the other way. When a question of this sort was referred to a Select Committee, which had heard witnesses vis à voce, and were not regulated by party views in the conclusions to which they had come, he thought it would be a bad precedent for the House, which did not hear the evidence given, even if the majority of the Committee had been narrower than it really was, to upset the decision of the Committee, and come to a different conclusion on the simple issue of the credibility of the witnesses. As to the credibility of Captain Carnegie's evidence, he thought that if it were examined it would be found that this evidence did not differ from the other evidence, and therefore he differed from the right hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir F. Baring) who put the matter upon the painful issue—whether credit was to be given to Captain Carnegie or to Mr. Murray? Mr. Murray's evidence was simply this—that he did not hear the conversation. But the recollection of Captain Carnegie was most precise and distinct as to what passed between him and Mr. Churchward in regard to the contract. He said the statement of Mr. Churchward had made a great impression on his mind, and he had the most lively recollection of it. He (Mr. Laing) then would ask the House whether, when a gentleman, an officer, and a man of honour gave this distinct answer, and was opposed by a gentleman who said that he did unauthorised Report could be referred to, and the hon. Gentleman was therefore out of order in commenting on the proceedings of the Committee.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member was not regular in referring to the Report before it was laid upon the table.

MR. LAING said, he understood that the Report had been, in fact, upon the table, though it was not yet printed, but as it was objectionable, he had no wish to pursue this subject further, for the matter, after all, must rest upon the Report of the Contract Committee. Placing the matter, therefore, solely upon the evidence from which he had read extracts, he did not wish to weary the House with any more quotations, because, in his judgment, the question was narrowed down to this simple issue, "Do you believe Captain Carnegie's evidence?" If they did not believe it, the whole question was gone; but if they believed it, it was impossible for any man of sense to doubt that Mr. Churchward did attempt to use a political bribe at the Admiralty in order to get a renewal of his contract. They then came to this, was an attempt to exercise political bribery in regard to a matter of contract a sufficient justification, under the circumstances of the Dovor contract, for the House of Commons to take upon itself the moral responsibility of putting an end to the contract by declining to vote the requisite sums? He thought that question turned upon the construction to be put upon the words which were introduced for the first time into the Dovor contract—"out of monies to be provided by Parliament." The introduction of these words was a great novelty in a contract, for they had never been inserted before; and certainly they were not inserted on this occasion without a purpose. He found it stated, upon the highest authority, that they were not inserted as mere unmeaning verbiage, but that they had a distinct meaning in the shape of a warning to the contractor. The hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Lygon), then in an official station at the Admiralty, stated that in the contract certain words had been introduced which would have the effect of rendering the contract subject to the ratification of the House. Indeed, the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire stated that with regard to the contract which appeared to have excited so much alarm in the mind of the noble Lord, it might be satisfactory to him to learn that it would be in the power of the House, when called upon to vote the money proposed to be paid, to reject the contract entirely. As an additional proof that these words were not looked on as a mere matter of course, it was stated before the Committee that one of the oldest steam shipping companies in the country had refused to sign a contract with the Government which contained these unusual words. It was absolutely necessary that some provision should be made with reference to these contracts either by giving the Government power to make the contracts irrespective of the House, or by making the contract subject to the approval of the House. He hoped that this would be adopted in future, and he believed that the insertion of these unusual words had really brought them up to this point. It came to this, that words of this kind being introduced, and Parliament thus having, in addition to its general jurisdiction of voting money, a special jurisdiction given by words which held out to the contractors a warning that such special power existed—the question was, what course should be taken? What were they to do in such a case as this? It was not a case for inflicting a severe and ruinous penalty on the party, because, even if the worst came to the worst, Mr. Churchward had got his contract until 1863.

SIR FITZROY KELLY: They might refuse the money.

MR. LAING: The course proposed to be taken by the Government in reference to this contract was a very clear one. The House refused last Session to vote the money under the contract now in question, and he supposed that the Government could not properly have taken on itself to reverse the decision of the House of Commons.

SIR FITZROY KELLY: Then the whole contract was at an end.

MR. LAING: The Government could not, after the refusal of the House of Commons, pay the money in the face of such decision; for, if they had done so, they would have rendered themselves, no doubt, personally liable. What the Government said to Mr. Churchward was this: "If the renewal of your contract should be set aside by a refusal to vote the money, inasmuch as you would not have abandoned the old contract except on the prospect of getting a renewal, the Government would have no wish to take away that which you held previously, and you may

Churchward first mooted the question of an extension of his contract, which would otherwise have expired in the year 1863. He was admitted to be an intelligent, active, diligent man, and, being anxious to make the postal service between the two countries effective, to do which a greater expenditure on his part would be necessary, he opened a communication with the Government of the day. That communication would have been made equally to the Government of the noble Lord if he had then been in office, and the fact of a Conservative Government being in power had nothing to do with the question. It was on the 6th of January, 1859, that he made a formal application to the Government for a renewal of his contract. His then contract had about four years to run. But he found it necessary to build additional packets for the service, and he naturally said, "A short contract will not pay me." Besides which, the French Government refused to make a contract for less than fifteen years, which would carry him up to 1870. Mr. Churchward had therefore two objects in view. One was to make a contract commensurate with the one he had entered into with France and Belgium, and the other to have such a contract as he commercially would be warranted in entering into. With these two objects in view, on the 6th of January, 1859, he applied for a renewal of his contract. That application was answered by the Government in a Treasury Minute on the 3rd of February, and on the 11th of February Mr. Churchward was invited by the Admiralty to make a formal offer of terms for the proposed contract. The House would bear in mind that under Mr. Churchward's old contract he received £15,500 a year and the casual services. The renewed contract was for £15,500, with the addition of £2,500 a year for the extra service, making £18,000 a year, undertaking at the same time to build two new steam-boats. The proposal was made on the 11th of February, and the Admiralty formally accepted it on the 23rd of February, and nothing remained to be done but the mere machinery of form. He (Mr. Malins) would ask whether, if a contract of that nature had been made between individuals, it would not have been considered to all intents complete and binding upon the parties. Now when did the conversation with Captain Carnegie take place? Why, on the 1st or the 2nd of April. And what was Mr. Church-lection might be explained, as Mr. Murray had suggested that it might be, by the difficulty there was for even the most accurate minds to remember conversations in the order in which they occurred. He (Mr. Malins) had spent his life among Judges and in courts, and had often found this to be the case; but without attributing to Captain Carnegie any desire otherwise than to state the truth, he believed he had fallen into confusion in making his statement. Had it been Mr. Churchward's object, however, to exercise any improper influence it was impossible to suppose that he would select Captain Carnegie, who was hardly warm in his seat at the Admiralty, and who would be the last man he would go to. He would rather go to the political department and the more important heads; but Captain Carnegie had confused the facts, and had arrived at erroneous conclusions. Mr. Murray was asked if his recollection was quite distinct that nothing passed between Mr. Churchward and Captain Carnegie with reference to the contract, and replied in the negative. Captain Carnegie contradicted Mr. Murray on that point, but there was a third person present, Mr. Churchward, and he (Mr. Malins), after all that had been said of that gentleman, was totally at a loss to discover anything that rendered him an impeachable witness. The Secretary of the Treasury, in a tone he hardly expected, and wanting in his usual generosity, had made it a charge against Mr. Churchward that in a Report of a Committee of that House it was stated that in 1852 he bribed two electors. Every one knew how much might be said about Reports of that kind, but the best answer to the charge was that Mr. Churchward had denied that charge upon oath. Even if it were true, surely no one would say that because in the heat of a past election a man may have committed such an offence, that, therefore, he was never afterwards to be believed upon his solemn declaration. He could not agree with the right hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir Francis Baring) in the grounds on which he thought public contracts ought to be repudiated. The right hon. Gentleman was generally so just and equitable in his treatment of questions before the House, that it was a matter of regret he should have exhibited so much ardour on the present occasion. The contract in question had been concluded and acted on, and value had been given on the one side and received on the

The payment was made at the very moment of the change of Government, and before the reference to the Select Committee. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite had referred to the dates, but they only showed that Mr. Churchward had obtained an advantage which he ought never to have had. It was also said, that owing to the mere accident that this was a dispute between an individual and the Government, Mr. Churchward would be deprived of the legal ordinary remedy. If Mr. Churchward had suffered a wrong in a matter of contract with the Crown and its officers, he denied that he was without a remedy in a court of law. He could not bring the same kind of action as if a private individual were concerned, and he might have to submit to a somewhat cumbersome and dilatory mode of proceeding, but when a payment became due he might proceed by a petition of right for its recovery, and every facility would be given him by the law officers of the Crown to bring the matter before any one of the courts of law. Therefore, unless the withholding the vote by the House of Commons were held to be a defence to the action, no Resolution of the House of Commons would impede Mr. Churchward's remedy. He had carefully perused the evidence of Captain Carnegie, Mr. Churchward, and above all of Mr. Murray, and he had come to the conclusion that the Select Committee were warranted in finding that Mr. Churchward had sought to obtain a matter of practical advantage by means that were to be reprobated, and which would tend to Parliamentary corruption. Believing Mr. Churchward to have been guilty of the misconduct imputed to him by the Committee, he felt it impossible by a vote in favour of the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member to reverse the decision at which that Committee had arrived.

LORD LOVAINE, having held an official situation at the Admiralty at the time, should not be doing his duty if he did not say a few words on this Motion. The right hon. Baronet opposite had not in his statement made a disclosure of the real facts of the case. He had stated that in 1855 the contract was renewed, and that in 1857 the renewal was again sought.

[Sir F. BAINE: "I said the application for certain extra services was refused."]

The right hon. Gentleman stated that Mr. Churchward had received an allowance for the extra services he had rendered, the ected by the t. He ought that this al- r the advice niralty, who e's) memory e contractor , entitled to rvice. [Sir that in the e fact. Mr. erred to the that he was he was paid , under these miralty with d of his con- He thought slight claim vious Admi- he purchase most useless, a large sum tary to the ated that at ension of the the perform- in be made, h a compe- . That was ted whether hon. Gentle- would have Mr. Church- onsideration d that Mr. ntract with a, however, ittle to the er had the idering that eans of en- at any mo- usual thing he believed did exactly instance it : Admiralty maintaining eless. The d been, he his observa- a Railway. with rail- leman; and the object was to run eate a per- enger traffic themselves, and tunit liked He : whet what East whet trary and twee haps level woul whet pany Wer woul susp Chur with the that Com the did i supp have foun judg certa Com: impo the p that be or word Mr. t was destr the c his c tain ceive and be he Carn with say t confu rende he th his cc proba colle yet h on di what that c sitting ind he exonerated the right hon. Baronet the on Member for Droitwich from any particihe pation in the extraordinary proceedings on- which had taken place between him and or- Mr. Murray and Mr. Churchward, he self stated that he was placed in a very pain-er? ful position—that he had met Mr. Murray gie and Mr. Churchward in one of the rooms fair of the Admiralty, that certain proposals ply had been made to him to which he felt it nce was quite impossible to accede with regard ere to his going to stand for Dover, and that his those proposals were of such a nature that vi- “they would get them all into a scrape.” the The Government, he stated, must be in-get jured by them if they should be carried or. into effect, and his own character in par-nee ticular would be gone for ever. Captain m- Carnegie certainly did not profess any ex-m- tra amount of honesty in regard to politi-th, cal transactions, for he said to him that be he did not pretend to be particularly off mealy-mouthed, and was ready to go with m- his party and make any exertions for them; the but he felt that the course proposed would the get them all into a very serious scrape, and that it was one which if he adopted the his personal character would be gone for nst ever. [Sir JOHN PAKINGTON: When was ne- that?] It was just after he (Lord Clarence for Paget) returned to town from the general in election, and before there was any quesord tion of the Committee. Afterwards, when va- it became evident that he would be called ing on to give evidence before the Committee, on; he came to him again, and said, “I have liar the most earnest desire to state nothing me that would in any way damage my party; ain I ask you whether I am not justified in gie that proceeding.” And he there and then uco told him (Captain Carnegie) he thought he and would be perfectly justified in not giving site any evidence whatever before the Compon mittee, not wrung from him, which would gh- damage his party. Captain Carnegie, so had far from deserving to have his conduct ery described, as he believed the noble Lord gie described it, as ungentlemanlike—

LORD LOVAINE said, he rose to explain—

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he should be very glad to receive from the noble Lord some qualification of that very offensive expression.

LORD LOVAINE: We always ought,
if we can, to be correct. What I said was, that it was unfair to his colleagues.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he was glad that the noble Lord so far retracted that expression. He wished to ward. The Government did not say the contract was bad; that something had taken place to render it not binding; that therefore neither party was bound by it, and that accounts should be settled for what was past; but they said they knew the contract was void two months ago, while they allowed £4,000 or £5,000 to be expended by Mr. Churchward in the interval; they maintained that the contract was void from the beginning, and then they revived and set up the contract of 1855, which they had themselves expressly put an end to. And they told Mr. Churchward that he must be remunerated according to its provisions, and in no other way. Neither the Government nor that House had the power to do that. Mr. Churchward was a man of honour, and was also a man of capital enough to enable him to go on in the performance of this contract; but if he had been a man of straw, and through the conduct of the Government in refusing the payment of the stipulated sum, had been led to say that he would provide for carrying the mails no longer; and if the Government had then fallen upon the sureties, he (Sir F. Kelly) should like to know which of those gentlemen would be bound? No lawyer or man of sense would reply, those under the contract of 1855. Then, if the sureties under the contract of 1859 were proceeded against, they might retort that they became sureties under the agreement, by which £18,000 a year was to be paid to Mr. Churchward, and that Government, having failed to carry out their agreement, the sureties could not be liable? As to the argument of the Solicitor General, founded on the Report of the Committee, he (Sir F. Kelly) was disposed to treat the Report of the Committee with all respect; all he had to say was against the purpose to which it was now sought to apply it. If it was meant to convict and condemn Mr. Churchward for an act of bribery, or an attempt to bribe, then he would say it was a judgment and sentence without a verdict or a trial. And he (Sir F. Kelly) claimed for Mr. Churchward the right possessed by the meanest of his countrymen, of being heard in his defence; having his case submitted to a jury, and the evidence heard upon oath. Whether in this matter, or in that of his contract being set aside, there could not be a shadow of a doubt that both legally and constitutionally Mr. Churchward was entitled to that measure of justice. He (Sir F. Kelly) believed that Captain Carnegie and Mr. Murray were both incapable of intentionally giving an undue colour to the transaction; but the matters that were spoken of by them were treated in a mere cursory conversation; and it was very easy for Captain Carnegie to have confounded the conversations. At page 81, question 1374, Captain Carnegie was asked what passed; and he replied, "Mr. Churchward spoke to me on the subject, &c.; and he promised me his assistance in general terms, and made allusions to his anxiety to obtain a renewal of his contract." He (Sir F. Kelly) hoped that there was no harm in that, when a contract was in progress through Government Offices, and when the question was, not whether the Government would agree to the contract or not, but merely as to the time when it should be executed. It was clear that was the only question that could have occurred; for Mr. Churchward said, "They were anxious to defer signing the renewal of the contract till after the elections," while he, on his part, was anxious to obtain the renewal at once. There was nothing like a promise to vote for Captain Carnegie; but Mr. Churchward made allusion to his anxiety to have the renewal settled; especially as the Government were anxious to defer the signing till after the election. Clearly the alleged bribery was nothing like an offer to do anything illegal; there was merely a kind of complaint that there was a chance that the renewal of his contract might be delayed till after the election. But see how this was met by Mr. Churchward. To question 1879, he stated that at the interview not one word was mentioned respecting the contractor, or as to his anxiety to obtain the signature of the contract. Captain Carnegie, no doubt, stated what he believed to be true; but Mr. Churchward contradicted his statement; and Mr. Murray, at page 90, said he was present, that he believed he heard all that passed, and that nothing was said in his presence about the contract. A Member of the Committee asked, "Do you think that the statement of Captain Carnegie has been altogether a fabrication?" And the answer of Mr. Murray was—and the House would, probably, find in all Christian charity that this gave the real explanation of the case—

"No; because I had several conversations with Captain Carnegie on the subject, and my impression is, that he is confusing some conversa-a conversation with Mr.

intended that no jury the matter were bo-
hesitate a moment to action on this conver-rray had done—that d confounded one con-
er. He came now to ommittee, which said, e enlarging the first to 1863, "This was dmiralty without prewith the Treasury or a reason why, by the rd might think that is safe, although it had l by the Treasury — ppear according to the
been made with due ion for the public in-ensure upon the Go-leave to the Govern-answer. The Report say that—

efore your Committee that of the contractors, on the election, at the time when tract was under consider-volunteered his support, as r Devor, to the Hon. Capie Lords of the Admiralty, candidate for that borough, his contract was to be exhis intention, if required, to out candidates for Dover.

it right to add, that the t had been recommended he Treasury at least six if the conversation referred to your Committee that lty nor the Treasury were a the decision rested ine renewal of the contract ical motive."

ry slight censure. It nly officer of the Go-ssed an objection, even ion, to this contract, be deemed so corrupt
e set aside and treated e Postmaster General;
ver, being opposed to by and Treasury. And t of Mr. Churchward?
the last general elec-
tract was about to be eered to Captain Car-
an influential elector, pectation that his con-nded, for the two Go-
n. The Committee also lelly reports Treas

to the agains gave a but th
Lord
tion th
He wo
in wh ment
such a though ward pectat then l place town
and it adequ been g ledge
the Co
said :-

" W engage the Ge submit
Mr. C expedi
the rep
has no
Comm
nity, t fulfil t
the 20
1870."

The
the E money merits wheth
from the la tion in tions,
sioner
premi tracto and a

" Do with th
cause
days fr
a sum liamen quarter Now, to ass
from provid of for

ments of the Government for the mere purpose of defining the particular fund out of which the money was to be paid. The absurdity of arguing that these words meant that the assent of Parliament was required for the payment of the money, was clearly shown by supposing that the payment of the money came due in September or October, instead of during the Session of Parliament. Surely no one would suppose that Mr. Churchward was to go on expending large sums of money for a period of six months during the recess, because, forsooth! Parliament was not sitting to approve of the money being given. The Secretary of the Treasury had relied upon an opinion expressed by an hon. Friend of his (Mr. Lygon) as to the meaning of these words, and he found that on the 14th of July, 1859, that hon. Gentleman did say that—

“Certain words were introduced into the contract signed on the 8th of April for Dovor, as had been done also in the case of Galway, providing that the contractors should be paid out of money to be voted by Parliament; thus, in fact, rendering the contract subject to ratification by the House.”—[3 Hansard, cliv. 1222.]

He did not hesitate to say that his hon. Friend was entirely in error in making this statement; and it was an error that was at once corrected by Mr. Wilson, who explained that—

“The stipulation that the contracts should be paid out of money voted by Parliament was not new. Why, from what fund could they be paid, except money voted by Parliament? The words said to be a new introduction, and to involve a new principle of Parliamentary revision, had been in use, at all events, since 1854, and were mere surplusage, because the contracts could not be paid out of money unless it was voted by Parliament. He did not object to the use of the words, but they should not be set up as proof of extraordinary vigilance. If the words had been ‘subject to the approval of Parliament,’ the case would have been very different.”—[Ibid. p. 1223.]

After this explanation he thought that no Gentleman upon the Treasury bench at least would contend that this contract depended for its validity upon the ratification or approval of Parliament. He submitted, then, that public confidence would be seriously shaken in respect to such contracts, if Government should seek to avail themselves of a quibble of this kind, and refuse payment of the money to which Mr. Churchward was entitled, on the ground that it had not met “the approval of Parliament.” But what had the Admiralty done in consequence of the Report of the Committee? Mr. Churchward, when he entered into the contract, had never been told that the money agreed to be paid to him must in the first instance be approved of by Parliament. The Board of Admiralty had never once submitted the question to the House whether it was expedient that the contract should be continued from 1863 to 1870; but the Board had adopted the present extraordinary course towards Mr. Churchward merely upon the ground of a recommendation contained in a Report of a Committee of the House. After allowing two months to pass by without giving Mr. Churchward any intimation of their intention, they suddenly informed him that, in consequence of the Committee of the House believing that he had said something improper to Captain Carnegie, they would punish him by declaring the contract void; and they then insisted upon taking off about 35 per cent from the money they had to pay him according to the terms of the contract of 1855, upon which alone they were then determined to act. He would venture to say that nothing had occurred which could authorize any court of law or equity to impeach the contract under which Mr. Churchward was acting. Nothing but misrepresentation on the part of Mr. Churchward, or the production of positive evidence to prove that the contract was originally given solely on the condition of the Government candidate being supported by Mr. Churchward, could justify the avoidance of that contract. Now, there was no charge of misrepresentation ever brought against Mr. Churchward, and the Committee completely exonerated the Government from any corrupt motives in giving the contract to that gentleman. But what did the present Board of Admiralty do? If they had determined to treat the contract as void, they were bound to do so promptly, and to give immediate notice of their determination to the contractor. And further, they should have ceased to take to themselves the benefit of the contract. If they had acted upon principles of fair dealing and justice they would have told Mr. Churchward that they did not intend to recognize the contract. Instead of doing that, they had allowed him to carry the mails day by day, for six months and more, and it was only when he had called upon them for payment that they had told him he had done something of which they disapproved, and therefore they would not pay him.

itself if it followed the course recommended by the hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire? That hon. Member did not ask the House in terms to find that Mr. Churchward was not guilty of corruption, but called on the House to say that, having considered the Report and evidence, it was of opinion that the contract ought to be fulfilled. Thus, the Select Committee having found that Mr. Churchward attempted to enter into a corrupt bargain with the Government for his own interests, the House was called on to declare that that contract ought to be fulfilled; and such was the record proposed to be handed down to future times. On the 11th of February of last year the Admiralty, instead of taking a businesslike course of proposing the terms which they would agree to for the payment of Mr. Churchward's extra services, asked him what he would like to have, and then he asked for the extension of the contract for seven years and an additional sum of £2,500 for extra services. On the 23rd of February the Admiralty recommended the proposal to the Treasury, the head of the department in the Admiralty, to whom the matter had been referred, having given his decision in its favour on the ground that the contract of Mr. Churchward was unremunerative. On being asked his reason for thinking the English contract unremunerative, this functionary, (Mr. Clifton) replied that a gentleman employed in copying accounts for a suit in the Court of Chancery informed him privately, to his surprise, that it was not remunerative, and that the expenses were very great. That appeared to be all the investigation made into the ground on which the renewal of the contract was founded. On the 1st of March the Treasury referred the application to the Postmaster-General, and on the 10th of March the Postmaster-General reported to the Treasury strongly against it. Upon that day Mr. Stephenson, a clerk in the Treasury, made a memorandum concurring in the Postmaster-General's report; and here he might observe that none of the gentlemen connected with the public offices appeared thoroughly to understand the business relating to these contracts, and the principles on which they ought to be granted, except Mr. Stephenson. The papers were then sent to Mr. Hamilton in due official course, and Mr. Hamilton made a memorandum twelve days after, namely, on the 22nd of March, taking a strongly opposite view. On the 1st of April the late Secretary to the Treasury (Sir S. Northcote) made a minute, according to which he felt considerable difficulty in coming to a conclusion, but on the whole he was disinclined to renew the contract, and desired Mr. Hamilton to see whether Mr. Churchward would not be satisfied with a larger money concession, and abandon all claims for extension. On the 4th of April, Mr. Churchward wrote a long letter to Mr. Hamilton, stating that he could not abandon his claim for the renewal of his contract. These dates were of importance, because, although the conversation that took place between Mr. Churchward and Captain Carnegie on which the Committee founded their decision had no fixed date, yet Captain Carnegie, on being asked to fix a date, stated that it occurred between the 4th and 9th of April. So that at this moment Mr. Churchward was in an agony of doubt, and it was most important for him to get his contract renewed. Now as to the mode in which business appears to have been conducted by the public departments in this case, which was a most important question. The Treasury minute of the 15th of April, assenting to Mr. Churchward's proposal, stipulated for the insertion in the contract of three conditions, the first being that Mr. Churchward should engage to make no fresh contract with the French or any foreign Government for the conveyance of the mails, without the consent of the Board; the second empowering the Board to change the hours of sailing, and the third declaring that the payment for special services should be reduced, if those services were cut off. Mr. Churchward had already a contract with the French Government, which would terminate in 1870, and it was considered so important that the termination of the two contracts should be made concurrent, that this was the main ground on which the Treasury recommended the renewal. Hence the condition first mentioned. But it would scarcely be believed that notwithstanding the assent of the Treasury had been given to the extension of the contract only provided the three conditions alluded to were inserted, the contract was actually renewed without those conditions being inserted. Not only so, but they were never even communicated by the Treasury to the Admiralty. The Admiralty was, therefore, not to be blamed for not inserting them. But Mr. Stephenson had told them that it

{COMMONS}

id he did	ter is in
; before a	After what
tted that	learned Mr
The con-	I must say
med, and	that the pr
infringing	act recogn
between	been conde
se should	says a pay
unction to	Churchwai
arried out	payment
r.	Board of A
EXCHE-	and when
et against	was to loc
doctrine of	taken his man with	has never
h he says	way. It i
ulfil. He	Churchwai
on which	consequenc
—namely,	sent Gover
at you are	the old and the agree-	the new co
ctrine of	claim to a
man, you	old contra
any con-	special ser
1.	Churchwai
there was	those char
id so dis-	but, as far there is n
EXCHE-	that the
, speaking	Churchwai
peaking of	lution of t
id learned	actually pe
if persons	which he v
ad Dublin	the new co
thing else	in the ren
n absolute	to 1870, a ntract. I	may think
al to the	matter her
use.	case is mac
se to make	Churchwai
	newal bein
llor of the	the offence
e House.	entirely op
to order.	not be misl
	less misrep
e to order.	that gentle esented is	great const
n another	us. I wis
e House.	position of
; to your	stances th
a right to	escaped th
ler. The	learned Ge
nderstood	ment, but
t instance	is primari
imputed.	Churchwai
EXCHE-	time when
vord upon	act in dero
intention	sion took
; the right	general op
; the mat-	be that it

m- censure Mr. Churchward's contract, and ith for that their impartiality is impeached.
to- No wonder they voted together, for they in- were supported by some Members from the aid other side. [The blue-book was handed eir to the right hon. Gentleman by Mr. Ly-Mr. gon]. Well, here is the most important ent division on the Committee, and I find the We name of the hon. Member for Evesham iad (Sir H. Willoughby), so that it supports we my statement. The proceedings of the in- Committee were governed by the same imon- partiality which directed their appointuld ment. They have presented a solemn and the important judgment. They do not find m- fault with the preceding executive Gore- vernment, but they say that the person ich with whom the Government made the Jo- contract "did resort to corrupt expedients no which affected injuriously the character ub- of the representation and the dignity of do Parliament," and they say, further, on and account of the offence of that person, that re- it is not possible for the House, with due the regard for its own dignity, to take those ink steps without which the contract would iti- become a dead letter. Is it alleged that pon the finding of the Committee is untrue? tee Is it untrue that Mr. Churchward resorted ee- to corrupt expedients affecting injuriously in the dignity of Parliament. I stand in let the main upon the Report of the Comon- mittee, and we should be most unwise, ose with our imperfect means, if we undertook ely to override the conclusion they came to.
tee But even on the face of the matter there l a is none of the obscurity which the hon.
this and learned Gentleman appears to discover ich in it. He quoted very imperfectly a por-ro- tion of an answer given by Captain Car-ro- negie, in which he says that Mr. Church-eci- ward made an allusion to his anxiety to but get a renewal of his contract, and says that to if the matter had been before a Judge, the om- Judge would have asked him to explain the what he meant by an allusion. But there om- would be no necessity for that interfermer- ence, for Captain Carnegie went on to ex-al- plain that Mr. Churchward said they were ttee anxious to defer signing the renewal ent, until after the election, but that he felt first it was too hard upon him, and he would lace prefer voting for Mr. Osborne and him-hey self, so that he might have a friend and in power whichever party was in office. om- Reference has been made to what has e to been stigmatized as a leading question the at the close of the examination, but oted although that is a leading question it cont to tains nothing which is not substantiated in preceding answers, and combines the effect of the whole of those answers. Independently of the Report of the Committee, I would stand upon those answers to prove that this gentleman did resort to corrupt expedients, affecting injuriously the dignity of Parliament. If that be so, is it true, on the other hand, as the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite contends, that this House is tied and bound to vote the money for the fulfilment of the contract which has been made with a party who has resorted to corrupt expedients in his endeavours to secure that contract? It is entirely an error on the part of the hon. and learned Gentleman to suppose that this contract was complete when the Admiralty had agreed to recommend it. Nothing but a want of acquaintance with the usages of a public department could have justified the hon. and learned Gentleman in saying that. [Sir FRIZBOROUGH KELLY: I never said so.] I understood the hon. and learned Gentleman to say that when the Admiralty had agreed to the contract it had the force of a preliminary agreement and that it was virtually complete. [Sir FRIZBOROUGH KELLY: Mr. Churchward thought so.] That is stating what is wholly irrelevant, for we have it in evidence that Mr. Churchward went from the Admiralty to the Treasury and made his application there, knowing perfectly well that it was there the real authority lay. I must say, I cannot help taking a broad objection to the manner in which the hon. and learned Member for Suffolk treated this question. He appears to bind it up in legal forms, which I do not hesitate to say are inadequate to do justice to the case. It is impossible to suppose that this House can be content with the observation of the hon. and learned Gentleman, when he asks, in what form would you have framed an indictment against Mr. Churchward for bribery? Therefore, because he cannot see his way to framing an indictment against Mr. Churchward for bribery, he says, on that ground—and on that ground alone—you have no option, that your liberty is gone, and that you are bound to vote the money necessary to give effect to this contract. I entirely dissent from that doctrine. I cannot admit, in the case of a contract which is to be satisfied out of the public money voted by the House of Commons, that the House of Commons and the public are to be bound under whatever circumstances of fraud by the first act of the Executive. There is no allegation that there was allegation was attempted to obtain it. House in money? of Commons these, is but taking not what printed? I the Executive House of of policy say how far extend. fixed where contract be held to leges of the With respect mentioned by. gentleman (Mr. Kelly) in of imprudence question of money; to take not permitted the House tract was tion was moneys for command but were Commons. and child by Parliament it be supplied accepting it was subject discretion arrived at exercise that we are and liberal justice, or contract a voluntary lected Committee reported that that contrary degrading point of view that question Government vote of the

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

ing whatever passed on my private conversations with Captain Caird, might not equally have passed through a shorthand writer was known, and that every word I uttered would appear in the newspapers the following morning. The hon. Gentleman for Liskeard hardly believes that I was unconscious of the relation held between my private and Mr. Churchward and Captain Caird, and, he would not believe it; I myself distinctly denied it. He then made this denial before the House; I think I had some reason to doubt of the hon. Member holding that; but I desire, in the face of the House of Commons and the nation, to have a satisfactory and distinct assurance on the subject, and I tell him that I know whatever about this conversation taken place between Captain Caird, Mr. Murray, and Mr. Churchward. The hon. Gentleman has no doubt as distinct an assurance as I have.

It now remains for me to state the conduct of the late Government generally with regard to these transactions.

The conduct of the late Board of Admiralty is hardly now in question; it will be recollected that the Admiralty passed their opinion on the subject as far back as February, 1847, and was no question of an election; there could be no ground of connection with election proceedings.

My own feeling is that I am prepared to blame for knowing rather less of the contract than too much. I was before the Board of Admiralty in February, when I have said, in February, when I was occupied with the plans for the re-organization of the navy, which it was my duty to submit to the House of Commons at the time, and the truth is I did not pay attention to it that I ought to have done.

And here I will say, from the opinion of the Admiralty, that I entertain the opinion that these contracts should not be thrown on the Admiralty, but that they have enough to do in attending to the interests of the navy, and I am satisfied that the present Government will take the proper and prudent course in transferring these contracts from the Admiralty to the Post Office. As to the opinion of the Treasury, it would be wrong in me to say one word except after the candid, frank, and open manner in which the hon. Member has ex-	language

{COMMONS}

depart-	ward had
to me	ment into
lty had	Mr. Murra
t a sub-	Do I accu
election	hon. Gentl
ttempts	did not sa
make a	it? Perha
ty, and	SIR FR
rnment	explain th
a con-	the Repor
rnment	but an ho
s charge	thinking,
'Parlia-	side, insis
mittee,	tire acqui
Election	I assented
mittees	was done
quitted.	opinion as
that in	the partie
as a ver-	mittee. I
. verdict	Murray w
of words	I think i
sacred—	great imp
are that	of the Ri
or sus-	at the sau
er in re-	a Parliam
y more;	SIR JO
strongly	hon. Gent
air deal-	in the ea
in such	no." H
s, I am	guage, for
o given	plain tern
I will	been a p
conduct	The right
tary. I	a great d
cast on	of Mr. M
believe	contract a
was ever	but it sho
strictly	tract was
a ques-	at the tin
rly and	Mr. Murr
re of a	Mr. Chur
ons I do	his exam
rry that	denied hi
presided	to Mr. C
drew	election v
ul para-	and, thou
nan the	wrote a l
Baring)	ference to n to go	collected
e Report	letter in J
en held	tion what
viewers	hon. Gent
ve been	rash concl
ht hon.	without t
on this	He is a
r offence	young ma
did not	as high a
to hear	who pres
ing use	judges.

with House to deal with Mr with as any man in England ould with by a court of law med he were arraigned for ions fore that Court. Wh ties against Mr. Churchwa eal- evidence against him, c all; ing away the grants u t li- tract, unless it be thi and tween three persons—non- Mr. Churchward, and M ryer Carnegie has stated o the conversation and Mr. C ling Murray another. Both out positive. I do not wa ects of intentional misrep ac- any one deny that speal ever sation months afterwar an I sible, but probable that the party or the other m now that without any inten bias is not true either of at I taken? What would igh Judge under such circ ouse the House to be wise with Is it not one of the n to justly accepted, that i tle- party charged shall b has it? For the sake of t int, House, and for the sak was that this House is no had dangerous and formida hese to brand a man with end take a course which is ade to ruin, upon a conve sion equally worthy of cre the in their recollection.
con- guago of the right hon hich ask the House to foll ecial pressions, and to act does liberally. If they do any the Committee, whic con- was not just, wise, or the sanctioned by this Hou is no Mr. G. W. HOPE s ecial Member of the Comm will the paragraph inserte de or quitting the late Gov pen- mittee accepted that only mously. Then came t on quitting Mr. Murray tion. could not say that M s but mitted a great offenc ether in his opinion, whol arch- Committee to take not e us. the question was raise essed was obliged to say a with felt it impossible to s xeralt conduct had been ot the croet. He was, how of England; but by what I consider an transfer of £300,000 at the amount, al- returns before the 0—I object, I say, ng taken from the id made a present property. There or such a proceed- re that this is a to the Bill of the himself cannot ap- enough that many be satisfied with ey are in the form ey say “We think contribute towards conscientious feel- may think them ng to make a con- is scruples, and to it all personal pay- shall be abolished. in my concession; nsiderable number as been exempted i Birmingham and accept the exemp- sanctioned by pre- that, with respect it would be an act and robbery to take ke from the poor, unity, £300,000 a e it a present to the r—who have never it never belonged. ruples, and would nger personal, but my man to exempt charge simply be- not approve of it; anything into this take anything out t therefore see the man to exempt in ich he can hold charge to which it ed. I know it has church rate is a and last year I Sir Robert Peel, ities, to prove that accepted. In the the Lords’ Com- stated by perhaps w existing, and it xplicit, that I will e. Mr. Coode, who was a Law ment highe conne this s House vided under with the o the o told that t them call j this r The (“Is thougl variab His s “Iu —it is ment upon the te tenant for res which goings spicuo the ra pay. had be it is v perien agent ships i siness, first c would estims perty the in: conseq avoide provid in the The la nant, i that h rent c adopt evitabl occupi that o: ductio have s place i an arg in whi thority land, i that it a guess may be compel

question
ment or wherever liable as action as that legal occupier is on land
by device, subject in made is come into king that going, and feel sur-ion which al precend econo-
as all the
the num-

perhaps iving to dence of opinion ience of sal with rch rate
t, ante-
of any erefore, ust ne-alue, a to hear o House it for a what is Now, I nothing
s of the
s. The tee are n at the on from munica-
shall be propose mber of ad from be ac-
on, and recom-
o which accept the 8th
recom-
ing the
to the serious future t upon church
pose to give the whole class of occupiers the same power of exempting themselves one and all from all liability for the purposes of church rates which they possess, of exempting themselves from the charge of the property tax under schedule A of the Property and Income Tax Act. I propose to acknowledge the charge for the purposes for church rate, as what it really is—namely, a charge upon property. I propose to enforce the natural incidence of the rate by making a charge upon property in lieu of it. As a landowner and a Member of this House I repudiate the idea of accepting any portion of this £300,000, which never belonged to me, to which I have no right, and the transferring of which to me would, I humbly conceive, be an actual robbery of the Church. That, Sir, is my strong feeling, and I am prepared, if the House should think fit to allow me, to lay my proposals on the table, to introduce the substance of a Bill which I have for some years considered, which I have submitted to several persons most competent to give advice on this subject, and in favour of which I have their ready concurrence and approval. I put it to the hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock, that he cannot hope that a Bill involving the spoliation of 85 per cent of the parishes of this country will ever receive the sanction of the House of Lords, especially after the careful investigation they have made, and after the circumstances which have come to their knowledge illustrative of the extent of the spiritual destitution which prevails in the metropolis and elsewhere. They never will sanction the privation of the Church of England of those means which are essentially necessary for the extension of her services. But if the hon. Baronet chooses to avoid the effect of his Bill to which I have alluded, which is a consequence entailed by, but not a principle necessarily involved in his Bill—I mean the spoliation of the church to the extent of £300,000 a year—then I believe that his Bill will meet a fair consideration in the House of Lords, and I am not without hope that it will promote that which I am willing to believe is his sincere object, an amicable settlement of this question, and the ensuring of peace throughout the parishes of the country for the future. I know not what the hon. Baronet will do. He voted against me before, and perhaps he will do so again to-day but by so doing, he will affirm the prin-

I by any concession
 o religious scruples,
 deprive the Church,
 gious community of
 wish to simplify this t to the landowners s true bearing. I conciliating the hon.
 am and others, who destruction of the a national establish-myself to those who ie Church as an es-preciate at its true serve our parochial ins in each parish a for his conduct (in cases a worthy ex-asses), as a guaran-
 and thus affords one for freedom. I rel organization of the
 . one of the best if or English freedom;
 . of the Church of
 nan or ecclesiastic, orce the conscience
 creed and disgraces manner which, I am
 case of the clergy
 y means more strin-of public opinion. I I hold, as I ever freedom of England
 ormation of her re-
 freedom never was eligion assumed the
 that it will never be eligion is corrupted.
 i with any man to hat religion. I will on the part of the
 to enforce anything
 strol; but believing ughland is the foundathis country, I con-
 of Religion Society," id destroy the power Church, and under s organized for the hat institution which of our freedom I s society. insincere in and totally unworthy not now enter into mendments I would mission to lay before hey have been care-
 l that in abolishing moving the common

in sub-church
charge
be colby the for boministraical auay more he colscoach-
to such tain the details desirous eration;
stance
a false Friend (Henley) to lay
but the ampton-
ace, and he most sed the ld have e whole
y an ex-
n which in Han-
was at-ie Mem-perfectly urrently nd con-
alf the ered the hat mis-
), and I
I stand.
eans of uestion,
n of the ands of ventured
. I was ported, Motion;
nication ilities, I oodwill.
ie counlated, I osal had should o in no n has a e repre-
as that which has for seventeen years returned me to this House—every man has a character to hold or to lose in this House. After having thus pledged myself I should deem it unbecoming of my character to yield on this question, because I am convinced that those who have heard me and those who know me would feel that I was departing from the course in public life to which I have long adhered. The offers of support which I have received from various quarters are alone sufficient to induce me to persevere. I state this because I have been told that this is a proposal which might be placed in better hands than mine. If last year I had been aware that it would have been taken up by abler men, I would have willingly resigned the matter to them. I think that a change has taken place in favour of my proposal since then, still if I am permitted to lay my Amendments on the table of the House I will willingly resign them into the hands of any abler man; but standing in the position in which I do, it is due, in justice to myself, in justice to the cause I advocate, and in justice to those with whom I have entered into communication, that I should take the sense of the House this year, as I did last, on the proposal which I now venture again to lay before the House.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, 'this House will, To-morrow, resolve itself into a Committee, to consider the propriety of establishing in lieu of Church Rates, thenceforth to be abolished, a charge on all hereditaments, in respect of the occupancy of which Church Rates have been paid within the last seven years; such charge to be levied with the County Rate at an uniform rate of poundage, the occupier being in all cases entitled to deduct the amount of the charge levied on his occupation,' instead thereof.

. Mr. CROSS, in seconding the Amendment, said that when it was brought forward last year he looked upon it merely as one of the various plans brought before the House to settle the church-rate question, and as he did not altogether approve of the plan he voted against the hon. Member for North Warwickshire. Since then all hopes of compromising the matter by any concession seemed to be at an end, and he had therefore reconsidered the matter, and on the principle alone that if they abolished church rates they were bound to provide some substitute, he should vote for the Motion. They must take care that in endeavouring to provide a remedy for a grievance they did not create one which

(MARCH 28, 1860)

Abolition Bill.

why the abolished.
than 5 or refused to free will;
just that,
he privi-
per cent
I enjoyed the Church
should be remedying unhappy. He act of the conscien-
of church of Eng-
to the ociety, he tract from once show
J. Morley,
lent deno-
committee asked—

and actuates rates taking the Church
the mode of same volun-

sion of this satisfy the
you please,

acts; would ition before ultimate ob-
omise repro-
only my own ve that the
from the
to put it in church rates

ing by that rests of the burohman, ojoyment of rovided for at is a very sent of the difficulties
e. I think a which at ere existed in with regards cases ion of Dis-tional pro-

dealt with
n.
the view of urd Church

establishments altogether as things injurious to religion?—I do believe so

"And that ultimately they may extreme future to find an opportunit the property which is now appropri Establishment and applying it others would certainly be the course of ev shape themselves as no doubt many minds are anticipating."

Nothing could show the spirit of that association better than t he had read; and he asked t whether it could approve of it or promote its views? It had proposed to give the Dissenters to be relieved from church rates ing a personal exemption. H approve that solution of the que was unjust to the Church, the which was to include within its whole community, and which, t emption of Dissenters, would d self into a sect. The adopti voluntary system had been su another remedy; but the volun had not answered for Dissent selves. To show the operatio voluntary principle he would refer to the evidence of Mr. Bun was asked by the Archbishop bury:—

"Do you think that the dissenting rally would be sufficient to provide fi tenance of religion in the rural dist the less populous parts of the country?

Mark his answer:—

"Certainly not: I think that all expe that. I may be allowed to believ Methodists are doing nearly all the that direction, and do what we can it i for us to provide for the rural popula Church of England in the nature of
do. I should extend that observation large towns. I think that certain large towns will never be provided parochial or a district system. Di has done that, and I think there are difficulties in its way."

He was then asked by the Chair

"Will you be good enough to stat consider those difficulties to be?"

And he said,—

"I do not think that voluntaryism provide missionary ministers in sufficie and at the same time pastors for con
"In fact," added the Archbishop, "I be a want of support?"

And the reply was—

"Yes; a want of pecuniary suppor Thus he had proved from one of authorities that the Church of had a duty to perform which had not. It was proved, by c and after the House had given its opinion on the subject the settlement ought to proceed. The Executive Government, from which no solution could be hoped. Discussions between Churchmen ought, if possible, to be avoided. It was obvious that, after the course of the Government of Lord Derby, the Government could settle the matter. He regretted that his hon. Friend was not permitted to bring forward a proposal which, though it might be tried year after year in that House, would leave the question of church rates settled more than before.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNE hoped this Bill would have quietly to go into Committee. It had been so directly appealed to that he could say a few words in reply. The Gentleman (Mr. Horsman) had asked whether he had inquired whether the Government intended to do or not. Now, when he (Sir John) returned to Parliament in 1859, as Chairman of a former Committee on the subject, he did ask the Government whether they intended to introduce a Bill with respect to church rates. He was told, too, that that announcement had caused a great sensation at the time. It was in the House and among the public. The Government of that day said that they would bring in a Bill at a future time. He waited patiently, but the time expired, and no such Bill was forthcoming. Subsequently, however, of which he was not a member, the Government on the subject was brought in by the Government of Lord Derby; and although it was not one, as he thought, in the same case, that Government were to be praised, for having at least attempted to deal with it. He had studied the question for many years, and saw that that Bill would not settle the question. Indeed, he was of opinion that all the measures proposed on that side were, from a Church of England point of view, infinitely worse than the measure. The scheme proposed by the hon. Member for North Devon was decidedly worse for the Church, while that hon. Member stated the absolute right of the Church to levy rates everywhere, he would exclude everywhere church rates had no and in those places he would not be liable for the theoretical liability of repairing church fabrics, which liability (Trelawny) left untouched by the proposed church rates. Although the abstract doctrine of the liability to repair churches would not be applied to conscientious persons to subvert the principle, who would not be coerced into doing so by the Ecclesiastical Commission, with regard to those cases the same in kind with that of the confiscation of church property, where church rates were levied. Again, the hon. Member for Warwickshire, having taken the case of occupiers, who were the benefitted by the enjoyment of the property, for which they had to pay, the right of voting for an increase of rates was not official to themselves, then transferred it to the owners of the property, absentees and derive no benefit from it, that it was possible that it might be a Dissenter also, who had a conscience and wish for the rate to be levied as the occupier. What was the consequence of this transfer of the rate would be an agitation to get rid of the tax altogether, as there had been a successful agitation to get rid of the rate in Ireland, and the Act in Scotland. If his (Sir John Lubbock) measure were confiscation the case of the hon. Member for North Devon was, in fact, a double consequence. The hon. Gentleman appeared to say that the rate was charged upon the property, but in disproof of this he said it was necessary to mention the fact that the use of unoccupied property was not to be levied. Indeed, it had been settled that church rates were levied upon lands. If a county was not to bridge, the county may be liable; if a parish do not repair a road, the parish may be indicted. If the tithe is not paid, there is a remedy by distress; if the land may be seized. But the rate is a tax in person and liable to be levied by a majority of parishioners. The ratepayer cannot be sued for the rate, the charge being pro salute anime; the executor is not interested. The hon. Gentleman proposed to extend the rate; but the measure which (Trelawny) proposed was one which would give the chance of the Dissenter being conciliated, and being willing to support the support of

Trelawny

for the abolition of rated that the total anxious impost would pon, believing that hat would give com- Church was surely own fabrics, as the rs. While the Wes- els for two million dents for half that tists for three-quar- ile in England and 1,000 churches and dependent and self- erous congregations, England could sup- by a voluntary sys- the Dissenters. He against the proposi- ber for North War-id, the hon. Baronet istock said he was ent of this question. y ways of settling a r instance, might be f furniture, whether hich he should put aving at length, as that matter, a fire d down the whole h effectually settled ledly opposite sense. leo was anxious to led, to have it set- ve every reasonable Dissenters; but he ents of church rates ns to any plan but . No plan proposed quite unobjection- nce of any alterna- n, he should support e hon. Member for Supposing even that the voluntary sys- repair as at present, to be considered— secure that the sub- uly raised from all it, in proportion to rest in the parish, ould secure against re. In places where to absentees, there in obtaining sub- stance, he might ere the great tithes belonged to a per- ously in America.

Then there was the case of happened, too, that the w consist wholly of conscientious and conscientious Dissenters was a vast proportion of pe not care for any religious b he did not wish those pers emptied from all payment. I too, the apparent owners of not the real beneficial own assured that if church rates w railway companies, clubs, a porate bodies would not be scribe, and thus those sou cut off. With regard to th economy, he might observe more easy to raise subscription new church or to restore a than it was to procure funds existing building from falli condition. Thus a church lowed to get into a worse year to year, until it becam then a subscription would b pend £500 to restore the b a timely outlay of £50 mi in good repair. He would Church to make large conce conscientious Dissenters, but asked to do more, and to reli and indolent, he thought th unjust, and that it would b yield to it.

SIR MORTON PETO s assure the House that not unconditional and absolute satisfy the Dissenters. A g been said about the ultimate senters, but he could assure that they did not desire to Church of one single shilling belonged to it, but they d resist an impost which affect sciences, which was a perso them and not a charge upon which they were determine be made so. The voluntary already proved capable of that was needful for the rel modation of the people. W the experience of this coun last half century? In 1801 t ber of sittings in churches a England amounted to 5,000, they exceeded 10,000,000, number the increase obtain than by voluntary contribut much more than 200,000 situ men as well as Dissenters more trust in the vitality of they professed. Look at the large sums that have been raised in Scotland by the voluntary efforts of less than 3,000,000 of people. Surely the Churchmen of this country would not be behind their brethren in Scotland in zeal and generosity towards the support of their religious edifices. He considered it was absurd to suppose that they would allow their churches to fall into decay, if this comparatively small sum of £300,000 a year were taken away from them. Were the members of the Church of England behind their fellow-subjects of Calcutta in fidelity towards their places of worship? It appeared that the followers of Bramah raised last year in Calcutta no less a sum than £200,000 for the building, repairing, and restoring of heathen temples in India. Surely it could not be for a moment imagined that the professors of the religion of Christ would be behind the heathens in zeal and liberality for the maintenance of their religious edifices. If the religion of this country were really of such a character—then he would say, perish that religion whose followers had shown themselves so unworthy of the character of disciples of their Divine Master, as to refuse not only their own contributions towards the preservation of His sacred temples, but to insist upon the money of others being dragged from them, to support a religion to which they were conscientiously opposed; but he knew too well the vitality of Christianity to feel any fear on its account. See how religion had thriven in Canada since the obnoxious question of the Clergy Reserves had been settled. He trusted that for the sake of religion itself the House would not stop short of the absolute and unconditional repeal of this obnoxious impost. In the Report of the Committee of the House of Lords a belief was expressed that a large body of Dissenters were not desirous for the extinction of church rates. He thought the Committee were altogether wrong in that impression. As he had before stated, the Dissenters were, in his opinion, most anxious for the total abolition of church rates, and it was his belief that if the impost were abolished a large number of Dissenters would be found amongst the voluntary contributors to a fund in lieu of them. It was idle to charge the Dissenters with the wish or intention of pulling down the Church of England. No such feeling of antagonism towards the Church existed in the minds of the great body of Dissenters, who displayed amongst themselves much fewer differences than were to be found within the precincts of the Church itself. He would remind the House of the decency and decorum observed during the religious services in the theatres of the metropolis. The aid of the police was not required there to preserve order. On the other hand, what was the conduct pursued in some of their churches? Were not some of their ministers approaching the practices and services of the Church of Rome so closely that he believed they would display their honesty only by going over to the latter Church altogether. What was the case in one of their churches? Was not the assistance of 100 or 150 policemen required to maintain order and to enable Divine service to be performed? There were no such differences amongst the Dissenters. If this impost were abolished he was convinced that the Church of England would advance with much greater strides than it had ever done before, and that the bitterness which was now increasing day by day in consequence of the present obnoxious system would completely disappear.

MR. PERRY WATLINGTON said, he could not agree with the hon. Baronet who had just sat down—for he did not consider that the disposition to make voluntary contributions for Church purposes was injuriously affected by the existence of an Establishment, any more than the fountain of private benevolence was dried up by the existence and operation of a poor law. Although this question had been frequently discussed in that House, still he thought that every succeeding year added something to their practical knowledge of the matter in developing, more and more distinctly, the ultimate objects of the supporters of this Bill, and in showing the effect that would be produced upon the Established Church if the proposed measure passed into a law. He for one would admit that if it were proved that the present system imposed a heavy grievance of conscience upon any class of the community, it would be their duty to remedy the complaint as speedily as possible. But when he found a mode proposed which would benefit a few by inflicting a great injustice on the many, he thought the advantage to be gained was wholly beneath the cost of the purchase. He would not trouble the House with extracts from the evidence taken before the Committee of the House of Lords which had been so largely quoted in the last debate upon this subject; but when he found Dr. Foster, a Baptist, saying that he considered it an immoral obligation for a Baptist or Independent to contribute to the support of a church in which he does not worship, and applying this remark to tithes as well as church rates—when he found Mr. Gladding, an Independent, declaring that he does not wish to see any change in the law, and does not think the conscientious objection is so extensive as is generally supposed—and the Rev. George Osborne, a Wesleyan minister, stating that he thinks he should not be wrong in inferring that there does not exist any very wide-spread opposition to church rates; but, on the contrary, and further, when he considered that the calculations of Dr. Hume, founded upon the formula of Mr. Horace Mann, had never been disputed, by which it appeared that—

13 per cent. of the population are Wesleyan Methodists.
9½	„	Independents and Baptists.
6½	„	Other sects.
3½	„	Roman Catholics.
42	„	Churchmen proper.
26	„	„ nominal.

100

He could not resist the conclusion that as far as the conscientious objection was concerned the abolition of church rates alone would be for the benefit of but few. And when he considered the large proportion of parishes in which church rates are easily levied—the petition signed by the whole body of archdeacons in their favour—and that where these rates are abolished, Birmingham for example, the churches are out of repair, and that where they are most readily levied—there, according to the evidence of Archdeacon Sandford, there are most voluntary contributions, he could not but feel convinced that to a large mass of the people of this country who had long looked to these rates for the support of their places of worship, an injustice would be done by their abolition of very considerable extent. When we considered the length to which religious controversy is too apt to run, the extreme bitterness it generally provokes, and the want of practical Christianity with which it is too often accompanied, every one must rejoice when any question that arouses it is removed from the arena of public discussion, and must be anxious to make the greatest concessions possible for

Mr. Perry Wallington

in Birmingham and other places were referred to by the hon. Member for Nottingham as an example of the advantages of the voluntary system. It was a curious fact that two days after this statement was made by the hon. Member for Nottingham in the House of Commons, we find one clergyman from Birmingham (Mr. Yorke) stating before the Committee of the House of Lords that "the external appearance of his church is ruinous in the extreme." We find another clergyman (Dr. Miller) stating that "the present system, as carried on in Birmingham, is a perfect mill-stone round the necks of a great majority of the ministers in the town, seriously prejudicing their spiritual work;" and Archdeacon Sandford, speaking generally: "The churches in Birmingham are going into decay." Surely it is not to Birmingham that we can look in the interest of the Established Church for an example of the advantage of the abolition of church rates. From Braintree, too, a town well known in connection with this subject—a town in his (Mr. Watlington's) own county—from Braintree, where the rates are practically abolished, the Incumbent writes in November last: "Our dilapidated church presents a most deplorable aspect; we cannot now proceed for want of funds." These, surely, are not encouraging instances to churchmen in favour of total abolition. As he had before stated he did not for a moment believe that the existence of an endowed church was prejudicial to the disposition to make voluntary contributions for religious purposes, nor were Churchmen less prone than members of other denominations to recognize it as a duty to give to these objects according to their means. All were aware of the spiritual destitution of the metropolis; every one must fear that a similar destitution existed in all the large towns of the kingdom; every one must be alive to the sadness of that state of things, which admitted the possibility of an estimate being made by which 25 per cent of the population was shown to be totally irreligious—the great need of exertion was fully recognized—and if the efforts made did not meet the necessity of the case, it was owing to the infirmity of human nature, and not to the fault of the system which Churchmen upheld. Depend upon it, by injuring the Established Church, injury would be done to one of the most zealous advocates for the exercise of voluntary benevolence. He was entirely opposed to the measure of the hon. Baronet, because it was a proposition not for a compromise, but the total abolition of the church rates; but at the same time he could not support the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, which did not, in his opinion, meet the difficulties of the case. He considered that the measure already introduced by the hon. Member for Buckingham, or one founded on the Report of the Lords' Committee, would be far preferable; and he would resist to the utmost the measure now before the House.

MR. EVANS wished to say a few words lest his vote might be misinterpreted. He was not wedded to any particular measure, but was most anxious that this vexatious and annoying question should be settled. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman) had called it a "convenient" question, but he thought it a most inconvenient one, for the constant agitation of it brought about ill feeling between Churchmen and Dissenters, and was most injurious to the Church itself. Having listened to the debates, and read the evidence on the subject, he must say that he did not apprehend any danger from the present measure. He had no fear for the Established Church. That Church was a rich Church, and he was certain that the Members of the Church were not less zealous than the members of other religious communities, and he believed that if church rates were abolished no difficulty would be felt in providing for the maintenance of the sacred fabrics and the decent celebration of the religious services. As to the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire, he believed that hon. Gentleman was actuated by good motives. He believed the Amendment was based upon evidence given before a Committee of the House of Lords by Mr. Coode, who was of opinion that although the rate was levied, no one who objected to pay the rate should be obliged to pay it, even though the objection was not taken until the collector called for the rate. By the adoption of such a plan as this it was plain that agitation would be revived, not suppressed. He could not support the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman, for it would in no manner settle the question. He had not much hope of seeing the question settled this year. He feared it would not even if passed here meet a very favourable reception elsewhere, for last year the Bill passed by a large majority in this House for the aboli-

that it sought payment of matter of concern upon land. Church rates were the proper not a charge until that should be quite state of public work out the for North of Lords had they had made astonished to gentlemen on the most ex-nude in any rds proposed d charge on ble the rates pay church ght be given church rates, question, the that all at-would fail, ould be done ates, leaving btain as she of repairing He had no ld propound ans to repair quire legis-ould be dis-if it were Member had had said on churches in i repair, al-paid. What ches in Bir-od repair as e ceased in of religion known Bir-Canon Mil-n quoted by hed to speak et excellent the case of ks. In the fr. Mellor's) d at a meet-used to put levying of the amend-riot occurred Member of that House was prosecuted for being concerned in that riot. The trial lasted several days. It was a spasmodic effort on the part of the Church to revive church rates at Birmingham. The prosecution entirely failed, and the rector had to pay the costs, which he believed were not less than £1,200. From that time to this, no attempt had been made to impose church rates on Birmingham. In fact, you might as well attempt to collect the national debt as church rates at Birmingham. With reference to the testimony of the Rev. Canon Brooks, quoted by the hon. Gentleman, as to the sentiments of Dissenters with regard to church rates in the constituency of Nottingham—which he (Mr. Mellor) had the honour to represent—he begged to say that exemplary clergyman was, in his opinion, entirely mistaken as to those sentiments. His hon. Colleague had recently presented a petition, containing 6,200 signatures, from Nottingham, against church rates; and he himself had presented many similar petitions from that constituency. That ought to be a sufficient answer to the opinion of the Rev. Canon Brooks that three-fourths of the Dissenters in Nottingham had no objection to maintain church rates. Canon Brooks admitted that there were district churches in Nottingham for which Canon Brooks stated that churchmen thought it was unfair to call upon them to support the pariah church. Why? Because they did not attend it, but attended the district churches. Why, that was the whole argument for abolition. According to his experience he thought the church would be better supported without church rates than with them. His notion was that people valued that which they paid for much more than they did what was provided by eleemosynary contributions.

Mr. A. MILLS said, he had generally supported the attempts made at a compromise of this question, and he should support that contained in the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, not, however, because he thought it to be the best suggestion that could be made. He did not, however, think it was the part of the friends of the Church to propose compromises, or alternatives for the proposition which was now before the House to abolish church rates. This agitation had now lasted fifty years. The advocates of abolition asked us to annihilate an ancient and valuable machinery which 90 per cent of the parishes of England now voluntarily used for the maintenance of divine worship. It was for those who urged a grievance to present it to the House in a practical form, so that it might be dealt with, without interfering with interests that ought to be protected. The hon. Baronet (Sir John Trelawny) and his friends had not adopted this moderate and reasonable course. And now, when Parliament was actually extending and increasing the powers of local taxation, in respect of libraries and recreation grounds, and even so far as to provide for the analysis of articles of food, yet at the same moment we were called on to destroy the machinery by which the expenses of maintaining our churches were provided for. He thought that the plan by which Dissenters could have relieved themselves of the obligation to pay church rates by obtaining certificates that they were Dissenters and objected to the payment of church rates, had been too hastily disposed of. The objection to that plan was, that Dissenters would be ashamed of obtaining an exemption in that mode, and that they ought not, as the phrase went, to be "ticketed;" but he could not conceive why a Dissenter should be ashamed to avow his dissent. He (Mr. Mills) was not ashamed of avowing that he was a member of the Church of England, but if on the ground of nonconformity exception was claimed, let that ground be plainly stated, and let the Legislature deal with it in a fair and tolerant spirit.

MR. WALTER said, there was a remark which he had met with of an eminent ecclesiastical writer of the present day, and which was a very trite one, that "When people understand each other, controversy is either at an end or hopeless." Now, if there was any one question of which it could be said that they all understood each other, it was that of church rates; and for his part the more he heard the subject discussed the more he was convinced that there were only two modes of dealing with it. One was to repeal the decision of the House of Lords in the Braintree case; the other to abolish church-rates altogether. He saw no middle course, and he believed there was none. Believing that it was impossible for hon. Members opposite to succeed in repealing the decision of the House of Lords, he could not see the use of wasting the time of the House and the country in perpetual discussions of the question year after year, and in endeavouring to arrive at a compromise which he considered to be unattainable. But of all the propositions ever made for the settlement of this question, that of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire appeared to him to be the most utterly hopeless. In the first place that hon. Gentleman very quietly assumed that the period of seven years was to be considered as a statute of limitations to establish a right of the Church in respect of church rates — to establish the right of the Church to levy a rate on owners of property instead of occupiers. [Mr. Newdegate dissented.] The words of the hon. Gentleman's Amendment were "to consider the propriety of establishing in lieu of church rates a charge on all hereditaments, in respect of the occupancy of which church rates have been paid within the last seven years." He presumed that meant, that in all cases in which church rate had been paid for seven years that rate should hereafter be levied as a permanent tax on the owners of the property. In the next place, it limited for all future time the discretion of parishes in respect to the collection of church rates; and it also adopted a principle which he thought was wholly inapplicable to church rates, because, if there were any one rate in connection with the Church which it devolved upon the occupiers to pay rather than the owner, it was that which went to the maintenance and repair of the fabric of the Church. They all knew that the Church to which the majority of that House belonged was not a material fabric, but, as it was defined in the Articles of their Church, a congregation of faithful men, the fabric being altogether irrespective of the essence of the Church. The material fabric being designed for the accommodation of worshippers, surely those who used the fabric should pay for the use of it, and not the owners of property, who might be living in another part of the country, and who might have nothing to do with it. Even as regarded occupiers it might be a matter of hardship. He could state the case of a tenant of his own—the tenant of a large farm—who would have to pay more than anybody else, though he had not a seat in the church, and could not get one; and a clergyman some days ago mentioned to him the case of a tenant of his who was in exactly the same position. He confessed, though as zealous a Churchman as any Member of that House, that he would have no hesitation whatever in relying wholly on the efforts of the voluntary system as a substitute for any deficiency that might arise from the surrender of this miserable contribution. When they considered how the proportions of the Church were varying from year to year—how new districts were being perpetually created—thus altering the proportion of the mother churches to the whole, the question was reduced to a very small point; and he put it to hon. Gentlemen opposite whether it was worth while contending for the retention of a rate of this kind, which would obviously be applicable to a mere fraction of the churches in this country. Even the Committee of the House of Lords, in their Report, proposed to exempt new districts from liability to the rate. On the other hand, if there were any other aid required as a supplement to the voluntary system, he could see no reason, either in theory or in practice, against the plan of a limited system of pew-rents, leaving, of course, a certain number of seats free for the maintenance of the fabric of the Church, in which the occupiers of pews had an interest. Considering that the wealthy classes invariably helped themselves to the best seats—and he did not quarrel with them for that—he saw no reason why they should not do what was done in every church on the Continent—pay for the seats which they occupied. When the House went into Committee on the Bill he should support the clauses which the right hon. Baronet the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Sir G. Grey) intended to propose.

Mr. A. Mills

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: Sir, our churches are national monuments, and the signal evidence of the zeal, piety, and munificence of our forefathers. In France the State, embracing this idea practically, maintains the sacred fabrics in repairs. The clergy who serve in our churches as ministers of the national religion (too many of them receiving a bare pittance for their incessant toil), are at all times ready to answer every call, of pastoral duty or general active benevolence. The freewill offerings of the people raised the parish church and the grandest minster: and in the humblest hamlet, or the largest town, the venerable fabric is still its chief architectural ornament, and appeals to the highest associations of our nature, the tenderest of human memories, and the most sacred offices that have been celebrated without intermission within its walls. In such towns as Tewkesbury, Malvern, Sherborne, Beverley, Selby, St. Albans, Christchurch, and many others, are noble churches, once collegiate and conventual, and amply endowed, now standing in the midst of comparatively small populations. How are such magnificent structures to be maintained, destitute of a fabric fund, if church rates are absolutely abolished, and no substitute provided? The real question at issue is—Will you dissolve the Established Church? Will you rely upon the notoriously inefficient and precarious collection under a voluntary system for the support of religion? I for my part view with the deepest apprehension any change that would affect the union of the Church and State which is interwoven with our civil institutions and is the safeguard of our social peace. The churchman justly requires that the interests of his communion should be regarded, and his principles treated with respect; all he asks is the preservation of the time-honoured maxim that it is the duty of the State to maintain and repair the fabric as the essential condition of an established Church, while all that his most scrupulous opponent and the most earnest asserter of toleration can claim, is exemption from contributing to expenses incurred in the celebration of services peculiar to those who worship within the pale of the Church. This I am ready to concede, but I do fervently hope that this House will arrive at a satisfactory practical adjustment and final settlement of a long-vexed question, indeed, too long a theme of public discussion and local animosities and difficulty, for the evil is pressing, and requires an immediate remedy. I have no fear, however, of the result, even if the Church shall be told to lean on her natural strength and be left to the affections of the people, as her last and chief resource; but that is no redress for the serious blow and wrong which are aimed against her vitality.

MR. NEWDEGATE wished to say one or two words. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member, having moved an Amendment, is not entitled to speak again.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 222; Noes 49: Majority 173.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

List of the AYES.

Adair H. E.	Agnew, Sir A.
Adam, W. P.	Alcock, T.
Adderley, rt. hon. C. B.	Antrobus, E.

d in parishes
' the seats are that he could a Bill for the
He voted for se he thought
church rates
e House.

ved to add as ause 1 :—

able out of the eforth defrayed from any other
com to the con-

stated, was to ported out of
' were under admitted that on Peto) was course he was all religious to make one esent position ad been made nduce him to which had just ions to defeat

hat (his own)
ould regret if f had induced
s side of the dications of a occupants of
. It was a dis-ier for good or
net. The hon.
proposed the position which on that occa-
that no com-
r the abolition
had abstained
(Mr. Newde-lthough they reversed their s rejecting all for the aboli-
amented this.
at it. From uly last year, ontinuance of ved himself to rs had diminic House had olicy, and he
he explained.
; abandon his position, but year after year he would indicate his feeling on this subject by a Motion

MR. MOWBRAY must say for himself, and many others who sat near him, that there was no inconsistency in the course they had taken. His hon. Friend had placed those who were as attached and as zealous in defending the rights of the Church as himself in the painful position of refusing to join him in affirming a proposition which, in their opinion, was not only not conducive to the interests of the Church, but which involved even greater and more numerous objections on the part of Dissenters than even the present law of church rates. His hon. Friend had been both privately and publicly implored to withdraw a proposition which many of his friends considered objectionable, and, giving his hon. Friend credit for sincerity and consistency, he had yet no right to reflect upon the consistency of those who had voted with him last July, but who now felt it to be their duty to walk out of the House, and to give no vote upon his proposition.

MR. MALINS said, he had gone even a step further than his right hon. Friend (Mr. Mowbray) for he had voted against the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire. He should, however, be sorry if it were supposed that he was in favour of the Bill of the hon. Baronet. He (Mr. Malins) was opposed to the abolition of church rates. He was, in fact, in favour of their total maintenance.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that what he had stated had at all events elicited some explanation, whether satisfactory or not was a matter for the judgment of the House. He could not forget that he had acted on the distinct suggestions that he received last year. Hon. Members might assign what reasons they chose for having changed their policy. He, at least, had pursued a straightforward course, and he hoped that the House would not think him disrespectful when he stated that he should continue to pursue it.

MR. SELWYN opposed the clause of the hon. Member for Finsbury, which was an attempt to repeal local Acts without any sufficient cause.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY did not think the proposed clause was in accordance with the Bill before the House, though the object of that proposal might be effected by a distinct measure.

wardens should be responsible for the sum they placed on one pew as compared with another?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that it would be done by the incumbent and churchwardens according to the statutes now in force establishing the same principle, and which no difficulty was found in carrying out. As to the observation of the right hon. Member for Wiltshire (Mr. Sotheron Estcourt), the wording meant, of course, seats legally appropriated, and he was not aware that any individual seats were exclusively appropriated to particular persons.

MR. WALPOLE objected to read the clause a second time, for the right hon. Baronet did not appear to see the full scope of it, and did not intend that it should have the effect pointed out by his right hon. Friend (Mr. S. Estcourt). He observed that the right hon. Baronet used the words "exclusively appropriated;" but, if he would ask the law officers of the Crown in what way pews could be legally appropriated to any person, he would find there were very rare instances indeed, possibly there were none, in which pews could be claimed by any persons whatever, unless by faculty or prescription. The hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) said he did not see any hardship in putting a rent on pews, because no person need pay such rent unless he chose. Need not pay it! Why, the effect of this arrangement would be simply to send down a message to every parish in the kingdom, that A B or C D, who had been accustomed to go to a particular pew all his lifetime, must pay rent for it in future, or he could not come to church. His hon. Friend (Mr. Walter) made a remark just now which certainly had some effect on the House. He said that when persons knew what they were about, there was either an end to controversy, or controversy was hopeless; but he wished to ask him—did they know what they were about? Down to a recent period the usual question in regard to church rates was this—Did it press on the consciences of Dissenters? But that was relieved, or offered to be relieved. And now did they know what they were about? According to the evidence taken before the House of Lords, the Dissenters declared that this was a step towards separation of Church and State and the spoliation of Church property and the destruction of the Church. He therefore wished to ask his hon. Friend whether they both knew what they were about?—whether his Friend (Mr. Walter) intended—he (Mr. Walpole) himself certainly did not intend—if the Bill passed in its present form, to admit the understanding upon which Dissenters were now pressing it on—namely, that it was a step towards doing away with the Church as a part of the established institution of the country.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY thought that if a palliative was to be applied, it would require to be more mature than that the right hon. Baronet had submitted to them. He was afraid that the imposition of sums upon pews would have a tendency to dry up the liberality of contributors to the funds of the Church.

LORD JOHN MANNERS remarked that the ill-feeling and litigation caused by church rates had always been pointed out as one of the great reasons for their abolition; but it was certain that, if the clause now proposed were carried into operation, it could not fail to produce all the enmity and litigation which it was alleged to be the object of the Bill to prevent. There were at this moment societies formed through the country to put down this very system of appropriated pews which the clauses would perpetuate. Besides, it was clear, from the words of the clause, that the plan would take in the whole of the pews that by faculty, prescription, or use, had been appropriated to particular individuals. The right hon. Gentleman had overlooked the common law in this matter, which gave parishioners a right to go to the churchwardens, and ask for sittings; and the churchwarden was bound to appropriate them to the full extent of the church room. He would not go into the general question of the pew system. He had always held it in utter abomination, on social, religious, and political grounds, and would never do anything to extend a system which must be attended with such evil results.

MR. HORSMAN had on various occasions expressed his objection in the House to the pew system; but he must say he thought the present proposition of even a more novel, dangerous, and mischievous character. Hitherto there had been a cause of quarrel between the Church and Dissenters; but if this clause were carried it would now be between the clergyman and his parishioners. Any arbitrary and capricious imposition by the clergyman of a sum on any particular pew might have nating the occupier and that church, and perhaps the number of Dissenters.

WILLOUGHBY hoped I should not lightly reject the right hon. Gentleman. He was of opinion that Dissenters should pay church rates; and as it was the fabric of the churches maintained, some compromise was proposed by which Churchmen should contribute to the support of the churches, not seen a more favourable compromise than that of the right hon. Gentleman, and therefore he thought, however, that the sums on the pews should be paid to the incumbent and not to the church, but that the occupiers should have a voice in the matter.

He would support the clause, which would provide free sittings for Dissenters free access to the churches, and secure the measure a more permanent position in "another place."

MR. LAURENCE wished before the vote was taken, to have an answer from the Government to the question of Lord J. Manners), whether the measure proceeded from an individual, or was one recommended by the united Cabinet, including the Lord of the Exchequer.

GREY said, that upon the question of church rates, it was well known how long since there had been a change of Cabinet. Hon. Members would recollect that a distinction was made of Lord Derby's Government, who voted for the total abolition of church rates in opposition to his own views. He had no hesitation in saying that if a proposal was brought forward that church rates were not made by the Government, he had on former occasions taken part in discussions on this question, and it was right to suggest what was an unobjectionable substitution of a rate for church rates. It was, however, to be understood that he did not despair of the Government in providing for the churches, and had no expectation that the rates would be allowed to fall into disuse if the rates were abolished.

He thought it to be a general impression that they had not discussed the subject, and as it was necessary to leave some time for the discussion of the Votes in Supply, he did

(5.) £65,000, on account, Departments of Secretary for War and Commander in Chief.

(6.) £125,000, on account, Manufacturing Departments, &c.

(7.) £315,000, on account, Wages of Artificers, &c.

(8.) £114,000, on account, Clothing and Necessaries.

(9.) £427,000, on account, Provisions, &c.

(10.) £723,000, on account, Warlike Stores.

(11.) £215,000, on account, Fortifications.

Upon a Vote of £69,000 for Civil Buildings,

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he assented to these Votes on account with the confident expectation that the right hon. Gentleman would exercise the power given him very sparingly, and that he would take care to leave open all questions for the Committee on a future occasion.

COLONEL KNOX protested against the plan of taking Estimates on account. There was never any redress when they had parted with such large sums in that manner.

MR. BENTINCK asked whether the fortifications at Alderney were included?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that whatever works were under contract were included. He presumed that the House of Commons would not wish to stop works in progress under contracts already made.

MR. CHAIRMAN said, the Vote before the Committee was for Civil Buildings.

MR. BENTINCK said, that recent experience showed there was no difficulty in breaking contracts. He objected to the outlay of a single shilling more on the fortifications at Alderney. He wanted to know whether it was intended to go on spending money which many hon. Members believed would be utterly wasted. He was opposed to these works altogether, and intended to oppose every one of them.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that in that case the Chairman had better report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again on Friday.

House resumed.

INCOME-TAX BILL,

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved that the Speaker leave the Chair in order to go into Committee on this Bill.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. SPEAKER do now leave the Chair."

COLONEL DUNNE complained that many hon. Members had had no opportunity of discussing the provisions of this Bill, to which there were great objections. He himself intended to propose that in Ireland the tax should be 9*d.* and not 10*d.*, and unless a promise were given that he should do so to-morrow on the Report, he would proceed with his Motion now.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there would be an opportunity to-morrow evening, on bringing up the Report. The only reason why he asked the House to permit the Bill to pass this stage to-day was to prevent the House of Lords being compelled to postpone their adjournment for the Easter recess.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he had thirty petitions to present, praying the House not to impose the income tax on incomes of less than £150 a year.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member cannot present petitions on the Question that I leave the Chair.

House in Committee.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he would take the sense of the House to-morrow on the question that incomes of less than £150 a year be exempted.

MR. BENTINCK urged the Chancellor of the Exchequer to fix a certain hour after which he would not bring up the Report to-morrow.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not attempt to force this Bill through the House without giving an opportunity for full and ample discussion.

It being a Quarter to Six o'Clock the Chairman left his seat at the table, and the Speaker returned to the chair.

House resumed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the stage of the Bill would be lost unless hon. Gentlemen opposite would consent to the House going again into Committee.

Committee report Progress; to sit again this day.

House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee.

House in Committee.

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

his belief
which the le powers additional of loans
no clause in which he power stringent sufficient.

hoped it
its of all the land-served by n by not

ie House, nt money
n Ireland, Treasury improve-ny person
which the t that no
ie accom-
labourers r cultivae believed l to adopt of Works built than Amend-
office was said, that valuable,

ient sug-
had last desirable,
t sanction ury would were en-proposed appeared e restric-building should be cottages od sense
nt abuse;
ight take purpose would let also retain ms which re to get erved that that pro-

e mainte-
n.]

nance of the new cottages to be erected under this Act, for if left to themselves, as was too often the case in Ireland, they would fall into ruin and decay. The removal of the original cottages, which were in most cases mere hovels, fit neither for human nor animal occupation, should be provided for. The Bill he believed to be a most useful measure; but it ought to be accompanied by protective clauses.

House in Committee.

Bill reported without Amendment.

Lord REDESDALE moved a clause giving power to the Board of Works to exercise control over the number of cottages to be erected on the estate. Their maintenance in good repair would be secured in a great degree by the supervision of the officers of the Board of Works, who, as long as there was money to be repaid, would take care that the security was kept in proper order; and, as the repayment was to extend over a period of twenty-two years, the extent to which these buildings would be suffered to want repair could not be very serious. The Board, too, would no doubt take care that the cottages were efficiently maintained, so as to produce a rent adequate as a security for the repayment of the loan. He left the removal of the old buildings altogether at the discretion of the Commissioners of Works, who would be guided by the proportionate increase which might take place in the population.

Amendment moved to

"Omit the Words ('the Labouring Classes in Ireland,') and insert ('Labourers and their Families in any Case in which it shall appear to the Commissioners for Public Works in Ireland that more or improved Accommodation for such Labourers is required; and the Commissioners, as the Condition of such Loan, shall require existing Dwellings to be removed, if they shall consider such Removal expedient, and shall not sanction the Erection of any greater Number of Dwellings by means of such Loan than they shall consider sufficient for the Accommodation of the Labourers required for the proper Cultivation of the Estate on which any such Loan is to be advanced, or of the Portion of such Estate on which such Dwellings are to be erected.')

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH complained that the principle was about to be departed from of making the money expended on these estates reproductive.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY said, those who were interested in the passing of this measure looked for its productiveness to the increased comfort which it would bestow on the labouring class. It was very desirable to know what xemption of the the Yeomanry ant year. The d previously to exemption; but during the last circumstances in of Volunteer reumstances he xemption would RIPON said, ed to grant an ax to the Yeo- ; that was to the classes to referred. He unity of stating lieved the Yeo- applied equally ; and that per- ps were entitled ax, if they per- the Act of Par-

CE.

ERS.

DROUGH said, opposite (the able to inform overnment were the speech of gentleman made eial position of r in which he If the Govern- a possession of most desirable ore the House. lar ability, and ormer and pre- of India. But confess that the were not alto- l be wished, in- ve the receipts years. Those t of the deficit enditure in suc- account of the . He thought supplied; and able their Lord- session of the balances in the in the various was inclined to the answer to the return he proposed to move for, that a very considerable portion of those balances consisted of deposits over which the Govern- ment had no power whatever. He might mention one that came under his own knowledge, to the amount of £500,000, over which the Government certainly had no power—that was the amount of the sums paid in under the head of prize money to the troops. He proposed to move for an account of the amount of the sums so situated, and of the purposes to which they were appropriated. He was very much struck by the amount of revenue which Mr. Wilson stated he expected— an amount, after deducting all charges of assessment and collection, of more than £37,000,000. If that were the case, what must be the position of Indian finances now compared with what they were in 1857, when revenue and expenditure were equalized? Still, he should like to entertain a sanguine hope in regard to them, because while in our own country the interest of the public debt amounted to a third of the whole public revenue, in India it amounted to only a sixth. India was, therefore, not only one of the most lightly, if not the most lightly, taxed of all countries, but also the one most lightly indebted. Mr. Wilson proposed, by great economy and by extending the taxation of the country, to equalize the revenue and expenditure. His own impression had always been, and was now as strong as ever, that the only true foundation of economy in the administration of the finances of India was to be found in a thorough reconciliation between the Go- vernment and the people. Now, he did not think any progress was made towards that result by the plan of finance which Mr. Wilson had propounded. Instead of confining himself to the novelties of finance, he proposed to go back to the most antiquat- ed notions, and to impose a graduated poll tax. Everybody, down to the mere artiz- an, was to be subjected to it. Now, he could imagine no system of taxation more distasteful to the people. He did not think it would promote good feeling be- tween the people and Government to sub- ject the artizans to that tax and to bring them into direct contact with the tax assessor and collector. Neither was the new tax on tobacco a measure tending to the popularity of the Government, it would be sure to create great dissatis- faction. It was stated that Mr. Wilson intended to levy the income tax upon all the community. He felt confident this must be an oversight, and had no intention of making it apply to non-commissioned officers and of the army. The income tax, was to be a general tax upon all persons. He confessed that a description would be extremely difficult if there were a hope of the people believe that it would be with thorough honesty and in accordance with the pledged word of the Government, and if also there existed in the country any machinery for the assessment and collection of the tax in a manner which would be just to the people. No Government had been held to be responsible for many years from levying in the provinces taxes upon the zemindars; he was satisfied that these persons thought the Government had acted fairly, and he was disposed to think that the under-tenants would be of the same opinion. He was afraid the measure of which the zemindars would adopt to make their under-tenants pay and to save themselves. In this country there was ample machinery of a judicial character for assessing and levying an income tax, and a respectability before which appeals were made by those who thought themselves aggrieved. But how would it be possible in the social state of India to find a body of persons or the machinery for levying the tax with impartial justice? He was afraid the known result would be—a constant course of extortion on the one side and the other, and no trustworthy decision could be arrived at between them. However honest and, therefore, the tax would be if honestly and fairly carried out, that it would excite the deepest and most general discontent throughout the country. There was one point in the speech of Mr. Wilson to which he desired to draw their Lordships' attention because he thought that in the manner used by him in respect to the tax was more dangerous than in any other taxation in India. Mr. Wilson proposed to make a very large reduction of the army. Mr. Wilson said the Government was favourable for this reduction; but at the termination of a great war there was a general desire for a large increase in the military expenditure. Mr. Wilson said:—

My army, which so long has been our Earl of Ellenborough

everrented (whichever term might be considered the right one), in regard to the land; but Mr. Wilson did not propose to bring in any increased revenue by adding to that tax; on the contrary, he had pointed out that an actual increase of revenue had been produced by lowering the land tax; and, therefore, as regarded that tax or impost no increase was proposed. That being the case, it could not be said with accuracy that the new system of taxation would be made to press with severity on the great mass of the population. As to the income tax, his noble Friend had forgotten to point out, what Mr. Wilson stated in his speech, that there always existed a certain amount of machinery in India that might be usefully used for its collection. Then with regard to the army, his noble Friend had laid far too much stress on particular words employed by Mr. Wilson. Whatever might be the construction that could be put on those words, it was manifest that when Mr. Wilson spoke of the Sepoy army having committed suicide when it broke out into the late mutiny, only a few regiments remaining in whose loyalty we could confide, he meant the Bengal army. It was perfectly clear that when he used the words quoted by his noble Friend, he had not in his mind the great armies of Madras and Bombay, by whose assistance the mutiny was quelled. It could not be said that the local European army had ceased to exist; but the noble Earl seemed to forget that, owing to the fact that so many of the men had taken their discharge, almost every regiment of that army was reduced to a skeleton. [The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH: No, no!] The noble Earl was, he thought, not correct in holding that opinion, for he found, from a Return which he held in his hand, that the number of men who had taken their discharge from the Bengal 1st Light Cavalry were 436; from the 2nd, 592, or more than one-half; and from the 3rd, 509. There was not, in short, one of the regiments of that army from which less than 300 men had taken their discharge; the regiments, therefore, had been reduced to skeletons. The question of dealing with the local army was one in reference to which the noble Earl must also take into account the circumstances in which the Government were placed. The late Government had appointed a Commission to inquire into and report on the subject. That Commission comprised two Secretaries of State, as well as a very considerable number of officers connected with the Indian army. The result of the investigation was—the two Secretaries of State having abstained from voting—that the majority of the Commission reported against a local army being maintained in that country. Almost all the officers of the Queen's service voted against retaining the local army, and almost all the officers of the East India Company's army voted in favour of retaining it. The Government of the day had under those circumstances to adopt a certain course, and they decided in favour of its maintenance in the proportion of 2-5ths to 3-5ths of the Line. Such was the position of affairs when Her Majesty's present advisers had come into office. His right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for India accordingly announced last year in the House of Commons that, having duly weighed the arguments which had been advanced on both sides of the question, he had determined to adhere to the decision with respect to it at which his predecessors in office had arrived. He might, however, be permitted to observe that, although at the time when the Commission was appointed the opinion of the late Company's officers had been almost unanimous in favour of keeping up a local army in India, events had subsequently occurred by which that opinion had to a considerable extent been altered, and which caused the amalgamation of that army with the Queen's to be regarded, especially by the younger officers, as an object which it was desirable to effect. He had, indeed, been informed that these officers looked upon such a step as one which would be calculated to contribute to their own professional advantage, instead of imagining that their prosperity was bound up with the maintenance of a separate army. He might quote a large number of influential names in support of that view, that it was expedient that the amalgamation of the two armies should take place; but the only one which he should on the present occasion mention was that of Sir Patrick Grant, Commander-in-Chief of the Army of Madras, and a distinguished officer of the late Company, who had, through the usual channels of information, declared himself to be favourable to that opinion. He did not, however, mean to say that the Government had determined to act in accordance with that particular view. Indeed, he almost used Mr. Wilson's very words, saying that the late local army was at an end, and that it amalgamated with the Queen's e did not say that that was the the Government. The question onsiderations of a very compli-re and required to be dealt with eliberation. He was, neverthered to admit that unless means found not only fully to provide terests of officers in India should but also for securing for the hat country a class of men valurather invaluable—for the dis-those duties connected with the e which they had hitherto pert would be absolutely essential, ime at least, to maintain a certain f local force in India. There urse, those who were of opinion ly could provision be made for of that force now in India, but ould be enabled to secure for a supply of men both able and devote their whole lives to the ervice. Unless means to effect cts could be found it was a quese utmost importance to consider he determination of the late and esent Government in the matter ne to which it was desirable to With respect to the officers of the now in India, he might be al-fer to a return from which the had quoted, and which proved r as they were concerned, no in-hitherto been done to their in-He found by that return that out mber of 1,151, including both the local and Native army, there sixty-four who were not em-the performance of either civil y duties; so that they, at all d no right to complain that a had been inflicted upon them. ion, he had simply to repeat that t was under the consideration of nment, and would receive at s that attention which its imemanded.

ARL OF ELLENBOROUGH obt at the end of the last Session it brought in a Bill to enable the ncrease the strength of the local India; so that at least at that endency of opinion was in favour ing a local army. His opinion en in the slightest degree varied nts which had occurred, and he express too strongly his convicur future security in India degether on maintaining that di-

Duke of Argyll

ventilated the scheme before their Lordships; Lord Stanley coincided in the opinion expressed; and ultimately Mr. Wilson was sent out. He was not, however, in the least responsible for sending out Mr. Wilson, but, without approving all he had done, he must say that Mr. Wilson was the only person who had grappled with the difficulty. For years they had gone on with a deficiency in the revenue, and confusion in the accounts. [The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH:—I never could understand them.] They were, indeed, unintelligible—and the Government of India had not discovered the errors in the accounts or made any proposal to meet the difficulty. They had appointed fifteen Gentlemen at home, on account of their supposed experience, but not one of them could invent any scheme to set right the Indian finances. The public were paid off with a convenient cant word that the Revenue was not “elastic.” Although Mr. Wilson might possibly have acted hastily, yet he contended that the public were immensely indebted to him for the gallantry with which he had met the difficulty. The first thing he did was to impose an income tax, of the elasticity of which their Lordships knew something, or would do next year. He believed that this was a measure which it would be found possible to work, though there might be many difficulties in its way. He believed that the noble Earl had himself admitted that there were no persons so lightly taxed as the merchants in India, and the difficulty of getting at their resources was only the same difficulty as was found to exist in this country. He believed it could be levied on them as easily as on the merchants of London. He should like to know whether there was any despatch in which Mr. Wilson had referred to his proposals which could be laid before the House; and he should also wish to know whether these proposals had the sanction of Lord Canning, and whether the Council coincided with Mr. Wilson. He perfectly agreed with the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) that, although he was not prepared to say to what amount, there must be some local army maintained in India.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he was afraid that Mr. Wilson would be too fast for the noble Lord, for he thought it might be inferred from that Gentleman's speech that the Standing Orders would be put aside and the measures passed without delay. He himself found great difficulties, financial as well as military, bequeathed to him when he arrived in India. He had to look around in all directions to discover the means of raising money. Amongst other means that of establishing an income tax was considered, but the difficulties of assessing it and collecting it were so great, and it seemed expedient to allow of so many exceptions, that the plan was given up on account of the smallness of the sum it would have realized. He dismissed altogether the idea of taxing the army, as a thing which was suicidal and altogether contrary to reason. One great practical difficulty in dealing with the wealthy Natives was this, that they were in the habit of lending their money to numerous individuals at very high interest, and he did not know how it would be possible to get at their incomes.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, there was no accompanying despatch and no official information which the Government could produce. Of course, as soon as any despatch arrived, it would be presented to the House. He hoped that the Government in India would lose no time in passing the measures. It had been the object of Parliament, in passing the late Act, to form a strong Government for India, and also that the Government of India should be in India. It was necessary that the original action of the Government of India in matters of taxation, should be in India.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he wished to be allowed to express one word of caution to the noble Duke and the Government. Let them observe that this great measure of taxation, which was to press on every individual in India, was committed to the decision of a legislative body, which, though composed of very respectable gentlemen, was altogether without the confidence of any one man in the country, and that this body was to dispose of the property of all the Natives, many of whom thought that it was contrary to good faith to tax them at all, and that there was not a Native, who was capable of expressing an opinion on the subject.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE hoped the Indian Government was not quite so bad as noble Lords opposite supposed. If so, what was the good of having an Indian Council at all? He had always heard this old song, that India should be governed in India; but practically they were always governing it from England. A Council formed of men of Indian experience was appointed here, and then they sent out a gentleman, who had never been in India in his life, and in a few months he proposed that the whole population should be taxed. He hoped the speech of Mr. Wilson would be laid before the House. It must have come home, or been commented on in some Minute of the Council in Leadenhall Street. Or, if not, it might be made the subject of some innocent Minute, to which the speech might be added as an inclosure, and thus laid before the House. He hoped the whole subject, one of the very gravest importance, would be brought regularly before them.

LORD WYNFORD asked, whether it was intended to form a staff corps of officers for India; and whether officers of the Indian army would be allowed to exchange into the Queen's Army?

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL stated (as we understood) that there would be a staff organized for India; and that the other point had not been decided.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH suggested that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Clanricarde) should move for the production of the documents he had referred to. If the Indian Council had any opinion on the subject, it was right that the House should know it.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he was disposed to do so. The House had a right to know their opinions. They had been appointed to assist the Secretary of State, and he ought to be able to rely on their advice.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at half-past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, March 29, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Emblements, &c. (Ireland); Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland); Bank of Ireland; Poor Relief, &c. (Ireland); Landlord and Tenant (Ireland); Highland Roads and Bridges.
2^o Pawnbrokers Act Amendment; Bankruptcy and Insolvency; Companies.
3^o Benefit Societies Rules Amendment.

BERWICK-UPON-TWEED ELECTION.

House informed, that the Committee had determined,—

“That DUDLEY COULTS MARJORIBANKS, esquire, is duly elected a Burgess to serve in this pre-

The Marquess of Clanricarde

sen T
be as De

qu bo by Re
lin ab

pl ne ex qu
w wi ho
th
of on

CI

th
th in of Ch
th
th rel
th ar
co lai pr ra ce

he lee wl
no cel
Or lar iss lar wl rai
be ha
th

was a sufficient distinction. With regard to the choice of quarters, by which he presumed the hon. and learned Member meant cabins, he had to state that Chaplains were always allowed one of the best cabins in the quietest part of the ship. With regard to sharing prize-money and taking rank as commanders afloat, he was afraid the Admiralty could not accede to that proposal. The Chaplains had never ranked with Commanders afloat, but had taken their rank with the Paymasters and Surgeons, and other Officers of that class, and the Admiralty had no intention of altering that arrangement.

ITALY—THE PAPAL STATES.

NOTE OF THE CARDINAL SECRETARY OF STATE.

QUESTION.

MR. BOWYER said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Lord Cowley has forwarded to Her Majesty's Government a Copy of a Note, dated the 29th day of February last, from his Eminence the Cardinal Secretary of State to the Nuncio at Paris, answering the arguments of Mons. de Thouvenel; and also, whether Her Majesty's Government will lay that state paper upon the Table of the House?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that the Government had not received any Copy of the Despatch in question from Lord Cowley; but Cardinal Antonelli had stated to a Diplomatic Agent in Rome he was extremely sorry he could not give a copy of the document at the time, but that it was about to be published, and he would furnish Copies of it to the Diplomatic Agents in that City. As soon as Her Majesty's Government received it they would take care to lay it on the Table of the House.

LUCKNOW PRIZE MONEY.—QUESTION.

MR. VANCE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India when the prize money for Lucknow will be distributed, and if simultaneously to the Officers entitled to it who have remained in India and to those who have returned home with their regiments, or are invalidated?

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, that before the right hon. Baronet answered that question he wished to know whether he could state what were the Troops among whom that prize money was to be divided.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he was not then in a position to answer the question put by the hon. Baronet. In answer to the hon. Member for Dublin (Mr. Vance), he had to state that the prize money belonged in the first place to the Crown, and it was necessary that the permission of the Crown should be obtained, through the Lords of the Treasury, for its distribution among the Troops. The matter had therefore been referred to them, and it was for the Treasury to give the necessary instructions for the distribution. But the Lords of the Treasury had proposed that a different scale should be adopted from that which usually prevailed, their suggestion being that the scale should be the same as that adopted in the case of the Russian war. The effect of the proposal would be to increase the shares of the private soldiers and to diminish that of the officers of high rank. The authorities at the India Board stated they had no objection whatever to such an arrangement; and that was the state in which the matter stood at the present moment, and he could not precisely say when the distribution would take place.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. VANCE said, he wished to ask the Attorney General if he can state to the House what will be the increased charge on the Consolidated Fund by the operation of the new Bankruptcy Bill?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, the charge to be transferred to the Consolidated Fund appears by the last Return, ending 31st of December, 1859, to be in the aggregate, £20,227. That is a charge for compensations and retiring annuities which, of course, will diminish almost daily, seeing that the greater number of them had been granted so long ago as 1832. I think one gentleman, possessed of the large sinecure of nearly £8,000 a year, has been in the enjoyment of it for thirty years. In all probability therefore that charge will be greatly reduced before the 11th of October, 1860, the day when the Bill proposes to come into operation. But then I do not in the smallest degree consider that there is any engagement on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the payment of compensations and retiring annuities should be a permanent charge on the Consolidated Fund. I expect, if the Bill answers its purpose, that there will be a very large surplus revenue from the income of the Bankruptcy Court. I have provided by the Bill that a very accurate Return shall be prospect of its being proceeded with, it might be introduced to the House; but in the present position of public business, he did not see that any benefit could arise from the introduction of such a Bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he rose to move that the notices of Motions be postponed until after the Orders of the Day for the consideration of the Income Tax Bill as amended, and the Committee on the Stamp Duties. It was material with regard to the arrangements made in "another place" for the Easter vacation, that the two Bills alluded to should be taken that evening. He was under the impression that it was not the desire of the House to renew, in any extended form, the general debate upon the Income Tax Bill. If there were any such desire he at once admitted that it would not be fair to displace the ordinary business, but it would be certainly most convenient that the Bills to which he referred should be taken at once.

Motion made, and Question proposed,—

"That the Notices of Motions be postponed until after the Orders of the Day for the consideration of the Income Tax Bill, as amended, and the Committee on the Stamp Duties Bill."

MR. LINDSAY said, he had a Motion on the paper referring to what he conceived to be a very important subject. He had had a similar Motion on the paper when the Treaty of Commerce was under discussion, and the Government then appealed to him to withdraw it, giving him a distinct pledge that they would grant a day to bring it forward in a distinct form. He saw however, from the great pressure of public business that it would be utterly impossible for the Government to redeem that pledge, and he, therefore, considered it was his duty to go to the noble Viscount (Viscount Palmerston) and state that, however important he considered his own Motion, yet the exigencies of the public business appeared so great that he could not keep the Government to their pledge regarding it. He, therefore, took his chance, and balloted for a day. He got that day, his Motion stood second on the paper, and there was, therefore, a good prospect of having it brought on. Now, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Motion were carried there would be but little chance of its coming on that night, and, consequently, of its coming on before the Easter holidays. He felt, therefore, reluctantly compelled to oppose the Motion.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he could assure the hon. Gentleman that there was no intention on the part of the Government to offer any opposition to his Motion. On the contrary, he thought it would be a fit resolution for the House to adopt, and therefore, so far as that circumstance might guide him with regard to the question of time, he could assure the hon. Gentleman that so far as the Government were concerned they had no objection whatever to his Motion being acceded to at once. Whatever hon. Members might determine as to the right of precedence, he trusted that even if the Motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer should not be acceded to, the two Bills to which it referred might be proceeded with at a somewhat early hour in order that hon. Members, who were anxious to express their opinions with regard to them might have an opportunity of doing so.

MR. DISRAELI said, that this was the fourth Thursday that private Members had been called upon to relinquish their right of proceeding with the business on the paper in its regular order by giving the Government precedence. He considered that they ought not to be called upon to give up their privileges, unless in case of urgent necessity. He was not prepared at all to assent to the assumption of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that there would be no further discussion upon the Income Tax Bill, or even upon the other financial measures. He rather apprehended that there would be a somewhat long discussion. He should himself consider the question very much in reference to the course the Government proposed to take with regard to the duty on paper; and he hoped some communication would be made to the House as to the position in which they were placed on that subject as regarded the duty on the export of rags. That was a subject which very much interested the public at present, and he hoped it might be in the power of the Government to make some satisfactory statement in reference to it. He was at a loss to understand why the Government could not proceed with the financial measures to-morrow.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he hoped the House would not agree to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's demand. The whole business of the House was getting topsy-turvy. They were making Friday a Notice day, and now the Government proposed not to take the Orders of the Day in precedence of Notices of Motion, but to run down the list of Orders, and take two particular Orders, 10 and 11, in precedence of everything else. What was the use of their instituting particular rules for their guidance and information as to when business was to come on, if they were systematically infringed. What was to become of the Orders which stood first on the list, and over which the Government had no control? Both the hon. Members for Liverpool and Guildford had Bills of considerable importance which stood before the Income Tax and Paper Duty Bills.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the right hon. Gentleman need not be so anxious as to the necessity for resisting the demands of Government, because that was one of those demands which it was not in the slightest degree the intention of the Government to force upon a reluctant House. Unless with general acquiescence such a Motion ought not to be carried—it ought not to be forced forward with a limited majority, amid discontent and dissatisfaction. He would therefore withdraw it. All he could venture to say was that he hoped that the Government would be permitted to take the Bills at a later hour than otherwise would have been usual. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) had referred to a point of importance which he said was much connected with the progress of the Bills. He had no difficulty in giving an explanation upon it. He should have been very desirous to bring forward the Paper Duty Bill that evening if the state of public business had permitted it, but he did not think in the present position of the business it would be possible to proceed further before Easter. So far as regarded the duties to be imposed, or not to be imposed, on foreign paper, that was in no respect an urgent question, and there was no necessity whatever for asking the attention of the House until a convenient period after Easter. He begged leave to withdraw the Motion which he had proposed.

Mr. MAGUIRE said, he was very glad the Motion had been withdrawn, and he was also glad to hear the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) say that there would be no opposition on the part of the Government to the Motion of the hon. Member for Sunderland. That discussion would probably, therefore, be short, and

Mr. E. P. Bouverie

tion was headed "The Organization of the Indian Army," that, in truth, was a misnomer, for although the Bengal army had already disappeared, with the exception of thirteen or fifteen regiments; the armies of Bombay and Madras stood intact in their organization, and were now as loyal and effective as they ever were. The question he wished to bring before the House was simply whether the army in India should be under the control exclusively of the Governor General of India and the Secretary of State for India, or whether it should be one under the control of the Secretary of State for War in England and the Horse Guards? The right hon. Secretary of State for India, seemed last year to have made up his mind upon the subject, because he had passed a bill through that House for the maintenance of 80,000 European troops in India as a local army; and he would now ask them whether in a review of the services of that army he had found that the Indian service had ever been wanting in cases of emergency or been unequal to any crisis, or whether there had been a single instance of such a disaster as the loss of an army under an Indian officer, and whether the same could be said of Royal commanders? Most undoubtedly not. As regarded its commanders, had the Indian service not produced its Clive, its Goddard, who marched 6,000 Bengal Sepoys, unaided by European troops, from Calpee, through a hostile country, and saved Guzerat from domination? Had it not also produced its Ochterlony, its Pollock, its Nott, its Outram, its Havelock? The fact that the misfortunes which had occurred in India had never happened under an Indian officer, was attributable to the local experience of Indian officers, their knowledge of the country and the people, and of the organization and temper of their troops. It was by these means that the Indian officers had got through difficulties which had overwhelmed others. With regard to the seniority system in the Indian army, it had been asserted that it necessarily produced old men, worn out in the service, incompetent to command, and physically and mentally unsuited to the elevated position in which they were placed. The names which he had already given was a sufficient answer to that unjustifiable assertion. Moreover, in the Royal army had they not some of the most distinguished men as successful commanders in India at a very advanced stage of life, or, at all events, beyond those periods of life at which officers of the Indian army generally remained in India. They had a Napier and a Gough, and they had now a Clyde—all of them septuagenarians. Therefore the arguments that the seniority system necessarily incapacitated officers for command by reason of age were groundless and futile. The difference of cost between the line and local European troops was 20 per cent; but admitting it to be only 10 per cent, that difference upon ten millions of money spent annually upon European troops in India would be exactly one million per annum saved. Was not that another argument in favour of a local army? Another advantage in regard to the local troops in India, was in their being acclimatized. They were not subject to the same mortality to which troops lately arrived in India were subject. In illustration of this fact, the gallant Colonel mentioned an instance which occurred in the force under General Whitelock, which was composed of troops of the line, and local European troops, about equal in strength, and whilst the losses amongst the acclimatized troops amounted to $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent only, the losses amongst troops of the line was $10\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Another instance occurred in the 71st Regiment of the line, which, with the 3rd Madras European Regiment, was under the command of Sir Hugh Rose, and upon one occasion the 71st Regiment, which had lately arrived from Europe, had twenty men struck down by sun-stroke in one morning, many of whom died. How many men did the House suppose were struck down on that day in the old Indian Madras European Regiment? Not one! It had been said that if a local army in India were maintained, it must deteriorate in its physique, morale, and discipline; but he need only refer to the services rendered by the 1st Bengal Fusiliers and the Madras Fusiliers, and Bombay European Regiments, at the battles of Plassey, Buxar, Arcot, and Guzerat, fought a hundred years ago, and to many other battles whose names emblazon their colours, and to the glorious services recently rendered by those troops during the late outbreak in India, to prove how utterly without foundation was the assertion of deterioration. Again, in this country so jealous were the people of having a standing army that the army was only maintained by an annual Mutiny Act and annual money Votes. What would the people say, then, to an army of 100,000 men being maintained in India, and paid out of the revenues of India, and being under the Secretary for War and the Horse Guards, but independent of the House of Commons? It was proposed that 80,000 European troops should be maintained in India; that every regiment should be relieved decennially; consequently, there would be annually 8,000 men afloat or in transitu; and with the reserves and depôts, the actual number, independent of the House of Commons, would amount to 105,000 men. Now, he asked, would it be possible to recruit an army of 105,000 Englishmen, for Indian service, independently of the army required for the Imperial service at home or in case of a European war? It would be physically impossible; and nothing short of a conscription would ever do it. Besides, an army of 100,000 men must consist of 100 regiments, which would require each from forty to sixty officers, so that there would be 4,000 or 6,000 commissions to be given away. And would the House of Commons be willing to add this vast amount of patronage to that already possessed by the Horse Guards? Yet such would be the effect of the scheme proposed; and if the army in India, with its own organization, was not to be kept under the Governor General and the Secretary for India, there would be a constant clashing of authorities. The returns for which he had asked were absolutely necessary to enable the House to form a right judgment when the question came regularly before it; and he did not see that they could be objected to. They comprised the opinions of men whose opinions, whatever they were, would possess almost irresistible weight in this country, and they could not, he thought, be considered of a confidential character, as every official department was bound to give such information to Parliament when it was demanded, and nothing should be kept back. He agreed with a distinguished public servant now in India, that whenever anything in such cases was concealed the Government itself was damaged by that concealment, and he would warn the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for India that a great feeling of distrust was now growing up in the minds of thousands of our officers in India, and a suspicion was entertained that it was wished not to carry out in a bona fide spirit that clause of the late India Act which ensured to every civil or military servant of the East India Com-

Colonel Sykes

strong arguments in favour of this scheme were adduced by the witnesses who were examined before the Commissioners who acquired into this subject, some of which would briefly and fairly lay before the House. One of their arguments was that if regiments were permanently stationed in India they were apt to deteriorate in discipline. That, however, was stoutly denied by many officers of high authority, and he thought it was hardly borne out by Indian history, which, as the hon. and allant Officer (Colonel Sykes) had said, seemed with the achievements—showing a less good conduct than valour and discipline—of the local European force. They further urged that it would be a good thing if the regular army to have its share in the credit and experience that might be derived from Indian wars. But now that there was no longer a single warlike neighbour to contend with, they might fairly look forward to a long period of peace, so that the soldiers would be more likely to be injured by the Indian climate than benefited by Indian campaigns. It was further said that a mutiny among the European troops would be more easily put down if they belonged to the regular army than if they belonged to a local force—an argument which he did not think worth discussing. These three were the only arguments in favour of the scheme which seemed to him worth notice, except the third argument—and he allowed it to be a powerful one—the argument that surely it must be far best in a single country to have but a single army under a single head; that by blending the two into one they would render the whole force a more effective instrument, and would escape those jealousies that must arise between two services running in couples. It might be replied that what some call jealousy was regarded by others as a wholesome and stimulating emulation; and again, that actual experience had not shown any ill effects from the combination of the local with the Imperial forces. Waiving that, however, and allowing that the army of India should be one army under one head, still it was an open question whether the sound inference would not be to make the whole European army a local one, under the Governor General, instead of making altogether a part of the regular army, under the Horse Guards. That alternative was exactly as open to them as the other, and they ought to remember that the Native army must perforce be a local one.

If, therefore, they made the European force a local one as well, then they would indeed make the Indian army a single army under one head; whereas, in the other case, they would retain the evil, such as it was, of a divided army, under a divided command; and he saw that Indian officers of great experience looked forward with alarm to the mortification and jealousy which the Native army would feel were the line drawn so sharply between itself and the European force. It appeared to him, then, that the arguments in favour of the proposed change were not of great weight, except the last, from which, however, the legitimate inference would not be to imperialize the whole European force, but to localize it all. But, when he turned to the other side of the question, he found the arguments against the scheme so numerous that the difficulty no longer was to find out what they were, but to choose among them, and so powerful that it was not surprising to find nearly every Indian statesman of experience and authority dead against the change. He might just mention the names of the Earl of Ellenborough, Earl Canning, the noble Lord the Member for Lynn; and above all, Sir John Lawrence. No one who had had any intercourse with Sir John Lawrence would dispute his profound knowledge and profound wisdom on questions of Indian policy; but he (Mr. Buxton) knew that Sir John Lawrence looked upon it, not as a matter of secondary consequence, but of first-rate consequence to the welfare of India, to prevent this scheme from being carried out. The House ought to observe this, that while on the one hand the scheme had proceeded from a Commission consisting mainly of a number of English generals and the British Commander-in-Chief, from whom they could not look for any intimacy with Indian affairs, and who might, perhaps, have some bias towards increasing the power of the Horse Guards, on the other hand the scheme was condemned by nearly every man whose judgment on Indian affairs was worth sixpence. And now, what were the arguments that weighed with the latter so strongly? It would detain the House too long were he to dwell upon them all; some, therefore, he would not touch upon. There were a few which he would barely refer to; but there were three or four to which he really was anxious to invite the attention of the House. The arguments that he would simply mention, without dwelling upon them, were those:—It was said that if regiments were permanently stationed in India, instead of merely paying it flying visits, they acquired a kind of traditional knowledge of the way to encounter the climate, and of the necessity for temperance and care; and, in the same way, they acquired an intimacy with the character of the Natives, which preserved them from violating their feelings, and further a smattering of the languages of the country which is found to be very convenient, especially in campaigning. Again, it was pointed out that if a regiment were a mere bird of passage, the men formed no lasting ties in the country, whereas, in local regiments, many of the men intermarried with the Natives, and many of the invalids and pensioners settled among the hills. As regarded health, the mortality in regiments that landed fresh in India was perfectly awful. Some returns given in the Appendix to the blue-book showed that in those regiments that went straight from England to India, 110 men out of every 1,000 die in the first year, and that fact might suggest another strong argument in favour of a local force. They were assured by the highest local authorities that, in Lord Ellenborough's words, it was cruel to see how young men, whose constitutions had not been formed, perished on their arrival in India. Well, then, if they had a distinct army for India, they might for that army put the age of admission, say, three years higher than for the regular army. By that means they would cease to compete with the home army for recruits, while they would lessen the mortality in India, with all the sorrow, suffering, and expense which it entailed. But, once more, they were warned, and that by men of great authority, and with great emphasis, of the risk there would be, that if the European force in India were merely part and parcel of the regular army, then in any stress at home, the remote interests of India, despite their infinite importance, would be forgotten, and our military force there dangerously weakened. To these secondary, and yet weighty arguments, he would add but one more. It was said that already the Horse Guards was overwhelmed with business, that the interests of the army suffered greatly from the impossibility of giving minute attention to such vast affairs, and that it would be a serious evil to the regular army if the Commander-in-Chief was further encumbered with the weight that country than recklessly to fling away millions and half millions. The third essential consideration was this—that if there were a separate army for India, every officer would go out there while still young. He would go not for a short tour, but to spend his days there. He would look forward to an Indian career, and to an Indian career alone. He would therefore have a powerful inducement to familiarize himself with the language of the people, and with whatever else would be likely to advance him in that Indian career, and being, so to speak, the servant of the Indian Government, his abilities, if he proved a man of ability, would be available for that Government either for any military or any civil post, and every one who was at all acquainted with Indian history must be aware of the incalculable due to our dominion over that country of services so obtained. Some objections no doubt had been made to that system, but in the opinion of the wisest Indian statesman, and again he might quote Sir John Lawrence, its effect was to give a powerful stimulus to the officers of the Indian army, by setting before them careers of responsibility and glory, even in the time of peace, and to supply a large body of excellent officials; while, in case of war, it had been found that no officers had shown such robust and vigorous ability as those whose minds had been trained by dealing with large civil affairs. But, abolish the local European force, and that system would be at an end. In that case the thing would work thus:—A regiment stationed, say at Gibraltar, would be sent at its turn to India; the superior officers would, as a matter of course, be middle-aged men, past the period for entering upon a new career; the young men would find that in ten years they would leave India and be home again; that even then perhaps they would be little more than thirty years of age, and the minds of all would rather look to an English or European career than one in Oriental banishment—nor, indeed, would it be possible for the Governor General to borrow other people's officers for his own purposes. If he did so, it would lead to endless clashing between the plans and orders of the unlucky man's two masters. The final consideration, and one of grave moment, was, that if the local army were given up, the head of the European force in India would no longer be the Governor General, but the Commander-in-Chief at home.

Mr. Buxton

Could it be wise to wrest from the Governor of a country like India his authority over the army, and transfer it to an individual 12,000 or 13,000 miles away, and who could have no special knowledge of Indian affairs, nor any special interest in India? Why not leave all possible authority in the hands of him who was responsible for the tranquillity, and well-being, and defence of the empire entrusted to his charge. But if it were said that the change would be merely one of name, and that the Governor General would still exercise paramount sway over the European force in India, then he asked whether it was not an obvious principle, but especially obvious with regard to such a country as India, to leave the whole prestige of authority where the actual authority resided? Why should they needlessly lower the ruler of the country in the eyes of those under him, by placing or seeming to place the command of his military force in other hands? Upon the whole he (Mr. Buxton) was not aware that he had ever endeavoured to weigh the pros and the cons of any subject in which he found the arguments on the one side so utterly overborne by those on the other—perhaps the papers which the hon. Member had moved for might throw some light upon it—but he earnestly hoped the Government might be induced to pause before they gave their sanction to this scheme.

COLONEL P. HERBERT said, when the question at issue came fairly before the House, he did not think that the sentiments of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, which from his having been long connected with the local army, to be both natural and honourable to him would carry much weight with them. The real question which they had to consider was, what would most tend to the efficiency of the army in India, due regard being had to the interests of officers then in the service. The hon. and gallant Gentleman laid great stress upon the economy of the local troops, in contradistinction to the Royal troops. He (Colonel Herbert), however, thought that he had placed the charge of the former at too low a figure. To the alleged impossibility of maintaining the required number of the Royal troops in India, on account of the difficulty of raising recruits, the best reply was, that the recruits had been got. Although it might be difficult suddenly to increase an army, yet, once increased, there could be no real difficulty in maintaining it at the requisite strength. He freely admitted that the local army had done excellent service; but he must say, so far as his small experience in India went, and from what he had learned in conversations there with officers of high rank, the discipline of a local European force was not equal to that of Her Majesty's army. To his mind, there was one great advantage which a Royal army had—namely, that in the case of disaffection arising in any of the regiments of a Royal army, the Indian Government would have the power of moving those regiments down to the coast and sending them to any of the colonies or to England, without assigning any reason, and thereby eradicating the evil; whereas in the case of a local force in India the Government had no such power. All that they could do was to move disaffected regiments from one station in India to another, which would only have the effect of disseminating, instead of eradicating the evil. The question was one to which he paid earnest attention when he was in India; he discussed it also with gentlemen in high stations, both military and civil, and the conclusion at which he arrived, even before the recent mutiny, was that if they were to have a force raised solely for local service they would run the risk of losing for the Government of India that freedom of action which was so necessary for a Government to possess. Occasions might arise on which a local army would combine together for a given purpose like one man; not so a Royal army; and in such an emergency they would run the risk of sacrificing the independence of the Government of India by the army becoming that greatest of all curses—the master, instead of the servant of the State.

SIR DE LACY EVANS was understood to express his astonishment that that discussion had been considered at all necessary, when he remembered that on the debate that took place last year on the question whether there should or there should not be a local European force, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India (Sir C. Wood) went even beyond the expectations of those who desired a local force by intimating his intention to introduce a measure with the object of increasing it considerably. On that occasion, too, the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) expressed himself most emphatically upon the subject, and said it was his bounden duty to place

Colonel P. Herbert

Government published a legal document, drawn up by a gentleman who was more a lawyer than an officer, to the effect that they had no right to their discharge. What had been the result? The soldiers having naturally relied upon the opinion of the heads of the Government and army of this country, and having made up their minds that they were entitled to their discharge, contended obstinately for such right, and got out of temper at finding it denied to them. The Indian Government at length declared that they might have their discharge. But did they act—as it had been said they would in such a case—as one man? No; 10,000 decided to come home, but 11,000 remained. They were greatly provoked, and their demand to be discharged was fully justified. But judging from the treatment which near a thousand of them had received on board the Great Tasmania on the voyage home, it would almost seem as if the authorities in India entertained some feeling of resentment towards them. He was still of opinion that it was not safe for the Government of India to be without the services of a body of officers who had been trained there, and whose ambition was more exclusively directed to Indian than to European service. Then, in reference to the Royal Commission that had been appointed upon the subject, however honourable and independent were the members of that Commission, it should be recollected that very few of them had ever been in India. That Commission consisted of eleven members, the three principal of whom, including the Secretary of State for War, who was chairman, and the Commander-in-Chief, had never been in India, and therefore knew personally nothing whatever of the subject. There were, however, four Indian General officers; and they signed the Report. On the other hand he believed that no less than seventeen gentlemen of the greatest authority and experience in India had dissented from the opinions expressed in the Report of that Commission. Amongst those gentlemen were, he believed, the Governor General of India and the Governor of Madras, Sir John Lawrence, and Sir J. Outram. The hon. and gallant Gentleman said that the discipline of the European local troops was not equal to that of the regiments sent out from England. Although martinetts and civilians, looking to smartness on parade, might fancy there was a superiority in favour of the latter, yet when they took the field the rough and easy manner of the local European regiments accustomed to India told very much in their favour. The local European troops in India had undoubtedly performed singular and continuous services of the highest importance. Amongst the many regiments that had passed through Calcutta, the Madras Fusiliers were received with the greatest acclamation, and had conferred on them the most honourable distinctions. He believed that a great portion of them had obtained their discharge. Were they therefore to be stigmatized for want of loyalty who had so pre-eminently distinguished themselves throughout the whole service? If the right hon. Gentleman should refuse the papers asked for he for one would use every effort to obtain their production when the question came again before the House.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he thought his hon. and gallant Friend, who moved for certain papers which he thought the House ought to have in their possession to enable them to discuss with advantage the question whether there should be any change made in the Indian army, had not acted consistently with his declaration that these papers were necessary to form a correct opinion in entering at considerable length into the general discussion. He certainly would not follow either his hon. and gallant Friend or the other hon. Gentleman who spoke after him. He had stated, in reply to a question put to him a short time ago, that the Government had not finally made up their minds on this important question. It was not a question for the decision of the Secretary of State for India alone; it was not a question which could be decided only on Indian grounds; it must be decided not on Indian, but on Imperial grounds. When that question was decided it might be necessary for him to bring the subject formally before the House, and that would be the proper occasion for discussing the merits of the question. It was quite true that early in the summer he had stated that the Government were prepared to maintain a local European army in India; but very important circumstances had taken place since that time. He would not say there had been a mutiny in the local European army in India; but the fact of upwards of 10,000 men taking their discharge as they did was a circumstance that could not be passed over by the Government in forming a final decision on this subject, as, in truth, it had changed the opinion of many of the most eminent persons in India. This alone, he thought, was sufficient to show that, however anxious they might be to come to a decision on this most important subject, the Government had not acted without good grounds in having paused before they took a final determination. Among the papers moved for by his hon. and gallant Friend were some which had only recently arrived in this country. It was impossible he could enter into a discussion of the main question without indicating an opinion on the one side or the other, and he repeated it was not yet ripe for discussion, and would not be until the question was decided by the Government, when he should bring it before the House and the country. With regard to the papers themselves, he did not think it right to produce them at that stage of the question. When the question could be brought fairly before the House, however, it would be his duty to lay on the table not only the greater part of these papers, but others having an important bearing on the whole subject. With regard to "the decision of the Secretary of State for India in Council," no decision had yet been come to on the subject. The next paper was "the Report of the Actuary to the Secretary of State for India in Council on the cost of a military European force in India of troops of the British line, as compared with the cost of an European local force." He certainly was in possession of that Report; but it was only within the last three days that he had received a very important letter questioning the accuracy of the views contained in it, and he had a decided objection to lay it on the table at present. If his hon. and gallant Friend really wished to have the last portion of the papers—namely, the correspondence between the military authorities—he had not the slightest objection, for these papers contained no opinion on the subject; but he thought the House would agree with him that not only these, but papers on both sides would be necessary to enable them to come to an opinion on this question. In fact, there must be a large blue-book. He had not the slightest wish to keep anything back. He only wished, by producing all the papers together, to enable hon. Members to consult them not partially, but at one view, so as to make up their minds on the whole matter. The papers would be produced whenever the Government had decided the question, and satisfactory. The right hon. Gentleman confessed the greatest anxiety to give the House all the information in his power, and even more than the gallant Member for Aberdeen had asked for; and yet he only refused it the information to be obtained through these Resolutions. The House had seriously to consider what sort of a question that was—not exactly the question involved in this Motion, but the question to which that Motion referred. For his own part he looked upon it as one of the most important subjects that could come before them in connection with the whole future government of India. In time of peace the army expenditure of that Empire was about £12,000,000 sterling, and in the last few years the amount had advanced to some £20,000,000. They might well hope the expenditure would come down again to its old standard, and, for his own part, he would say the sooner the better. But the present question was whether that House should have before it now, or at any early period, such information as the Government could afford to enable it to form a sound judgment on the future management of the whole military establishment of India. Much confidence could not be placed in the right hon. Gentleman's desire that they should know all about it, or in his assurance that when the Government arrived at their decision and came before Parliament for the means of carrying out that decision, then every information would be laid before the House. They were all aware that when the Government had decided, even although they had decided wrongly, a great power was thrown into the balance on one side as against the other; and any conclusion to which a large portion of that House might afterwards come might be seriously prejudiced by the previous conclusion of the Government. Therefore, while the question was still under consideration, not only by the Cabinet and the Horse Guards, but by the part of the public conversant with the matter, it was most important that information should be produced that the House might have an opportunity of studying, conversing, and thinking on the subject; all which would, no doubt, have an influence even on the decision of the Government itself. He had understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that opinions regarding the military establishments of India had greatly changed since the occurrence of recent events. Probably the events thus referred to consisted of the refusal of the Company's European troops to transfer their allegiance to the Queen, and their consequent return home. These circumstances had, however, arisen at the time when the right hon. Gentleman discussed this matter before. But, be that as it might, it would be the paltriest of quibbles for any Government to say that a great question of so much importance ought to be decided upon a ground such as that, springing out of no disloyalty on the part of the troops, but out of one of perhaps the most extraordinary blunders ever committed by any Government. Whether Englishmen were in India as servants of the late Company or of the Crown, he undertook to say that, if the same measure of justice were meted out to them, there would be the same measure of discipline and loyalty. To assert, then, that because 10,000 men had returned to England believing they had been unfairly dealt with—as, indeed, they must have been, or they would not have been allowed to come home—that fact changed the bearing of this whole question, was an excuse which ought not for one moment to be listened to. The Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen asked for copies of the Report of the Military Committee of the Council of India to the Council upon the reorganization of the Indian army, and of the decision of the Secretary of State for India in Council thereon. Of course, if the Secretary of State had not decided, that portion of the return could not be produced. But the Report of the Military Committee to the Council would be of great value to the House in considering this subject. The hon. and gallant Gentleman further asked for the Minutes of members of the Indian Council. Now, though he understood that the members of the Council had not the smallest objection to the publication of that part of the return, yet the Secretary of State might think it not desirable to place these Minutes before the House, because they might disclose discrepancies of view the existence of which it would not be for the advantage of the service to make known. The gallant Member might, therefore, consent to waive that portion of his Resolution. The Motion likewise asked for the report of the Actuary to the Secretary of State on the cost of a military European force in India of troops of the British line as compared with the cost of an European local force. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that within the last few days he had received a revised estimate differing from the original estimate, and he could not yet tell which of the two were correct. If, however, the right hon. Gentleman would undertake to lay the Report on the table as soon as he had ascertained which estimate was correct, the object of the Motion would be answered, and the Resolution might be so altered as to include papers that could be easily granted. That was not the proper time to discuss the great question whether the Indian army should be under the control of the Horse Guards, or under the Secretary of State in Council here, and the Government in India. He had paid no inconsiderable attention to the affairs of India, though not so much to this branch of the subject, perhaps, as to some others; but he thought they would commit a very great error if they permitted the Government, without the most serious deliberation on the part of that House, to come to such a conclusion as should hand over 50,000, 60,000, 70,000, or 80,000 European troops in India to the management of the Horse Guards in this country. Judging from all past experience, the expenditure for the Indian army out of the revenues of India would rise rapidly if the control were transferred to the Horse Guards. And whatever evils had hitherto arisen in the management of the patronage connected with the Indian army would be greatly aggravated if that patronage were added to the present patronage of the Horse Guards. Such being his opinion—though he could not say that no documents which might be produced would change that opinion—he was entitled, and the House was entitled, to call upon the right hon. Gentleman to be frank with them in this matter. An hon. and gallant Member who sat below him (Sir De L. Evans) had referred to a point not often alluded to in that House, and had spoken of the influence of the Court as to that question. It was to be hoped that the House would not feel itself unable to discuss freely a subject on which it was supposed that the influence of the Court was largely engaged. The great interests of India and of England, and the question whether the Indian military expenditure should be £12,000,000 or £20,000,000 sterling were infinitely more important than the sentiments of anybody connected with the Court of England in such a case. The House should, therefore, have the matter fairly before it, that it might not aspect to the Indian service. This was a question which affected, not merely the commands of regiments, but all the staff appointments; and he would remind the House that, if so large a force were transferred to the Line, the Governor General would lose a portion of that proper control which he ought to possess over the whole army in India. The greatest care should be taken that the control of the Governor General should not be impaired. With regard to the Motion, he submitted that there were many reasons why the House should press strongly for the production of the papers now moved for, more especially for that of the opinions of the Members of the Indian Council. Those councillors had been excluded from the House of Commons and placed very much under the control of the Government, and it was therefore very desirable that their Minutes should be laid before the House, in order that they might assist it in coming to a decision upon this question.

Sir Charles Wood

Mr. Bright

Lord ADOLPHUS VANE TEMPEST said, the right hon. Gentleman (Sir C. Wood) found fault with the gallant Member for discussing the subject before the papers had been laid on the table; but then he stated that he should not think proper to produce them; and it thus resulted that the question was not to be discussed at all. The intelligence which had just been received from India, however, showed the importance of the question as to the reorganization of the Indian army. They read that Mr. Wilson contemplated, if he had not executed, the disbandment of the whole Native force of India. Now, having served some time in that country, he entertained a very strong opinion that it would be impossible to maintain British dominion in India with an European force alone. He did not think that a European force of 80,000 men could be permanently kept up; and, besides, there were camp duties which would be much better performed by Natives. The Motion ought to have received more consideration than the right hon. Secretary of State for India seemed disposed to show to it; and, at all events, the right hon. Gentleman ought to lay upon the table such papers as he thought might be produced without inconvenience to the public service, in order that hon. Members might have some data upon which to form an opinion as to one of the most important questions which could affect our Indian Empire.

Mr. T. G. BARING said, he concurred with those who urged that the House before it discussed the question, ought to be placed in full possession of the materials for arriving at a conclusion. He would remind hon. Members, however, that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for India had promised that prior to that discussion, and as soon as Her Majesty's Government had decided what course they ought to pursue, such of these papers as existed should be laid upon the table. He had also added—and he hoped that would be satisfactory to the House—that he would at the same time produce other papers bearing upon the subject. There was not the slightest intention to conceal from the House the opinions of the members of the Indian Council; on the contrary, those opinions would be laid before Parliament at the proper time, and therefore he hoped the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen would not press his Motion to a division. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) would perhaps feel relieved when he told him that the question was not one of the magnitude that he supposed with regard to the number of troops it concerned. It did not affect the number that he had stated.

Mr. BRIGHT said, he had stated no specific number. What he said was—50,000, 60,000, or 80,000, or whatever the number might be.

Mr. T. G. BARING said, that when he informed the House that the whole of the Local European troops concerned amounted to between 11,000 and 12,000 men, it would be seen that the hon. Member had rather exaggerated the numbers. The hon. Member talked also as if the whole power and patronage of the army in India were to be transferred to the Horse Guards. Now, if the hon. Member had read the papers already upon the table with the care and attention that he usually gave to other subjects, he would have found that more than one feasible plan had been proposed by which, if that change were made, no addition at all would be made to the power of the Horse Guards. He (Mr. T. G. Baring) would carefully abstain from expressing any opinion upon that subject, but he wished to disabuse the minds of hon. Members of the idea that the Indian army, under any new arrangement, must necessarily be handed over to the Horse Guards, or that there would be any addition to the patronage of the Horse Guards in respect to staff appointments in India. The hon. Gentleman had further suggested, not in the most civil language, that it was a quibble when his right hon. Friend said that recent occurrences in the European army had obliged Her Majesty's Government to take this matter again into their consideration. He (Mr. T. G. Baring) appealed to hon. Members, and especially to hon. and gallant Officers present, whether those occurrences were not of the most grave character, and whether the Government were not perfectly justified in allowing some delay in order the more carefully to consider the whole question, so that they might not, by a hasty decision, pledge the country to a course which in the end might not be the most advantageous to the public service.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, the question was narrowed to this—whether the documents should be produced or not. He thought they ought; and he would remind the House that as the report of Sir Patrick Grant, expressing a strong opinion on one side had been laid on the table, justice required that the opinions of Sir James Outram and Sir Bartle Frere should also be produced. He entreated the House to take care that they had all the documents before the discussion took place. It was said that when the Government had decided the course they would take, then the question should be discussed; now he thought the discussion ought to precede the decision. Besides, a grave constitutional question was at issue—whether the Government was to have under its command 80,000 or 100,000 men who were not subject to the Mutiny Act or in any way under the control of Parliament. The Indian army was entitled to know what course the Government intended to pursue. He believed that a portion of the Indian Army should consist of local troops, while the other should consist of regiments of the line; but nothing could be so dangerous as to hang up a question of such vital importance, and he hoped the Secretary of State would feel it to be his duty to produce the documents asked for as soon as possible.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he hoped that in the consideration of this question only one object would be kept in view,—the welfare of India; because, upon a wise and prudent decision of it depended the safety and welfare of that country. He could not pretend to say that he had made up his mind in the present state of his information, but strong opinions hav-

Mr. T. G. Baring

their functions, and then to submit it to their responsibility to Parliament. Parliament is, afterwards, to pass judgment on their conduct, approve or disapprove of their acts, and punish them, if you please, by a vote of censure; but it is not the proper function of a legislative assembly to take out of the hands of the executive administration the affairs of the country. Now, I say, it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to take into consideration this question and to decide upon it on their own responsibility. It is very possible that as on many other questions, so on this, the action of Parliament may be necessary in order to give effect to the decision of the Government. In that way, I doubt, Parliament will be called upon to co-operate with the Government in carrying into effect anything the Government may think proper to recommend; and without such action the decision of the Government may be totally vain and fruitless. In that respect the argument of the hon. Member for Birmingham is correct and constitutional. But before Parliament can come to that point it is necessary that they should be in possession of the full information on which the Government may have acted, and the manner in which the Government may intend to carry its intention into effect. Now, Sir, this question is one which no doubt affects the interests of a great number of gallant and meritorious officers, and that may be one element, no doubt, in the consideration; but I contend that it is a question not merely regarding those officers, and not merely regarding the interests of India, but it is a great and Imperial question. It is a question involving the interests of the British Empire, and it is a question to be decided not on narrow and local grounds, but on grounds of military and political expediency, as bearing upon the general interests of the empire at large. It is stated—and I am almost ashamed to advert to these clap-trap arguments or insinuations which we have heard in the course of this discussion—that the Government would be swayed in their decision by considerations of Court influence, of Horse Guards patronage, and God knows what. I feel almost ashamed to defend the Government against those insinuations. I should hope that any Government that aspires to the confidence of this House and the country would act on higher grounds than those—on a sense of public duty—of what they believe to be the proper interest of the country, and would not allow themselves to be swayed by prejudices either on one side or the other. Therefore I say, while, on the one hand, none of those influences which I have alluded to ought for one moment to be considered; so, on the other—although it so happens that all those who have been employed in India may follow the groove in which they are accustomed to run, and speak according to the views and habits of former life—we should not be swayed solely by the turns of thought engendered by those habits and that particular kind of employment. Now, Sir, it is said that if you have the whole of the force a European force in India for general service, the population of the country will not sustain the strain. I should like to know if a certain number of European soldiers are required for service in India what great difference it can make as regards the strain whether they serve in the general service or in the local force. They must serve in India clearly. The hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Henry Willoughby) considers it in a constitutional point of view, and says you will have an army that will not be under the control of Parliament. Why, if that argument has any force, it does not apply any more to the local army than it does to the general service. The local army not coming in any way whatever under the cognizance of Parliament, is exactly that unconstitutional force which the hon. Baronet inveighs against as inconsistent with the institutions of the country. Parliament certainly must have more effectual control over the force in India, if it belongs to the general army than it can have over a local force which is totally withdrawn from all cognizance and control of Parliamentary action. Well, but then, he says, an army in India supplied from the general service would not be sufficiently under the control of the Governor General. [SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY: I never said a word about it.] Well, then the argument was used by some other hon. Member. I beg to say to that hon. Member that the Governor General would have every control over the arrangements for the general service troops—in fact, the same as he has over the local service. The only difference is, that the general service troops are under the general regulations of the army established by the Commander-in-Chief; but all the local arrangements are as much under the orders of the Governor General, with respect to the general service troops, as with respect to the local service troops.

But, however, I will not enter into that now. My right hon. Friend has stated that when all the papers which are essential to a full and proper consideration of the subject shall be ready for presentation, to this House they will be given. He objects, and I object, to partial information, which would only tend to mislead, or insufficient arguments on one side with corresponding arguments on the other. We object to a partial production, but we shall be perfectly prepared to give full information to the House when it is in our hands. I hope, therefore, the hon. and gallant Gentleman will not put the House to the trouble of dividing. His object will have been obtained by that which we shall voluntarily give. With regard to the letter of Sir Patrick Grant, that was addressed to the right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel), and forms part of the documents already presented.

COLONEL NORTH said, that the hon. Member for Birmingham was in the habit of making statements which were wholly and wilfully erroneous.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he rose to order. The hon. and gallant Member would feel on reflection that the expressions which had just been used by him were not consistent with the usage or courtesy of the House.

COLONEL NORTH expressed his regret at having transgressed the bounds of order by using an expression which was considered discourteous, but he could not help expressing his wonder that the hon. Member for Birmingham, who had constant opportunities for considering the Army Estimates, should not know that the Horse Guards had nothing whatever to do with the Army Estimates. They were entirely under the control of the Minister for War, and the constant complaint of the Commander-in-Chief was, that he could not command a single farthing even for the purposes of the most necessary sanitary Reforms. With respect to the Indo-European Army, his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Sykes) had paid a justly-merited compliment to its bravery, but what he (Colonel North) complained of was the want of discipline which could have allowed disaffection to go on so long without the knowledge of the officers. During the whole proceedings not a single non-commissioned officer had made his officers acquainted with what was going on, and it was only in consequence of two Queen's soldiers joining the service and telling their officers what they heard, that the matter was at last brought to light. With respect to the Returns moved for, he thought that nothing could be more objectionable than to have information given to the House piecemeal.

Viscount Palmerston

MR. KINNAIRD said, he did not think that the reasons assigned by the noble Lord for refusing his assent to the Motion were satisfactory. The despatch moved for by the hon. and gallant General opposite, expressing as it did a strong opinion on one side of this question, had been granted, and it was only just, therefore, that publicity should be given to opinions of a contrary nature.

MR. VANSITTART observed that he had been told that in Mr. Wilson's financial statement that gentleman said he was not prepared to recommend the resuscitation of the local European Army. It was most desirable to do away with the absurd anomaly of separate Armies in India, with separate interests and separate rules of promotion. He should feel it his duty to support the Government upon that occasion. As it appeared to him that it would, at the present moment, be premature to call upon the Government to produce the papers connected with that important question.

COLONEL SYKES, in reply, said, he held in his hand a copy of Mr. Wilson's speech, and it contained not a word on the subject. If, however, his right hon. Friend the Secretary for India would give him an assurance that he would produce the papers within any definite period, as for instance a week or a fortnight after Easter, he would not press the Motion.

SIR CHARLES WOOD stated that he could not accede to his hon. and gallant Friend's request, but as soon as he was in a condition to produce papers which would reflect opinions on both sides of the Question, he should be prepared to lay them on the table.

Question put and negatived.

DIFFERENTIAL DUTIES—(FRANCE). ADDRESS MOVED.

MR. LINDSAY said: Sir, I rise to propose the following Motion:—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that she will be graciously pleased to enter into negotiations with the Emperor of the French, with the view of making a Treaty for the reciprocal abrogation of all discriminating duties levied upon the vessels and their cargoes of either of the two nations in the ports of the other; and for procuring such alterations in the Navigation Laws of France, as may tend to facilitate the Commercial intercourse, and strengthen the friendly relations between England and France."

After the statement made in the early part of the evening by the noble Lord at the head of the Government, that he did not mean to offer any opposition to this Motion, I should content myself with simply proposing it to the House, were it not that, from the peculiar nature of the subject to which it relates, there are two parties who must give to it their assent before it can be attended with any practical effect. This House may adopt the Resolution, but it can lead to no result, unless it shall also meet with the approval of the Government of France; and I therefore deem it expedient that I should go at some length into the question with which it deals. I believe that although the change which I advocate is desirable on the part of England, it would be still more beneficial to France. Those Navigation Laws, which we abolished in the year 1849, had been imitated by France and other countries. They had been framed as long ago as the year 1651, and they had been in operation since that period until the year 1849, with the exception of those alterations which had been made in them under Reciprocity Treaties, concluded some time after the commencement of the present century. By them it was provided that no goods from Asia, Africa, or America should be imported into this country in any but British ships; and that from Europe no goods should be imported except in British ships, or ships of the country where the goods were produced. There were, besides, lists of what were called "enumerated articles," which could only be imported, under any circumstances, in English vessels; and there were double duties against foreign ships for Light Dues, Harbour Dues, and other charges. Those laws remained in force until the year 1850, when the measure for their abolition, which had been passed in the preceding year, came into operation. They were somewhat broken in upon by a Treaty into which we entered with Turkey in the year 1809, and which was our first Reciprocity Treaty. But the first great blow next struck at them was the Reciprocity Treaty which we were compelled to conclude with the United States of America in the year 1815. By the laws previously in force we prohibited the Americans from bringing us their own produce in their own ships. They protested, and very properly protested, against such a provision, but their remonstrances had hitherto been made in vain. At last they gave notice to our Government that they would be obliged to exclude the ships of England from their ports unless we made a material change in our Navigation Laws. The British Government paid no attention to that threat, and then the Government of the United States levied a duty of one dollar per ton on every British ship entering their ports; and not satisfied with that, they imposed a differential duty of 10 per cent on all our manufactures imported in British ships. The result was that we were driven to the necessity of forming with them a Reciprocity Treaty, which placed American ships entering our ports upon the same footing, with regard to duties and local charges, on which they placed our ships entering their ports. Shortly after that we had to make a similar concession to almost every other country. Every one conversant with that subject must be aware that in the year 1822 the Prussian Government complained of the effect of our Navigation Laws on their trade, and threatened to exclude our ships from their ports unless we changed those laws. The consequence was that Mr. Huskisson found it necessary to conclude a Reciprocity Treaty with Prussia upon the most liberal terms which had previously been adopted, in the case of the United States of America, in 1815. Then followed our Reciprocity Treaties with other countries, including France, with which we entered into a treaty of that character in the year 1826. France, it might therefore be said, had imitated our policy in that matter throughout its two early stages. She had followed our exclusive system, which we had commenced in the year 1651, and which she had "imitated" in the year 1664; and she had afterwards concluded, as we had done, Reciprocity Treaties. It will, perhaps, be advisable, considering the subject which I have now in view, that I should here state what it is that we have lost or gained by the policy which we have pursued upon this subject. In the year 1720—the earliest period for which we have any Returns—under the protective system, there cleared outwards from our ports 430,000 tons of British shipping; and in the year 1810 there cleared outwards from our ports 1,600,000 tons; showing an increase of 1,170,000 tons in these ninety years. Hon. Members might think that was a large increase; but as throughout that period we had the command of nearly the whole Carrying Trade of the world, he believed it ought really to be regarded as a very small increase, and it would appear still more so when it was compared with the figures of other epochs. The middle stage of our Navigation Laws was that of a reciprocity period. In the year 1820, before the operation of the reciprocity system, there cleared outwards from our ports 1,670,000 tons of British shipping. In the year 1849 we abolished our Navigation Laws, and with them the reciprocity system, and in the year 1850 there cleared outwards from our ports 4,700,000 tons of British shipping; showing, under a partial free trade, an increase of upwards 3,000,000 tons in a period of thirty years, while under a strict protection the increase had amounted to only 1,170,000 tons in ninety years. In the year 1858 there cleared outwards from our ports 6,440,000 tons of British shipping, which give in the eight years an increase of 1,740,000 tons—a greater increase than that which had taken place in ninety years under a close protection. But as it might be said that these Returns did not give a correct view of the state of the trade, I must direct the attention of the House to a statement of the tonnage of the ships which we owned. In the year 1830, under the reciprocity system, we owned 2,500,000 tons of shipping; and at the end of last year we owned nearly 6,000,000 tons; showing, during that interval, an increase of 3,500,000 tons. Look, too, at the other advantages which accompanied the change—at the great improvements which have taken place in the models of our ships—at the application of the screw to navigation—at our magnificent steamships constructed of iron—and, above all, if we look at the vast increase in our commerce which this free trade in shipping has materially assisted, we must at once admit that the free-trade policy was a wise policy, and that it has greatly benefited, not only the country generally, but the shipowners themselves. Now, as I have already said, France followed the example of our ancient navigation laws. She thought that they were founded upon a wise principle; and I fear she still considers that to be a policy which it is her interest to pursue. By her first navigation law she levied 50 sous per ton on all foreign ships frequenting her ports. In the year 1687 she made the law almost an exclusive one against foreigners; and, not satisfied with confining her coasting trade and the trade with her colonies to her own ships, she actually imposed a duty of £30 per ton on all exports from her West Indian colonies, and a duty of £50 per ton on all imports into those colonies; and those charges had to be paid by her people for the purpose of "encouraging" the enterprise of her shipowners. But France, as I have already stated, wisely entered into reciprocity treaties, and her treaty with this country was concluded in the year 1826. I shall now proceed to allude to the state of her navigation laws as they at present exist. There is, first, her coasting trade, which is strictly confined to her own ships, any foreign vessel engaging in that trade being liable, as well as its cargo, to confiscation. There is, next, the direct trade—that is to say, such a trade as that between France and England—and, by the Treaty of Reciprocity, that trade is placed upon the same footing in the two countries. There is, thirdly, the indirect colonial trade of France. That trade is entirely limited to French vessels, the differential duties to which foreign ships are liable being so high that they are excluded from any share in it. Then there is the indirect foreign trade—such a trade, for instance, as that between New Orleans and Havre, or that between Brazil and Bordeaux. From that trade, too, English ships are almost wholly excluded, because the differential duties to which they are liable are so high that they could not enter into the competition. I wish the House to observe what has been the result to France of the policy she has thus pursued. In the year 1787 she had 164,000 tons of native shipping employed in her trade with foreign countries; in the year 1830 she had only 156,000 tons engaged in that trade; so that in the course of those forty-three years that portion of her shipping had decreased by 8,000 tons. In her colonial trade, which is entirely confined to her own ships, she had in the year 1787 not less than 114,000 tons of shipping; she has now only 102,000 tons; so that there has been in the forty-three years a decrease of 12,000 tons in that strictly protected trade. Another very remarkable fact is, that while the protected branches of her shipping have decreased, there has been an increase in those branches of it which were unprotected, and had to engage in a competition with other nations. On comparing the entrances and clearances of France for the year 1856, with the mean number of annual entrances and clearances during the five years from 1851 to 1855, I find that although in the trade with the Colonies there was an increase of 16 per cent, in 1856 there was a decrease of 17 per cent in her strictly protected trade with her own, French possessions out of Europe; and that in her fisheries which were guarded with unusual care, there was a decrease of 4 per cent. But both in her non-protected trade with European countries there was an increase of 10 per cent, and in her non-protected trade with countries out of Europe there was an increase of 11 per cent. What I say is this, that while the policy which has been pursued by France towards this country, in a commercial view, has been injurious to us, it has been far more injurious to France. Let us examine the question with respect to the number and the tonnage of the French ships, and contrast them with ours. In 1787 France owned 500,000 tons of shipping; in 1850, sixty-three years afterwards, she owned only 688,000 tons. Her shipping has only increased, therefore, in sixty-three years, 188,000 tons. In 1835 I find France owned 15,600 vessels; in 1840, instead of any increase, I find she only owned 14,800. The House may say that, although the number of vessels is small, their tonnage may be large. What is the fact? Why, that out of 14,800 vessels there were 10,000 under thirty tons, and 3,000 between thirty and 100 tons. France, in 1838, owned 680,000 tons of shipping, but instead of increasing she appears to have been on the decrease, for I find that in 1844 she owned only 604,637 tons of shipping. Taking the whole period, from 1838 to 1858, the increase in her shipping, under her protective policy, was only 370,000 tons; whereas, if I look to the increase of British shipping during the same period I find it has increased from 2,890,601 tons to 5,609,623. So, while the French shipping has increased only 370,000 tons under her protective policy, British shipping has increased under a free and enlightened policy no less than 2,800,000 tons. What is the case with respect to steam? I find that while we had, in 1838, 82,716 tons of steam vessels, in 1858 we had no less than 488,000 tons; while France, which in 1838 had 9,693 tons of steam shipping, had only increased in 1858 to 66,587 tons. Thus while we have increased upwards of 400,000 tons of steam shipping in the last twenty years, France has only increased about 55,000. The House will also remember what France has given large bounties for the creation of a steam merchant fleet, and yet with all her protective policy in her favour and with all these bounties she can only show an increase in sailing vessels of 370,000 tons as against an increase in British sailing vessels of 2,800,000 tons, and in steamers an increase of 55,000 as against 400,000 tons. Why is all this? France has a greater seaboard than any other country in Europe. Her coast is studded with magnificent ports along the Channel to an extent of no less than 150 leagues; on the shores of the Atlantic she has a seaboard of 130 leagues; and on the shores of the Mediterranean she has a seaboard of 90 leagues. Her situation is all that they can desire for carrying on a very large maritime trade. France is also increasing at an extraordinary rate in her general trade, for I find the increase of her special commerce from 1827 to 1836 to have been 10,000 million francs; from 1837 to 1846, 15,000 million francs; and from 1847 to 1856, to have been no less than 22,000 million francs. That is the commerce which includes only her own manufactures and her own produce, and articles which she imports for her own use; yet in the ten years from 1847 to 1856 the increase in that special commerce has been the immense sum of 20,000 million francs. How is it that, with a splendid situation for carrying on large mercantile pursuits, with such a large seaboard studded with magnificent harbours, with a vast and rapidly increasing commerce of her own, that the shipping of France is almost at a standstill? I will tell you why. It is because the shipowners have been taught by their legislators to depend upon the Government instead of depending upon themselves. As with individuals we seldom see those who have been left well provided for so energetic as men who have to make their way in the world themselves, so it is with nations. It has been proved by the policy of this country that when British shipowners were left to their own energies and their own resources they went on increasing largely, and I have no hesitation in saying if the Emperor of France had adopted as wise a course of policy the shipping of that country would be greatly increased and materially benefitted, and its commerce generally would be vastly increased. Now, Sir, observe how unjustly these laws operate upon the French people themselves. It was stated before us the other day in the Merchant Shipping Committee, by an intelligent witness, that in one particular branch of trade alone, which was a very small branch, the difference of freight paid between the French and English ships on sugar imported from our possessions in the East to France was no less than £300,000. Of course France pays that. It is not possible, but if it were possible to show what the people of France are suffering and paying in trying vainly to increase their Merchant Navy, I have no hesitation in saying that the people of France would at once appeal to the Government, and demand a change in the Navigation Laws for their own interest. Because, if in a small branch of trade in which only about 180,000 tons of shipping are engaged, the people of France have to pay every year £300,000 for the benefit of that trade, what must it be with the trade of France as a whole. France, with her vast commerce, has not got a merchant navy one-fourth sufficient to enable her to carry on her own trade; consequently, she is obliged to come and seek shipping from other countries, and, in spite of her protective laws, foreign shipping, to a very large extent, entered the ports of France. In 1857, the total number of entries in French ports was 4,162,000 tons, but of that number no less than 2,550,000 were foreign ships; so that by far the largest proportion of the carrying trade of France is conveyed in foreign ships, and if we could get at an estimate of the differential duty paid upon that 2,550,000 tons of shipping, it would be found that the people of France are taxed to an enormous extent in their vain attempts to create a merchant service and a foundation for her navy. The people of France are beginning to find that this policy of protection to shipping is a mistaken policy for their own interest. Honourable Members may have seen by the public press, the other day, that the merchants and planters of Guadeloupe have memorialized the French Colonial Minister, and have represented to him the very great inconvenience to which they have been subjected from the want of a sufficient supply of French tonnage to carry their sugar and other produce to France; and only the other day I had a letter from a large East India House, and though I do not wish to weary the House with extracts, this is so important that I must beg permission to read it—

Mr. Lindsay

Mr. Lindsay

It is from a merchant and shipowner at Bordeaux to the head of an East India House resident in London, and is an answer to a communication with respect to the rice market in the East. This firm had written to the French merchant to know if they could supply him for the coming year, as on previous occasions. The following is his reply:—

“ I have received with much pleasure your letter of the 24th November, and thank you for the information it gives me on business in this year. I must tell you that rice is no longer admissible, except by a French flag, since the beginning of this year; that is, that it pays a duty of 9 francs per 100 kilogrammes, if by a foreign ship, which excludes it completely.”

I find, Sir, that in 1847 France imported 3,000 tons of rice; but in 1856, when the duties on rice and other grain were suspended, she imported no less than 50,000 tons of rice from the British East Indies, showing the enormous benefit which, in this case, France derived from a free-trade policy, by which they allowed ships of all nations to convey rice from our possessions in India to the ports of France. But this is not all. Take the case of the manufacturers, and here again I beg to refer to another important communication. About a fortnight since I made a speech in regard to this same question, and it so happened that the words which fell from me found their way to the French press, and were somewhat extensively circulated. And in consequence I received a communication from a large manufacturer carrying on his business in a northern town of France:—

“ I am interested,” he says, “ here in jute-spinning, and our trade in France will be much injured, if not ruined, if the present differential duties are continued; and as these duties are injurious both to the British shipowner, as well as to the French manufacturer, while not in reality serving the French shipping. I thought your influence might be brought to bear on the subject.”

Well, Sir, the only answer to be given to the French manufacturer was—“ Really, this is more a question for the French manufacturer and the French people, than it is for the British shipowner. Memorialize your Government to release you from the trammels by which you are bound; agitate throughout the country for the repeal of the laws, to the repeal of which you must look for advantage as a manufacturer, and by so doing do good to the people, and also to the shipowners of your country.” But, Sir, while we are impressing upon the French Government that, in justice to us, as well as in justice to their own shipowners; and, above all, in justice to the people of France, they should make a material change in the navigation laws of that country, let us not forget that we have a duty to perform to France. We still levy Light Dues on the ships of France entering our ports, as we do on the ships of all other nations. But France lights her shores free. She makes no direct charge on the ships of England under the head of Light Dues. There are other small taxes, more annoying, perhaps, than of pecuniary importance, which we still continue to levy upon the ships of France frequenting our ports, from which freemen are entirely exempt. I believe these charges are well known as Freemen's Dues. France, upon various occasions on which we have endeavoured to obtain reciprocity from her, has made these charges the ground for not entering into reciprocal dealings. I think such excuses have been frivolous, but still they have been made, and I say we must be prepared to remove those charges, which are still levied at 83 ports throughout this country. We must exempt the ships of France from all such charges; we must exempt them from Light Dues; and when we have done so, we shall have placed the ships of France in all our trade on the same terms in every respect as our own ships. Having done so, it is to be hoped that the Emperor of the French will be willing and ready to meet us in making the change I propose, which is much more essential to the interests of his own people than it is to the interests of the people of England. To what extent it is desirable that that change should be made it is not for me to say. That is a matter which must rest with the Government of France itself. If I had anything to say in the matter, if I was a Frenchman interested in the question, I should urge the total and unconditional repeal of the Navigation Laws of France, and I should urge it not merely on the ground of justice to the shipowners, but, above all, in justice to the people of France. If the French Government is not prepared to go to that extent, and to say that the Navigation Laws should be totally repealed, they ought at least to put the trade between our colonies and possessions, and France in the same position as the direct trade is now placed; that is to say, they ought to abolish all differential duties levied on goods conveyed from our possessions and colonies to France in British ships. In that trade, which is peculiarly our own, we ought at least to be placed on exactly the same footing as our ships are now placed with respect to the direct trade. The noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) has been good enough to say that this Motion is not to be opposed, and that, so far as Government is concerned, it will be allowed to pass this House. Allow me, however, to take the opportunity of saying to the noble Lord that something more is wanted. If this Resolution is adopted by the House, it will be in the shape of an Address to Her Majesty, and it will be the duty of the Government to lay it before the Queen. But there is another duty connected with it beyond that—a duty which is most important; and I do trust that Her Majesty's Government, if the Motion is carried, will use its most strenuous efforts and every argument in its power to impress on the Government of France that if the Treaty of Commerce just ratified is to produce the good both nations anticipate—if it is to increase their commerce and bind them more closely together in their friendly relations, and thus tend to prevent war, then it is essential that a great change be made in the Navigation Laws of France, so as to enable the more free interchange of commodities, and remove the irritation which these differential duties create, and which tend to produce angry feelings, and too often, with them, war. I wish my feeble words could reach the palace of the Emperor and the Senates of France, but far more do I wish that they should reach the hamlets and the homes of the heavily taxed and toiling millions of that fair—that sunny land. The question, as I have endeavoured to show, is of far greater importance to the people of that country than it is to England; but in the interests of progress, and, above all, of peace, it is one of vast importance to both. However prone man is to evil—however desirous to vindicate what he considers "right" by might, no nation can desire war. To Her Gracious Majesty I move this Address. I know that she ever has and ever will mourn the sacrifice of her people on the battle field; that she will ever be ready to put forth her hand to aid the cause of peace; and I cannot but feel that her great Ally, the Emperor of the French, must equally deplore the dread havoc which war creates, and that he will be ready to join our Queen in the adoption of such measures as are likely to render more secure the peace of Europe, and promote the happiness and prosperity of the people. There can be no happiness in their palaces when the harsh note of war is sounded. On questions such as these they must hold even stronger feelings than the people, for in the uncertainty of war their own destinies are at stake, and in its results depend the stability of their thrones and kingdoms, and often their personal liberty. They, indeed, must be deeply interested in any movement which tends to join nations together in the bonds of peace and goodwill.

MR. HORSFALL, in seconding the Motion, expressed his conviction that the greatest good would be produced by the fact of its receiving the unanimous support of the House and the Government.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that, as his hon. Friend was already aware, no opposition would be offered by the Government to the Motion. He quite agreed with the hon. Gentleman that if this address were adopted it would be necessary that steps should be taken to give effect to it, and at a fitting opportunity the Government would use their utmost endeavours for that purpose. There could be no doubt that British ships laboured under many disabilities in French ports. The coasting and colonial trade, or the trade between France and her own colonies, might not at once be conceded; but with regard to the indirect carrying trade or the foreign trade of France, seeing that all countries, with the exception of France, Spain, and Portugal, had extended full reciprocity to England in the foreign carrying trade, he might fairly express a hope that the facilities enjoyed elsewhere would be also extended to this country by France. He felt the advantage it would be to French commerce and to the French nation, and, without taking up the time of the House by travelling over unnecessary ground, he might say that he fully concurred in the views of the hon. Member as to the great advantages conferred on English shipping and commerce by the liberal navigation code which we had adopted. The hon. Member had made a most interesting and useful speech, and he would say no more than that he could assure him the Government would do all which lay in their power to give effect to his views.

SIR HENRY STRACEY said, that representing as he did a constituency all more or less concerned in the shipping interest, he felt called on to make a few remarks on the question now before the House. The distress of the shipping interest was acknowledged when the hon.

Mr. Lindsay

Member for Sunderland moved for a Committee of Inquiry. At that time he did not think that the sympathies of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade were greatly in favour of that interest, but he was delighted to hear the right hon. Gentleman express himself to-night much more warmly, and to receive an assurance that the noble Lord at the head of the Government intended to employ himself to carry out as much as he could the views of the hon. Member for Sunderland. With regard to the fact stated the other day that freights from the Mauritius were unremunerative to British ships, while they were lucrative to French shipowners, a witness before the Committee on Merchant Shipping attributed it to the excess of British tonnage. Great competition might partially be the cause, but he believed that the command of a more extended sale for their produce made it worth while for merchants at the Mauritius to pay double and treble freights and to put their merchandise on board French ships rather than English ships, which in comparison had so limited a field for sale. It was a most extraordinary injustice that English shipping should be exposed to the operation of differential duties in French ports which operated against it in the proportion of five to three, and also involved, in some cases, the forfeiture of both the ship and her cargo. He had read not long since a pamphlet written, he believed, by the hon. Member for Southampton (Mr. Digby Seymour), in which that hon. Gentleman mentioned that the increase of the French over the English shipping since the repeal of the navigation laws was in the proportion of nine to one; and in his opinion that statement was perfectly accurate. Statistics proved that the export and import trade of Yarmouth had very much decreased. In 1857, Yarmouth exported in British ships 77,413 quarters of wheat; in 1858 only 33,462 quarters of wheat. In 1857, the export of barley from the same place was 81,792 quarters, and in 1858 only 77,249 quarters. In 1857 no maize whatever was imported into Yarmouth in British ships, but in foreign ships 3,492 quarters. In 1858, 200 quarters were imported in British, and 7,990 quarters in foreign ships. In 1857, 410 quarters of wheat were imported in British ships, and 9,723 quarters in foreign ships. In 1857 no barley was imported in British, but 36,950 quarters were imported in foreign ships. In 1858, 4,999 quarters of barley were imported in British and 22,695 quarters in foreign ships. There were many other statistics, proving the decline of the trade of Yarmouth, with which he would not trouble the House. He would merely say that within the last few months 100 foreign ships had delivered their cargoes in that port. Yarmouth, which he had the honour to represent, was particularly interested in the trade of salted herrings, and his constituents expressed great anxiety at the extraordinary quantity of salted herrings which had arrived lately from Norway and other places. A few days since one ship brought no less than 1,100 barrels. They believed that a great trade might be opened with France if the Government would kindly give their attention to the subject, and endeavour to get the duty lowered on them, if not abolished. At present the duty charged by France on the barrel of 100 kilogrammes—equal to 2 cwt. — was 30 francs, and when he told the House that the same quantity could be bought for much less, retail in Yarmouth, it must be obvious that the duty was perfectly prohibitory. He had reason to know that there was a disposition on the part of the French Government to afford facilities to the English merchant for carrying on this particular trade. The demand from the interior of France for them was great and increasing, but the duty of 30 francs a barrel was regarded in the light of a prohibition, and notwithstanding every encouragement was given to the French fisherman, he could not, under any circumstances, meet the demand made from the interior of his own country. If the Government at this favourable time would interest themselves in coming to an arrangement with that of France on this subject, the result would be to open up an important trade between France and the towns on the eastern coast of this country, and it would be relieved from the reproach that they had more especially consulted the coal and cotton interests, and had neglected the shipping interests of this country.

MR. FENWICK said, that he wished to call attention to a branch of this question which had been overlooked. The question of a treaty of navigation with France was not a new question, for a treaty was entered into in 1826, having reference to the direct trade. That treaty had not been in operation more than a few months when grave complaints were made by the Government of France against the manner in which that treaty was carried out by this country. France charged the English Government that although they might carry out the treaty in the letter, yet in the spirit of that treaty they had not faithfully carried it out. The ground of complaint made by the French was, that in a vast number of our ports there existed exemptions or exceptions in respect to the payment of duty, which operated differentially against the ships of a French port. Matters continued in this state up to the year 1849, when a new state of circumstances occurred. It would be in the recollection of the House that, in that year, the Navigation Laws were repealed, and it was then proposed by the English Government, as a sort of corollary to our repealing the Navigation Laws, to enter into a negotiation with France; but the same objections with regard to local exemptions were then urged as were urged in 1826. Mr. Edgar Bowring, of the Board of Trade, was employed to investigate the grounds of complaint, and the result of his inquiry, as stated in evidence before a Select Committee, was that in no less than eighty-one ports and creeks of this country local exemptions from the payment of duty continued to exist, and to operate differentially against French ships trading to this country. In 1850 another attempt was again made to enter into a treaty with France, when the question of local exemption was again urged by the French Government. As he understood that fresh negotiations were about to be commenced on this subject, he should like to have some assurance from her Majesty's Government that they would endeavour to get rid of those causes which, from 1826 down to 1850, formed a barrier to the carrying out of any treaty with France. Unless the Government did that, he was afraid that no negotiations on this subject could have a successful result. He quite agreed with his hon. Colleague that the system of the Navigation Laws as it existed in France was, although injurious to English commerce, still more injurious to French commerce and the French people; but he had no great faith in the Government being able to convince the French people of that fact at present. He trusted that before the debate was concluded, the House would have some assurance from the Government that an attempt would be made as early as possible to get rid of the causes which had so long operated to prevent this treaty of navigation between this country and France being carried into effect.

MR. LIDDELL said, he regretted that the hon. Member who had last spoken should have introduced a new element of dissension into the debate. Attempts had been made both by the Government and the House to deal with the local exemptions alluded to, but without success. The reference to them on the part of France was obviously only a shallow pretext to avoid a navigation treaty with this country. He rose, however, mainly for the purpose of expressing his gratification at the assurance that Her Majesty's Government were prepared to enter into communication with the French Government with a view of obtaining, at any rate, some relaxation of the French Navigation Laws. He thought that as we were now supposed to be on terms of commercial alliance with France we were entitled to ask, as a matter of justice, from those with whom we had recently concluded the treaty, that they should meet us in a fair spirit. It had been left free to French ships to trade from all parts of the world to this country as suited them best, and it was extremely galling to an English shipowner that in consequence of discriminating or differential duties being levied in French ports on English vessels, he was often unable to compete in our own Colonies with French vessels in obtaining a cargo, or getting as high a freight. He trusted the French Government, if they were sincere in their desire to carry out the design of giving to the French consumer the full benefit of the Commercial Treaty recently concluded, would see the necessity of removing these very offensive duties. He asked of the Government that they would supply the omission in the late Commercial Treaty, an omission which had been much complained of, but never satisfactorily explained. He trusted the proposed negotiations might prove successful; but he wished he could be more sure that they would be successful, for he felt that if the negotiations had been entered into at an earlier date, their chance of success would have been much greater than it now was.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he also wished to express his gratification at the fact that the Government had acceded to the Motion of the hon. Member for Sunderland, and his conviction that the Government had exercised a sound discretion in taking that course, still he thought it behoved the House to ask why it was necessary that so soon after the Treaty with France another negotiation should be commenced? How came it that they had so soon to set to work to patch up the comprehensive Treaty recently concluded? He believed that the Treaty had originated in party and not Commercial objects, that it was more a political than a Commercial Treaty. It had, therefore, been hurried through in a hasty, crude, and, he might say, slovenly manner, so that it might be ready for announcement at the opening of Parliament, as a proof of activity during the autumnal recess. This seemed to have been considered requisite as a stimulant after the long period of autumnal inactivity. He doubt it had obtained for the Government some cheers, but they would be only of a temporary character. The Government had given up everything to France, and now they would have to recommence negotiations with the Government of that country when they had no inducement to offer. He rose to remind the House, and to press upon the Government, that they should in future employ those skilled and experienced diplomatists who were always at the service of the country in these important matters. It was no disparagement to the ability of the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden), for whom he had the highest respect, that, however eminent he might be in private life, however superior to all competitors in his own line of trade, he was not so well qualified to deal with astute and wily negotiators, as one who had had the benefit of diplomatic training and experience. If a proper negotiator had been selected, then this country would not have been called upon to make such extensive concessions without obtaining equivalents. He would shortly call the attention of the House and the noble Lord at the head of the Government to a speech of the noble Lord's, made seventeen years ago, on the occasion of Lord Ashburton being sent to the Court of Washington to negotiate a treaty. The noble Lord laid it down as a rule, and he was a great authority, that when the country had to enter into Commercial Treaties, they ought to leave the matter to diplomatic agents, and the noble Lord used these remarkable words:

Mr. Fenwick

"I know that some persons imagine that in negotiation a plain, simple, straightforward man will do just as well as the most experienced and skilful diplomatist; but the House may depend upon it that the same rule holds good in negotiation, as in any other employment of the intelletal faculties, and that a man who has some acquaintance with the practice will, ceteris paribus, have an advantage over a man who has none. Now, was the Government driven by any necessity to appoint an inexperienced negotiator, and had they no other choice?"

Those words were spoken seventeen years ago, and yet the noble Lord, in forgetfulness of them, had appointed an hon. Gentleman who had had no experience in these matters. He entertained no political bias against the hon. Member for Rochdale; but he believed it would be seen that the more his crude and ill-digested Treaty became known throughout the country, the more it would be disliked and opposed. As an instance, he might refer to the Chamber of Commerce of Leeds. A petition had been presented from that body, which showed that the 30 per cent duty on goods imported into France, would in almost every instance prove a strictly prohibitive duty. The people of Leeds were engaged in nearly all the great manufactures to which the provisions of the Treaty related, and so dissatisfied were the leading and influential merchants of that great centre of commerce and manufactures, that the Chamber of Commerce prayed that a supplemental treaty might be made. Now, if the work had been properly done in the first instance, there would not be this universal cry for a supplemental treaty. He believed the right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Board of Trade, had not been consulted on all these matters, or a different result might have been obtained. It might be said, on the part of the Government of France, whenever an attempt was made to open negotiations, that the Parliament of England had sanctioned the principle of differential duties, by agreeing to the late Treaty, and that would be one of the great difficulties in the way of removing them. In the case of the linen trade, the right hon. Gentleman, (Mr. M. Gibson), had held out hopes of an amelioration of the regulations in future negotiations; but what hope could there be of successful negotiations when the original proposition of the French Government was a maximum ad valorem duty from 10 to 15 per cent, which was raised by our negotiation to 30 per cent. He (Lord C. Hamilton) could only hope that those future negotiations would be entrusted to an experienced diplomatist, and that the noble Viscount at the head of the Government would act upon the advice he had tendered to another Government in making the selection.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR said, he thought the observations of the noble Lord uncalled for, and that the attack made by him upon the conduct of the hon. Member for Rochdale in his absence was undeserved. That hon. Member would no doubt receive the thanks of his countrymen for his recent labours in the cause of freedom of trade; and he believed the noble Lord could not name any diplomatist who would have been better qualified to carry on the late negotiations with the French Emperor and his Government. The Treaty was from first to last a Treaty of Commerce, and not of navigation, and the noble Lord could not point to any Article in it which altered the character of the Treaty. Any man who looked at the matter fairly would see that in asking the French Government to enter upon negotiations for another treaty, the Government would be met by the answer that one of the first things to do would be the removal of those various charges on French vessels which had been referred to by the hon. Gentleman near him (Mr. Fenwick). The object of the Motion before the House was to show the general feeling of the maritime body and of the Government, that France, having regard to the concessions made by us, as well as with regard to her own interests, should meet us in the spirit in which we met her. For the last ten years England had allowed French ships to enter her ports freely, and the moral was that free trade could not be both a blessing and a curse, or, in other words, while free trade was life to us, it could not be death to the French people. But though England had thrown open her ports to France, English vessels, although permitted to carry goods to France from this country, were at a relative disadvantage with the French, because they were excluded from the French coasting trade. The latest advices from the Mauritius stated that while French ships were getting from £3 to £3 10s. for freight, British ships could not command more than £1 for freight to French ports. But at Port Louis, French and English ships for English ports were obtaining the same freights. The differential and tonnage duties against British ships were equal to £4 19s. 4d. per ton on all importations of guano into France. These facts were enough to show that the statesmen of both countries ought at once to negotiate the basis of a supplemental treaty of navigation; and to those who remembered the advances which France made in a free-trade policy in 1854, by repealing a portion of her navigation laws, this would not appear altogether hopeless. He had recently received a copy of the Journal du Havre, which contained a report made by the French Ministers, MM. Baroche and Rouher, in which they commented on the Treaty recently concluded between the two countries, from which he (Mr. Digby Seymour) was led to hope that, while due regard was paid to the French marine as one of the great national interests, a sounder commercial policy than the old Protective system had now among its champions the Emperor of the French and the Ministers who had assisted him in the recent progress of free-trade doctrines in France. This country had cast away the worn-out cloak of Protection which the French had picked up; but he hoped the sun of free trade would induce them, too, to drop it from their shoulders, and that they would come to see that it was for their own advantage to make those arrangements in favour of the shipping interest which the voice of justice demanded. He trusted the example of France in 1854, when certain alterations were made, would be followed, and that better results would be obtained. The hon. and learned Gentleman then referred to comments of MM. Baroche and Rouher in the Journal du Havre, in favour of the late Treaty, and said he hoped a better light was dawning upon the Government and people of France in reference to freedom of commerce, and if that were so, it would lead to the further adoption of the principle of the Treaty of 1826 between this country and France.

MR. CAVE rose to express his surprise that any hon. Gentleman should place the differential duties, or rather the exemptions which existed in certain English ports, as really a bar to the negotiations of a treaty with France. Those were not really dues that were charged on the shipping with France, they were simply exemptions that were made in favour of certain classes of persons in England, and pressed upon portions of our own countrymen quite as much as they did on the subjects of France. He quite concurred in the conclusion of the hon. Member for Sunderland, and he was assured that the shipping interest would read the hon. Member's speech with great satisfaction, for they would remember that not very long ago the hon. Gentleman did not attach so much value as he now appeared to do to the system of reciprocity. They would be glad to find that since the hon. Gentleman had applied his vigorous mind to the subject he had come to the conclusion that, without reciprocity, the prosperity of the British shipping interest would not long continue. He did not mean, however, to detain the House with any remarks on the general question, which he thought was exhausted by the speeches in the present debate, and by one on a former occasion. But he must say that it was not complimentary to the shipping interest that it should be necessary to bring forward this Motion. When a treaty of commerce was under discussion it was due to the shipping interest that hopes should have been held out to them that their interests would not be neglected. But those hopes had not been held out, and it was only after a great deal of agitation, both in and out of this House, that hopes were at last held out that some attempts would be made to redress their grievances. For his own part, he was disposed to trust very little to the generosity of nations; for each Government would naturally get the best advantage for their own subjects that they could; and he felt certain that if in a negotiation they were to begin by giving to France all they had to give, and then asked France to make some sacrifice to them in return, they would find themselves quite disappointed. He thought the attitude of Prussia, in Mr. Huskisson's time, which had been alluded to by the hon. Member for Sunderland and the hon. Member for Southampton (Mr. Digby Seymour), and by himself on a former occasion, was the attitude which should have been maintained by Her Majesty's Government. His opinion was that the whole question of the navigation laws with France required revision. Circumstances were entirely changed from what they were when the existing treaties were formed; and following the example of the hon. Baronet behind him (Sir H. Stracey), he would take the liberty of reminding the Government that in any revision of our relations with France there was a portion of his own constituents whose claims he wished to recommend to the notice of the Government. The hon. Baronet advocated the interests of the herring fishers; he wished to advocate the claims of the oyster fishers. It was known to everybody that there was on the south coast of England a race of hardy fishermen who were engaged in the oyster fisheries. Since the convention with regard to these fisheries, which was concluded with France in 1839, deep-sea beds of oysters had been discovered in the middle of the Channel, the existence of which was at that time altogether unknown. These beds could only be fished at a certain time, and in rough weather the boats could not go out to them at all, and as the close time intervened great hardship was often inflicted on these fishermen, who in some seasons lost their fishing altogether. Now, there was no reason why the terms of the fence months should not be, in regard to the deep-sea fishings, extended for two months longer, but the difficulty was to persuade the French Government to consent. The French fishermen cared nothing about these deep-sea fishings; they only wanted to protect their own shallow water fisheries, and with that view they demanded that our fishermen should be prevented from going into deep-sea fishings. This prohibition, however, was of no advantage to either party, for as the beds lay in the middle of the Channel and were not under the jurisdiction of any Government, the Dutch fishermen, as he had lately learned, came to the beds and dredged them in the fence months to the disadvantage of both countries. He hoped Her Majesty's Government would take this question into their favourable consideration, as our fishermen naturally felt aggrieved at these injurious regulations which pressed upon them alone. I think the Motion, though it only regards actually the reciprocity duties of France and England, should include these minor matters in any revision which may be deemed advisable. Her Majesty's Government had shown themselves anxious to maintain a good understanding with France. Every man on both sides of the House, who had any regard for the interests of his country, would be anxious to maintain it. But Her Majesty's Government need not to be told by him, that nothing would be so fatal to such a good understanding as any uneasy feeling among particular classes in the country that it had been purchased at the cost of impediments to their trade, and a sacrifice of their interests.

Mr. Digby Seymour

Mr. BENTINCK said, he could not allow this discussion, so important in every respect to one of the most vital elements of British prosperity, to close without saying that it was without exception the most unsatisfactory debate—and he had heard a good many unsatisfactory debates—to which he had ever listened. What was the result? His hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, than whom no man was better qualified for the task, had brought forward a Motion in which he had shown there was a strong case for interfering in favour of the present depressed condition of the British mercantile marine; and the only result of that Motion was, that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade was good enough to get up and say that at some future fitting time Her Majesty's Government would condescend to look into the matter and see if they could do something for the shipping interest. This was the sum and substance of all that was gained in consequence of his hon. Friend's Motion. He must say, therefore, that involving as this Motion did the welfare not only of that important branch of British industry, the shipping trade, but involving what was far more important, the supply of the seamen to the British navy, it was impossible that a more meagre, unsatisfactory, and unfortunate answer could have been given than the answer which Her Majesty's Government had given to this Motion. The thing spoke for itself. The condemnation of Her Majesty's Government lay in the fact that his hon. Friend felt called on to make such a Motion. What was the state of the case? This Treaty had just been concluded, and they were told it was a Treaty of Commerce, not a Treaty of Navigation. But if so, why was the third Article introduced into the Treaty? The question he put was this—he wished it had been put by his hon. Friend who was so much better qualified to deal with the subject—why were the interests of the British mercantile marine so totally lost sight of and neglected by Her Majesty's Government when they were negotiating the terms of this Treaty, under the able and distinguished diplomacy of the hon. Member for Rochdale? Why were those interests neglected? Was the thing of so little importance that they did not think it necessary to ask whether those interests would be injured or not? Before this Treaty was concluded with a great neighbouring nation, was it not their duty to inquire whether there was anything in the position or the relations of that interest that required revision before the Treaty was signed? But that was not the whole of the case. Long before they entered upon the consideration of that miserable Treaty the deeply-depressed condition of the shipping interest had been pressed upon them in every possible way, and every possible means had been taken to call the attention of the Government to the subject, yet the whole question was ignored by them when they came to carry out the details of this Treaty, and all his hon. Friend could obtain by his Motion for this great national interest was an assurance from Her Majesty's Government that at some fitting opportunity they would endeavour to rectify some portions of the gross neglect of which they had been guilty. He wished this debate could have been postponed for a few days, because then he should have been at liberty to quote to the House the opinions of a great authority in these matters, for the fact, which indeed there was hardly a man connected with the shipping interest who would not corroborate, that if the reciprocity clauses in our Navigation Act were once put in operation, there was not a country in the world which would not agree to reciprocity with us, rather than submit to be shut out, by the operation of those clauses, from our trade. That was stated by a high authority in evidence, to which he would not further allude, except to say that it would soon be laid on the table of the House. But this was only another proof of the inconceivable blindness of Her Majesty's Government to the existence of this great and important interest. If his hon. Friend was content with the assurances he had received from Her Majesty's Government, of course he could not object—all he had to tell him was, that all the assurances he had yet received were not worth a £5 note. But this was only part and parcel of the proceedings of Her Majesty's Government, by which every interest in the country was sacrificed with one exception. The Government and their agents had been utterly mystified by abler men than themselves in the concoction of this Treaty; and unless something more than this was done, the hon. Member for Sunderland would find that this great national interest would be sacrificed in the same coldblooded manner in which every other interest, except one, had been sacrificed in this country.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he rose to express the surprise with which he had learned that exceptional dues existed in some of those very ports that were now claiming reciprocity. As one entirely independent and impartial in the matter,

Mr. Bentinck

it appeared to him that we could not ask France to remove her restrictions unless we removed ours. [Cries of "Agree."] He was glad to find that the House should agree, and he hoped they would insist on these restrictions being removed.

MR. LINDSAY said, he rose to reply. He was quite willing to admit that the Treaty, which had been recently ratified by both sides of the House, bore on the face of it that it was strictly for commercial purposes, and that it left the question of navigation exactly where it found it. It was not fair, therefore, to charge the Government, as they had been charged, with neglecting the interests of the British shipowners. They had not, in fact, done so. It ought to be remembered that the present navigation laws between the two countries imposed differential duties upon foreign ships that were employed in the trade between England and France. The third clause in the Treaty, to which so much reference had been made, proposed to continue those duties, and if that clause had not been inserted foreign vessels might have come here and been loaded with English manufactures, and conveyed them to the ports of France. The insertion of this article, therefore, was a protection of both English and French ships against foreigners, and against that small amount of competition the Government had not neglected to protect the British shipping. But he must say, as this Motion was to be adopted unanimously by the House, he did not think it would be sufficient for his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade to say that he would take some fitting opportunity, at any period, however distant, to take this solemn and unanimous Resolution of the House into his consideration. He felt such treatment of this Resolution would be a mere mockery—a waste of the time of the House. The Government ought not merely to sit upon it when it suited their convenience, but they should be prepared, he hoped before Easter, to state distinctly what measures they proposed to adopt in order to carry if possible the Resolution into effect with the Government of France.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved,—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to enter into Negotiations with the Emperor of the French, with the view of making a Treaty for the reciprocal abrogation of all discriminating Duties levied upon the Vessels and their Cargoes, of either of the two Nations in the Port of the other; and for procuring such alterations in the Navigation Laws of France as may tend to facilitate the commercial intercourse, and strengthen the friendly relations between England and France."

TENURE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, I rise to make one more attempt to settle the question on which the care of every Government has been bestowed and the time of every Parliament for a longer period than I have had the honour of sitting in this House—a question of great difficulty, and to Ireland of great importance. I believe that from the conclusion of peace with France in 1815 down to the present time many branches of this subject have continually engaged the attention of Committees of this House and of Commissioners appointed by the Crown. But the period which may, perhaps, be regarded as the principal era in the history of this question was the appointment of the Commission under the late Lord Devon, which took a large and interesting mass of evidence, and presented as the result of its inquiry its opinions to this House. Since that time there has been, I think, no Minister who has not endeavoured to settle this question. Scarcely has there been a year when there has not been before the House some proposal in regard to it. In the year 1845 the Earl of Derby, then Secretary for the Colonies in the Government of Sir Robert Peel, made a proposal on this subject in the House of Lords. In the following year it was renewed in this House by the present Duke of Newcastle, then Secretary for Ireland. Next, my right hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Sir W. Somerville), under the succeeding Ministry, made a like attempt in 1848, and again in 1850. In 1852 the Government of the Earl of Derby made a great effort to settle the question; and under the Government of the Earl of Aberdeen that effort was repeated, but not successfully. Afterwards Mr. Serjeant Shee, with great ability and great labour, brought forward similar measures. Those measures were to a certain extent taken up by the Government of that day, but again they failed to receive the sanction of Parliament. Then an independent Member of this House, Mr. Moore, took up the subject in two successive years, 1856 and 1857; and the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire), in 1858, was the last Member who submitted a measure dealing with it. The late Government, I believe, had undertaken and intended to grapple with it. Now, it is manifest that a question of which this is the history must be one not only of great importance, but also of great difficulty. And if we presume to entertain a hope of being able to settle it, it is because we think that the condition of Ireland is far more favourable for its settlement than in the times of some of our predecessors; because we believe that their experience may have done much to facilitate the progress of the measure; because we believe that the decisions of this House have shown what are the measures which it is impossible to carry, and will have prepared the way for the attainment of such as are practical and possible; and because I believe I may confidently appeal to this assembly to listen to proposals made with an earnest desire to obtain for them, as far as may be, legislative sanction and practical effect. The first question that anybody will naturally ask is, "Why is it necessary to deal with the land of Ireland in a manner different from that of England or Scotland?" That question has been repeatedly answered in this House in language of the highest authority. Those who are familiar with the works of Arthur Young, of Mr. Burke, or of Mr. Mill, know that in their successive generations those practical and philosophic writers have drawn a broad distinction between the state of land in Ireland on the one side and its state in England and Scotland on the other. A distinction so recognized by the highest authorities may fairly commend itself to the calm consideration of this House. But every Minister and every Member of Parliament who has handled this subject, from the Earl of Derby in 1845, down to the hon. Member who last brought it under our notice, has expressed in the most emphatic terms the necessity of dealing with it, for Ireland, in a manner specially adapted to the circumstances of that country. I am not about to trouble the House with unnecessary references to papers; but I think I ought to ask you to hear the statement on this part of the case which rests on the authority of the Devon Commission, in order that you may have before you the ground of the legislation on which you are invited to enter. These are the words:—

"It is well known that in England and Scotland, before a landlord offers a farm for letting, he finds it necessary to provide a suitable farmhouse, with necessary farm buildings, for the proper management of the farm. He puts the gates and fences into good order, and he also takes upon himself a great part of the burden of keeping the buildings in repair during the term; and the rent is fixed with reference to this state of things. Such, at least, is generally the case, although special contracts may occasionally be made, varying the arrangements between landlord and tenant. In Ireland the case is wholly different. The smallness of the farms as they are usually let, together with other circumstances to which it is not necessary to advert, render the introduction of the English system extremely difficult, and in many cases impracticable. It is admitted on all hands, that according to the general practice in Ireland, the landlord builds neither dwelling-house, nor farm offices, nor puts fences, gates, &c., into good order, before he lets his land to a tenant. The cases in which a landlord does any of those things are the exceptions. The system, however, of giving aid in these matters is becoming more prevalent. In most cases, whatever is done in the way of building or fencing is done by the tenant; and in the ordinary language of the country, dwelling-houses, farm buildings, and even the making of fences, are described by the general word 'improvements,' which is thus employed to denote the necessary adjuncts to a farm, without which in England or Scotland no tenant would be found to rent it."

This, Sir, is the foundation of all legislation on this subject—that the law and practice, as they exist in England and Scotland, have differed from the law and practice as they have existed in Ireland, and that special legislation is requisite to meet the circumstances of a totally different case. Now, I am happy to say that since the Devon Commission presented their Report no more marked improvement has probably taken place in any country in the world than has been witnessed in Ireland, and that amelioration has resulted in changes which, if on the one hand they diminish the necessity for legislation of this kind, operate on the other as the greatest encouragement to all just and needful measures whereby the law may second the efforts of an improving people, may expand their industry and enterprise, expand and thereby accelerate the progress of a beneficent movement. Since the year 1845, by public works, by loans, and grants, by money expended on drainage, and last, not least, by the multiplication of railways and other internal communication, the greatest advancement has been exhibited by Ireland. If it is not unduly trespassing on the time of the House I will state one or two striking instances of this improvement. We all know that live stock is a much more remarkable and critical test of prosperity in

Mr. Cardwell

Ireland than in this part of the kingdom. The earliest record we have of the value of live stock in that country is now about 20 years old. It was then supposed to be worth £21,000,000 sterling. By the last return, if calculated at the same price, it would be now worth nearly £36,000,000 sterling. But that would be a most feeble and imperfect index of the true merits of the case, because the quantity itself has not more perceptibly increased than the quality has improved and the price risen. At a moderate estimate, the value is double what it was. If we take the holdings, the proportion to large and small ones is entirely changed; whereas at the time the Report of the Devon Commission was made the number of holdings under five acres was six times that of holdings above thirty acres. Now, however, the former are much less numerous than the latter. You have sold in the Landed Estates Court 2,000,000 acres of land for £23,000,000—most of it, I am happy to say, Irish money, not money imported from this kingdom—to more than 8,500 owners, who, having purchased it for purposes of improvements, must be taken to have expended a considerable capital on their property. I have no accurate information as to what the wages of agricultural labour were in Ireland in 1841, but if I put them at 6d. a-day I think I shall not be far wrong. At present the general average throughout the four provinces is 1s. 3d. per day. Ten years ago the number of persons evicted in the year was 72,000; last year it was 2,308. Looking at crime of an agricultural character, I find that ten years ago there were 15 agrarian homicides; last year only four. Ten years ago there were 20 cases of firing at the person, attributed to agricultural causes; last year one. Ten years ago there were 87 serious assaults of the same character; last year there were 19; making in the whole 122 agricultural crimes committed ten years ago, against 24 in the year just expired. If we turn to pecuniary results, we find that ten years ago the number of paupers relieved amounted to 2,142,000; last year it was 161,000. Ten years ago the expenditure amounted to 2,199,000; last year to £414,000. It is only right that I should state these facts to the House, because it would be uncandid to claim as the basis of a measure on this subject the statements made by the Devon Commission without also referring to the progress which has since been made. The exist-a new machinery, involving new expense, if there be already in existence one sufficient for the purpose. It has in former years been proposed to entrust the administration of this law to the Commissioner of Valuation, so that the valuers, who are spread through the land, might be his agents for carrying it into effect. Constitutional objections were always taken to that course, and I am bound to confess that I think that the officer by whose decision land is to be burdened ought to be a judicial and not an executive officer. It will be necessary, of course, to have the advice of executive officers; but the power of employing experts at present possessed by the Court of Chancery could easily be given to the Court exercising jurisdiction in these matters. We propose that, in the first instance, at least, the chairman of every county should exercise that jurisdiction, and that he should have power to employ experts to enable him to arrive at a sound decision. We think that probably the valuator employed for the public valuation would in most cases be the expert referred to, but we intend to leave the decision with the judicial and not with the executive officer. What we propose, therefore, is that when a limited owner seeks to improve his estate, he shall, through a cheap and simple agency, which is provided by the Bill, give notice to his successor. The Bill provides further that he shall at the expiration of three months from the period of notice being served appear before the chairman of the county and present an estimate of the cost of certain improvements and their nature; that the chairman shall hear the objections of any person who may be interested in the matter and think proper to appear, and, having satisfied himself on the subject by having recourse to the advice of a valuator or expert, give a provisional certificate for the execution of the improvements. We, moreover, propose that the successor and other persons interested in the property shall, during the progress of the works, have the power of ascertaining the bond fide character of the improvements and of the expenditure, and that when completed, the sum thus laid out shall be charged by the chairman under what may be called a charging order as an annuity on the property. This annuity we propose should be the same as that which is given by the Settled Estates (Scotland) Act, £7 2s. for each £100 of the improved value of the property, to last for a period of twenty-five years; but that it shall not exceed one-fifth of the unimproved value of the property. It is, however, obvious that these are questions of detail on which other opportunities will present themselves of entering more minutely into their consideration. The position of the limited owner will be this—so long as he remains in possession, he will, of course, himself enjoy the value of his improvements. After the termination of his estate, it is provided that the annuity, if he has made the advance, shall go to his executors for so long a period of the twenty-five years as has not expired. I do not, I may add, think that it will be necessary to encumber this arrangement with an appeal, and I therefore have inserted no provision in the Bill with that object; but if the House should be of opinion that the safeguards which I have introduced are not sufficient, they will have an opportunity of discussing the point in Committee. For my own part, I must say that, after the experience of the past, I have not deemed it expedient to encumber the Bill with provisions of that nature which would be likely to prove completely inoperative. When the annuity has been charged, it will be in the power of the limited owner to register it in the Public Registry in Dublin, and it will be a charge on the land bearing priority from its date. The limited owner will, then, under this Bill have much the same power in respect of improvements on his estate as that at present possessed by the owner in fee. The next case to which I would call the attention of the House is that of the tenant who improves under lease, and to this part of the case I think hon. Gentlemen from Ireland will agree with me in attaching the greatest importance. A few years ago the Settled Estates Act gave large powers for amending imperfect settlements by extending to them the usual powers of leasing. But, again, the machinery of that Act was limited to the Court of Chancery, and the applications which were made under it in Ireland were very few. We propose to extend its operation in three ways. In the first place, we propose to create a power of giving special improvement leases for a longer period than ordinary agricultural leases. We propose to include under this provision not only the limited owner in the ordinary sense, but also corporations, lay and ecclesiastical, and the owners of foundation schools, making the law in that respect of general application. However, the improvements which ought to be executed by a tenant are less extensive than those which ought to be executed by a landlord, because they extend only to his particular holding, and not to the whole estate. Therefore, when dealing with the improvements of tenants, we propose to leave out one or two of the heads which are included under that term in that part of the Bill which applies to limited owners. We propose that the tenant under lease should be able to execute such improvements as the draining of the land, the reclaiming of bog, the making of roads and fences on his own farm, the erection of farm-houses and other suitable buildings, &c. That which we propose to do with regard to the lease itself is this—at present every limited owner can give an agricultural lease for twenty-one years without the intervention of any court, and we propose to allow corporations to do the same. With respect to improvement leases we propose that they may be granted, with the sanction of the chairman of the county, for a period of forty years. We propose that building leases, which in fact amount to an alienation, may be granted, as they are granted under the Settled Estates (Scotland) Act, and as they are granted under many special Acts referring to Ireland, that they may be granted with the leave of the Landed Estates Court, if they relate to a larger quantity of land than three acres, or to a larger value than £100 a year, and if less, then with the sanction of the chairman of the county. We propose that all these leases shall be subject to three conditions, that they shall give immediate possession, that they shall be granted without fine, and that they shall be subject to certain covenants. There still remains another, and that by no means the least complicated part of the subject. To this part of it my attention was directed in the course of the last Session by the hon. Member for Tipperary (The O'Donoghue), who expressed a hope that it would be satisfactorily dealt with in any measure on the subject which the Government might introduce. The case which the hon. Gentleman mentioned on the occasion to which I allude was, that in which the owner of property, believing he had a leasing power, gave to his tenant a lease for his life, under which he agreed to improve the estate which he held. The tenant accordingly began to improve the property, and expended with that view a small sum of money. The landlord died, and the tenant went on spending a larger sum on improvements. A dispute, however, soon after arose between himself and the new proprietor of the land. Legal proceedings were taken, and the case was heard before the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, a most distinguished Judge, who, in pronouncing his decision, said that he was compelled to give judgment against the tenant, but that nothing could be more repugnant to the principles of natural justice than that the landlord should look on at a great expenditure year after year without warning the tenant of his intention to turn him out of possession of his farm. He added that he had no jurisdiction to administer equity in its natural sense, or he should have no difficulty as to the judgment which he should pronounce. The case subsequently came before the Lords Justices of Appeal—Mr. Blackburn and Mr. Napier—and they did not express their dissent from the language which the Master of the Rolls had employed. Such was the instance which the hon. Member for Tipperary brought under the notice of the Government, and I trust the provisions of the Bill which I have already sketched out have shown the hon. Gentleman that the landlord will have the power of giving a lease, although his own settlement contains no such power, and, therefore, by an arrangement with his original landlord, the tenant will have the benefit of the protection afforded by the Act. To whatever extent the House may think it right that this Bill ought to provide such protection, to that extent, under the leasing powers of the Bill, the tenant will have protection. There yet remain other provisions, however, which the hon. Gentleman may deem more adequate to effect that object, and in approaching this part of the subject, I desire to state in the first place what it is in connection with it which we cannot accomplish. In the first place, I shall fairly avow that we intend to make no attempt to give what is called retrospective compensation. Our legislation is intended to be entirely prospective. I appeal to those who think that we ought to give retrospective compensation to remember the history of retrospective legislation when other measures have been brought before the House; and last, not least, I ask them to remember what occurred last year, when a deputation of those gentlemen who had taken most interest in this subject waited upon the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks, who was then the leader of this House, requested him to exercise the power of the Government to bring this question to a settlement, and stated to him their views upon the subject of retrospective compensation. They stated in the most distinct and emphatic manner that they did not expect retrospective compensation, and that they desired a sound and reasonable Bill which would give prospective compensation for prospective improvements. When a discussion arose in this House the year before last the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire), the last Member not in office who had the conduct of a Bill of this kind, which measure failed to obtain the sanction of the House, in stating the reasons which caused his failure, used the expressions to which I shall now appeal as a sufficient explanation why those who, like himself, have exerted themselves to the utmost of their power to obtain what they believed to be right and just for the tenants of Ireland should not refuse to accept that which is practicable because they cannot obtain that which experience has shown the two Houses of Parliament will not grant. "The Bill," said the hon. Gentleman, "which I brought in was rejected by an overwhelming majority—a majority of something like three to one. Why did I fail? Because my measure contained what is known as the retrospective principle with regard to compensation for improvements." Then, he asked, were he and his friends to continue to press on a measure which they knew must result in failure and disappointment? and he said, most justly and emphatically, "If we had done so, we should have deserved the scorn of this House and the contempt of our countrymen. Instead of doing this, instead of demanding something which we knew we could not get, my friends and myself have resolved to do something practical." I entirely appreciate the wisdom of those observations. The object which I have in view is to bring in a Bill which, if it does not obtain popularity and satisfy all expectations, may at any rate do some practical good and pass into law, and therefore I frankly state at once that I have no intention of dealing with the question of retrospective compensation. Are we, then, to sanction prospective improvements without permitting the landlord to have any voice or any opinion as to the effect of those improvements upon his land? I shall not debate now the justice or injustice of the question, but I think it is absolutely necessary for the success of any measure that we should not interfere with the power of the landlord in that matter, and that we should reserve to him the right of objecting to improvements if he does not think they will benefit his estate. If, then, we cannot violate the law of property—if we cannot give what is called fixity of tenure by which I understand the transferring the property from the landlord to the tenant—is there nothing we can do? I think we have it in our power to accomplish a great and most important practical result. I think we have it in our power to give to an improving tenant that which is of value to him—the certainty of compensation. I think we can put him beyond the risk and hazard of being left in the position of the plaintiff in the case that came before the Master of the Rolls. I think we can insure to him a cheap, simple, and certain mechanism by which, if he chooses to execute improvements, he will be quite certain that the result of those improvements will return into his own bosom. That is the object I have in view, that is the object which I trust we shall be able to attain. Can we give compensation in the shape of a capital payment? I think it is impossible to give it by a capital payment. I have told you that the general rule in Ireland is that a landlord holds under a settlement. If a landlord holds under a settlement, and if the period of his settlement may shortly expire, how can you enable the tenant to improve, and then saddle the whole cost of the improvements upon the landlord who has only a limited interest in the land? I think it is impossible you can do that, but you can give an improving tenant the certainty of compensation, and you can give it him in that same form of an annuity by which you have already provided it for an improving landlord. In order to carry this plan into execution, we propose that when a tenant seeks to improve he shall serve upon his landlord a notice of his intention. I ought, perhaps, to say, with regard to this notice, that we intend to have forms of notice printed and sold at a small price, so that an improving tenant shall not be subject to any legal expense that might be otherwise incurred. We propose, then, that he shall serve a notice upon his landlord or upon the agent who receives the rent of the land. If the landlord disapprove the improvement, he will have the power to terminate the tenancy. We believe that this will practically lead, not to a termination of the tenancy, which would be a great mischief, but to a written agreement between the parties as to the terms on which the holding shall be continued. I believe hon. Gentlemen connected with Ireland will agree with me when I say that one of the most desirable results which could arise in that country would be obtained by the introduction of business-like written engagements between landlord and tenant with respect to the occupancy and improvement of land. I believe that the effect of this provision will be whenever the landlord disapproves, not that he will evict the tenant, but that he will enter into a written agreement with him for the improvement of the land; but supposing the landlord to take no step, then he will be held to have acquiesced, and the tenant will execute the improvements contained in his notice. He will then go before the chairman of the county to prove the value and extent of the improvements, whereupon he will obtain a provisional certificate, which certificate will give him an annuity calculated at 5 per cent upon every £100 expended in the improvements, or £7 2s. for 25 years. If he be evicted by his landlord, he will go before the chairman and obtain a charging order, accounting for his arrears of rent, and that charging order, transferable and saleable, will be duly confirmed and registered, and will be binding on all to whom the land may come. It is obvious that the hardship denounced in such strong and forcible language by the Master of the Rolls cannot arise if this arrangement be carried into effect. As I said before, it will not satisfy the expectations of those who want retrospective compensation, of those who think that the landlord should have no voice in the improvement of his property, of those who desire to have fixity of tenure. I frankly acknowledge that I cannot hope to satisfy those expectations, but I can appeal to the gentlemen who entertain them whether, after the evidence they have had of the certain failure of every measure which contained such provisions, they would consider it an honest act on the part of the Government to propose another Bill of the same kind, or whether they would care to commit themselves to an obstinate adherence to an impracticable and unattainable measure. I ask them not to reject measures which will set free the land of Ireland for extensive, but, at the same time, just, equitable and beneficial improvements, because they cannot obtain that to which they attach importance, but which they know well the two Houses of Parliament will never grant. I can make a further appeal to them. If they think that I have been too timid in not venturing to adopt plans which I believe would not receive the sanction of Parliament, they will have an opportunity when we go into Committee of taking the sense of the House upon those plans, and of regulating their conduct according to the event. The measure which I have explained to the House, whatever may be its shortcomings, will set free the land in the hands of limited owners, and will enable those owners, whether they be sole owners, or corporations, trustees of schools, or clergymen, to give improvement leases; and I say that whoever succeeds in carrying a measure which shall settle the law upon this subject will confer a great benefit upon Ireland. If the measure is not of an aspiring character, I hope on that account it will commend itself to the candid consideration of the House. Surely there have been difficulties enough during the twenty-five years we have been dealing with the subject, and it is time we obtained for the people of Ireland some degree of improvement. The Encumbered Estates Act has conferred a signal benefit on Ireland in regard to land which has passed into the hands of new proprietors; let us by mutual co-operation try to arrive at some measure that will benefit that larger portion of the soil of Ireland, which, I trust, will descend to remote generations in the hands of its present possessors.

Mr. Cardwell

Mr. Cardwell

Motion made, and Question proposed,—

“That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law relating to the Tenure and Improvement of Land in Ireland.”

LORD FERMOY said, he could not concur in thinking that Ireland was so extremely prosperous as had been represented. The statistics of the two periods could not fairly be compared. Ten years ago Ireland was only coming out of an appalling famine, from which even now she was only recovering. Neither was he so sanguine as the right hon. Gentleman seemed to be as to the good results of the measure. In the first place, a large portion of the Bill was only an enabling Bill to put landlords in a position to raise money at $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent upon an annuity which was to last for twenty-five years, and which was calculated at $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. [Mr. CARDWELL: I believe it is calculated at an annuity of 5 per cent.] But the right hon. Gentleman had forgotten to tell who was to lend the money; and that brought him to the most important part of the question, namely, who in Ireland possessed capital to lay out in improvements on the land? He believed that the farmers were the only class that possessed capital to lay out on such improvements; and, if so, any measure to be effective must be such as to induce those who had capital to lay it out in that way. But that could not be done without giving them some security for its investment. Now laws of this kind were not made between the good landlord and his tenant, but between the bad landlord and his tenant; and how did the right hon. Gentleman purpose to deal with the two? In ordinary circumstances it would be bad enough for a man who would not allow his tenant to improve, to eject him; but instead of that, down came Cardwell's Act to do it for him. The law would be known in Ireland as Cardwell's Act. He could not see how it could have anything but the worst effect—it was giving the sanction of an Act of Parliament to the ejectment of an improving tenant. It would be better to allow the present state of things to exist than to attempt to interfere by such legislative quackery. The right hon. Gentleman was afraid to deal boldly with the question, and he attempted to deal with it in this insufficient manner. The Bill would do no good, but might, he feared, do much harm.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, as one of the deputation which had been alluded to, he did not abandon or repudiate the principle of retrospective compensation; but merely stated that he would not obstruct a measure which had other good points, because it did not contain that one. He did not quite understand that part of the measure by which it appeared that if the landlord and tenant did not agree as to the improvements the tenancy was to cease. The right hon. Gentleman had alluded to the prosperity of Ireland; he did not think that prosperity rested on a very sound basis; it was caused by the diminution of the population. The extension of farms was brought about by a process of wholesale eviction, which in Ireland was not considered a great sign of prosperity. The first part of the Bill he could not understand; the second part referred to occupiers who had no leases, and it could not be said that the measure was likely to better their condition. The Government was dealing with Ireland like a doctor with a hypochondriac patient; feeling that it must do something, it prescribed bread pills.

Lord Fermoy

MR. LONGFIELD said, he was disposed to take a more favourable view of the Bill than the noble Lord or the hon. Member who had just spoken. It embodied three main principles; two of them could easily be carried out; with the third there might be some difficulty. The principle of enabling a person having a limited ownership of land to improve it, and charge a portion of the expense on his successor, who would reap the benefit of the improvement, was a sound principle. It was adopted nearly eighty years ago in Scotland under the Montgomery Act, which enabled the owners of entailed estates to improve the land and charge a limited portion of the outlay on the successor; but the charge was made in a gross sum—not as an annuity, and the amount was regulated by the annual rental of the estate. He thought that principle wise and beneficial. Then there was another principle, recognized from the earliest period as one of the justest and most humane, embodied in the Bill; he alluded to the proposal of allowing limited owners to give secure tenures to the tenants. There were at least fifty Acts providing leasing powers in Ireland, and five of them had been passed within the last three years. They were all, however, insufficient, but the right hon. Gentleman had got through the difficulty by proposing a uniform leasing power, which all might take advantage of. With regard to the third portion of the Bill, providing machinery by which tenants from year to year might be permitted to expend their capital for the improvement of the estate, he could not go along with the right hon. Gentleman. He listened to the explanation of that part of the measure with attention, for he knew there lay the difficulty, and he did not think that the right hon. Gentleman had provided much, or, indeed, any remedy. Any provision for the purpose was liable to the objection of converting a temporary tenure, such as that of tenant from year to year, into a settlement, and that was an infringement of the law of property. The difficulty of legislating on this point was great, and he did not think the right hon. Gentleman had mastered it; and, therefore, from this portion of the Bill he must withhold all praise. The right hon. Gentleman might have introduced a useful provision, for which there were precedents in Ireland, conferring on tenants who hold by leases power to improve their lands.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he could assure the House that no one had listened with greater anxiety and deeper attention to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman than he had done. He had listened to the right hon. Gentleman in no cynical or captious spirit, and with no desire that the statement he made should be unsatisfactory to the country which he officially represented. On the contrary, he was anxious that the question should be finally and satisfactorily settled, that all legislation on the subject should end with the end of the present Session, and that, if possible, the name of tenant-right should never again be heard in that House. But, however much he admired two portions of the Bill, there was one part which might be considered its weak point, and on which his noble Friend (Lord Fermoy) only gave expression to the feeling of disappointment and pain which every Irish Member felt. He agreed with his noble Friend, that if the right hon. Gentleman did not amend and greatly alter that portion of the Bill, and the most vicious machinery which had been sketched out, his name would be associated in Ireland with evictions in every part of the country. That was surely not an object which the right hon. Gentleman, who was benevolently inclined, and was anxious to associate his name with the prosperity of Ireland, could have had in view. Irish Members were struck with astonishment when they heard that if a tenant from year to year wished to improve his land, and his landlord did not think the improvement would be beneficial, or objected to it from any motive—of folly, or viciousness, or a grudging disposition—the unfortunate man, whose spirit of industry and enterprise had induced him to make the offer, was to be victimized in consequence of his having possessed the very virtues which the right hon. Gentleman was anxious to instil into his mind. With every feeling of respect and friendliness towards the right hon. Gentleman, he could not help saying that a more vicious suggestion for the landlord, or a more fatal result for the tenant, could not by any possibility be imagined. The right hon. Gentleman admitted the fact that most of the land in Ireland was held from year to year. That was a fact quite notorious to every one; indeed, he might challenge any Irish Gentleman to say, whether five-sixths of the land occupied by tenants was not held from year to year. Although the landlord might not disturb the tenant, and although in the instances of honourable, and fair, and kind landlords, the tenancy might be as good as a lease, still the fact remained, that the vast majority of tenants held only from year to year. Who then were to improve the condition of Ireland? In whose hands was the soil—on whose energy and industry must the country depend? Just those very tenants from year to year. If they had not energy and industry, all legislation would be abortive, and the most benevolently inclined Minister and the most anxious Parliament could do nothing in the matter. How then could such men ever be induced to exert the qualities upon which so much depended, if a poor, struggling, industrious man, the moment he asked permission to improve his land, might be turned upon the roadside by some churlish, ill-conditioned, or vicious landlord? It might be said that such landlords would not be often met with; but had the House contemplated how one single act of such cruelty and folly might extinguish for a generation every impulse to improvement in the district where it was committed? If the right hon. Gentleman wanted a precedent for a practical and judicious measure, he might have found it in a Bill prepared by a former distinguished Member of that House—a late Lord Chancellor of Ireland. By that measure a tenant might improve even in spite of his landlord, and might claim compensation—not indeed for useless or extravagant outlay—not for the building of a pagoda or a piece of Gothic ornamental structure—but for improvements which were proved to be suitable, practically valuable, and for the benefit of the land. He was most anxious, as he was sure his hon. Friends were, to give the Government every assistance in carrying through the Bill; but he believed in his heart and soul they would be deserting their country, and sowing the seeds of future evil, if they sanctioned at least that portion of its provisions. He, therefore, earnestly appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw that clause of the Bill, which was not only vicious but absurd; and which, while effecting no single object the right hon. Gentleman desired to effect, would inevitably operate as an encouragement and source of evictions in Ireland.

MR. MONSELL said, there was one portion of the speech of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Cardwell) that was extremely important as regarded hon. Gentlemen not connected with Ireland. He laid down in the clearest manner why it was rendered necessary to have a different system of legislation between landlord and tenant from that which obtained in England and Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman showed that in Ireland those improvements which were considered to be landlords' improvements in England were made either not at all or were made by the tenant. The one test they had to apply to the Bill of his right hon. Friend was, whether the Bill met that difficulty or not. He (Mr. Monsell) agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman, the Member for Mallow (Mr. Longfield), that the two first features of the Bill were founded upon sound principles; but he could not agree that they were likely to produce very important results, and he would tell the House his reason. There existed at the present moment, or within the last year, a system in Ireland, by which landlords, whether with entailed estates or not, might proceed to the Board of works and borrow money upon much more advantageous terms, namely, at 3½ per cent, the repayment of the whole money to be at 6½ per cent for twenty-two years, by which drainage and also farm buildings were enabled to be executed. Though he agreed with the principle, he was afraid that part of the measure was not likely to produce very important results. The real question of importance in the Bill was the way in which it affected that great mass of people who in Ireland were tenants-at-will. Unless they exerted themselves to induce that class to spend the capital they had been accumulating for the last three or four years upon their land, that land would not be improved. He asked any Gentleman who had listened to the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman, whether this measure was likely to produce the desired result, of encouraging those tenants to spend their money upon the improvement of the land. Let them consider what the process was to be. The tenant was to serve a notice upon the landlord that he wished to make such and such improvements, and if the landlord refused to give his assent to those improvements, a compulsory eviction might take place. Under such circumstances, was it possible to imagine that a tenant would go to his landlord and say to him he wished to make such and such improvements, when he knew that if the landlord refused to allow him to make those improvements, he might be immediately turned out of the farm? He really hoped that he did not understand the measure as it had been explained, but, if he did understand it, it seemed to him calculated to make things infinitely worse than they were at present. He did not think the measure would give satisfaction to the people of Ireland.

MR. WHITESIDE said, it was impossible to discuss a measure of this kind without seeing the Bill, because a great deal of its value would depend upon the machinery by which it was to be worked. There was a great deal of this measure that he for one could not assent to. He was not content that the chairman of the county, without appeal, should have the large powers given to him as proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. As to the power of granting leases, that had been proposed over and over again; but now they had chiefly to deal with the tenants from year to year. There was much difficulty in dealing with that question, no doubt. In the province of Ulster the great bulk of the population were tenants from year to year; and he had no hesitation in saying that if the clause of the Bill, as he understood it, referring to tenants at will should be made applicable to that province a flame of discontent would rise from one end of the country to the other. He was anxious to protect the rights of property; but he, for one, could never give his assent to that clause. A landlord, no doubt, ought to have the opportunity of exercising his judgment, but in this Bill it was proposed, as he collected, to enforce by the landlord eviction against a tenant civilly asking permission to make improvements. [Cries of "No!"] He had certainly understood, and if he had misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman's intention it was not his fault. Was the landlord to have the power of saying to his tenant, "For your audacity, Sir, in making this application to me, go about your business?" The fact was that the necessity for legislation on this subject every day diminished. Tenants were far more prosperous now than they were some years ago, and it was well that this was the case. He would not say in what part of Ireland he was a short time ago when he had a conversation with a banker, and asked him what was the state of the farmers in his neighbourhood? The reply was, "I cash bills now for £100 for men for whom seven years ago I would not have cashed a bill for £10." The true interest of the landlord was to encourage the tenant, and not to try to squeeze the last farthing out of him. By the custom of the country tenancies in the North of Ireland were mostly from year to year; but it was a mistake to suppose that the landlords generally got high rents. The rents were moderate, but the landlords always got them. That was, nearly always. He recollected an extensive landowner in Ulster telling him, that during the famine year he got all his rent, minus £100. Believing the worst legislation to be that which was calculated to produce quarrels between landlords and tenants, he could not give his assent to this part of the Bill; but he would willingly lend assistance towards improving its machinery, so far as it related to leasing powers. The worst legislation they could have was that which would tend to produce quarrels between landlords and tenants; but if the Government proposed to enlarge leasing powers such enactments should have his best support.

Mr. Maguire

MR. DEASY said, he rose to remove a misapprehension which appeared to have arisen in the minds of the noble Lord below the gangway (Lord Fermoy) and other hon. Gentlemen as to the intentions of the Government. It was assumed that the Bill gave increased facilities for eviction. Nothing was more contrary to the real provisions of the Bill or the spirit of its framers. All that was intended was that the landlord should have a veto on the improvements, that he should be enabled to exercise his judgment whether they were calculated to improve the land, before he was bound to pay compensation for them. If he did not think they ought to be carried out the tenant was warned, and must proceed with them at his own risk. The result, they hoped, would be some written arrangement between them, by which both parties would understand their relative position, and the tenant would be enabled to take advantage of the beneficial provisions of the Bill to acquire a term from which neither the remainderman nor the encumbrancer could disturb him. The class of tenancies to which the operation of the Bill was confined was that of tenants from year to year, for considerable difficulty would be experienced in dealing with those in which the leases constituted regular contracts between the landlord and tenant. The Bill proposed by the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland had never, he might remark, obtained the assent of Parliament, but the hon. and learned Gentleman had felt bound to withdraw from the responsibility of having originated it. In 1855, when a Bill was proposed under the auspices of his noble Friend at the head of the Government, containing provisions with regard to improvements executed by tenants holding under lease, they had been strongly opposed by the hon. and learned Member for Wexford (Mr. George), and it was only by the utmost exertions of the Government, and by a very narrow majority, that the clause had been retained in the Bill.

MR. BOWYER said, he would not enter into a discussion of the measure, but simply say that he entirely concurred in all the objections which had been taken to the Bill, which did not remedy any of the grievances complained of by the people of Ireland. He advised the Government to withdraw it with a good grace, and to bring forward some measure more adapted to the requirements of that country.

MR. BLAKE said, he wished to express a hope that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who had shown an anxious desire to render his term of office beneficial to the people of Ireland, would cause such modifications to be introduced into the Bill as would fulfil their reasonable expectations. He was not as much in love with the landlords of Ulster as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. White-side), for the records of the House would show that of the atrocities perpetrated by the landlords of Ireland—which was saying a good deal—the most striking were performed by that very class.

MR. GEORGE said, that without entering into the details of the Bill he wished to state that he believed it to be free from several of the prominent objections which had been urged with regard to former measures on the same subject, and there were no indications whatever of a desire to give to the measure a retrospective tendency, which he should have felt it his duty most strongly to oppose. He did not agree with some hon. Gentlemen in thinking that an additional power of eviction would be given; the privilege of the landlord was neither accelerated by the circumstance of the veto, nor, on the other hand, was the power of evicting tenants at will, after the ordinary six months' notice, interfered with.

MR. HENNESSY remarked that he cordially agreed in all that every Irish Member had urged in condemnation of the measure, and would recommend the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw it.

MR. MALINS said, he spoke with reluctance in reference to an Irish measure, but the Bill involved principles which were not applicable peculiarly to Ireland. The time was rapidly approaching when the condition of Ireland would be equal, if not superior, to that of England; and he saw no reason, therefore, why any distinction should exist between the legislation in the two countries on these subjects. Consequently, if the measure were proposed to be extended to England he should not entertain those objections to it which had been expressed by Irish Members. There could be no more reasonable principle than that the landlord, with the concurrence of the tenant, should be enabled to improve the land, and charge the cost of the improvement on the land so as to bind his successor. In England a somewhat similar principle existed in reference to parsonage houses, the rate of interest being so arranged that it did not press with any severity on the person by whom the money was borrowed, but left him with an improved estate, and a gradually diminishing scale of payments. That seemed to him to be a sound principle. He did not think, however, that it would have much operation in Ireland, as landlords already had power to borrow money for improving their estates. By the Settled Estates Act, it was provided, that with the consent of the Court of Chancery, certain provisions might be inserted in settlements which had been omitted by their settlors. This was a matter of the greatest importance, and one hon. Member had asked where was the money to come from? Well, there were many persons who might be willing to lend the money. The landlord, himself, might not desire to put his own money into an estate which might go after him to his own child or to some other person. [Laughter.] He repeated the landlord might not like to lend the money unless he saw that his return was secure. Taking that view of the question and noticing the great assimilation which was growing up between England and Ireland he would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman whether he should not cease to treat this measure as an Irish Bill, but extend its provisions to England, so as to make it an Imperial question. He was glad to learn, however, that the impression which he had certainly gathered from the right hon. Gentleman's statement was incorrect—namely, that if a tenant year to year served notice upon his landlord of a desire to make improvements, and the landlord did not accede, that was to be equivalent to a notice to quit.

Mr. George

MR. CARDWELL said, that he was afraid that he had been the cause of some misunderstanding from a desire of being perfectly candid with those hon. Gentlemen who were advocates of tenant right. He wished distinctly to express that the veto with regard to the expense of repairs was to be left with the landlord. It gave no encouragement to evictions, but in the belief of the Government would lead to a more general system of written agreements between landlord and tenant. They wished to avoid the possibility of the landlord lying by appearing to acquiesce in the tenant's improvements, and then turning round and evicting the tenant, and taking advantage of his labour and capital. With regard to the other points of the Bill, the right hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Mossell) was quite mistaken in supposing that the powers intended to be conferred by the Bill already existed in Ireland. All that existed was a loan, which was nearly all exhausted. With regard to another point, it was the fact that leasing powers did not exist in Ireland. He begged further to say that it was open to any hon. Gentleman to bring forward any plan which he might deem feasible, and see whether it would be favourably accepted by the House or not.

Leave given.

Bill ordered to be brought in by MR. CARDWELL and MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND.

Bill presented and read 1^o.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND).

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. DEASY said, he rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to consolidate and amend the law of landlord and tenant in Ireland, and to express a hope that he might be allowed to defer any exposition of the measure until a future stage.

COLONEL DUNNE inquired what was the consolidation intended by the Bill.

MR. DEASY said, that he could not state the objects of the Bill without entering into minute explanations of a legal character which the House, he believed, would not at that hour be disposed to hear, and he might add that the hon. and gallant Member would not be the wiser if he (the Attorney General for Ireland) were to make such a statement.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he thought that was not a fitting answer for the hon. and learned Gentlemen to give to the question which had been put to him. No doubt an explanation would take some time, but a law that touched every acre of land in Ireland, and affected all the relations of landlord and tenant, required a short exposition, and if the right hon. Gentleman asked the indulgence of the House to defer that exposition he ought to have refrained from the use of any language which could be considered of a personally offensive character.

MR. DEASY disclaimed the slightest intention of giving any offence to his hon. and gallant Friend. He had merely meant to say that he could not explain the provisions of the Bill without entering into details of a legal character, which he feared that he could not at that moment make intelligible to a gentleman who was not himself a lawyer.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he really had not heard what was the answer the right hon. and learned Gentleman had given to his question. If the Bill had reference to the relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland he believed he understood the subject better than the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself.

Leave given.

"Bill to consolidate and amend the Law of Landlord and Tenant in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND and Mr. CARDWELL."

Bill presented and read 1^o.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND).

LEAVE.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he also wished to move for leave to introduce another Bill upon the same subject, and to follow the example of the Attorney General for Ireland, and abstain from entering upon any explanation at present.

Motion made, and Question proposed,—
"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law of Landlord and Tenant in Ireland."

Put and negatived.

PAWNBROKERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HORSFALL moved the second reading of this Bill, the object of which he explained to be to enable pawnbrokers to charge the sum of one halfpenny for every duplicate issued on a pledge under the sum of 5s.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he should move that the Bill be read that day six months. The effect of the measure was to charge the poor for a duplicate, which pawnbrokers were precluded from doing by the statute. The Act of Geo. II. was the first Act which regulated the rate of interest and issuing pledge-tickets. That Act was amended by an Act of Geo. III., by which no duplicate tickets were chargeable for pledges under 5s. The Bill emanated entirely from Manchester and Liverpool, and was not desired at all by the respectable portion of the trade in London. The argument put forward in support of the Bill was that it would put a stop to the unlicensed pawnshops to which the poor people resorted, where they were not treated with the same liberality as at the licensed pawnshops. If there were such shops as these, carrying on a trade and extorting money from the poor, it was the duty of the Government to put them down in a regular manner. The pledges under 5s. in the pawnshops of London alone amounted to 31,650 in one month, many of them being for 3d. 4d. and 6d., and it would be monstrous to take the halfpenny from the poor and add it to the enormous interest—frequently more than 100 per cent of the pawnbroker. It was purely a Manchester scheme, and he was persuaded the House would never give its sanction to a Bill so palpably favouring extortion.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. MELLOR said, it was of little consequence whether the Bill emanated from Manchester or elsewhere. The question was whether it was just. The country pawnbrokers were universally in favour of the Bill. It was found that to take pledges under 5s., issue a ticket gratis, and meet the expense of warehousing the articles was not a remunerative business. The consequence was that the pledges were refused, and the poor were driven to unlicensed shops, where they were charged, not 200, but 800 per cent. The unlicensed trade flourished, and the poor were infinitely more oppressed than if they were charged $\frac{1}{2}d.$, as provided by the Bill.

MR. HUMBERSTON contended that the Bill was, in fact, a protection of the poor. The licensed pawnbrokers were not compelled to accept pledges under 5s., and unless they did the poor were necessarily driven to those who were unlicensed. The charge of $\frac{1}{2}d.$ upon the duplicate was therefore reasonable.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 178; Noes 32: Majority 146.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for Tuesday, 24th April.

PAPER DUTY REPEAL BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he wished to postpone the Committee till Monday.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, an impression prevailed in the House that this Bill would not be proceeded with until after Easter. He hoped the doubt would be cleared up by the right hon Gentleman.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, if the hon. Baronet said there was a doubt, no doubt there was a doubt; but he had no idea that there was a doubt, at any rate there was no doubt upon his mind.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

INCOME TAX BILL. CONSIDERED AS AMENDED.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read; Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended in the Committee, be now taken into consideration."

COLONEL DUNNE said, it was hardly fair at that hour (ten minutes to 1 o'clock)

Mr. Mellor

to ask him to proceed with his Amendment. The statement which he had to make might lead to a discussion. This was an important measure, and it had not been sufficiently debated in that House, for it was brought in without much discussion, and it had been so hurried through the House that only one Irish Member had had an opportunity of speaking upon it. He thought the right hon. Gentleman ought not to force the Bill on at the hour. He should move the adjournment of the House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was sorry to put the gallant Gentleman to any inconvenience, but he thought he had done everything in his power to afford facilities for a discussion of the Bill. With that view he had proposed a morning sitting, and in the early part of the evening he had vainly sought permission to bring the measure under consideration. A great part of the evening had been spent in discussing unopposed Motions, and much time also in discussing Motions in which the hon. and gallant Gentleman, as an Irish Member, must feel an interest. It was quite a mistake to suppose that money bills of that kind were usually required to be brought on at 6 o'clock; on the contrary, it was extremely unusual to raise so many discussions upon them in their later stages. But this was not the last stage of the Bill; it would be read a third time next day (Friday) on the first order of the day, and perhaps the hon. and gallant Gentleman would make his statement on that occasion.

COLONEL DUNNE: On the third reading I could propose no Amendment.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The hon. and gallant Gentleman will be perfectly free to move the re-committal of the Bill when I propose the third reading.

MR. AYRTON said, he thought the time had come when there should be some definite understanding as to what the House had to do before it separated, for they were getting into great embarrassment. He felt the difficulties in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer was placed. In the Budget most important changes in every department of finance were propounded, and the subsequent discussions had not been commensurate with the principles at stake. While recognizing the duty of the House to give the Chancellor of the Exchequer every assistance for a full discussion of his measures, in order, if approved, that they might be passed at the earliest possible period, he could not help observing that the right hon. Gentleman's course of proceeding had been embarrassed by the kindly competition for public approbation which was being waged by him and the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the one pressing forward measures relating to the finances of the country; the other, a Bill for a reform of its constitution. It was impossible the House could go on discussing those questions and others in the way they were now going, passing in one day from serious drama to light farce and back again. It was desirable that the House should resume the discussion of what some called the unimportant question of the Reform Bill. He did not think it was unimportant, though the more it was discussed the less it seemed to be liked. But the noble Lord was not more fortunate than the late Government in that respect. He had produced a Bill which seemed rather to excite ridicule than serious discussion. Shortly after the India Bill of the late Government was brought forward the noble Lord suggested that, instead of continuing a useless discussion of a measure which gave satisfaction to no one, the Government should withdraw it, and that the House should then proceed to deal with the subject by way of Resolution. If that was thought to be an excellent mode of framing a constitution for India, the House might proceed in the same way in framing one for England. He hoped hon. Gentlemen opposite would allow the Chancellor of the Exchequer to advance his Bill a stage pro forma, on the condition that a day should be set apart for the discussion of the whole question.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he hoped to hear from the Government a distinct statement as to what was to be done that day (Friday). The right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer had just told them that the first business would be the income tax, and the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs had previously stated that the first business would be the Reform Bill. It was desirable that they should know which version was correct.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he wished to know whether, on the third reading of the Bill, they would be permitted to move Amendments? ["No, no!"] Then he begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he did not see what the Chancellor of the Exchequer would gain by pressing on his Bill at that hour, if it was to be recommitted in the evening.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would not agree to the recommitment.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the House now knew the nature of the proposal made to them. He thought, on the whole, it would be best to take a division at once on the Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Dunne).

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON remarked that the Chancellor of the Exchequer said the hon. and gallant Gentleman might move the recommitment of the Bill; but he never said he would agree to it. The hon. and gallant Gentleman would have an equally good opportunity of taking the sense of the House on his Amendment that evening at 5 o'clock, if he consented to the proposal of his right hon. Friend, as he would have if he brought it on at that moment. Of course they were quite ready to take up the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member at once, if he desired it.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he thought that, considering the concessions the House had already made in regard to this Bill, and also the growing feeling in the country that the possible decision on the Paper duty, and the alterations in the Army Estimates, might affect the question of the income tax, it was not right to press the Bill upon them then. He hoped that if Government did not give way, the House would divide on the Motion for adjournment.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, his noble Friend (Lord John Manners) appeared to think he was so entirely blind to the duties of his office, that, after making a step forward that morning, he would be quite willing to take a step backward in the evening. All he said was, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman might test the feeling of the House as well on the Motion for recommitment as at that moment.

MR. BENTINCK said, so much confusion had crept into the conduct of business in the House, that he hoped the Motion for Adjournment would be adhered to.

MR. EDWIN JAMES observed, he was surprised the noble Viscount at the head of the Government had sat down without answering the question addressed to him, whether they were that evening to go on first with the Income tax or the Reform Bill.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated clearly that the income tax would be taken as the first Order of the Day that evening.

MR. WHITESIDE asked whether, after the Income tax was disposed of, they were to go on with the Reform Bill?

MR. MALINS urged the noble Lord to postpone the Reform Bill.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, unquestionably it was the intention of the Government to go on with the Reform Bill that night, if the other business should be disposed of in proper time to allow it.

MR. MALINS said, he wished to know what the noble Viscount meant by proper time?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he wished to state that he only pressed this Bill as a matter of public convenience—

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he rose to order. The right hon. Gentleman had already spoken on the question before the House.

MR. SPEAKER said, it was not unusual to allow a Minister to explain under similar circumstances.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

STAMP DUTIES BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee Read.

House in Committee.

Clause 1.

MR. BENTINCK said, that unless the Chancellor of the Exchequer consented to stop at Clause 16, so as to allow him the opportunity of moving, on another occasion, the omission of Clause 17, he should move that the Chairman report progress.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that unless the Bill passed through Committee to-night it could not go through the other House before the recess, and the public in that case would lose £1,000 a day by the postponement.

MR. BENTINCK asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would make the next stage of the Bill the second Order of the Day to-morrow, so as to give him an opportunity of making his Motion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER assented to this arrangement.

Clause agreed to. Clauses 2 to 8 agreed to.

Mr. Edwin James

Clause 9.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he wished to direct attention to a point which he declared to be practically inconvenient and even absurd. To enact that a broker was not to recover his brokerage unless the delivery order was stamped, he maintained to be a most extraordinary proposition. If he understood the clause, which was very enigmatically drawn, that was its meaning.

MR. CRAWFORD said, the only operation of the clause would be in the case of contract notes of brokers on the Stock Exchange.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER defended the clause, and urged that its meaning could not bear two interpretations. That which the hon. Member for London had mentioned was the correct interpretation.

MR. AYRTON said, he did not think the clause could possibly bear that meaning.

Clause agreed to. Clause 10 agreed to.

Clause 11 (Documents not to be valid unless stamped at the time of execution.)

MR. EDWIN JAMES objected to that provision.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would consider the matter, and state his decision on bringing up the Report.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

House adjourned at half-after Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, March 30, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—3^d Consolidated Fund (£850,000).

INDIA—THE PROPOSED LICENSING SYSTEM—PETITION.

LORD OVERSTONE presented a Petition from Merchants and other Inhabitants of Bombay, unconnected with the Government service, against the proposed Measure of Taxation. The petition had been adopted at a public meeting convened by the sheriff, and attended by almost all the influential inhabitants, merchants, lawyers, and commercial men of Bombay. The petitioners, after a full discussion, condemned the proposed Government measure as unjust and unequal, and prayed that the House of Lords would prevent its becoming law. He could not pretend to be possessed of so much local information or to have studied the question so deeply as to be able to give any opinion of his own on the subject; but he had no hesitation in calling their Lordships' attention to the matter, both on account of the importance of the subject and on account of the large number of influential signatures appended to it. On these grounds he was confident the petition would receive from their Lordships that respectful consideration to which it was so justly entitled. He thought it right to call to their Lordships' notice that in the course of the discussion which took place at the meeting, it was stated that a former petition which had been sent from Bombay had, on its presentation in this country, been received with silent contempt. Now, he felt certain that nothing of the kind could have occurred in their Lordships' House, and that this feeling must have arisen from some misapprehension; but he alluded to this matter now because he felt certain that this petition would receive from their Lordships' hands all attention, and that their Lordships would not proceed to discuss the question without giving to the statements contained in this petition all the consideration which they so well deserved.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he could not recollect that any petition representing the opinions of any portion of the inhabitants of India had been received either by the Government or by their Lordships with silent contempt. He recollected that in the course of last Session and during the former Administration of Lord Palmerston, several petitions were presented from various parts of India by noble Friends near him; but they were uniformly introduced by the noble Lords who presented them with observations stating the purport of the petitions, and calling the attention of the House to the importance of their representations; and these remarks had always been met by such respectful observations from the Government or other noble Lords as the subject required. As regarded the petition which his noble Friend presented, it was too late, in the best sense of the word; for it referred to the licensing system, which Mr. Wilson distinctly stated in his address had been abandoned by the Government because it was based on unequal and unsound principles.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE stated, that a petition which had been sent to him from India for presentation had remained in his hands, because, with the changes impending, he really did not know how it applied to the existing state of things in India.

Petition to lie on the table.

CHINA EXPEDITION.

MOTION FOR ESTIMATE OF EXPENSES.

EARL GREY moved for an " Estimate, as nearly as the same can be made out, of the probable Cost of the Expedition to China up to the Close of the Financial Year 1860-1; the said Estimate to include the Pay and Supplies for Her Majesty's Naval and Land Forces (whether of the Regular or Indian Army) if they should continue in China to the above Date, together with all Charges for Transport, Freight, Military Stores, and Coals."

The noble Earl said the information which their Lordships at present possessed upon this subject was very scanty and imperfect. All they knew was, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in introducing his Budget, was reported to have said that during the present financial year, ending to-morrow, nearly £1,000,000 would be required for this purpose. That, he begged to state to their Lordships, was for the liquidation of expenses, the result of measures taken by the Government during the three or four months before Parliament assembled, and without the slightest authority from Parliament, which had had no opportunity of expressing its opinion of the purposes for which it had been incurred. Their Lordships had not taken notice of that irregularity, nor had any notice of it been taken in the other House of Parliament—the House which had charge of the public purse; but he (Earl Grey) was old-fashioned enough to believe that these expenses ought not to have been incurred by the sole authority of the Government, and without previous application being made to Parliament, or without Parliament having had an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon the circumstances. It was true they had heard from the Secretary of State for War that Her Majesty's Government had, in the Estimates laid before Parliament, made a further provision to the extent of two millions and a half for the costs of the expedition in 1860-1; but that right hon. Gentleman, at the same time, said he would not speculate upon what might be the cost of those operations; and he (Earl Grey) thought the right hon. Gentleman was highly prudent in declining to state that that Estimate would be the ultimate cost of the operations to be carried on. He would, indeed, be a bold man who would venture to predict what the cost would be, when he considered the enormous expense of conducting military operations at so great a distance from their resources, and the uncertainty when war had once begun of what might be its limit, or when it might be brought to a close. When all those things were considered, they must feel that it was only too probable that the cost of this expedition would swell to the most formidable dimensions, and have to be reckoned by millions. Even if these operations should be brought to as early and successful a close as it would be possible to hope for, still in that case he believed there would have been a very considerable expense incurred; and of all those expenses he thought their Lordships ought to have a proximate Estimate. No doubt it was impossible that anything like an accurate Estimate could be prepared, nor was it necessary that such an Estimate should be presented; but it ought to be practicable to make out, for their Lordships' information, an account which would show the probable cost of the measures which had been already taken and ordered by the Government, on the supposition that no unforeseen contingency would arise. The Government ought to make out the cost of sending to China, and maintaining there, until the close of the ensuing financial year, the large naval and land forces which had been already ordered. That was the Estimate which he (Earl Grey) proposed their Lordships should call for. It was proposed to take the expenses up to the end of the ensuing financial year—and he indeed must be a sanguine person who expected the return of the expedition at an earlier period; and even if it should happily return before that time, the cost of the return voyage would absorb the funds provided, and there would be no immediate reduction in the expenses of the ensuing year. It was necessary that their Lordships should have this Estimate before them, in order that their Lordships and the country might have an opportunity of knowing what might be the cost which, in the most favourable event, would be thrown upon the country by the measures which had been taken by Her Majesty's Government. Their Lordships could not clearly understand what the Government proposed to do without this Estimate; and it was the more necessary that they should have it before them, because, contrary to what used to be the practice of Parliament, Her Majesty's Government had adopted their measures, had undertaken this great expedition to a distant country, and had, in all probability, commenced a long and costly war without having first invited Parliament to express an opinion upon it. The ancient practice of Parliament was, that when war, involving probably a large expenditure, was imminent, it was felt to be the duty of Ministers, at the earliest period in their power, to call upon Parliament to advise the Crown, and to share the responsibility of Ministers. That was a good and a wholesome rule, and he regretted that it had been departed from in the present instance. It was true that the other House of Parliament had been asked for a Vote of £850,000 for the expenses which had been already incurred; but no formal judgment of Parliament had been asked upon the subject, and their Lordships had had no opportunity of expressing any opinion. That might be a convenient course for a Government to follow, but he did not believe it was consistent with the spirit of the constitution, nor did he think it was just to the Members of either House of Parliament, or to the nation at large. It might be a convenient course for a Government to throw the papers upon the table, as thereby a vote of censure could not be obtained without difficulty—for it was much more easy to avoid a vote of censure than to obtain a vote of approval. It was a difficult, an invidious thing for a Member of either House of Parliament to propose a vote of censure; but this he would say, it was by no means just to throw upon Parliament the responsibility of a silent acquiescence, although the measures which Government had taken might, in the opinion of Parliament, be erroneous; still less was it fair to expect that private Members would come forward in the character of accusers. It was not just that the nation should have to bear the cost and burden of, it might be, an expensive and protracted war, and the expenses of military and naval preparation, without the question being in the first instance submitted to the deliberative judgment of Parliament. Although the course pursued by the Government was one of which he did not approve, he owned he did not wonder that they had followed it. It showed impliedly that they had but little confidence in the strength of the case which they would have to submit to Parliament, had they come forward to ask for its support. Had the Government done so, they would have been called upon to prove that the quarrel with China was a just one—to show that the Chinese were not entitled by the law of nations to resist by force the breaking down of the barriers erected for the protection of that river which gave access to their capital—how it was that the precedents which had been followed in the wars with other nations, and especially in the last war with Russia, had been neglected in this instance—how it was, in short, that a convention had not been signed with France clearly defining the objects of the war. In undertaking combined operations with an allied and independent power there were always difficulties to be overcome in order to maintain cordiality and to prevent jealousies and animosities from arising. In order to guard against those dangers it had been customary at the very earliest possible period, and before anything was done, that the terms should be clearly defined and agreed upon, so that there should be no room for doubt or dispute as to the real objects in view, and what one allied Power had a right to expect from the other. Nothing should be left to vague understanding—nothing to conversations of which there might be an imperfect and jarring recollection. Whatever passed in conversation ought to be recorded in due diplomatic form. The precedent of the Russian war showed that those precautions had not been needlessly observed; and still more recent events showed that one at least of the stipulations in the Russian war convention would not have been useless—that neither of the contracting parties should seek for itself any territorial accession in consequence of the war. Would such a precaution be needless now after what they had seen within the last month? Had the question been submitted to Parliament, Ministers would have been asked what advantages were to be derived from the war—what was the promised end of all this costly preparation—were the cost and risk commensurate with the advantages to be gained? Of the advantages which would be gained and the effect which these would exercise on the national safety and honour the House had yet received but the most imperfect and vague explanations. They had been told that a great expedition was sent out to enforce the performance of the Treaty of Tien-tsin and to obtain an apology from the Emperor of China for the occurrences which had taken place at the mouth of the Peiho River. There was not a particle of evidence to show that without any expedition at all there would be any obstacle to the execution of the treaty in question; and he must add that, if an apology was all that was wanted, they would have to pay very dearly for it—for an apology from a semi-babbarous sovereign they would have to pay five or six millions of money. The more he considered the subject, the less he was able to perceive what end could be gained at all commensurate with the hazards which must be incurred. If it were proposed to obtain from the Chinese by force concessions which they would not yield except to force, then it appeared to him that those concessions would be of very little value; for what guarantee had they that as soon as the force should be withdrawn the concessions would not also vanish? And if on the other hand the Chinese Government did not yield without necessitating the employment of the force sent out, he wished to know how its operations were to be directed, and with what likelihood of success. It should not be forgotten that with a large land force, such as they proposed to send, the difficulties of transport were very great; then there were the dangers of climate, the difficulty of procuring supplies, and the uncertainty which must exist as to what measures it would be proper to adopt; in short, it appeared to him to be an act of great rashness to send under such circumstances so large a land force to China. Well, but let them suppose these operations were as successful as they could desire, what would be the result? What interest had we in China beyond the extension of our trade? Were they to burn the Chinese towns, to slaughter the people, to devastate the country, and bring upon it all the inevitable calamities of war? Every blow we struck at China more or less recoiled upon ourselves; and supposing that our triumph extended even to the overthrow of the existing Government, why then we should be in a worse position than ever. The results would be to China most disastrous, to ourselves anything but beneficial. He assured their Lordships that from the best information he could gather, such a shock as it was proposed to give to the Chinese Government was not at all unlikely to overturn it; and what it might be very easy to overthrow it might be very difficult to provide a substitute for. How were peace and order to be preserved in that immense empire if the machinery by which it had hitherto been regulated were broken up? We had had some experience of former doings at Canton, where our proceedings had brought upon that portion of the Chinese empire a state of anarchy. Hitherto our trade with China had been most flourishing and prosperous, and one of the main causes of that was that the Chinese Government had maintained order and security, so that the people were able to carry on the operations of agriculture and to produce their tea and sugar and those other articles which formed her staples of commerce. But should there ensue a state of anarchy, not only would the best trade between China and England be hazarded, but also that very important trade between China and India. He believed that in such an event not less than between £7,000,000 and £8,000,000 of revenue would be sacrificed. He feared there was too much reason for believing that that the rebellion in the Chinese Empire was the consequence of our war with China in 1840. When in office he had had an interesting conversation with Dr. Gutzlaff, who told him that it was to the war, and especially to the effect of the large pecuniary indemnity which England enforced, that the rebellion was owing—that by it her finances and her Government were crippled and paralysed, her great officers were left unpaid, and in every instance there was greater suffering than there had ever been before; that by the war the maintenance of order and security was destroyed; and Dr. Gutzlaff described in most moving terms the ruin and misery which arose from that insecurity and from the disorganization of the Government. The finances of the empire were crippled—the officers of the Government were left unpaid, and to obtain a subsistence were driven to a greater degree of corruption than they had previously practised, the administration of justice was neglected, and so much misery and distress was caused that the people broke out into rebellion. From the papers already on the table of the House it would be seen that the rebellion had caused a falling off in production, and with that our trade must also suffer. He was not now asking their Lordships to pass judgment on the policy of the war. In order to discuss that important question it would be necessary to go into the whole of our relations with China since 1840, and a mere Motion for a return was not a fitting occasion for such a discussion. In his position, too, unconnected with any party, and having no right to look for support from any part of the House, he was not the proper person to call for such a judgment. He had therefore merely touched on the surface of the question in order to show that it ought to be discussed, and that it was one on which the Government ought to have invited the judgment of Parliament. All he desired was to show how wrong it was that the question should not have been submitted to Parliament and a decision taken upon it in the ordinary constitutional manner; but in pointing that out, however strong might be the opinion which he personally entertained, he should not attempt to bring forward those arguments which he thought might fairly be used to prove that there was no justification for the war. With these observations he would conclude by moving for the Estimate of which he had given notice.

Earl Grey

Earl Grey

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that the noble Earl himself, while moving for an Estimate of the cost of the Chinese expedition, said that he would be an extraordinarily clever man who could venture to predict the cost of a Chinese war. According to his own showing, therefore, he was now asking for a Return which he believed the Government could not furnish with any accuracy. He wished to call their Lordships' attention to the position in which they stood. As regarded the action which took place at the mouth of the Peiho river last year, those occurrences had taken place before he came into office, and therefore he (the Duke of Somerset) considered himself no more responsible for them than the noble Lord was. To pretend to throw upon the present Government any responsibility for such transactions would be going quite beyond all Parliamentary precedent. But it ought not to be forgotten that when the news of those occurrences reached England the public mind was thrown into a state of very great alarm, for it was feared from the Report that neither British life nor property was safe at Amoy, or Shanghai, or Canton. Under such circumstances, he asked, was it not the duty of the Admiralty to take immediate steps for the sending out of a force sufficient to protect the lives and properties of British subjects? The course that the Government had adopted in reference to these transactions had been fully approved by public opinion. The noble Earl, indeed, said that Parliament ought to have been summoned. But that was not the opinion of the Earl of Derby; and it was plain that no advantage would result from the summoning of Parliament, but that, on the contrary, it would greatly have increased the excitement which already prevailed. What the people of England required was, that immediate steps should be taken to redress the wrong, and to demand an apology for the outrages which the Chinese had committed. Parliament was perfectly aware of the course which the Government had taken; the papers and instructions to Mr. Bruce had been laid upon the table, and they showed sufficiently the mild and moderate course which had been adopted by the Government in demanding from the Chinese Government reparation for the wrong they had committed. He could not understand what course the noble Earl would have desired. He could see no more prudent course open to the Government to pursue than the one they had adopted in this case. He did not agree in opinion with the noble Earl that no outrages had been committed by the Chinese. He thought, on the contrary, there had been throughout duplicity and deception on their part, and no one could read the papers which had been laid on the table without seeing that the Chinese had tried to evade the reception of the Ambassador. The instructions to Mr. Bruce were, that they would try evasion, and that he must insist on the Treaty. The Chinese did not clearly and boldly say, "By the Peiho you cannot come." On the contrary, they led Mr. Bruce to believe that he could come that way. They did not say, "We have put up barricades, and will not allow you to pass;" but they said, "We will remove the barricades, which have not been put up against you, but against rebels." If that was not duplicity and evasion, he did not know what was. But the noble Earl went back and told them that this Chinese expedition was to be the commencement of a new policy. Surely he must remember that it was not a twelvemonth ago that a treaty had been entered into by his noble Friend (the Earl of Elgin), and that that treaty was to have been ratified at Peking; but if the Chinese thought fit not to fulfil their promise, but to enter into an open war with the English forces, surely that was not a new policy, but returning to a state of things which existed before the treaty was agreed to. The noble Earl said these wars caused a very great increase in the Estimates, and that this course of policy ought to be checked; but if he looked back he would find that ever since 1840, or even earlier, our relations with China had been very unsatisfactory. Every two or three years during the last twenty years there had been some outbreak, some outrage, some complaint, and, if not war, a state of things very nearly approaching war. In 1843, he believed, we had more men in China than we had now, and we had been constantly paying largely, because the unsatisfactory state of our relations with China compelled us to keep a large force there. This state of affairs was attributable to our never being able to communicate directly with the Chinese Government. We communicated with Viceroy at the ports, who sometimes took one view and sometimes another. Sometimes a Viceroy, to gain popularity, would put a humiliation on the barbarians, as they were pleased to call us. If we were in force and matters looked serious, the Viceroy was recalled, and they took off his head, or obliged him to commit suicide, which was a way they had of getting rid of an obnoxious Minister in that country. If, on the contrary, the Viceroy behaved in a friendly manner to foreigners, he was very likely to bring on himself the odium of the Chinese. Our object by this expedition was to put our relations on a more satisfactory footing, and, if that were accomplished, no matter what it cost, he should deem this the most economical expedition which had ever been sent to China, and he should not estimate its cost without reference to its results. He really could not see what milder course the Government could have pursued. In his position at the Admiralty he certainly could not censure Admiral Hope, who had shown so much courage and gallantry at the head of the expedition. Errors of judgment there might have been; but he was not speaking of professional tactics, and he was not criticizing the operations, but he was speaking of the gallantry and courage of the British seamen and their officers, which had not been surpassed by any expedition ever sent from this country. And in what position should we have been in if we had not sent out an expedition to demand redress for the outrage that had been offered? Did the noble Earl think that under those circumstances commerce would have gone on, or that the English at Shanghai and Hong Kong would have been safe? The noble Earl said that trade would be destroyed by this war. If the result should be injurious to trade it would be unfortunate; but fortunately the Chinese did not manage their affairs as they were told in this country they ought to manage them. He had heard debates upon China, and he had heard, year after year, that our policy was most destructive to trade. But trade had gone on increasing more and more. The Chinese were a peculiar people. They would fight with us in one part of the country and trade with us in the other. The annual average value of British produce exported to China was, in the eight years from 1834 to 1842, £926,000; from 1843 to 1850, £1,700,000; and from 1851 to 1859, £2,299,000. During the whole of this time there had been frequent disputes and wars with China; but trade was developed and increased more and more rapidly. Now as to the noble Earl's Motion, it was clearly impossible to give the cost of the expedition to China in detail, because it must depend on occurrences which might take place from month to month, and almost from day to day. If the Chinese Government agreed to the Treaty and the demands which the Government made, which were very moderate, namely, that they should have such relations with the Court of China as would prevent those complications which were constantly taking place, then he did not think the cost would exceed the estimate. He found that there was a greater force in China in the beginning of 1858 than at the present time. There had been a considerable force there for the last fifteen or twenty years, and he put down the additional force consequent upon the present state of affairs at about 5,000 men. The cost of transport and of stores would be large—he feared as much as £200,000—but he hoped that the Estimate taken this year would be sufficient to carry on the operations and bring back the force, if, as he hoped, the matter ended peacefully. The supply of coals and of naval stores at Hong Kong would also entail large expense—it would be one of the heaviest items, and he set it down at £150,000. These were the chief items; but he considered that the whole Navy Estimates next year chargeable to China would be about £680,000. He would not pledge himself to that amount, and he should be sorry to lay an Estimate of that kind on the table, because he thought Estimates ought to be made with more precision and official responsibility than he could undertake in reference to this subject. The whole expense must depend on the news which arrived from month to month. There might be reasons for sending out more vessels, or for bringing home some already sent out, and with Hong Kong at such a distance it was impossible at present to lay estimates on the table. The noble Earl had referred to the former war at Canton. Upon that question the Government went to the country, and the country decided in favour of the Government. The course of the Government then was different from the course which was taken now, because under the peculiar circumstances of the Treaty with China, the course now taken was marked by the utmost possible consideration. He could not conceive any course more moderate and forbearing, unless they had apologized to the Chinese for having sent any Ambassador, and for the affair at the Peiho. It had been said that it would be impossible to trade at Canton if we went to war with China; but he had been informed by persons who had been out there that the people of Canton showed no dissatisfaction with our occupation, and that English officers could purchase any articles in the shops, and order them to be sent home to them, just the same as in Regent Street. At the same time, he thought it desirable that our troops should as soon as possible be withdrawn, as the occupation was, of course, attended with considerable expense. It was alleged to be very inconvenient to undertake the expedition jointly with France; but it was only natural and proper that, the injury having been inflicted on the two countries on the same occasion, the demand for reparation should be made by them in unison. When the small gun-boats went up to the mouth of the Peiho, the French force was represented alongside of the English, and a French and English officer appeared side by side in front of the forts of Taku, when a handful of Europeans kept their ground before 20,000 of the enemy, and refused to retreat until they were recalled by order of their commanding officer. France and England were together when the outrage was committed, and should, therefore, be together in demanding redress. He trusted the noble Earl would not insist upon the production of Estimates which must necessarily be of a very conjectural character, and which, in the case of the army, were rendered very complicated by the circumstance that many of the troops would be removed from India instead of going out direct from this country.

The Duke of Somerset

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY:—My Lords, it is not my intention to trespass on your Lordships' time at any length. I think the noble Earl who brought this subject under your Lordships' notice was quite right when he deprecated any debate on what may be called the China question; but my noble Friend, the noble Duke opposite, has entered largely on that question; and I think I should hardly be doing justice to the Government of which I had the honour to be a member, if I did not make some observations on what has been stated by the noble Duke. I have been particularly anxious not to make any comments on what passed in the Peiho, lest I might be thought to be in some degree criticising the actions and the conduct of Mr. Bruce, who was placed, most undoubtedly, in one of the most difficult situations ever occupied by any public servant. But I cannot submit to have it supposed—much as I appreciate Mr. Bruce's ability, and sensible though I am of the difficulty of his position—that I give that entire approbation to his proceedings on that occasion which my silence might be taken to imply, and therefore, after what my noble Friend (the Duke of Somerset) has stated, I felt obliged to state my opinions with respect to what passed. Undoubtedly, Mr. Bruce followed his instructions most faithfully in many respects; but those instructions did not foresee the events which subsequently took place. I confess I had foreseen that all that finesse which had been said to characterize their former proceedings would be again had recourse to by these barbarians, but I did not expect that hostilities or the application of force would result from what was proposed to be done. Those instructions to Mr. Bruce were therefore forwarded on the supposition that matters would be carried out without any fighting on any side. The spirit of those instructions—which I am sorry I have not before me, because it is difficult to recollect phrases—was, that Mr. Bruce should insist that the treaty should be ratified. Many of the noble Lords present are very conversant with the terms of diplomatic correspondence, and they will hardly say that the word “insist” in such correspondence bears any other meaning than that there should, in case of necessity, be a pressure of argument and a positive determination verbally expressed that such and such an event should take place. Certainly the word “insist” would not imply that any further steps were considered necessary. I do not blame Mr. Bruce for what took place beyond this—that having a very wide latitude for action, I think he exhibited too much precipitancy. That is the only fault I find with him; and in saying that I think I ought to explain myself. It appears from the papers furnished to Parliament that the original commissioners who had negotiated the treaty entered into a correspondence with Mr. Bruce. He insisted on the treaty being carried out. They said they must communicate with the Court of Peking on the matter, and on the 12th June, I think it was, they informed Mr. Bruce that they had sent a courier to Peking who must take 11 or 12 days to reach that city, though he rode at the rate of 200 miles a day. This courier carried to Peking the proposals and the determination of Mr. Bruce, and was to bring back the reply of the Imperial Court to those propositions. He could not have reached the Imperial city before the 22nd or 23rd June, and then three or four days ought reasonably have been allowed the Government to consider the proposals and what answer it should return to them. But, my Lords, if I understand those papers accurately, it was on the 20th of the same month Mr. Bruce and the English and French admirals determined to attack the mouth of the Peiho. I believe it was on the 24th, or within a day or two of that date, the battle was fought. It appears to me, therefore, that it was physically impossible for the reply to Mr. Bruce's ultimatum, sent by the original commissioners to Peking, to have come from that city to the mouth of the Peiho. In my opinion, then, Mr. Bruce's fault, and his only one, was his not waiting for the arrival of the reply to the despatch of the commissioners who had forwarded his ultimatum to Peking. It may have been purely an error in the Chinese commissioner, who offered him another way up, which, perhaps, he was quite right in refusing to accept; but that official had no connection with the correspondence which was at that time going on with the capital. I can only judge from what I see in the papers, for though Mr. Bruce's despatch is directed to me, and was sent over to me, I received no private letter from him, or anything that would elucidate his rea-

an estimate of the expenses incurred, and that it would be deceiving the House and the country to attempt to do so, and think all that we can do is to ask for money on account.

THE EARL OF ELGIN: My Lords, in a position in which I stand, and with a prospect before me of being required to proceed from this country to China, in a hope of interposing to put a speedy end to the unfortunate hostilities that are broken out, I cannot but feel that I should not be taking a course conducive to the public interests if by any premature expression of opinion in this House I were to fetter the discretion which it is absolutely necessary that I should possess, if I hope to achieve any beneficial result to my mission. At the same time, connected as I have recently been with our domestic proceedings in China, and deeply interested as I must be, because of my relationship to the individual who represents Her Majesty's Government in China, I might, perhaps, be chargeable with a want of respect to your Lordships if I were altogether to maintain silence on this occasion; and if I were to allow the observations of the noble Earl who has just spoken to pass without remark. The noble Earl confined his reproof and reflection on Mr. Bruce to one particular—that he had shown precipitancy in not giving sufficient time for the transmission of the communication he had made to the Imperial Commissioners at Shanghai, and the return of that communication at the mouth of the Peiho. Now, I would remind the noble Earl that if Mr. Bruce had extended the time for the return of that communication to the Peiho, and had remained there without proceeding up the river, the time specified in the treaty for the exchange of the ratifications would have expired. If, indeed, the Chinese had been obviously acting in good faith, and if this delay had indicated no intention to take advantage of the expiry of the time for ratifying the treaty, I should be ready to admit that Mr. Bruce might have run this risk, and that out of consideration for the Chinese Government he might have allowed the time fixed for the ratification of the treaty to have passed over. But I will remind the noble Earl that that is not exactly the state of the case; because, in the month of March, acting under the instructions of the noble Earl himself, I communicated to the Chinese Commissioners that Mr. Bruce was on his way for the purpose of proceeding to Peking, there to exchange ratifications of the treaty. Moreover, in order to conciliate the Chinese authorities to the utmost extent, I made a concession, for which, when things looked brighter and more hopeful than now, I have been reproached by some. Finding how unwilling the Chinese were to tolerate a permanent English Minister at Peking, and although I still believe and hold most firmly to the opinion, that unless, in some shape or in some form or other, we have direct relations with the Court of Peking, we never shall have permanent peace with that country—notwithstanding that feeling, and in order to meet the objections of the Chinese Commissioners, I stated—and in doing so I believe I obtained the full approval of the noble Earl—to the Commissioners that if they received with all due honour Her Majesty's representative when he came out to exchange ratifications of the treaty, and if they carried out in perfect fidelity every other clause of it, I would submit to Her Majesty's Government my opinion that it would be desirable that Her Majesty should exercise the option she possessed under the Treaty of Tien-tsin not to establish a Minister permanently at the capital, but to send him from time to time to the capital, as circumstances might arise and render it desirable. Consequently, the Chinese Commissioners not only knew that Mr. Bruce was coming up in order to exchange the ratifications of the Treaty, but I had, as I thought, laid before them the strongest possible inducements I could devise to induce them to receive him properly and at the proper time; and if, with such indications of bad faith, Mr. Bruce had allowed the period for the exchange of ratifications to pass, and if in consequence of that circumstance difficulties had been raised to the ratification of the treaty—and if it had further been known that the naval authorities had informed him some days before that there was no difficulty in removing the obstructions in the river—I feel confident that a very heavy responsibility would have rested on him, and the non-ratification of the treaty and all the consequent evils that might have followed would have to be thrown upon him. The noble Duke has explained the difficulty that there is in meeting the specific Motion made by the noble Earl; I will only say, therefore, that I sincerely hope—nay more, entertain the most confident expectation—that the result will prove that my noble Friend has taken a very exaggerated view of the liabilities which these unfortunate affairs in China will entail on this country. The question which my noble Friend has raised, to a certain extent is a speculative question; but there is behind it a practical question of the most serious character — what are the measures, by the adoption of which we may best hope to bring this unfortunate state of affairs to a close, and establish peace with China, upon a footing that will relieve us for the future of the heavy expenses we annually incur for the protection of our trade? That is a practical question which has necessarily occupied the attention of practical men interested in China, whether as merchants, philanthropists, or statesmen. It has occurred to some of them—and the opinion is shared by Her Majesty's Government—that as I negotiated the Treaty of Tientsin—acting in concert with my distinguished and able colleague, Baron Gros, the representative of the French Emperor, and whose honour and loyalty I cannot speak of too strongly, or in terms too warm—it is possible that our return to the field of action at the present time might give the Chinese Emperor an opportunity of proposing terms of accommodation, and of intimating that it really is his intention to carry out faithfully and honourably the stipulations of the treaty into which he had entered. When it was proposed to me that I should proceed on this mission I gave the only answer which I think a public servant could give to such a proposal. I am by no means insensible of the honour of a seat in Her Majesty's Council, or indifferent to other advantages I forego by proceeding on this mission; but I felt that no considerations of this description should militate against my doing what public duty required. There was only one difficulty; and although it is of a personal character I venture to appeal to the sympathies of your Lordships in referring to it. I could not have undertaken this mission, if I felt that its proposal implied on the part of Her Majesty's Government any slight or reflection on my relative, who represents our Sovereign in that part of the world. I have been assured by the Government that that is not the case, and that there is no want of confidence in my relative; but that the reason of its being supposed that I might have some advantages in dealing with this question arises, in the first place, from the circumstances to which I have alluded; and, in the second place, from the fact that I have naturally, proceeding from this country, greater means than he can possibly have, of knowing what are the sentiments of Her Majesty's Government; and I think I may add that, in consequence of what took place during the recent visit I paid to the French capital—of knowing, also, what are the sentiments of the French Government on the subject. I can only say that my object in proceeding to China is to defeat, by all the means I can, the calculations made by the noble Earl behind me as to the cost and evils that will attend this war. I concur in what has been said by the noble Duke, that it is necessary, in the interest of our commerce with China, that we should, in some way or other, carry on our communication direct with the Imperial Government. It might be very well, if we could go back to the state of things that existed during the time of the Indian monopoly, when the trade between this country and China was conducted at our port, and by a privileged body of merchants. That was a condition of things not very favourable to the extension of commercial intercourse; but although it had certain advantages, it is impossible for us to revert to such a state of things. Even if we were willing to return, still it would be impossible to induce other nations to do so, who have also obtained treaties with the Chinese. Therefore, what we have to do is to put our commercial and other relations on the best and safest footing. The Emperor of China has entered into treaty obligations with this country; but owing to the arrangements under which our diplomatic intercourse has been conducted since the Treaty of Nankin, it has been utterly impossible ever to solve any difficulty that has occurred between the countries, except either by war, or by acts of war; and I am prepared to show, if we were to go into that question, that not one single year has passed since the ratification of the Treaty of Nankin, during which individual consuls at different ports have not taken on themselves to commit acts of war. It is true that they have not always led to actual war, because the Chinese have been afraid to resent these acts; but if they had done so, we should have been obliged either to support our consuls believing them to be in the wrong, or to abandon them at the risk of leading the Chinese to misapprehend our motives in so doing. These acts of war have been committed by Consuls having the highest reputation for consideration and kindness towards the Chinese. A very excellent gentleman, who is now in Japan, and who in one of the "blue-books" has written a paper indicating a warm and kindly feeling towards the Chinese—Mr. Alcock—a few years ago found it necessary to stop the whole junk trade proceeding to Peking, and to threaten the capital with starvation. His justification for the proceedings he adopted was, that if he had referred the case to Her Majesty's Representative at Hong Kong and made the outrages which led to his acts the subject of diplomatic correspondence, it would have been bandied about from "one official to another in distant parts of the Empire, three months would have elapsed before his communication reached the capital, and a still longer period before it could have been put in a course of settlement. In consequence, however, of the summary but, in point of international law, unjustifiable course taken by Mr. Alcock, the matter was settled in the course of a week. I maintain, therefore, that it is desirable to put an end to that state of things, and although there is a certain amount of reluctance on the part of the Chinese Government, I am confident it is the greatest kindness that you can possibly confer upon the Chinese Emperor; because most of the difficulties into which the Chinese get arise from their entire ignorance of foreigners, of their power, and of the principles by which they are guided; and no doubt if we had a Resident in that country and an establishment where they had communications with the capital—if we had intelligent Ministers representing this and other countries, no doubt they would be able to advise the Chinese Government, and keep them out of the many scrapes and difficulties into which they fall. Some persons say, why should we go to Peking? We have no interest in China but that of our trade. I entirely concur in the opinion that our only interest in China is that of our trade. But trade cannot prosper unless there be security for the persons and property of our merchants, and that the present system fails to give. In proceeding to that country my object will be to carry out my instructions, and bring to a close the hostilities which have lately broken out between the countries. The noble Earl may, perhaps, not have considered all the consequences that would follow if we resorted to a declaration of war against China. It would compromise to a very large amount the revenues both of India and England. A declaration of war would carry destruction and devastation among the people of China, and would also entail ruin and distress on large bodies of British and other merchants in the China trade, besides inflicting a most unnecessary and enormous amount of misery on a portion of the population of China with whom we never had a quarrel, and who were always desirous of maintaining the best of terms and the most amicable relations with us. If affairs in the north of China are conducted as I hope they will be—and I have perfect confidence in the gallantry and prudence of both the military and naval authorities out there—and if they have the issue I confidently believe they will have, any acts of war which are committed there will take place chiefly between our troops and the troops of the Emperor of China. I do not undervalue the loss of human life even under these circumstances, but that is, comparatively speaking, a lesser evil than the consequences that we should entail on the great population of the rest of China if we resorted to a general war. It has been laid down as a doctrine that pressure on individuals never brought a war to a close. I do not know how far that doctrine may be true; but I believe that, as regards China, the great mass of the population have no connection whatever with the causes of complaint that have arisen, and that the only way to put an end to these complaints is to deal directly in all our negotiations with the Government of the country.

The Earl of Elgin

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he wished to explain that he did not mean to express a desire that any further pressure should be placed upon the population of China; but if we were going to undertake a war which would employ 20,000 men, he thought that such a war should be preceded by a declaration of war against the Emperor of China. He would remind the noble Earl that the arguments which, on this subject, he had applied to China, would equally apply to any other nation.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, I cannot refrain from taking the present opportunity of stating in this House that, in my opinion, no public man has ever been called upon to make a greater sacrifice than that which the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Elgin) is asked to make, when he is requested to return to the scene of his former labours in China. In doing so I, of course, think he only discharges a public duty; but at the same time I cannot help feeling that he is not the less entitled to the gratitude of his country. It would be impossible, I have no doubt, to find anywhere a person to whom the conduct of our negotiations with the Chinese Government could, with so much hope of a peaceful solution, be intrusted. He has already conducted, so far as I can understand, all the negotiations in which he has taken part in that country with, I may perhaps say, fortunate audacity, but certainly with a degree of ability of which the exercise is but rarely witnessed in the performance of great public functions. It is, in my opinion, also matter for congratulation that he is likely, on his return to China, to be associated with the same representative of France between whom and himself such friendly relations on the former occasion existed. Under all these circumstances, I more confidently entertain than I should otherwise do the hope of a pacific result being attained by means of the commission with which the noble Earl has just been intrusted. I at the same time feel that we have in dealing with this question great difficulties to encounter, notwithstanding the circumstance that we may expect to have the same cordial co-operation with the French Ambassador as before. One of the most serious of those difficulties is that, in conducting hostilities with a desire to secure peace, we shall be compelled to act in conjunction with a Power whose interests are not ours, and which is not animated by our views. We seek for nothing but peace with honour. France, I fear, desires honour without peace. We desire to shake hands with the Chinese Government, and to be on good terms with the Chinese people. The French have declared it to be their wish to chastise them. Now that word "chastise" is not one, my Lords, which ought to find a place, under such circumstances, in the language of a civilized State; and I earnestly trust—indeed, I feel confident—no feeling such as that which it indicates will animate the noble Earl opposite in prosecuting the mission which he is about to undertake. It is sad to be obliged to enter into a war in which success or failure will be almost equally a subject of regret. The latter will cause us not only great material loss, but also bring with it disgrace. If, on the other hand, success is to be achieved by directing military operations against Peking, it can only be obtained by producing one of the greatest—one of the most extensive

The Earl of Ellenborough

—one of the most appalling calamities with which any portion of the human race can be afflicted. Of this there can be no doubt. The example of the dreadful war of 1843 justifies the opinion on the subject which I entertain. The advance of a hostile army on Peking, with the prospect of its being captured, would be sufficient to cause every woman and every child within its walls to be sacrificed by their relatives. Such, my Lords, would be the dreadful effect attendant on our success; nor can it be denied that the occupation, even for a short period, of the Chinese capital by our troops would operate to destroy altogether the authority of the Chinese Government from one end of the Empire to the other; and give general triumph and victory to that horrible collection of men, hardly qualified to be classed among human beings, who have for so many years desolated that country. The noble Earl has seen with his own eyes the effect of some of the struggles which have taken place in that quarter of the world, and I feel assured, he will be induced by every sentiment of humanity to do all that lies in his power to uphold the authority of that Government, which, maintained in authority, may be able again to establish the prosperity of the Chinese Empire. I entertain the highest respect for the opinions of the noble Earl on this subject. No man's opinions with respect to it are entitled to be held in greater estimation. I am, however, at the same time obliged to confess that I have never been able to comprehend why so much importance has by some persons been always attached to the presence of a British Minister at Peking. If, indeed, a representative of this country were admitted willingly into Peking, with an express desire on the part of the Chinese Government to have him there for the purpose of mutual communication and advice, and with a view of preventing those calamities which war has occasioned in different portions of the empire, in that case, no doubt, great advantage to China and to ourselves would be the result. But if it be a question of forcing a British Minister into Peking, there to take up his residence—a constant menace and humiliation to the Chinese Government—I cannot, I confess, understand how his presence will be productive of that benefit which has been expected. The noble Earl in the course of his speech referred to a most valuable and interesting paper written by Mr. Alcock, which appears in the blue-book, and the statements contained in which I do entreat the Government, as well as the noble Earl to weigh well before he sets out on his present mission. From what he will learn that unless some control is placed upon our own merchants and people in China no hope of permanent peace with that country can reasonably be cherished. To their conduct I feel confident it is due more than to any other cause that we have been forced into those hostilities, the occurrence of which from time to time we have had to deplore. During that period when our merchants trading with China were under the strict control of the East India Company no wars with China took place. A single ship occasionally visiting Canton was found sufficient to preserve unimpaired our interests in that quarter. Since that time, however, there has been a continued succession of wars with China, and I know not one of them in which the misconduct of our own people and their disgraceful avarice has not materially, either directly or indirectly, contributed. So far as the present war is concerned, I can only say I regard it, as I have done from the commencement, with utter horror. It is an unjust war. It was so from the beginning. It is not, my Lords, lawful to make war for the purpose of making money. To do so is to commit a crime. We have already received one great rebuke during the progress of our operations in prosecuting the hostilities with the Chinese people in which we are engaged. I hope we may not receive one still more severe. We are now in a position in which it is, perhaps, impossible for us to arrest our course. It is a position, however, which we have brought upon ourselves. It is based upon wrong, and wrong will not continually be protected by Providence. I will not, upon the present occasion, say more on this distressing subject. I say distressing, because I am acquainted, perhaps, better than most of your Lordships, with the real character which a war with China presents—for when I was in India I had a considerable share in the direction of operations against that country. I then received a despatch which contained a statement giving an account of the suffering of the Chinese people, in consequence of the prosecution of hostilities, which I durst not publish. I have never generally made known the details of the horrors which thus came under my notice. I fear we are about to witness others of a similar character, for it is difficult for us so to conduct the war as to avoid their repetition. I, nevertheless, trust that the noble Earl opposite, fully alive, as I am sure he is, to the importance of the mission which has been committed to his hands, and seeing how deeply it bears upon the honour and interests of this country, as well as upon the much higher object of humanity itself, will endeavour, to the utmost of his power, to bring this sad contest to a pacific termination.

EARL GREY, in reply, said he was persuaded that if there was a wish on the part of the Government to give the information he asked for, there would not be the slightest difficulty in so doing, for, all he wanted was an approximate calculation. But if the Government told him that they would not, or could not, give the information, it was not for him to press the matter further—he would only say that the refusal of the information was a symptom that the case was much as he had described it. He quite agreed with the noble Duke that it was most proper to send reinforcements to protect the lives and properties of Englishmen, but he wanted to know whether 18,000 or 20,000 men were to be sent out in the approaching summer for the protection simply of our interests? He complained that we were making preparations for an offensive war. He thought that their Lordships ought to have been invited to express their opinion when the whole question could have been carefully considered. He still hoped that though late this question would be brought before them; for if it were, he was persuaded that those communications to which the noble Earl who last spoke had referred would be required by the House. It was impossible to read the memorandum of Mr. Alcock without blushing for the conduct of Englishmen in Japan, or without feeling how deep was the responsibility the Government was incurring by its proceedings in that part of the world. Under all the circumstances, sending out the noble Earl (Earl Elgin) was, perhaps, the best course that could be adopted; but he regretted it had not been taken at an earlier period. The Government had declined to give the information his Motion asked for, and he should not press it to a division.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he had once been compelled to make an estimate for a Chinese war, and he could state it was quite possible; it was done quickly and proved correct.

Motion, by leave of the House withdrawn.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

PRIVATE BILLS.

On the Motion of LORD REDESDALE it was Resolved—

“That no Private Bill brought from the House of Commons shall be read a Second Time after Tuesday, the 3rd day of July next :

That no Bill confirming any Provisional Order of the Board of Health, or authorizing any Inclosure of Lands under Special Report of the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, or for confirming any Scheme of the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales, shall be read a Second Time after Tuesday, the 3rd Day of July next :

That when a Bill shall have passed this House with Amendments, these Orders shall not apply to any new Bill sent up from the House of Commons which the Chairman of Committees shall report to the House is substantially the same as the Bill so amended.”

THE WHITWORTH ARMS.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN asked, What steps Her Majesty's Government have taken in order to secure for this Country the Benefit of Mr. Whitworth's Inventions in rifled Fire Arms and Projectiles? The noble Earl said that in putting his Question he should ask the indulgence which was usually extended to a new Member of their Lordships' House, whilst he endeavoured to state the reasons which had induced him to bring forward this matter. He had sat for many years in the other House of Parliament, and during that time his practice had been never to bring forward any private grievance; and he might mention that he had placed this notice upon the paper without any communication whatever with Mr. Whitworth. He brought the matter forward as a question of national importance. He was not one of those who were at all alarmed at any number of his countrymen meeting an equal number of any other nation in arms; but he thought it was the duty of the Government to take the very earliest opportunity of securing for the country every new invention in fire arms and projectiles. The Secretary for War had asked for £15,000,000 for the Army Estimates, and had said that the increase was partly to be accounted for by the providing of new arms and projectiles which had been recently introduced, and which a number of foreign countries were rapidly adopting. He would not wish to say one word in disparagement of the weapon of Sir William Armstrong, for he believed his guns were very superior to any guns which had been before invented, and he believed that Sir William deserved well of his country. There was, however, one point which required explanation; for it appeared to him that Sir W. Armstrong occupied an anomalous position. Sir William Armstrong, he believed, had been appointed Superintendent of the Royal Gun Factory; and he believed that he was also a contractor under Government. He had no doubt that this fact was susceptible of explanation; but at first sight it would appear to be somewhat anomalous that the same person should be contractor and also Superintendent at the Royal Gun Factory. He should wish to have this explained; and to hear that in appointing Sir William Superintendent of the Gun Factory, the Government had no intention of placing in the hands of his firm a monopoly in supplying artillery. He believed that recently a very greatly improved gun had been invented by Mr. Whitworth, and every person who knew Mr. Whitworth knew that he was one of those individuals who were fortunately not rare in this country: Mr. Whitworth commenced business as a working man in the employ of Messrs. Maudslay and Co., and had worked himself up from the position of a mechanic to the highest pitch of professional reputation. He was looked up to by scientific men not only in this country but in every quarter of the world. When a new invention was required, Mr. Whitworth was almost universally consulted. When the great scientific question as to the correction of the standard measure of this country was brought forward, Mr. Whitworth was consulted; and when a new machine was wanted to turn out some of the work which he saw around him in that chamber, the architect of the Houses of Parliament applied to Mr. Whitworth. Mr. Whitworth had not only invented a gun, but he had submitted it to experiments which had shown it to be most successful. Everybody said that it was the best gun which they had ever seen. Now, what was it that induced Mr. Whitworth to turn his attention to projectiles? It was this, that in 1854, during the Crimean war, the Government applied to him and requested him to devote his great talents to improving our weapons. In 1854 he turned his attention to the manufacture of a rifle, in which he proved so successful that he produced a weapon surpassing any of which we had any former experience.

Two Committees had been appointed by the War Office to investigate the merits of the rifle; but, though it was proved to be superior to all others, it was not adopted into the service. He hoped he should not be told that financial considerations were against its adoption, for he thought no Government should allow financial considerations to stand in the way when the efficient equipment of our soldiers was in question. But Mr. Whitworth had declared that the price at which his rifle was furnished afforded no criterion of what the cost would be in a completely organized establishment; and he had offered, if the Government would allow him, to improve the machinery at the Enfield factory. Since then Mr. Whitworth had turned his attention to the manufacture of rifled cannon, by which a ball was to be carried to the distance of five-and-a-half miles. He heard from a gentleman who had fired it, and who had never fired a gun in his life before, that with two shots he hit a mark, which was six feet high and one-and-a-half foot broad, at the distance of two-and-a-half miles. He had the authority of Sir John Burgoyne for stating that he had never in all his life seen such an admirable weapon. Mr. Fairbairn, the eminent mechanist, of Manchester, declared himself unable to refrain from writing a letter to The Times congratulating Mr. Whitworth and the country on the great success that had attended his gun. The whole mechanical population of Lancashire witnessed its success at Southport, and there were not Englishmen only then present, but parties representing the French, the Russian, and almost every other European Government. In self-defence Mr. Whitworth had been compelled to erect a manufactory at Manchester; and as his experiments were carried on without aid from the Government he had opened a shop for the supply of his weapons to all who chose to ask for them. Under these circumstances he felt bound to ask Her Majesty's Government what steps they had taken to secure to this country the benefit of Mr. Whitworth's inventions in rifled arms and projectiles?

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, it would scarcely be necessary to tell the noble Earl or to assure their Lordships that the great results of the trial of the gun which had been invented by Mr. Whitworth, as exhibited by the experiments at Southport, had engaged the attention of his right hon. Friend the Secretary at War and of Her Majesty's Government:—for those experiments had attracted attention in every part of the country, and the Report of their results had received the best consideration at the hands of the Ministry. He begged further to state that the object of the Government in regard to this matter being simply to obtain for the country the weapon which was most efficient for warfare, his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War had determined that a formal trial of this gun should take place, under the supervision of the officers of the Government appointed to superintend experiments of this nature, and who were wholly unconnected with any particular manufacturer or inventor—namely, the members of the Ordnance Select Committee, presided over by an officer of great experience, Colonel St. George, who himself was present at Southport at the first display of the rifled cannon invented and recently exhibited by Mr. Whitworth. Nothing could be more important than that this country, distinguished as it was for its triumphs of mechanical genius, should be provided with the best weapon of defence that could be invented; and he (Earl de Grey) could assure the noble Earl that no adherence to preconceived opinion would deter Her Majesty's Government from selecting that weapon which, after investigation, should turn out to be the best. He was sure, however, that the House would not desire Her Majesty's Government to decide without a full and careful examination. They were anxious, therefore, to propose this trial; Mr. Whitworth had declared himself ready to submit his gun to the examination, and was anxious for an opportunity of again displaying the merits of his inventions. There could be no question, as the results at Southport showed, that the gun would prove itself a most valuable engine of warfare under any circumstances under which it might be tried. There was one point, however, in his noble Friend's speech which he (Earl de Grey) had heard with less pleasure than the rest. His noble Friend appeared to draw an unnecessary comparison between Mr. Whitworth's invention and that of Sir William Armstrong. Both the inventors were men of great ability and of remarkable energy—and whilst he quite agreed in the eulogy which had been passed upon Mr. Whitworth, he must take exception to that part of his noble Friend's speech which seemed to convey something of a reflection upon Sir William Armstrong's present position. There was no intention on the part of Her Majesty's Government to give to Sir William Armstrong, the company which he represented, or to any other person, a monopoly of Government manufacture. In stating that Sir William Armstrong was a contractor with the Government, the case was not put quite fairly. The noble Earl must remember that the late Government entered into certain arrangements with Sir William Armstrong relative to the works at Elswick, which were of a very peculiar character. Sir William Armstrong gave up to the Government his invention and all the improvements which he had subsequently made in it. In return he was appointed to the office of Engineer of Rifled Ordnance, with a salary of £2,000 a year. That was the position of affairs on the accession to office of Mr. Sidney Herbert; and as rifled cannon were those most wanted, of the pattern which had been patented by Sir William Armstrong, he put an end to the manufacture of smooth-bore guns, and established Sir William Armstrong—who, under the arrangement made by General Peel, was at the time an officer of the Government—as Superintendent of the gun factories. But in taking this step the Government had no intention of creating a monopoly, and if Mr. Whitworth or any other person could prove that another description of weapon was better adapted to the general purposes of the service it would, of course, be the duty of the Government to adopt it. With reference to the Whitworth rifle, it must be remembered that at the time the comparison was instituted it was by much the more costly weapon. Cost, was of course, an element of considerable importance in reference to rifles, which were to be furnished to all British troops. No doubt, Mr. Whitworth was now able to produce a much cheaper arm; but at the time the experiments were made his rifle was much more expensive than the Enfield. A Committee had been appointed, which would commence its sittings almost immediately, to inquire into and report upon the best form of rifle, and the Government had every disposition to examine into the matter in the fullest and fairest spirit. He felt confident Mr. Whitworth would never be afraid of a fair trial, and that he would show every disposition to meet the views of the Government.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN expressed himself satisfied with the explanation of the noble Earl. He disclaimed all intention of making insinuations against

Earl de Grey and Ripon

Sir William Armstrong, though it must be admitted that the position of that gentleman was anomalous.

House adjourned at a quarter before Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter before Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, March 30, 1860.

MINUTES] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Valuation of Land (Scotland) Act Amendment.

COMMERCIAL ARRANGEMENTS WITH FRANCE.—QUESTION.

MR. E. C. EGERTON said, he would beg to ask the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any Supplemental Treaty has been arranged between this Country and France on the subject of the Duties on goods admitted from this Country into France; and if so, whether he has any objection to lay it upon the Table of the House?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, there was no such Supplemental Treaty.

MR. E. C. EGERTON said, he would beg to ask whether such Treaty was in contemplation?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the Government had no intention at present of entering into any such Treaty.

THE SAN JUAN QUESTION.—QUESTION.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what progress has been made towards a settlement of the San Juan question, and to produce (if there should be no objection on public grounds) any correspondence which may have recently taken place between the British and American Governments on the subject?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, the only progress which has been made towards the permanent settlement of the San Juan question is that an arrangement has been proposed on each side, but it has not yet been concluded. The last Despatch on the subject went from this country, and I expect that an answer will be made to it on the part of the Government of the United States. I must say that the conduct of General Scott, on the part of the United States, has been most conciliatory. About 800 American troops and a battery of guns had been placed on the island; but the number of men has since been reduced to 100, and the battery of guns has been entirely removed. It is also understood that 100 marines are to be stationed here on the part of the British Government, in order that there may be a joint occupation until the question is finally settled.

CENTRAL ITALIAN STATES.—IRISH BUSINESS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. HENNESSY said, that to put himself in order he should move that the House at its rising do adjourn to Monday next. He did so because he wished to make a statement to the House as well as to ask a question. The question related to the annexation of the States of Central Italy to Sardinia; and he begged to call the attention of the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs to a despatch which appeared amongst the official correspondence on Italian Affairs, and which he had received from Earl Cowley, dated the 5th of February. In that despatch Lord Cowley gave an account of a conversation which he had had with M. Thouvenel, the Foreign Minister of France, in which the latter stated that, "if Her Majesty's Government were ready to admit that the annexation of the Central States of Italy to Sardinia should depend on the consent of the Great Powers, the Emperor would subscribe to the same rule as regards Savoy and refrain from annexing that country, unless he had obtained the consent of the Great Powers. The principle in fact was the same in both cases." To this Lord Cowley replied, with the sanction and approval of Her Majesty's Government, that there was a distinction between the two cases, and that the British Government could not agree to the proposed Congress. It will thus be seen that M. Thouvenel threw upon the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs the onus of the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France. With that brief explanation he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government had advised Her Majesty to recognize the annexation of Bologna, Tuscany, Modena, and Parma, to the kingdom of Sardinia; and if so, whether he was prepared to state the reasons which had induced the Government to tender such advice to Her Majesty? He should now pass to another subject. Those who were familiar with the records of the House must know that at the close of each Session their proceedings became embarrassed and complicated, chiefly by the accumulation of Irish business. The late Government had adopted the prudent course of taking a large quantity of the Irish business early in the Session, and the Irish Members very naturally expected that the Chief Secretary for Ireland would follow that example; but so far from doing so, the right hon. Gentleman opposite might be said to have treated the Irish business with unexampled contempt. Until half-past twelve of the previous night, the Chief Secretary for Ireland had laid before the House only one Bill of any importance relative to Ireland, and that (the Reform Bill) was a purely political measure. There were various social matters in which the people of Ireland took an interest, such as the Poor Laws, Medical Charities, Reformatory Schools, Agricultural Improvements, and sanitary arrangements; but the right hon. Gentleman had entirely neglected the social wants of the country. As a set-off for neglecting the social interests of the people the Chief Secretary brought in a Reform Bill. It might be interesting to the House to know, that only four petitions were presented in favour of the Irish Reform Bill. The first was presented by the right hon. Gentleman himself, and was signed by one person only. The second, also presented by the right hon. Gentleman, was likewise signed by one person only and that one person an Irish Peer. [Cries of "Name, name."] The name of the solitary petitioner was Lord Monck. The third petition was from the students of the Queen's University, signed by 185 of those gentlemen, praying for the representation of that institution in Parliament; and the fourth petition—the strangest fact of all—was the first petition presented over again, no doubt through mistake, by the hon. Member for Kildare. Great agitation prevailed in Ireland on the subject of education, the poor laws, and other non-political matters, but no attempt to legislate was made. Indeed, the subject of education had been very much complicated by the conduct of the Attorney General for Ireland. It was hardly twelve months since that right hon. Gentleman appeared before the altar of a Catholic chapel in Cork, and in the presence of four bishops in their robes, solemnly denounced the system of mixed education. The Government, on the other hand, were pledged to the principle of mixed education, and the people of Ireland did not know what to think, seeing the discrepancy between the sentiments of the Government and of their Attorney General. But there was no excuse whatever for the neglect of the poor-law question. The present Poor Law system was destroying the people of Ireland. He (Mr. Hennessy) would urgently urge the Government not to continue the powers of the Commission, but to establish in Ireland the English system of extensive out-door relief. It was not long since the extraordinary scandal was exhibited of the Irish Poor Law Board being brought into the Court of Queen's Bench and prosecuted by a Catholic chaplain, when the Judges of that court decided in favour of the plaintiff, and against the Government. In spite of that decision the Government had taken no steps to remedy the evil complained of by the chaplain. They were all familiar with the distressing and disgraceful stories about the removal of Irish poor from England. A debate took place on that subject a few nights ago, in which the Attorney General took no part; nor when he (Mr. Hennessy) made a Motion on the subject of the Bailey borough Union was either the Attorney General or the Chief Secretary for Ireland present. A very wholesome lesson had been read to the Government last night on the subject of Irish tenant right. The Chief Secretary's measure was condemned on all hands. If the right hon. Gentleman had looked at what had been done by his predecessors in 1852, he might have produced a much more satisfactory Bill. There were other matters which the Chief Secretary for Ireland had neglected, and he (Mr. Hennessy) wished to give him a fair opportunity of informing the House what steps he intended to take. The English Registrar General complained for instance that the vital statistics of the British islands were in a worse position than those of any other country, simply because of the neglect of the statistics of diseases and mortality in Ireland. In conclusion he was bound to bear testimony to the courtesy and attention of the right hon. Gentleman; but he was also compelled to add that those qualities could not make amends for his inevitable ignorance of Ireland and the Irish people. The right hon. Gentleman was a distinguished Member of that House; but when he went to Dublin he was surrounded by a clique of place-hunters who shut him out from the Irish people, and effectually prevented him from learning anything of their real habits, temperament, or wants. The right hon. Gentleman was as little able to cope with the diplomacy of that clique as the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary was to encounter the diplomacy of Vienna or of Paris. He begged to move that the House at its rising do adjourn to Monday next.

Mr. Hennessy

Motion made, and Question proposed—
“That the House at its rising do adjourn to Monday next.”

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he did not rise to debate with the hon. Gentleman either the question of Savoy, or that of the Irish business and its position at this moment. Those who remembered how large a portion of the Session was occupied a few years ago by Irish business, to the exclusion of both English and Scotch affairs, would perhaps be inclined to agree with him in thinking that the altered state of things afforded no bad augury of improvement in the internal state of Ireland. His object in rising was simply to object to the Motion with which the hon. Gentleman had concluded his speech, because it was necessary that the House should sit on the next day in order to receive a commission. He might at the same time inform the House that it was not the intention of his noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs to propose the resumption of the adjourned debate upon the Bill for Amending the Representation of the People that evening, because there was no probability that if renewed it would be continued. His noble Friend would state on Monday to what day after Easter he would propose that the debate should be resumed.

THE LORD-LIEUTENANCY OF THE COUNTY OF LONDONDERRY.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he rose to draw the attention of the House to the recent appointment of Mr. Lyle, at present Receiver-Master of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, to the dignity of Lord Lieutenant of the county of Londonderry, and to the circumstances under which such appointment was made. He believed that it would be admitted by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary that no gentleman had held that office so long as he had done with less opposition from the body of Irish representatives. Having been in office himself, and having suffered from an unscrupulous opposition, he should be very unwilling to make an fair attack upon any one so courteous as the right hon. Gentleman had always shown himself to be; but the matter to which he was about to call attention was one which he thought the House would be of opinion ought to receive a satisfactory explanation. Within the last fortnight the death of a very old and respected Member of that House, Sir R. Ferguson, had created a vacancy in the representation of the city of Londonderry and in the Lieutenancy of that city and county. The Lieutenant of an Irish county—which office was created in the early part of the Reign of William the Fourth by Earl Grey and Lord Melbourne, with the assent of the Duke of Wellington—commanded the Militia, appointed its colonels and other officers, was the custos rotulorum of the county, nominated the clerk of the peace, and, being supposed to be the man of most eminent station in the county, he recommended to the Lord Chancellor such of the gentry as he thought ought to be made magistrates. The Chancellor was not disposed to act without his recommendation, and therefore he acted as a check upon that high officer to prevent his appointing unfit persons. In fact, he was the first man in the county. Shortly after the office was created, a Member of that House complained of the appointment of Lord Duncannon to be Lord Lieutenant of his county, on the ground that he held an inconsistent office, he being at the time First Commissioner of Works. In the debate upon the subject Mr. Stanley, defending the Ministry, said:—

“The rule laid down for the selection of Lord-lieutenant was to appoint the most respectable persons, whether noblemen or gentlemen, connected with the county by fortune and respectability. The object of the Government in bringing in the Bill had been to appoint persons residing in or contiguous to the counties, who, by their influence with the particular district, and by their residence, would be better able to attend to the interest of Ireland. It was certainly said that the preference should be given to peers, because they wished to select persons of the highest rank, that there might be an avoidance of jealousies, which would have been created if commoners were appointed when there were so many in one county of equal rank.”

The contest for Londonderry city was proceeding that day. He did not blame the Government for wishing to preserve the seat for the maiden and unconquered city; nor did he indulge in the political prudery of supposing that they would not exercise any legitimate influence they possessed in support of their Friend. The other night the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs warned them not to place implicit reliance upon telegrams, and when he received by that means an announcement that a gentleman whom he left at his desk in an office of the Court of Chancery in Dublin, busy settling the accounts of the receivers, looking after defaulting tenants, and seeing that balances were lodged in court, had been pitchforked into the Lord Lieutenancy of the county of Londonderry, he said to himself that he would not believe it, and would put no question upon the subject until he was better informed. On the following day, however, he looked into a Dublin newspaper, and there he saw a paragraph stating that “the newly appointed Lord Lieutenant of Londonderry, Mr. Lyle, his son and son-in-law, had left town en route for Derry, where it was said the new Lieutenant would use all his influence in support of Mr. Greer, the tenant-right candidate, in the contest then going on.” This made him think the matter more probable, and soon afterwards he received a letter, from a gentleman in Londonderry, stating that Mr. Lyle had walked into the grand jury room and announced to the gentlemen present that he was the Lord Lieutenant of the county, an announcement which, as his letter stated, “they received in solemn silence.” Now, the Receiver-Master was bound by law to be in his office so many hours every day, though, no doubt, in an Easter vacation he might be at liberty to assist at an election; but surely, if objection could be taken to the appointment of Lord Duncannon, it must apply still more forcibly to that of an official of the Court of Chancery who was withdrawn from his duties to be manufactured into a Lieutenant of a county. He objected to it especially if it were done at the present moment in order that the influence of the Lieutenant of a county and city should be thrown into the scale in support of a candidate at a closely contested election, whom the Government were disposed to favour. One of the duties of the Lieutenant of a county was to recommend magistrates to the Lord Chancellor and to act as a check upon his appointment of them. How could such functions be exercised by a person whose very office it was to execute the orders of the Lord Chancellor? This question he put to himself, and having no one to reply to it he answered it himself—“He is going to retire.”

If there was an election to be carried, the Government, despite the defaulting Exchequer, would not stick at trifles, and he therefore ventured to think that Mr. Lyle would get his retiring pension of £2,500, the amount of his salary. He had no doubt that Mr. Lyle was entitled to his full pension, as when he ceased to be Remembrancer and was transferred to the Court of Chancery, it was fairly arranged that his time as Remembrancer should be reckoned in his services in the Court of Chancery. He would not grudge him his pension, nor any mark of personal respect that could be paid to a useful, diligent and punctual servant of the Crown. But what was to become of his office in the Court of Chancery? That was a very nice point. The House ought to be informed that whenever a Gentleman contested a county or a city in Ireland, and was defeated, it was necessary to soothe his wounded feelings with a lucrative place. The Earl of Carlisle had been more patriotic and benevolent in that respect than most of his predecessors. The Gentleman who contested the county of Dublin in the Whig interest at the last election was now a Commissioner of something or other, it was immaterial what,—gaols or lunatics, it was all the same. The son of the Lord Chancellor contested the city of Dublin and was defeated; by a like equity he must be provided for. However, there was some difficulty as to whether the Chancellor could make his son Receiver-Master in his own court, but parental feelings were universally respected and the rumour was that an excellent Gentleman, and a friend of Lord Carlisle, the Commissioner of the Bankruptcy Court, was to be transferred to the office of Receiver-Master in the Court of Chancery, and the Chancellor's son was to be appointed to the vacant Commissionership. Then they had—what? A Lord Lieutenant, who was Receiver-Master of the Court of Chancery, or if not, who was the pensioner of the Crown, the Crown paying the salary of that Gentleman, and that also of the hon. and learned Gentleman to be appointed. Who was that Gentleman? He was informed it would not be the son of the Chancellor, but Mr. Berwick, who was to be transferred to that office from the Bankrupt Court, so that the Gentleman who had contested the city of Dublin might be suitably provided with a place. Did the Chief Secretary expect to govern Ireland upon such principles? When the office of Lieutenant was created in Ireland, it was objected to on the ground that the Lord Lieutenant of a county might interfere in elections. The answer was, that peers would generally be appointed, and that, as it was a breach of privilege for peers to interfere in elections, the apprehended danger would not arise. What had taken place in the present case? It was stated that no sooner had Mr. Lyle received his appointment than he proceeded straight to Londonderry, where a hot contest was raging, and gave his support to Mr. Greer, a gentleman who advocated those tenant-right views which had met with no sympathy in the House of Commons, but whose vote might always be depended upon by Ministers. Hitherto none but noblemen and gentlemen of influence in their respective counties had been appointed to the office of Lord Lieutenant. Was the Chief Secretary authorized to state that, unless Mr. Lyle had been Receiver-Master, and had held opinions similar to those of the Earl of Carlisle, he would ever have been made Lieutenant of Londonderry? The appointment was one of which the Chief Secretary might not have heard, yet he was responsible for it. The law officers of the Crown were not consulted upon such occasions. Why had the Earl of Carlisle passed over the Marquess of Waterford, Lord Garvagh, Sir Harvey Bruce, Mr. M'Causland, and many other gentlemen owning large estates in the county of Londonderry? Mr. Lyle was a younger son of a respectable family in Londonderry, a member of the bar, and a gentleman who had long discharged the duties of a public office in an exemplary manner; but the gentry of Ireland had to ask themselves whether the place of Lord Lieutenant of a county was properly filled at the moment of a contested election either by an actual Receiver-Master in the Court of Chancery, or by a pensioned officer of the Crown. Such an appointment was utterly unjustifiable; it was unprecedented, and it was contrary to all principle. Mr. Lyle had a model farm in Londonderry, the best cultivated in the county, on which, in his leisure moments, he had certainly spent some time and money; but he did not possess a considerable estate in the county, such as would justify his appointment to an office of so much importance. Why had he been made Lord Lieutenant, in the middle of a contested election, by a clique in Dublin, headed by the Earl of Carlisle, in preference, not only to the noblemen and gentlemen whose names he had already mentioned to the House, but to the two Members for the county, one a relative of a distinguished statesman, and the other the descendant of a chief magistrate of the metropolis? The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them that they ought to apply rules framed on the highest standard of morality to elections. How could he reconcile his principle with the practice of the Government, who had made an appointment such as never was made before, and which he was quite certain, if that House did its duty, would never be made again.

Mr. Whiteside

MR. CARDWELL said, he desired, in the first place, to return his acknowledgments for that part of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's speech in which he claimed for himself, and those who acted with him, the credit of having shown towards himself (Mr. Cardwell), since he had the honour of filling his present office, every possible courtesy and consideration. He acknowledged that fact thankfully; and he also acknowledged that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had the most perfect right to hold him responsible for every act of the Irish Government. Having made those acknowledgments, he would proceed to state what he understood to be the charge brought against him. As he understood the charge, it was that of having sought to put into the Lord-lieutenancy of a county a political partisan at the moment when a contested election was going on, and of contriving, at the same time, to provide for a relation of the Lord Chancellor. He would answer the two charges clearly, simply, and categorically; but before doing so, he would beg to state precisely what had been the case with regard to the vacant Lord-lieutenancy of the county of Londonderry. The first he had heard of it was an expression from his noble friend, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, of the extreme pain and regret with which he received the announcement of the vacancy created by the lamented death of Sir Robert Ferguson. He could assure the House that his noble Friend exercised the utmost care in the selection of a successor to the office left vacant by the death of that gentleman. The property of the county of Londonderry was largely held by great Companies in London. Upon the list of the deputy-lieutenants of the county there were the names of only two peers, one who had property in the county, but did not reside there; and the other, who did reside there, but upon property the succession to which had not yet fallen in, and which was not yet his own. There were no other names of Peers on the list. Among the commoners of the county his noble Friend, therefore, had proceeded to make the selection which the law vested in him, and for the exercise of which he was responsible. He selected a gentleman who he (Mr. Cardwell) believed would be acknowledged by every one who knew him to be a man of the most unblemished character. His (Mr. Cardwell's) understanding with regard to Mr. Lyle's property did not conform with that of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He believed that he was a gentleman of considerable landed property, highly respected in the county of Londonderry, residing in the county, and taking a great interest in its affairs. With regard to the statement that this was done from a wish to create a vacancy, his noble Friend (the Earl of Carlisle) was in communication with Mr. Lyle some months before, that gentleman being then extremely desirous to resign his office, with the intention of going to reside in the county of Londonderry. He was persuaded to retain his office for a short period. This occurred some time before the death of Sir Robert Ferguson. Mr. Lyle, as he before said, consented to remain; stating, however, at the same time, the period for which he would continue in office. At the termination of a few months it was fixed that he should retire, and it was, therefore, as a gentleman, who had previously avowed his determination to reside upon his estate in Londonderry, that his noble Friends elected him to fill the position of Lord Lieutenant for the county. With regard to Mr. Lyle's interference in the election, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside) himself referred to the well-known fact that many distinguished Members of that House had themselves filled the high office of Lord Lieutenant; and he (Mr. Cardwell) was not aware that it was any reflection upon the Lord Lieutenant of the county, if he should exercise in the ordinary manner, and without any circumstances which could be alleged against him as a charge, the ordinary political functions of a voter in the county. The House might imagine, from what had been said, that a keenly-contested election was going on between a warm supporter and a strenuous opponent of the Government. Now, if he were correctly informed, Mr. M'Cormick's opinions would not be found to correspond with those of the hon. Gentlemen opposite. He had not had an opportunity of referring to Ireland, but he believed that Mr. M'Cormick and Mr. Greer had expressed the same political opinions. It therefore appeared that, so far from there being a desire to create a vacancy, there had been a desire to prevent a vacancy. With regard to the way in which that vacancy had been filled, the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside) seemed to have had much freer access to the intended appointments of his noble Friend, for which he (Mr. Cardwell) was also responsible, than he could pretend to have, if he (Mr. Whiteside) could vouch for the statements which he had given to the House. All he (Mr. Cardwell) could say was, that no intimation had reached him, either from his noble Friend or from the Lord Chancellor, that there was the slightest wish of any advance of either of the two gentlemen to whom the right hon. and learned Gentleman had referred. He (Mr. Cardwell) could only conceive, therefore, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had been indebted to mere rumours, which the imagination of some persons, not acquainted with the subject, had occasioned. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said he rose to put to him a direct question—which was, would Mr. Lyle have been appointed to this office if he had not been Receiver General in the Court of Chancery? He (Mr. Cardwell) could answer that question most completely. Mr. Lyle was the choice of his noble Friend, on the grounds to which he had referred, and the only difficulty which occurred to his noble Friend was, whether the continuance of his holding that office for the short period to which he had referred was or was not a difficulty which ought to have prevented that appointment. Considering, however, that the period was both brief and fixed, his noble Friend regarded it as not a sufficient objection, and made the appointment. Now that he had answered the question put to him by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, he would make a short reply to the statement so courteously introduced by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hennessy). The hon. Gentleman was not quite so well informed on the state of the subject as he supposed himself. With regard to Irish business, experience showed that at the end of a

Mr. Cardwell

Session they were very much encumbered with Irish business, and Bills frequently brought in were dropped at the close of the Session. He (Mr. Cardwell) regretted that such should be the case, but the hon. Gentleman should remember, that when he referred to former Sessions he could not say that those who, at the present moment, were responsible for the conduct of Irish affairs, were responsible for anything which occurred in former Sessions. If it had been possible to have introduced Irish business early in the present Session, it would have been of the greatest satisfaction to him but he was sure the judgment of the House would be, that it would have been highly inconvenient and impossible to introduce measures about which there was any contest, until the most pressing public business of the country had been disposed of. When the hon. Gentleman said that he (Mr. Cardwell) had not brought in any Bill on the subject of education in Ireland, and put a question as to whether he intended to bring in a Bill upon the subject, he answered him that no Bill was required to carry out any change. It was only within a week that he received the rejoinder of the Roman Catholic Archbishops and Bishops of Ireland to the communication addressed by the Government, and it was quite obvious, as he had stated before, that when he introduced the Estimates was the proper time to make a statement upon the subject. With regard to the poor law in Ireland, the Poor-law Amendment Bill was introduced last night, and would be shortly in the hands of hon. Members. As to the question of poor-law removal, his right hon. Friend the President of the Poor-law Board, on a former occasion, had fully laid before the House the state of that question. With regard to the registration of births, marriages, and deaths, he (Mr. Cardwell) had, very early in the Session, announced his intention of bringing in a Bill on that subject, and he was only prevented from introducing that measure for the want of an opportunity. All he could say was, that as soon as it was the pleasure of the House to proceed with the Irish business, it would be of the greatest possible convenience and satisfaction to himself.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, I should not have addressed the House on the present occasion had I not been personally alluded to in the course of the debate, and was it not for the fact that, amongst the reasons assigned by the Press the public for the appointment of the new Lord Lieutenant of the county of Londonderry is the following, namely,—

“That there is not one nobleman or gentleman of sufficient position and character in that county to qualify him to fill the high and responsible office of Lord Lieutenant.”

I do not mean to state, Sir, that this was the motive that actuated the Government, but I must say that the appointment of a gentleman, however respectable, holding a high legal situation in the Irish Court of Chancery, and therefore almost constantly resident in Dublin, would naturally lead to the supposition that there was no one else in the county qualified for the post. This is an imputation, Sir, that on behalf of those noblemen and gentlemen, I indignantly repudiate. It is true, as has been stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland, that a large part of the county I have the honour to represent is the property of the London Companies, who from their constitution, although in general represented by excellent agents, are, and must be, in the position of absentee landlords, and unable to fill any public situation. Still, Sir, all who are acquainted with the County Derry know perfectly well that there are many most respectable noblemen and gentlemen of large property in the county—many of them constantly resident—who are of the class, both by position and character, usually selected for offices of the nature in question. I do not make these remarks, Sir, with the least intention of saying one word against Mr. Acheson Lyle. On the contrary, from what I have the pleasure of knowing of that gentleman, I believe him to be both a highly honourable man and one who, by his good sense and business habits, is well fitted to transact the business of any situation in which he may be placed. But, Sir, I am afraid that the real reason of the appointment is not avowed by the Government, and that political considerations are the chief things considered. In this view, Sir, the nobility and gentry of the county, with hardly an exception, undoubtedly do possess the disqualification which it is impossible they can surmount—it is, Sir, that they have not the happiness in general, to take that sanguine and complacent view of the merits of the present Government that, I suppose, they ought to do. I should have thought, Sir, that if it was desirable that magistrates should be appointed, irrespective of political considerations, it was equally important that he who has the nomination of those magistrates should also be selected without regard to party, or to the political opinions he may happen to hold. Before sitting down, I must correct the statement of the Secretary for Ireland, that the three candidates for the representation of the City of Derry hold the same political sentiments. I believe it will be found that Mr. M'Cormick, if elected, will undoubtedly take his seat on the Opposition benches. I should not have said a word on this subject had I not felt that the gentry of the County Derry had been unjustly attacked; and I will close my observations by adding my humble tribute of respect and regret for the loss of the late Sir Robert Ferguson, so highly esteemed as a Member of this House, and who discharged the duties of Lieutenant of the County Derry for so many years, by universal consent, with impartiality and justice.

LORD FERMOY said, the House was indebted to the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside), for having called their attention to the subject of the appointment of a Lord Lieutenant for the county of Londonderry, because he (Lord Fermoy) thought they ought to settle the question upon what principle were appointments to be made in future to those high offices. He meant to say nothing against Mr. Lyle, for he knew nothing about him, but he was willing to believe that he was a most excellent officer in the Court of Chancery, and had served his country usefully. That might be a reason for allowing him to retire upon full pay, if he chose, but it was no reason for appointing him to an office in a county, the due fulfilment of which required two things—namely, the respect of all parties in the county, and a thorough local knowledge of that county. If Mr. Lyle, however, had honestly and carefully discharged his duties in the Court of Chancery in Dublin, it was perfectly impossible he could have acquired a thorough knowledge of a distant county. Even if that Gentleman did now possess a large property in the county, he had been absent from it for the greater portion of his life, and therefore could not possess the local knowledge to fit him for the office of Lord Lieutenant. He was prepared to go the length of saying that where two men highly qualified by rank and a knowledge of the district presented themselves for the office of Lord Lieutenant, and one agreed with the Government in political opinions and the other did not, they might appoint the man who agreed with them. Further than that they should not allow political opinions to enter as an ingredient into the question as to who should be appointed a Lord-lieutenant of a county. The right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite had asked whether Ireland was to be governed upon that principle, but he (Lord Fermoy) wished to ask upon what principle was Ireland to be governed. They must recollect the position of affairs in Ireland at the present moment. In that country they had a large body of men representing the Ultramontane Catholic party, whose confidence the Government did not nor ever would possess. [Mr. Bowyer: Hear, Hear!] Therefore, in order to manage affairs in that country, the Government must possess the confidence of the moderate Catholics and the Protestants; but the policy that had been pursued was not at all calculated to secure that confidence. What measures relating to Ireland had been proposed? After the application of the screw Parliamentary, two Bills had been introduced, but had not progressed further than a first reading. But surely if they held out to the people of Ireland the idea that they were going to legislate for their benefit, they were bound to carry that intention into effect. He asked what had become of the Endowed Schools Bill? A Commission which sat on the subject of education had shown to them that the endowed school system in Ireland was a monstrous job. They had £80,000 a year which was misapplied, and still the Government had not attempted to deal with this question. He believed, however, the late Government, before they left office, had showed a disposition to deal with this question. Another question of great social importance to Ireland was the Fairs and Markets Bill, which had not been dealt with. True, the Government had brought in a Reform Bill; but a measure which had received less approval from the Irish people, he believed, never was brought into the House. He had endeavoured to induce the Government to grapple with the question of the Ecclesiastical Courts, which in England as well as in Ireland, was a monstrous nuisance. They impeded the whole administration of justice in Ireland. [Cries of "Question."] That was the question. It was disagreeable to many hon. Members in that House to hear subjects of that nature discussed, but they must excuse him if he told them that while they were neglecting all those material interests in Ireland, the country was slipping from them; there was no public opinion in their favour, and they should recollect they had laid down this principle in dealing with other countries, that dynasties might be abolished and dependencies might be set free by universal suffrage. The day might come when this country would want the support of the independent Catholic and Protestant party in Ireland, and the only way to obtain that support was by applying those useful measures of social legislation to Ireland. If they did not do that, public opinion in Ireland would desert them, and a Minister of some foreign country would be sending them a well-written despatch, calling upon them to appeal to universal vote in Ireland. He feared very much, when that day arrived, men like himself who had an interest in the country, and wished to see Ireland governed upon moderate, fair, and reasonable principles, would find themselves deserted by the country, and the decision of the whole people of Ireland would be against connection with England.

Lord Fermoy

BRIBERY AND CORRUPTION AT WAKEFIELD—QUESTION.

MR. ELLICE (St. Andrew's) said, he wished to inquire what were the intentions of Her Majesty's Government as to the Report of the Commission on Corrupt Practices at the Election for the Borough of Wakefield. The subject was one of importance, and, as the Reform Bill could not be proceeded with until after Easter, he hoped the House would take advantage of the interval to clear its conscience, for having allowed this important matter to sleep so long. In consequence of the Report of a Committee of that House, a Royal Commission of Inquiry into the circumstances of the Wakefield election had been appointed, and the Commissioners presented their Report on the 28th of last January. Their Report had consequently been on the table of the House for two months. Its contents were well worthy of serious consideration, especially now that the question of reform was under discussion. The Commissioners reported that at the election of 1859 the constituency consisted of 866 voters, of whom 809 voted; and that the election was conducted by, and on the part of ch of the candidates in a corrupt and legal manner. As between the two candidates, one being a Conservative and the other an ultra-Liberal, it seemed that with regard to the amount of corruption, it, in common parlance, was six of one and half-a-dozen of the other. The sum of money spent on either side was much the same. In all, the Commissioners found that £8,050 had been spent on the constituency by the two candidates, of which amount £6,900 had been spent for purposes of corruption; £3,500 of it had been paid out in direct bribery, and £3,400 for other matters closely connected with illegal and corrupt practices. The Commissioners went on to say that the candidates had provided these large sums of money with the intention of the money being employed in bribery and corruption; that the sum of £3,500 was paid in bribes to eighty-six persons, who had received on an average about £40 a head, but that in all there were 142 persons bribed or corruptly dealt with. The Report of the Commissioners, in its concluding paragraph, stated,

"Lastly, we find, having regard to the length of time before the election at which the preparations for the work of corruption were commenced, to the large proportion (142 out of 866) of the whole constituency engaged in corrupt practices and guilty of bribery, to the number of persons (including fifty-six, themselves electors) who voluntarily joined in the work of offering and giving bribes, to the zeal and skill they exhibited, to the readiness with which their services were received and their acts adopted, to the open way in which bribery was carried on by the canvassers and discussed among all classes, and to the manner in which the voters received and bargained with the canvassers on both sides, that large numbers of the electors were then not for the first time engaged in the like operations of gross corruption."

By the Corrupt Practices Act, under which the Commission was issued, express provision was made for the exemption of persons who gave evidence before the Commissioners in such cases, from any penal consequences attached to acts which they themselves might have disclosed; but the Act at the same time contemplated that wherever the Commissioners thought fit to refuse a certificate of indemnity, the persons should still remain open to prosecution. Now, to the Report of the Wakefield Bribery Commissioners was annexed a schedule containing the names of the persons who had been guilty of bribery and corrupt practices there, distinguishing those to whom the statutable certificate had not been awarded by the Commissioners. In that list, and without such certificate, he found the names of the two candidates, who were stated by the Commissioners to have spent £8,000 in bribery at Wakefield. Now, he would refer to what was done last year in the case of the Beverley election. In that case, likewise, it was reported that bribery had prevailed, and the names of certain persons were reported by the Committee as having been guilty of it; and on the Motion of the Chairman of that Committee, the names of two of those persons were specially brought before the House, and the Attorney General was directed to prosecute them. Those persons were two men named Boyes and Taylor, whom the Committee had found guilty, the one of giving a bribe of £20 amongst nine persons, and the other £4 7s. between two persons. When the Motion for prosecution was brought before the House, the hon. Member for Southampton (Mr. Digby Seymour) moved as an Amendment,

"That, as the recent Commissions have clearly demonstrated that many persons of higher social rank have been involved in graver criminality, it would not be expedient to limit the direction to Her Majesty's Attorney General to the prosecution of Boyes and Taylor."—[3 Hansard, clvi., 489.]

The right hon. Gentleman (Sir G. Lewis), in supporting the original Motion, said,

"As far as the present case went it was quite clear that it would be a precedent for the prosecution of others guilty of a greater amount of bribery. If it were right that persons reported against by other Election Committees, or by the recent Commissions issued in respect of Wakefield and Gloucester, should be prosecuted, he was sure that the House, if those persons had not received certificates from the Commissioners, and if there appeared a prospect of success in the prosecutions, would listen to any hon. Member who should feel disposed to bring the subject under consideration. It was, therefore, a reason in favour of the present Motion that it established a principle applicable to all cases."—[3 Hansard, clvi., 494.]

In the eyes of the public a rather unfavourable contrast would appear between the course which the House took then with those two humble individuals, who had been employed to offer inconsiderable bribes on behalf of others, and the course which was now taken in passing over the conduct of two wealthy persons, who were proved before the Commission to have produced and applied the sum of £8,000 for corrupting and debasing a whole constituency. In the one case the House had been very eager to punish the subordinates, but if when the principals were detected, which could but rarely occur, they did nothing, the public would look upon the House as desirous of screening these persons, and shirking the application of the rule they had been ready to apply to their agents. He wished to know why a different rule should be applied to the Wakefield case, where two persons were reported against as having been guilty of corrupt practices for their own purposes, from that which was applied to the Beverley case, where two persons had been employed in a similar transaction for the advantage of somebody else? With such an inequality of dealing, it was but natural that doubts should prevail out of doors as to the purity of the intentions with which the House took up the question of Parliamentary Reform, when such a report as that of the Wakefield Commission was lying on the table unnoticed side by side with the Reform Bill. They talked of lowering the franchise to £6. Now, Wakefield was the creation of the old Reform Bill, and its constituency, composed of £10 householders, was a pure one, and uninitiated in corruption, until it was demoralized by some wealthy persons. But did the House think that if the constituencies of Wakefield, Gloucester, or Berwick, had been composed of £6 instead of £10 householders, the bribery there would have been less? On the contrary, was it not evident that the list of bribers would only have been enlarged? Before going further into the question of Reform, the House should justify itself from such slurs as were cast upon its character when a Report like that of the Wakefield Commissioners was left unnoticed. He had no fear of the result of extending the franchise if they gave the voter fair play; but, if they left him exposed to every sort of illegal appliance, it was his opinion that, instead of conferring a benefit by the enlargement of the constituencies, they were only increasing a class which, politically, —if there was any truth in these Reports of numerous Commissions—was already much demoralized. He did hope that the Government would show their sense of justice and honesty of purpose by taking care that if the delinquents in the Beverley case were punished, the Wakefield Report was also acted upon, and that the Attorney General would be instructed to prosecute the two principals who were compromised by it.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he wished to correct one error into which his hon.

Mr. Ellice

Friend had fallen, in supposing that the House or the Government were disposed to apply a different rule in these cases according to the station of life of the persons implicated in them. It was a mistake to suppose that it had in former cases been the practice of the House to direct the Attorney General to prosecute all persons who had been reported by an Election Committee to have been guilty of bribery. That course was confined to the cases in which the Committee reported, not only that certain persons had been guilty of bribery, but that in their opinion the Attorney General ought to be directed to prosecute; and in the Beverley case the Committee having reported to that effect, the Chairman moved a Resolution of the House directing that the Attorney General should institute a prosecution. There were many other persons who during the last Session had been reported to have been guilty of bribery, but in those cases no such action had been taken. With regard to the Wakefield Commission, the hon. Gentleman had not stated the case very correctly. No doubt the Commissioners expressly pointed to certain persons, whose names appeared in the schedule, as guilty of bribery and corrupt practices, and the names were also specified of those among them to whom the Commissioners had refused the certificate which alone would protect them from any prosecution or penalty. Under these circumstances it was obvious that the persons to whom certificates were refused were open to prosecution, provided the evidence was sufficient to insure a conviction in a court of law for the crime of bribery. But independently of the certificate of indemnity given to persons who spoke the whole truth to the satisfaction of the Commissioners, there was a clause in the Act which prevented the evidence given by any person on compulsion before the Commissioners from being used in evidence against him on a prosecution in a court of law. If, then, in the Wakefield case the persons from whom certificates of indemnity were withheld were proved by their own evidence only to have committed bribery, that testimony would not be available against them in a court of law. His right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, after having given a careful consideration to the Report of the Commission, had referred it to the law advisers of the Crown, calling their attention to the fact of a large number of persons having been reported guilty of acts of bribery, and also the fact that to some of them the certificate had not been given. The law officers of the Crown had, therefore, been called upon to consider whether they considered there was sufficient evidence to support a prosecution. But independently of any proceeding on the part of the Government, the Report having been laid before the House, any hon. Member might move that the Attorney General be instructed to prosecute. On the general question, he stated the other night that it was not expedient that these corrupt practices, carried on so extensively, should be overlooked, and that the writs should issue after a short temporary suspension. In Wakefield, especially, the Commissioners stated that although there were not more than 200 persons who had actually received bribes, they believed that the corruption was at all events connived at by the great bulk of the constituency, and that it was not confined to the lower class of voters, but pervaded all classes. He (Sir George Grey) believed that the most effectual means of checking those corrupt practices would be to enact that for a given term of years boroughs so circumstanced if not absolutely disfranchised should be prevented from returning Members to that House, by which means Parliament would mark its sense of the corrupt practices to which the constituencies had been proved to have resorted, and time would be given for correcting the corrupt practices. But there being now a Bill before Parliament the effect of which would be to add to the constituencies of both the boroughs in question, the Government did not think it would be right, while proposing that addition, to invite the House at the same time to suspend the exercise of the franchise in these boroughs for any lengthened period. Under the circumstances the Government recommended that no new writ should be issued for either of those boroughs during the present Parliament, and for that purpose he apprehended no Act of Parliament would be necessary, as the object might be effected by the Resolution of this House.

THE EXPENSE OF THE DEFENCE OF THE COLONIES.—QUESTION.

MR. ADDERLEY said he was sorry to be obliged to add one more subject to the heterogeneous discussion which had already taken place; but the Question of which he had given notice was, he thought, of so important a character as to justify him in asking the Secretary at War for an immediate explanation. If the answer to his question should not be satisfactory, he should ask the House to assent to the appointment of a Select Committee on the subject after the Easter holidays. His question had reference to a better apportionment of the expenses for the defence of the Colonies between the Imperial and Colonial Treasuries. He was of opinion that the present system of charging those expenses almost wholly on this country was not only burdensome to this country, but was mischievous in its effects to the Colonies themselves. The facts were these—that for the purpose of the military defences of the Colonies there was thrown upon the English taxpayers a burden of nearly £4,000,000 a year, whilst the amount contributed towards that object by the Colonies themselves was somewhat less than £400,000 a year, being less than one-tenth of the whole sum required. It seemed to him that that was a most unreasonable state of things, and that the House would do well to consider it with a view to a more just and satisfactory arrangement of the matter. The taxpayers of the mother country derived no advantage from the contribution of that money, whilst the exemption of our Colonies from their own taxation was indefensible and injurious, if not seriously mischievous to themselves. The two colonies of New South Wales and Victoria no doubt contributed somewhat more than our other Colonies towards the expense of their defence. He could not understand the reason why the British Colonies should be the only part of the empire—indeed of any empire in history—exempted both from personal service and money payment for the cost of their own defence. The effect of the arrangement was to weaken this country by occasioning the Queen's forces to be scattered in small detachments all over the world. The number of our troops supposed to be appropriated to the defence of the Colonies was 42,000. Those were scattered over a great number of the Colonies, and were lost to this country when their services were really wanted. In time of war we were obliged at the risk of incurring a bad understanding with Foreign Powers to resort to German and Swiss legions from the circumstance of being unable to avail ourselves of all our own troops. But with regard to the Colonies themselves it did a still greater injury. In the first place, these few soldiers could not really defend the Colonies. Their numbers being totally inadequate, and there being only two or three companies often in a large tract of country, the colony trusting to such defence would be at the mercy of any enemy who had anything like a competent naval force; whereas if the Colonies were obliged to depend on their own resources they would provide a sufficient force for their defence. The great inequalities, too, of the system—some of those colonies, often those the least responsible, being required to contribute more than others—naturally created a feeling of jealousy, and an impression that injustice was done to the former. Another anomaly of the system was shown in the colonial allowances made to English troops—allowances being granted liberally by some of the colonies, whilst others made no such allowances. The consequence was that the British Treasury had to make up the difference to Her Majesty's troops when stationed in the liberal colonies; and the troops stationed elsewhere complained. Last year the late Secretary at War, whilst referring to this question, complained of the present system being unjust, capricious, wasteful, and mischievous. Some colonies were not even required to pay for their own local forces, and very few had raised any local militia whatever. When he brought the question on the last occasion under the consideration of the House, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War said that a Committee had been appointed to investigate the subject. That Committee consisted of the Secretary of the Treasury, the permanent Secretary of the Colonies, and the permanent Assistant Secretary of the War Office, who were required to state the existing system, and to make some suggestion as to a better principle of apportionment of military expenditure in Colonies between the Imperial and the Colonial Treasuries, and as to the best mode of carrying out that apportionment. He had asked for the Report of that Committee; but he was told that it was a Departmental Report. He, on the other hand, held it to be the property of the House, because it had been so referred to in that House, and made a pretext for stopping his intended Committee of Inquiry; and the less right had the Secretary of State for War to withhold it when it was remembered that the Committee was appointed by his predecessor in office (General Peel), and was actually sitting when he went out of office. He, therefore, now asked the Secretary of State for War whether he was still disinclined to produce that Report, and, if so, whether he, on the part of the Government, would offer any objection if he (Mr. Adderley) should think it his duty to move for a Select Committee to inquire into this subject, in order that he might obtain and lay before the House the same information as was probably contained in that document?

Mr. Adderley

THE POLISH REFUGEES IN THE CRIMEAN WAR.—QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he rose to call attention to a Petition from certain Polish Refugees, who, having served under the British Government in the Crimean War, complain of injustice being done to them, and ask for inquiry and redress. He would not occupy the attention of the House for more than a very few seconds, for he was as anxious to listen to the hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel) as any Member in the House. The case to which he had to call attention was one of charity and justice, which involved the honour of the British Government. It related to the claims of forty-one unhappy Polish refugees who had served in the Crimean War. They complained of the gross injustice which had been done to them, and sought redress from that House. The statement of their case which had been placed in his hands had been drawn up by a most accomplished lady, the daughter of a Polish nobleman, and he would just refer to one or two facts stated to show that the case called for investigation. It would be remembered that in the difficulty which this country experienced to get men to fight our battles, and when our agents all but embroiled our relations with America by recruiting in the United States, the services of a German and a Polish Legion were engaged. The German Legion had been well treated; the Polish had been scandalously misused. The Petition stated that the petitioners had served in the Crimean War in the Polish Legion under the British Government, and up to this day they had not received their full payment, which they had never ceased to demand. Before they entered the Legion they had been told by an agent of the Government that great benefits would accrue to Poland from the war, and that all would receive the protection of the Government, as well as the promised bounty—a year's pay, and a free passage. They asserted that they only received £1 of the bounty, although the Germans were paid £6. When the Legion was disbanded in July, 1856, General Storks said they would receive all that was promised them; but only one-tenth part of them received it; and many thousands of them were obliged to turn shepherds in Bulgaria. Those who had received their passage money were obliged to submit to its deduction from their year's pay. Their good clothes were taken from them, and inferior clothes were given them. And as there was no room for their baggage, their good clothes were cast overboard. One of those gentlemen, Lieutenant Alexander Goman, stated that he was born in Cracow, and made prisoner of war by the Russians in 1831. In consequence of having served against Russia he was doomed for life by the Government of that country to serve as a private soldier; but in consequence of his exemplary conduct he was subsequently raised to the rank of lieutenant. Being tempted by the agents of the British Government, who were abroad to procure men to fight their battles, he entered the Polish Legion formed under the authority of the British Government: he served during the war in the Crimea until the 11th June, 1856, when the force was disbanded. At that time there was £104 due to him, but in consequence of some private quarrel a portion of that money was detained from him by the commanding officer of the Legion. He demanded it from General Storks, who promised to get it for him, but he had never obtained it. He was now reduced to the most abject poverty, and condemned to work at manual labour with his health shattered. He (Mr. Maguire) had seen two or three of the petitioners himself, and more pitiable and wretched objects he had never beheld. They were almost walking skeletons, and their whole condition was such as to excite commiseration. He asked the earnest and honest consideration of the Secretary of State for War to this case. Let some trustworthy person be employed to make inquiry, and if there was any truth in the statements made he conjured the right hon. Gentleman, for the sake of those unfortunate people, as well as for the honour of the British name, to do them justice.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that with regard to the request of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Adderley), who wished to have a copy of the Report of a Parliamentary Committee appointed by the War Office, the Treasury, and the Colonial Office, by his predecessor, the gallant General (General Peel) opposite, he had stated to him the other day that he thought, as a general rule, there was an objection to publishing the Reports of such a Committee; but it was also true that last year, when his right hon. Friend brought the matter before the House, he (Mr. Sidney Herbert) had stated his opinion on the general subject; he stated the injustice in some cases and capriciousness with which these payments were distributed, and expressed the hope that some remedy would be found; and the Government were pursuing inquiries with that view. Generally speaking, he was opposed to making the Reports of these Departmental Committees public; but, as the one in question had been announced as occupying the attention of the Government, and as the foundation of some measure on the subject, he had in this particular case, having consulted the Colonial Minister, no objection to the production of the document. It would be found to be a document of great ability; but, of the three Members of the Committee, two had signed a Report opposed to that of the other. With respect to the case mentioned by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Maguire) as one of charity and justice, he had to state that it was really a case of charity, not of justice. He believed the hon. Gentleman could not overstate the destitute condition to which these unhappy persons were reduced. Their case had been taken up by a lady, who was a Russian subject, and who was now in this country on a very unfortunate mission connected with painful family circumstances. These men had entered the Turkish service originally in the regiment known as the Cossacks of the Sultan, and were subsequently taken into British pay; but the whole question was simply one of compact. The Government raised through an English agency a certain number of men to be added to that legion. These men were promised no bounty whatever. The complainants were either deserters from the Russian army, who were transferred where they were without the necessity of providing outfit for a long voyage, or they were prisoners taken from Bomarsund, and sent out at the expense of the Government to join this Cossack Legion. The contract with them was, that the officers should receive the pay of French officers, and the men of Turkish privates. That they received, and at the expiration of their service a certain gratuity. Some came back; others remained in Turkey. Those who came to England received all that was due to them, and gave a receipt as having been paid in full. They never made any complaint until last autumn, when they found that others who had enlisted in the same legion at a greater distance had received more money in order to compensate them for the expense of reaching it. The lieutenant who had been referred to had been dismissed from the service for some misconduct by his superior officer, who was the proper person to decide upon the case.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY TO FRANCE.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I rise, Sir, to call the attention of the House to the subject of which I have given notice—the recent annexation of Savoy to France. It is a subject in which I take great interest, and I trust that, under the circumstances, the House will kindly bear with me in the statement I am about to make. Nay more, I believe the House will concur with me in thinking that, looking at the embarrassed state of foreign affairs at this moment, it is desirable, before we adjourn for the Easter vacation, that some expression of opinion should be made with reference to the position of Switzerland; and that we should have an opportunity of considering and weighing the immense and immediate danger with which the neutrality and independence of that country are now threatened by the annexation of Savoy to France. My object in rising to-night is, I may say, to endeavour to save Switzerland by a generous expression of sympathy on the part of this House and this nation, for I do think that she is greatly menaced by the position of France in her immediate neighbourhood. Individually I own I take a lively and very natural interest in the welfare of that country, having lived there for several years in a very impressionable period of my life. But I put that on one side. I come here as an Englishman, in the free Parliament of a free people, to advocate the principles of liberty wherever it may concern this country, and to maintain those principles wherever imperilled; and I shall be satisfied if, when I resume my seat, I shall have contributed to draw attention to, and thus serve the cause of that country whose rights and liberties are now imminently endangered. At the outset I must say that the repeated insinuations of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) against those who have advocated the interests of Europe in opposition to the aggressive policy of France are most unfounded. That hon. Gentleman is very severe in his criticism of those who venture to differ from him on political questions. We know the candour of his censures; but I am convinced almost every Member of this House dissents from the un-English policy which the hon. Gentleman would recommend Her Majesty's Government to pursue at this moment. That hon. Member repudiates the opinion of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Kinglake) as well as those which I and abler Members of this House have expressed on several recent occasions on this question. But, mark you, those opinions are now the opinions of Her Majesty's Government. The hon. Member for Birmingham the other night said he repudiated those views because he represented a great English constituency; but, remember, we all of us form the collective representation of the entire constituent body in this country; and I say the hon. Gentleman, in disowning our views and the views of Her Majesty's Government, disowns the sentiments of nine-tenths of the town which has sent him to Parliament. That, however, is the hon. Member's own affair, and he had better look to it. I venture to tell him that if the new Reform Bill passes he will find himself very much in the position of the right hon. Member for Ashton (Mr. M. Gibson)—the late Member for Manchester. But when the hon. Gentleman endeavours to persuade us that we have no direct interest in this great question, I believe he grossly misrepresents the general feeling of this country, and egregiously undervalues the depth of that feeling. I wish also now to state that, in bringing this subject before the House previous to the adjournment for the Easter Recess, I am certainly not actuated by any unfriendly feeling towards Her Majesty's Government. I only desire, as was said the other night by my hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. S. FitzGerald), to strengthen their hands in the present emergency. I only desire to see them pursuing a policy worthy of this country and the grave responsibilities under which they are placed. They have shown much hesitation on several occasions in answering questions relating to foreign affairs; but I believe they could lose nothing by a generally diffused knowledge of what their policy has been within the last few weeks. Certainly I think the opinions expressed the other night by the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary have had a very great effect in this country. Those opinions have immeasurably enhanced the confidence of the nation in the straightforward course which that noble Lord will unquestionably take in the conduct of these affairs. But why not let us know what has been the answer made to M. Thouvenel? It was promised to be laid on the table the other day; but we have never seen it? It is said in the streets that it is very spirited. Let us see, then, what your spirited answer is. Observe the difficulty in which Members of the present Government are placed by not informing the country what their policy has been. When in 1857 Mr. Cobden proposed a vote of censure on the Government, I think his expression was that their foreign policy had been "turbulent and aggressive." They were turned out of office in consequence. The year following, Mr. Milner Gibson,—the right hon. Member for Manchester then—moved another vote of censure against the Government for not having been, as he called it, sufficiently prompt in vindicating our national honour. That is to say, in 1857 the Government were too turbulent; and in 1858 they were not turbulent enough. All this comes of the country not knowing what your policy really is. But the wording of the right hon. Gentleman's memorable Motion is really worth recalling when we are considering the Government's hesitation to show us their despatch. The then right hon. Member for Manchester declared:—

Mr. Sidney Herbert

"This House regrets that Her Majesty's Government have not felt it their duty to make some reply to an important despatch received from the French Government on the 28th of January, 1858."

Here we are in almost the same position. The right hon. Member for Ashton, sitting on his present comfortable bench, may, perhaps, not like to take the matter up now. But this important despatch has not been produced, and we are ignorant of its contents. I dare say it is "spirited," if it accords with the tone used the other night by the noble Foreign Secretary. There may be, however, doubts about that, but of this there can be no doubt, that a wanton outrage, fraught with the gravest consequences to the peace and happiness of nations, has just been offered to the Powers of Europe and the principles of justice. Within the last three days I think that last act has been signed, the effect of which must be, unless this country and the rest of Europe protests against it, to subvert the independence of Switzerland. What have been the assurances of France all this time? We all recollect the famous declaration, "L'empire, c'est la paix!" The French Government had over and over again solemnly declared that it aimed at no personal objects—that it sought no territorial aggrandizement. In his proclamation issued at Milan, the Emperor told the people of Lombardy:—

" Vos ennemis, qui sont les miens, ont tenté de diminuer la sympathie universelle qu'il y avait en Europe pour votre cause, en faisant croire que je ne faisais la guerre que par ambition personnelle, ou pour aggrandir le territoire de la France."

In his speech from the Throne, on opening his Chambers, on the 1st of March, the Emperor said, "La France ne menace personne;" and then went on to avow his hope, by the expansion of the resources of France and by the extension of liberty, "to console and reassure humanity." And this is the way in which he "consoles and reassures humanity." I think we have too long and too credulously listened to his good assurances; that we have too ingenuously accepted the good faith of his intentions. Whatever may be the consequences—and grave, I fear, they may be—of the present complications, certainly, as far as is consistent with the honour of this country, and the material interests of Europe, peace must be maintained. The House, I am sure, would be sorry to urge Her Majesty's Government to adopt a policy involving war, and all those painful concomitants of war with which, alas! too many of us are familiar. But, whether it be necessary by peace, or by a firm and rigorous attitude to encounter a policy on the part of France which is producing distrust tending to war, I think we all ought, as far as possible, consistently with peace, to strengthen the hands of the Imperial Government, which is responsible to Parliament for the safety of our interests and the maintenance of our honour. Nay, I go further than the hon. Member for Birmingham went the other night, and say that, whatever may be the particular interest of Russia, of Austria, of Germany, or even of Switzerland, I should be very sorry to see the Government of England adopting a policy calculated to plunge us into a war for no object of general interest. But is there no principle of common interest affecting this country at stake in what is now going on? I believe there is. Many hon. Gentlemen, here and out of doors, think Her Majesty's Government have connived in some way or other at the aggression and annexation now being pursued by France. I do not concur in that suspicion, and I have said so from the beginning. Appearances have been strongly against them, I admit. I think they have carried forbearance to its extreme limits. But I believe they have been deceived—grossly deceived. In fact, they have confessed as much themselves. But mark you, they have been deceived by a Power whose good faith and good intentions they were bound to accept after the repeated assurances they had received. Is there, then, I repeat a principle of common interest at stake? I believe there is. I ask the House to observe the position in which Europe is now placed. Is it likely that the Emperor, having rejected all the friendly remonstrances of this country and of others, having by his desperate policy plunged France into a system of aggrandizement and territorial aggression, will now stop and be satisfied with what he has obtained, even if he be able to curb the further progress of the revolutionary—for it is revolutionary—policy which he is pursuing? It is the revolutionary policy of 1848, which was adopted by M. Lamartine and by M. Louis Blanc; and I ask you, as we know that ce n'est que le premier pas qui coûte, whether it is not most probable that, having tasted the pleasures of ambition, and witnessed "the pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war," the Emperor will take the first opportunity of proceeding to some conquest which will more materially affect the interests of Europe. If that be so, we have at this moment the great and important duty to perform of endeavouring, with the assistance of the rest of Europe, to check his progress. What is the feeling of Europe at this moment? Does Europe feel with us? The hon. Member for Birmingham thinks that it does not. The other night he said, to my astonishment, "Russia takes no interest in this miserable question." The hon. Member for Birmingham calls that "a miserable question" which concerns the liberties of half a million of people. He said, "Does Russia take an interest,

Sir Robert Peel

does Austria take an interest in it? Austria won't join you in a quarrel about Savoy or Switzerland, when not one word has been said about her own dismemberment." He must not think that every Power has that feeling of jealousy and nasty spitefulness. I believe that Austria, although she has suffered severely, has sufficient manliness still to come forward in the interest of the rest of Europe to endeavour to vindicate the right, and to defend the principles which she has herself sworn to adopt. The hon. Gentleman says that you can't get up any interest in the question in this country. In answer to that assertion, I may appeal to the state of the House at this moment; I may appeal to this crowded assembly, called together by no words of mine, but by an active and determined interest in the welfare of Switzerland. Yet the hon. Gentleman says that you can't get up an interest on this subject; adding that there is some little attention paid to it by one newspaper, but that it is a newspaper notorious for a mixture of piety and ruffianism. That is the way in which the hon. Member for Birmingham speaks of a free press. He says that day after day that newspaper endeavours to stir up the passions of the people by vituperations—I am referring to what I have read in the newspapers—

MR. SPEAKER: I must request the hon. Baronet not to refer in detail to a past debate.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Of course I bow with submission to the Chair. I was merely alluding to what I read had taken place. One thing I recollect having seen in the newspapers, and that was, that it was insinuated by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) that the guilty instigators of these vituperations were princes of the House of Orleans. Now, I do think that that was a most unjust and ungenerous imputation for any man to cast upon a family like the House of Orleans. They are princes of an exalted family, and I am assured that I speak the sentiments of the House, when I say that, weighed down as they are by the bitterest visitation with which Providence could afflict a family, they have, during all the time that they have resided in this country, conducted themselves with a nobility of character, and more than a nobility of character—with a dignity of demeanour which has gained for them the sympathies of every one, except the hon. Member for Birmingham, who, coupling them with the Savoyards, is so ready to cry down and afflict them. I only hope that the hon. Gentleman himself may never be placed in such a position as to learn what it is to be deprived of his home and of the country of his birth. [A laugh]. I do not mean to say that he is ever likely to become a Sovereign. Let me now call back the attention of the House to the inquiry, "Is the feeling of Europe opposed to the consideration of this question?" Russia, they say, is cool about it. Why, Russia is at this moment occupied with a great question of domestic policy, and of course she is more ready to turn her attention to the East than to the West. But take Prussia. Take Prussia, with her well-organized army and her loyal people; what are the feelings of Prussia? Were they not nobly expressed in that despatch of Baron Schleinitz, which was quoted the other night? I have not it by me, but it was a generous and noble expression of feeling on the part of the Chief Minister of that country. Recollect that that is a country which has never forgotten, and I hope never will forget, the injustice and indignities which were heaped upon it by the First Napoleon, until the genius of the Duke of Wellington and the sword of Blucher vindicated its national honour. The Prussians must feel very deeply when they are told that the Rhine is threatened now. Do not tell me that the whole of Europe is perfectly indifferent to what may take place! Above all, do not tell me that Prussia, with its devoted army, and its loyal people, is contented to assent to the aggressions of France. Well, then, I come to Austria. They say that Austria won't make any move with regard to Switzerland, because nothing was said when her own territory was dismembered. It is true that Austria has had to suffer a very heavy calamity; but I believe that any one who studied the campaign in Italy will admit that nothing could have been more heroic than the way in which the Austrian soldiers fought throughout that campaign. Of course our sympathies were with the Italians; but at the same time we admired the way in which the Austrians fought under the direction of men who were unequal to the emergency. The Austrian army showed itself worthy to be the army of a great empire, and I am satisfied that if it had been better organized it would have contended with greater success even against the forces of France. But what is the condition of Austria at this moment? There are two causes which prevent Austria from taking any active interest in this question, religious discord and financial embarrassment. Any one who has watched the affairs of Austria will know that ever since 1855, when the concordat with Rome was concluded, there has been much religious dissension in that country. The Austrian empire contains a population of 35,000,000, of whom 3,000,000 are Protestants, and they conceive that their religious feelings and religious rights have been very much compromised by the concordat. That is an element of discord against which it is most difficult for any Power to contend; but there is another embarrassment, which is still more important, because it concerns the supply of the sinews of war. Every one knows that Austria is at this moment labouring under the greatest possible burden of financial difficulty. I believe that I am correct in saying that within the last eleven years the public debt of that country has increased 150 per cent, and that at this moment it amounts to more than eight times the annual revenue. Nay, to show the difficulty which Austria has in raising money, I believe that the last loan she attempted to negotiate failed upon every bourse in Europe. I ask you then, is it likely that she should take any active part in assisting us to arrest the aggressions of France? But this I will say, that I believe her sympathies, that I believe the sympathies of Germany, are entirely in favour of Switzerland. Let us see for a moment how it is that all these difficulties have fallen upon Switzerland. Just consider for one moment what it is that presses down that country. It is this unhappy policy of France. I, in common with everybody else in this country, hoped that France was acting a noble part towards Italy, that she was acting disinterestedly, that she was really desirous to free that country; but there has been this arrière pensée all through her transactions. From the very beginning she has been seeking to obtain what she calls un territoire de très peu d'étendue, but what is both politically and strategically of great importance to Europe. France has always been desirous to obtain possession of that. Her expression was that she wanted nothing that need alarm Europe, nothing but un territoire de très peu d'étendue; and that neither by military operations nor by insurrection would she seek to acquire these provinces. These are the provinces which abut upon Switzerland, which are absolutely essential to the salvation of that country, and which for 230 years have been considered absolutely necessary to its welfare. Savoy un territoire de très peu d'étendue! Why, Sir, this is the territory that in 1814 Lord Castlereagh and Capo d'Istria were both determined that France should not have. France desired to have Chablais, which abuts upon Switzerland, in order that she might gain a footing upon the Lake of Geneva. Russia and England, represented by Capo d'Istria and Pozzo di Borgo, by Lord Clancarty and Lord Castlereagh, prevented her from then acquiring that territory, but she has now taken it without asking. I wonder whether the Emperor of the French ever reads his Bible [A laugh]. It is a very serious matter. If he does, I wonder it does not recall to his recollection that small territory which Ahab the King wanted to take from Naboth the Jezreelite. That was un territoire de très peu d'étendue. Ahab wanted it for money, and took it with blood, and what was the consequence? The cry of the weak rose like a sacrifice to the Almighty, and the expectations of the rich man were blasted with disappointment. Such, I believe, will be the case in the present instance. We do not live in a period when miraculous interpositions take place, but I hope that the cry of the weak will still find an echo with the Government of this country; sure I am that it will find an echo in this House of Parliament. You ought not to disregard national feeling. This country never has disregarded national feeling in Europe. I well recollect to have read in the speeches of a great Parliamentary leader, when some Members of the House of Commons were urging the Government to adopt a policy of cowardice and cringing towards the first Emperor of the French, of which I hope that we shall have no examples in the present day—I well recollect that when those Members of the House of Commons were attacking the Duke of Wellington, and arguing that, after all, Napoleon would govern the Spaniards a great deal better than the Spaniards governed themselves, Mr. Canning, with that magnificent élan of character which always distinguished him, said, "National feeling! National feeling is prior to and paramount over every consideration of political convenience." And I, Sir, think the national feeling which has been aroused not only in Switzerland but in every country of Europe by the aggressive policy of France is worthy of the attention of this House and the country. What are the reasons which M. Thouvenel gives for the annexation of Savoy and Nice? At first he said the people would be consulted;—the people are against annexation. Then he said he would consult the municipalities;—the municipalities agree with the people. Then he promised to consult the Powers of Europe;—the Powers of Europe are of the same opinion as the people and the municipalities; but before they have had time to return an answer France has accomplished the annexation. The conduct of M. Thouvenel has been marked throughout by a duplicity unworthy the Minister of a great empire. He says in a despatch to the French Minister at Berne, "Historical traditions favour the annexation of Savoy to France." Really, Sir, I should have liked to answer that despatch. It is a total perversion of the truth. He tries to show that France has always wanted Savoy. Why, Sir, the conduct of France towards Savoy has always been the very reverse. Charles Emmanuel was Duke of Savoy when Henry IV. was King of France. Charles Emmanuel, profiting by the internal dissensions of France, endeavoured to extend the limits of his Duchy. Henry IV. attacked him, and took the whole of Savoy; but what was his policy? He was generous and politic, and having inflicted this lesson upon Charles Emmanuel returned Savoy to its Duke. How can M. Thouvenel say that "historical traditions favour the annexation of Savoy?" Louis XIII., in 1628, acting under the advice of Richelieu, also took Savoy; Hastening to Italy to arrest the progress of Austrian influence, and advancing through Savoy with the view of crossing into Italy, he demanded the passage of the Alps, then in the occupation of the Duke of Savoy. This was refused, and although defended with heroic courage, a passage was forced by the French Army through what is called the Pas de Suze. But, generous and politic, Louis XIII. did not, any more than Henri IV., seek to retain these versants Français des montagnes; but he, too, gave Savoy back to the Duke,—another conclusive proof that historical traditions are not in favour of the annexation of Savoy to France. It is only since the dynasty of Napoleon has arisen that any attempt has been made to take permanent possession of that which has for so many centuries belonged to the Dukes of Savoy. But in a despatch to M. Persigny, the French Minister particularly alludes to this question. He there says that circumstances had compelled the Emperor to interfere in Italy, and that the annexation of Savoy and Nice has been considered by several of the principal Powers of Europe as a compensation due to France. That statement is also without foundation. Castlereagh and Clancarty, Capo d'Istria and Pozzo di Borgo, were all desirous of preventing Savoy being annexed to France. I trust that the House will excuse me if I enter into the details of this question yet more at length; but I have now to inquire how the King of Piedmont could have been induced to part with those provinces which abut upon Switzerland, and which he was bound either to keep or to return to Switzerland? I maintain he has no more right to part with Savoy to the Emperor of the French than the Sovereign of this country would have to part with Gibraltar, or than Charles II. had to part with Dunkirk. It was given to him as a defence against France, and he was paid 10,000,000 francs, to fortify it, as an inducement to keep it. Count Cavour hopes the declarations of M. Thouvenel will be satisfactory to the Powers, as they are satisfactory to the Savoyards. What, I ask, is the truth of the case? The people of Savoy and of Piedmont, it is said, have given an expression to their opinion; but, Sir, I hold in my hand a manifesto and a declaration from the provinces of Haute Savoie containing some 12,000 signatures, and in a letter which accompanies that declaration, I read that those signatures comprise the bond fide names of the inhabitants of the provinces named, and they are stated, by those in authority, to be chiefly composed of small landowners and a few avocats. My correspondent adds, that the names of the Savoyards resident in Geneva are not included. A more remarkable manifestation of opinion never occurred, and its importance is increased by the fact, which has been communicated to me from Chambéry, that the French agents are doing everything in their power to get up a movement in favour of France,—Les agents de France font dans ces vallées une propagande formidable—and have bought nearly all the newspapers, which,

Sir Robert Peel

consequently, give a very false idea of the feelings and wishes of the population. I cannot understand a policy which gives liberty to Italy and destroys it in Switzerland and Savoy, and it is impossible not to contrast the conduct of the King of Piedmont in 1814 with that of the present sovereign. France had annexed Savoy in 1792, and for 22 years it had been separated from the rule of the Victor Emmanuel of that day. In 1814 the Powers had the greatest difficulty in inducing the King of Piedmont to give up a portion of his territory, upon the understanding that it should be comprised in the Swiss neutrality, because, he said, he could not think of separating himself from “old, faithful, and loyal subjects.” These are the very words. The Plenipotentiaries of the Powers addressed themselves to the King of Sardinia to obtain from him the cession of this part of his hereditary dominions, but they experienced the greatest difficulty, “dans la repugnance qu’éprouvait Victor Emmanuel de se séparer de bons anciens et fidèles sujets.” The Victor Emmanuel of the present day is ready to make any sacrifice in that respect, and I cannot help thinking that his conduct shows he is little worthy to reign over that brave and devoted race. The House of Savoy should have one resemblance to the glaciers of that country. As the glaciers take their form from the womb of the mountains out of which they burst, so the House of Savoy ought to bear the stamp of the people among whom it sprang into existence, and over whom it has reigned for so many centuries. But the hon. Member for Birmingham exclaims, “Perish Savoy!” and he says to the Savoyards, “The industry of Lyons will double your incomes, and therefore you can easily shunt your loyalty.” The hon. Member must have been thinking of the loyalty of the House of Savoy, and not of the loyalty of the people. “Perish Savoy!” I should rather say—Perish the future destinies of a Power which seeks to enlarge its boundaries by sacrificing the liberties of half a million of people who for eight centuries have been the mainstay of its existence and the rock of its defence! Savoy has been called by the Ambassador of France a barren rock. When I heard that phrase, I declared that every time I alluded to the subject, I would bring that expression to the bar of public opinion and stigmatize it as it deserves. The people, Sir, are poor, but the very rocks among which they live make them place a higher value upon liberty and independence than upon the industry of Lyons and the duplication of their incomes. I am almost afraid it is all over with Switzerland, and Savoy is already gone. A deputation from Savoy went to the Emperor to offer him the country, and it is quite amusing to read how the Emperor received this deputation. I do not know where the deputies came from, but they arrived in cabs at the Place Vendôme, dressed in the national costume. Having dined with the Emperor, they received a photograph of the Imperial Family, signed in memoriam, 24th March, and since then they have not been heard of. It is a very curious thing that the Emperor, when he received them, made a most striking remark to one of the deputies from Chablais, which is close to Switzerland. He said, "By the way, Député Savoisien, are there any barracks in your country?" "Yes, Sire," replied the deputy; and then the Emperor exclaimed, "Ah! je vais vous envoyer des troupes, dont la présence donne toujours de la vie et de l'animation aux pays." That is charming—that is the way in which the liberties of these people are going to be got rid of, and the manner in which they are to be deprived of what they at present enjoy. I am afraid that they will have but a slight enjoyment of the liberty which they expect to receive from the Emperor of the French. It is curious to observe that the family of Napoleon are always talking about liberty and national feeling. I recollect a famous letter of the first Napoleon, which was published the other day, and the present Napoleon is following precisely the policy of the dynasty. It is only surprising that we cannot be on our guard against what must be the infallible consequences if we allow that policy step by step to advance. There was a letter, which the first Napoleon wrote to his brother Joseph, who was a quiet man, and not in favour of violent measures. In this letter the first Napoleon wrote,— "Mind you favour national feeling." But, at the same time, in a private letter he said, "Crush every sign of national feeling; enfin faites brûler les maisons, trente des principaux de chaque village et distribuez leur bien à l'armée. Livrez au sac deux ou trois gros bourgs cela servira d'exemple, et rendra aux soldats de la joie et de la gaiété." These Savoyards will have to undergo the same consequences, and the people of Switzerland are in the same danger. La question Suisse, let me remind the House, is a different thing from la question Savoisienne. The question of Switzerland is one of the deepest moment. From the earliest time the President of the Swiss Confederation impressed upon Captain Harris "that it was of vital importance to the safety and independence of Switzerland that Savoy, and especially 'Haute-Savoie,' should never be annexed to France; for if that took place the flank of Switzerland would be completely open, and Geneva would inevitably follow." "We know," he added, "what passed in 1792." Why in 1792 France annexed Savoy, and in 1798 France annexed also the town and territory of Geneva. The President of the Swiss Confederation clearly foresaw that this must happen again. The hon. Member for Birmingham has said that Savoy is politically worthless. That expression shall not go forth without correction, and so I have quoted what the President of the Swiss Confederation says with regard to the annexation of Savoy to France. Louis Napoleon in one of his writings says, "Not only will Savoy augment the French territory, but it will open the great Simplon road, and give to France la liberté des Alpes, et en cas de guerre un magnifique champ de bataille pour une lutte offensive et défensive." When the first Napoleon annexed Savoy, did he think it unimportant? This only shows how the hon. Member for Birmingham makes statements without the slightest foundation. The first Napoleon, directly after he took Savoy, he himself stated that he considered the occupation of Switzerland as a thing absolutely necessary on military grounds, and he came to the same conclusion on political grounds. For these reasons he commenced his intrigues against Switzerland, occupied its cantons and laid contributions on them, seized the public treasure, the Government funds, plundered the magazines and arsenals of stores of all descriptions in fact, according to official documents he robbed Berne alone of no less than 45,000,000 francs. Can Switzerland forget the horrors inflicted by the French troops? Can the Swiss ever forget how Brune, Schauenberg, and Rapinat, generals under the direction of Bonaparte, behaved towards them. Can Europe forget that Bonaparte, before the close of that very year 1798, compelled the Swiss to grant him two roads for the passage of his army, one by the Lake of Constance, the other the route du Simplon through the Canton of Vallais. It is singular that while the President of the Swiss Confederation was continually pointing out to Captain Harris that there was great danger for Switzerland; that Captain Harris, on the other hand, replied that there was no occasion for alarm; that no change would take place of a neutral territory without the entire consent of the parties to the treaties. The President of the Swiss Confederacy, however, insisted upon the danger, and said that without consulting the Powers these important provinces would be annexed. On the 19th January, Captain Harris wrote to the noble Lord, describing the fears of the President; but he added that he (Captain Harris) had told the President that he ought to have confidence in the opinions expressed by Her Majesty's Government. Events have shown that, whatever confidence he might have had in the assurances of Her Majesty's Government, the result to the independence of the country from the aggression of France is likely to be most fatal. Very great satisfaction has, indeed, been afforded by the answer given by the noble Secretary for Foreign Affairs to a question I put to him sometime back. I asked the noble Lord whether the Government were prepared to abandon the neutrality of Switzerland as guaranteed by Great Britain in common with the other Powers, and the noble Lord replied in language worthy of himself and his country,

Sir Robert Peel

"That the Swiss Government have asked us whether, in case of such annexation (of Savoy), we are prepared to maintain the neutrality of Switzerland, and to provide in such a manner that the neutrality should in no way be injured, and we have always replied that we have determined to do so; that Chablais and Faucigny were parts of the general arrangements for the guarantee of Switzerland; and that if separated from Sardinia they ought to be annexed to Switzerland."

It is a curious thing that M. Thouvenel at one time made the same assertion—I have forgotten the date, but I think it was on the 5th of February—for he told Earl Cowley that if Savoy should be united to France the provinces of Chablais and Faucigny should go to Switzerland. But the French Government and M. Thouvenel have strangely changed their opinions; and in point of fact it is impossible to expect them to abide for one week by their declarations. One of the most unworthy documents I ever cast my eye over is the answer of M. Thouvenel to M. Turgot at

Berne. He says, for instance, that the principle of sovereignty implies the right of the sovereign of any nation, from whatever motive, to cede the whole or any part of his states, and that none would be justified in opposing such measures unless they should result in a disturbance of the balance of power in Europe. This is a most extraordinary doctrine to hold in the middle of the nineteenth century. That a sovereign should be entitled to give away his people as he may desire—can this be maintained in the nineteenth century? It is a re-establishment of the divine right of kings; and I, for one, will never give my adhesion to a principle which gives up a people who have for centuries been accustomed to the enjoyment of liberty into the hands of a man who governs under the most severe of despotisms and for the most ambitious purposes. M. Thouvenel said the neutralization of the districts in question had not been originally arranged with a view to the protection of the Swiss frontier, because that was sufficiently defended by an impassable barrier. This means the neutrality guaranteed by Europe. Nothing can be more futile than such an assertion. I will not, however, enter more fully into the question. But I am bound to say that I think we should interfere, if we can, at the present moment. I do not like to see this country interfere in matters in which its interests are not concerned. For instance, there was recently an attempted interference between Spain and Morocco. I do not approve that. Again, there are some passages in the despatches of Mr. Elliot from Naples which I think are far from satisfactory. On one occasion Mr. Elliot tells the King that such and such a thing has occurred. The King says that his Ministers have told him just the contrary, upon which Mr. Elliot replies in the most overbearing manner, that what the Neapolitan Ministers say does not matter to him; the King may believe that what he has told him is the case. Into the Neapolitan question I do not wish to enter, but the position assumed by our representative cannot, I think, be altogether justified. But the hon. Member (Mr. Bright) says that England has always ignominiously failed in the exercise of its influence with foreign countries. I do not agree with him. Did Mr. Pitt ignominiously fail when he endeavoured to use the influence of this country in Europe? Did Lord Castlereagh, did Mr. Canning, did the Earl of Aberdeen, did Sir Stratford

Canning ignominiously fail? In 1830 Viscount Palmerston was Foreign Minister. I allude to an historical circumstance, and therefore mention the noble Lord's name. He did not ignominiously fail in making the influence of England felt in Europe. The question of Belgium had then to be treated, and, through the influence of England and of Europe, Belgium has for thirty years enjoyed the blessings of constitutional Government, under a wise and liberal Sovereign. Again, did Viscount Palmerston fail, during 1838-9 and '40 in making the influence of this country felt as regards the affairs of the East? Then I say that what we want now is a generous and a vigorous protest on the part of the British Government. I recollect in 1847, when the question of Cracow arose, the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) made a protest, from which I wish to read a sentence. He said:—

“ I consider that in late transactions in Europe, although on more than one occasion, and by different Powers, our wishes have not been complied with, our desires have not been listened to, our protests may have been disregarded, yet there does remain with us a moral strength nothing can take away. . . . We are ready in the face of Europe, however inconvenient some of those stipulations may be, to hold ourselves bound by all our engagements to keep the same and the name and the honour of the Crown of England unsullied, and to guard that unsullied honour as a jewel which we will not have tarnished.” [3 Hansard, xc., 894.]

That was the protest of the noble Lord against the conduct of the three Powers in 1847 with regard to Cracow, and I hope to see that the English Government has not retrograded since then. I hope also to see a vigorous protest from this House. We are not, as the French paper said, the nominees, the écuyers, and the chambellans of an Imperial Court, but we are the free Parliament of a free people. This House is a great assembly, and ought to exercise the rights which belong to it as the representative of a great country. We have always been battling against France. It has been the policy of this country to counteract the policy of France, and we have done so successfully. We checked the aggression of Louis XIV. and of Louis XV.; we curbed the ambition of the First Napoleon, and are now called upon to check the unhappy policy which the present Emperor of the French seems desirous of inaugurating. I hope the Emperor will not, like his uncle, curse Europe with the destruction and the desolation which swept over its face in the last great war. If he does, and if we resist him, our quarrel will be a just, our cause a good one, and worthy of this country. Shakspeare says,— “ Thrice is he arm'd who hath his quarrel just,

Sir Robert Peel

And he but naked, though lock'd up in steel, Whose conscience with injustice is corrupted.”

I believe that to be the corruption which now infects the Imperial policy; and that injustice sooner or later will bear bitter fruits in the retributive condemnation with which it will be met. This very night I have been told that perhaps there may yet be some hope for Switzerland, and that the union of Chablais and Faucigny with France is not yet accomplished. If that be so, I ask the House to join me in a protest which shall vindicate the interest and the liberties of Switzerland. I ask the House to allow me to be its interpreter on this occasion in favour of a liberty-loving nation and of a most loyal Republic. I ask it to allow me by anticipation to give expression to its feelings, and I think the House will then concur with me when I say in the name of public opinion in this country, that upon every principle of justice, of honour, and of right it is absolutely necessary that these provinces should be annexed to Switzerland, or otherwise you will infallibly see that Republic sink into the lowest depths to which it can descend, the consequence of its absorption into the Imperial domains, and of its subjection to the Imperial dynasty of France.

Question, “ That the House, at its rising, do adjourn till Monday next,” put and negatived.

INCOME TAX BILL.

CONSIDERED AS AMENDED.—ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [29th March, “ That the Bill as amended in the Committee, be now taken into consideration.”]

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. DISRAELI said, it would be convenient to know when the Government intended that the adjournment for the Easter holidays should take place.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON replied, that the Government hoped to move the adjournment of the House on Tuesday next, if the state of business would allow it, but at all events Wednesday.

MR. BRIGHT said, he had a suggestion to make to the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) respecting the state of public business. It was unfortunate that the Budget, involving as it did an unusual number of questions, should be mixed up with the question of Reform; and he suggested that it would be better to go on with the Budget and get all those subjects disposed of, and then proceed with the Reform Bill from day to day. He knew that the Reform Bill was put off until after Easter, but the same difficulty might occur then, unless some such plan were adopted. The repeated adjournments which had taken place of late were not just to the Government, to the House, nor to the question of Reform.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the course which the hon. Gentleman recommended was that which he intended to take. He proposed to fix the Reform Bill for the 19th or 20th of April. By that time he hoped that the principal questions involved in the Budget would be gone through, and it would not be advisable to postpone the Reform Bill any longer. The second reading of the measure would then be taken, and at the end of April he hoped they might go into Committee. When the adjourned debate was resumed it would certainly continue from day to day on the evenings at the disposal of the Government.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he would remind the noble Lord that an important Bill—the Church Rate Bill—was fixed for Thursday, the 19th of April.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, in that case, he would fix the Reform Bill for Friday, the 20th.

Question put, and agreed to.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he rose to take the opportunity of protesting against the unfair taxation to which Ireland was subjected as compared with England, and which was quite opposed to the spirit and the terms of the Act of Union. The revenue derived from Ireland last year was £7,000,000, but that did not represent the whole of Ireland's contributions to the Imperial exchequer. Nearly all the articles paying Customs' and Excise duties consumed in Ireland were imported from England, where those duties were paid, and were included in the taxation of England, but, of course, the Irish consumer was the person who really paid them. The amount of those duties could not be less than £2,000,000, making £9,000,000 of taxation; but to that was to be added at least £4,000,000 drawn annually from Ireland and spent in England by absentee proprietors, thus making a total drain of £13,000,000 from Ireland. Then, again, as to the expenditure, he found that nearly all the great Government establishments were in England, and the money paid to support them was again distributed over the country. He found by a Report laid before Parliament, that after paying for the different charges of Government in Ireland, no less than £2,252,000 was remitted to this country, leaving still a balance of about £1,000,000 to the credit of Ireland. By the Act of Union, the debts of the two countries were to be kept separate, but since 1824 no distinction had been made. He knew it was said to be productive of real amity between the two kingdoms that all distinctions should cease; but while he desired a real union he did not wish it to be upon the basis of considering Ireland as a province of England. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had talked of the increase of wealth as justifying the increase of the income tax, but he (Colonel Dunne) denied that there was any increase of wealth in Ireland. He found from the Returns that between 1854 and 1859, although there had been an increase upon schedule A, there had been a decrease upon schedules B, C, and D. He therefore totally denied that the prosperity of Ireland was increasing after the ratio mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman. There was actually—astounding as might be the fact—500,000 acres less land cultivated now than were under cultivation in 1847. It might be true that the farms were larger, but making them so had added to the misery of the people by necessitating evictions. Had commerce advanced in Ireland? At that moment the value of the exports and imports did not amount to more than £300,000. No doubt there had been an increase in the trade with England, for if there had been no such increase there would be no prosperity whatever. It was, however, remarkable, that the foreign exports and imports from and to Ireland were considerably less now than in 1790, ten years before the Union. At that time they were then no less than £1,000,000. Where, then, was the enormous prosperity of Ireland, which was to entitle the right hon. Gentleman to add to its taxation? There was no ground on which to base it, nor any reason to suppose that the people were more able to pay it than they had formerly been. It was true that they had removed the duties on butter and some other things. The value of the butter exported from Ireland was about £1,000,000. That was the trade between England and Ireland chiefly; but by the removal of differential duties they had admitted the competition of all the world. In other words there was free trade. In these days the mere mention of free trade seemed to be an excuse for everything, and that was the great cry which had been raised to force through the late commercial treaty with France, by which she gained and England lost everything. But then it was said, "O, this tax is necessary for increasing our defences." What had they added, he would ask, to the defences of Ireland? Had they sent her a single additional gun or raised a single additional fort? They were not even allowed to raise volunteer corps in that country. Why did not the Government, if they distrusted the Irish, tell them so at once. Yet there was no part of the British nation more loyal or more willing to come forward in defence of the country than were the Irish. The Irish, besides, had no occasion for that extraordinary preparation for defence. They had never nourished a feeling of national antipathy to the French; on the contrary, there were reminiscences and associations which connected almost every family in Ireland with France, and there was not that hostile feeling which continual wars had fostered between England and France. While, therefore, he asserted that the agricultural wealth and commercial prosperity of Ireland were not such as to justify the imposition of an additional income tax, he asserted also that there were not sound reasons for the expenditure of large sums for defence in that country. If, however, war broke out between France and England, the Irish would readily assist in the defence of England, although they objected to pay additional taxation for purposes of defence—not in Ireland, but in England. He hoped that ere long every Irish Member would come to Parliament pledged to settle the fair proportion of taxation to be borne by Ireland; but, until that arrangement was made, every Irishman ought to object to any additional taxation whatever. He submitted that it was high time that taxation as between Ireland and England should be settled on a proper basis, because at present he was perfectly satisfied that they paid what was not fair. Those were Irish considerations; but he thought also that there were strong reasons why this additional income tax should not be imposed upon England in order to fill up the deficiency occasioned by the repeal of the paper duty. Indeed, he had strong doubts whether the right hon. Gentleman would be able to pass his Paper Duty Repeal Bill without imposing a foreign import duty. He warned the Chancellor of the Exchequer that there was not then the same disposition in favour of his Commercial Treaty with France as existed two or three weeks previously, before the nature of the bargain was fully known, and before the manifestation of French policy in the annexation of Savoy, which had created universal distrust. He reminded the House that not only had France gained everything in the Treaty, but that for years she had snatched at and obtained every commercial advantage, while she had surrendered none. The people of this country were, therefore, not so favourably disposed towards the Treaty, and did not see why—for the very problematical advantages this country was to receive—an additional income tax should be levied, in direct contradiction to the assurance given in former years by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it should come off in 1860. The subject was, therefore, a fair one for reconsideration, and he proposed that the income tax should be 9*d.* instead of 10*d.*

Colonel Dunne

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 3, to leave out the words "Ten Pence," and insert the words "Nine Pence," instead thereof.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was afraid the hon. and gallant Gentleman had anticipated the view which Her Majesty's Government must necessarily take of the Motion he had made. His speech was broader and larger in its views than altogether suited the occasion, and, on the other hand, his Motion, though one of great importance, did not seem to belong to his speech. The gist of the gallant Gentleman's speech was, that there was no cause for assuming the capacity of Ireland to bear equal taxation, and that Ireland had a right to complain of being subject to the same taxation as England. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) should say at once that it was a legitimate course for the gallant Gentleman to bring that reasoning under the consideration of Parliament, but he did not raise the proper issue in moving a universal reduction of the tax. The logical sequence from his premises would have been to introduce a distinction in favour of Ireland in proposing an income tax. Not that such a Motion would have met with a more ready assent from the Government, because he was prepared to contend that there was no real equality of rights and liberties without an equality of taxation, and he must say that the manner in which the income tax had all along been borne by Ireland showed that the people there were well aware that that was a sound political doctrine, and that exemptions and privileges granted to a country in matters of taxation were nothing more than the note of political depression and degradation. The Government always set out with assuming that it was the intention of the House to maintain the public credit and to provide so much revenue as would be necessary to meet the estimated expenditure. On that principle they could not part with the penny which the gallant Gentleman proposed to take off the tax without leaving the exchequer involved in a probable deficiency; at a time, too, when the expenditure was more than usually uncertain; because, though we were not in a state of war, yet we had a military expedition on hand which might issue in war at a distant part of the globe, and if it did issue in war there would be an imperative call for a considerable expenditure for that purpose. The provision already made for that expedition was very considerable, and in that event it would have to be increased still more. He thought it enough to state, what was undeniable, that according to all the best estimates that could be formed of the revenue and expenditure of the year, the loss of £850,000 in round numbers, which the Motion of the gallant Gentleman would cause, if carried, would leave the Government in a deficiency of about £500,000. It was true that in his speech on the Budget in the beginning of February, he assumed a surplus of £460,000, yet since then some few of the proposed minor charges had been modified, which would reduce the surplus to £360,000, and if £850,000 more was deducted there would be a deficit of half a million. He was convinced it was not the wish of the gallant Gentleman to assist in bringing about such a result. He hoped the gallant Gentleman would not believe that he was slighting his Motion. The whole argument, in fact, as he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had just stated it, was summed up in a couple of sentences, and it was his duty to oppose the Motion.

Question, "That the words 'Ten Pence' stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he rose to beg leave to modify Clause 8 in such a way as that incomes under £150 a year should be exempted from income tax. When this tax was first proposed by Sir Robert Peel he considered it would be an act of great oppression to impose it upon incomes under £150, and this exemption continued from 1841 to 1853, although several renewals took place by different Governments in the course of that period. In the year 1853 the right hon. Gentleman brought forward a great financial scheme in which he proposed reductions of taxation on several articles which entered largely into the consumption of the great mass of the common people, and he made out that those reductions would, in the consumption of ordinary families, more than counterbalance the imposition of 5*d.* in the pound on incomes between £100 and £150. The right hon. Gentleman carried the House with him; but what was the consequence? In less than twelve months the taxes on the necessaries of life were increased to an enormous extent, as well as the tax upon incomes between £100 and £150, so that all the principles upon which the right hon. Gentleman obtained the sanction of the House were completely violated. In 1853 the tax was 5*d.* in the pound, but now in the year 1860—when, according to the promise of the right hon. Gentleman, the income tax was to cease altogether—it was made 7*d.* in the pound on those incomes, and the taxes on the necessaries of life, such as tea, were kept considerably above what he had proposed. There were several classes, such as labouring men who worked extra time, clerks, small tradesmen, clergymen, and retired officers of the army and navy, to whom this tax was a severe burden, and greatly interfered with the maintenance of a respectable position, and even with the education of their children. But what was the cause for those taxes? It was to be found in this, that the Estimate for this year for the army and navy amounted to £18,000,000 more than had been required by the most eminent men that ever governed this country,—Sir Robert Peel and the Duke of Wellington. The necessity for this increase of £18,000,000 he believed nobody, except Her Majesty's Government, understood. Probably they had an apprehension of a war; but, if war should arise, they might come down then and ask for an increased grant from the House. Now, if the right hon. Gentleman would allow the Army Estimates to be referred to an impartial Committee, he (Mr. Williams) would undertake to show that a reduction might be effected without lessening the strength or efficiency of the army in any respect. And he would say the same of the Miscellaneous Estimates. For these reasons he begged to move the modification of which he had spoken, and he should take the sense of the House upon it.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 37, after the words "one hundred," to insert the words "and fifty."

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, there could be no doubt of the extreme pressure of this tax on the lower class of incomes. He wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he contemplated the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the inequalities in the operation of the tax. Some such course ought to be pursued, for the present Budget left the tax in a most uncomfortable position. The extremely unequal pressure of the tax on all property in Schedule A was indisputable. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had himself proved that the 7*d.* income tax was nearly a 9*d.* tax on property under that schedule; and he believed that the 10*d.* rate about to be imposed would operate at the present moment as a rate of 1*s.* on all real property. In a town in which he was himself interested—Leamington—there were two rentals in the ratebook—one the net and the other the gross rental. Those who paid upon the gross rental paid, in point of fact, a tax upon a tax—they paid not merely upon their income, but upon their income and taxes as well. Under the exigency of war an income tax might be tolerated, and even in peace a small tax of, say, 5*d.* in the pound, might be borne; but to levy so heavy and unequal a tax as 10*d.* in time of peace upon all incomes was contrary to the first principles of justice. He trusted, therefore, that the Government would announce their intention of endeavouring to grapple with the subject, and remove at least some of the most glaring injustices.

MR. HUBBARD said, he thought that to enter upon any one or two or three of the many anomalies of the income tax would simply be to detract from that inquiry which must take place at a future period, and which ought to be attended with greater deliberation than could then be given to the subject. At that juncture a lengthened debate on the subject would be neither for the interest or convenience of the country, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer was so situated that the passing of this measure was a matter of necessity. He trusted, however, that the right hon. Gentleman would give the House some information as to the feelings with which the tax was viewed by the Government. It was a grave consideration that the income tax was about to be imposed for one year only. That a tax producing £10,000,000 or £11,000,000, so full of injustice that no statesman could justify it, should be levied for only one year, was a state of things productive of much apprehension, and the House ought to know by what means the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to provide at the end of the year for the revenue of the country. The Motion of the hon. Member for Lambeth was objectionable because its effect would be materially to lessen the productiveness of the tax, which the right hon. Gentleman could very ill afford. He objected to the Motion, however, upon principle. He thought that where the wages of unskilled labour ceased, and higher wages began to represent a combination of skill and capital, there Parliament might begin to levy an income tax. The incidence of the tax might fairly begin at £100, and the interval between £100 and £150 was, he thought, not unwisely chargeable with a diminished ratio of tax as compared with incomes exceeding £150. The House had nothing to do now but to pass the Bill and to assist the Government out of the difficulty in which they had placed themselves by the unwise remission of indirect taxation. He trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would concur on some subsequent day in the appointment of a Committee of Inquiry, who might recommend some revision of the tax, so as to make it less objectionable, for use it at present he feared we must.

Mr. W. Williams

MR. ROEBUCK said, he had no doubt the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer wanted the money, and that the House must provide for its payment; but still he would point out to the right hon. Gentleman something of the injustice he was about to commit, not intentionally, but of necessity, and thus he (Mr. Roebuck) would show the justice of the proposition made by the hon. Member for

Lambeth. The income tax was most incomplete and unequal in its operation. Take, for instance, a man possessed of many thousands in the funds, or so many acres of land, and then place under the operation of the schedule a man of brains, making £5,000 a year—and that was a high figure for a man of brains to make, let him be either a physician or a lawyer. Suppose the latter to go on from day to day, perhaps from year to year, and then all upon a sudden there came upon him a fit of apoplexy. He was destroyed, and his £5,000 a year melted to nothing, and though he might have been living like a man of £5,000 a year from land, he was from that moment rendered null and nothing. Then the lower they came, and the smaller the sum taxed, the greater was the injustice inflicted. A man who had only £150 a year spent that £150. Compare that man with the artizan. He was obliged to make an appearance in the world. Suppose that he had a family—a wife and two or three children—he must live in a particular kind of house and maintain a certain kind of appearance, and it would be found that at the end of each year his £150 had disappeared. If the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer taxed this man upon his outgoings by indirect taxes he would get out of his income all that he could. By the income tax he cut off a portion of that man's enjoyment, but it did not increase the sum in the Treasury by one penny, because the tax had diminished his power of contributing to the indirect taxation. He would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman as he had done before, though he knew his necessities were quite equal to those of the men whose cause he (Mr. Roebuck) was endeavouring to advocate. He knew the Chancellor of the Exchequer was in a most pitiable condition, and that he was providing from hand to mouth. This year he made an effort—grand he (Mr. Roebuck) would allow, pertinacious everybody would acknowledge, and successful he hoped it might be. What might follow next year? He hoped it would not be the injustice of the present year. He wished the right hon. Gentleman would draw a distinction which he (Mr. Roebuck) had pressed on the late Sir R. Peel, when that great Minister first introduced the income tax to the House. He (Mr. Roebuck) pressed upon him the justice of making a distinction in the charge on the income of men of skill, art, and science, and that on men of fixed income. Sir R. Peel told him plainly that he could not answer him, but he wanted the money. He would acknowledge the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer felt the same necessity at that time, but he hoped for some more justice hereafter. The Chancellor of the Exchequer pounced upon the poor clerk, upon the poor gentleman, who was obliged to keep up an appearance in the world; he fixed his fangs upon him, and made him writhe and twist in very agony while he took from him, perhaps, his last shilling. The right hon. Gentleman could however draw from the country an equal income without producing the same injustice, and he (Mr. Roebuck) hoped next year to see the right hon. Gentleman in his present seat, though in these times the transitions of governments were so frequent that no man knew what might come to pass, and he would entreat of him meanwhile to consider the circumstances of this tax.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he would suggest that orders should be given to the assessors to do their duty with all possible forbearance. Nothing could be more disagreeable to gentlemen who acted as Commissioners of the income tax in the country than the ordeal which small tradesmen had to undergo before them under cross-examination. The grocer was required to disclose all his transactions both with his customers and with the wholesale dealer. The publican, in the same way, had to give the quantity of beer and spirits, and the profits were then calculated. The same with the baker and his transactions with the miller. Such a mode of examination was painful to everybody, while it was lowering to the character of the Government that imposed the tax. A small amount of forbearance on the part of the assessor would afford a considerable mitigation of the grievance. He knew it was a great difficulty to make the income tax palatable to any one. But the word of a gentleman or a merchant was taken without question, whereas these country traders, with small incomes, were rigorously examined. In short the tax was most obnoxious from its inquisitorial character.

MR. BARROW said, he was most anxious that the incidence of the tax should undergo a thorough investigation, with a view to relieve incomes between £100 and £200 from paying the full rate of income tax. He suggested to the Government that it was desirable such an investigation should take place in the course of the present year, in order that they might have an opportunity of considering the proportions in which the tax should be levied in a future year.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he wished to remind the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) that he would have saved himself and the public business much inconvenience had he consented to the appointment of the Select Committee which he (Mr. P. Urquhart) had proposed at the beginning of the Session. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would see that the sooner he consented to the appointment of that Select Committee the better. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. W. Williams) that incomes of £150 a year deserved the greatest commiseration, for to make use of the words of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham) there was no class of society which felt the pressure of the income tax more than that "where the fustian jacket ends and the cloth coat begins." He sincerely hoped that a Select Committee might be appointed as soon after Easter as possible, with a view to soften the inequalities of the tax, so generally complained of.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, he would suggest that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should take into consideration the propriety of adopting the scheme proposed by Sir Robert Inglis some years ago to the effect, that relief should be given to small incomes by applying the tax only to the amount by which they exceeded the point of exemption. In this way, if a person had £150 a year, £100 would be deducted, and he would be taxed only on £50, and the same rule would apply to other incomes up to a certain amount. If that proposal were applied to incomes up to £300 or £400, it would afford great relief to those persons to whom allusion had been made, namely, clerks, clergymen, and others, whose small incomes were so deeply affected by this tax.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, that before he gave his vote he should like to know what difference was likely to be effected if the Motion of the hon. Member for Lambeth were carried. He (Mr. Sheridan) was of opinion the difference would be in amount almost equal to that given away by the repeal of the paper duty, if not a great deal more.

MR. PEASE said, he entirely sympathized with the views and arguments of the hon. Member for Lambeth, and would be most happy if he could relieve from the pressure of income tax those who were immediately contemplated by his Motion. But then they were in duty to the country bound to maintain the Budget which had been brought in by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, based on certain principles, and on that ground he should reluctantly be compelled to vote against him. He had another reason. The House was to a certain extent guilty of great extravagance, and he did not care how universal was the outcry against taxation re-echoed in that House if it would only lead to something like care in the public expenditure.

Mr. Barrow

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Without referring to all the statements and arguments that have been urged in the course of this conversation, I will ask the permission of the House to allude to some of the principal points that have been raised; and, first, I will take the appeal of my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard). He absolves the Government from the duty of shadowing out their policy for seven years to come, but confidently hopes they may not refuse to sketch out the general view of what they are likely to propose in 1861. Now, in point of fact, if we were in a condition which would permit us to state by anticipation what we were likely to do in 1861, perhaps we should not find it so difficult to go further; but the truth is this, that in times when the expenditure of the country is in a stable and what may be called normal condition—when you have no reason from the state of public affairs and the public mind to anticipate any great change in the scale of national expenditure, nothing could be more reasonable than to endeavour to form plans for a more extended future than that of twelve months only with respect to taxation, and to sketch out its probable operation and effects; for then you have got a certain basis to work upon, inasmuch as the expenditure of the country must regulate the amount of taxes to be imposed. Those who think that the expenditure of the country is now in a normal state, may very well draw from that opinion the further conclusion that it is reasonable to assume that the expenditure is a fixed quantity, and that a permanent provision may be made for it accordingly. But that is not my view. I do not assume that our expenditure is in a normal state. I doubt the wisdom, I doubt the safety, I doubt the possibility, without serious danger to the country, of continuing such an expenditure in time of peace; and on that account the Government have not thought it wise to attempt to sketch at the present moment the future of the case when the most important elements are necessarily in a state of some uncertainty. For that reason I think it impossible to venture on any distinct indication of what might be the view of Government, supposing them to hold office twelve months hence, with respect to the expenditure at the time which will then have arrived.

Then, with respect to another point of great importance, namely, the inequalities of the income tax, which has been raised and discussed by the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir H. Willoughby), the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), and others, I have only to say that in the main I admit what is stated with respect to those inequalities. I think, however, that upon a minute and careful examination, we shall find that other taxes have likewise many gross inequalities in their operation, which, however, are veiled and concealed in a very considerable degree; while those of the income tax have, at any rate, the merit of being tolerably patent on an examination of the case. Apart from the great and vital question whether it is just to tax incomes at a uniform rate without any reference to how far they are permanent, there are great inequalities in the income tax. If you take the single case of Schedule A, there is a great inequality between houses on the one hand and lands on the other; and house property, no doubt, is much more severely taxed than landed property. If, again, you take house property of different classes there is very great inequality; because the repairs of houses, according to their condition, and the period at which they were built, according to climate and exposure, and many other circumstances, will vary from 5 to 25 or 30 per cent. Now, the question is asked whether Government are prepared, on their own responsibility, to propose a Committee to inquire into the income tax with a view to the removal of these inequalities. I am bound to say, on the part of the Government, that we are not prepared to propose any such inquiry, and for a reason which I will distinctly state to the House. I do not think it the duty of the Government to submit, on their own responsibility, the subject of a great, gigantic tax like this to the scrutiny of a Committee of the House of Commons with a view to the removal of certain evils and defects, unless the Government be conscientiously persuaded that it is in their power to make proposals to the Committee and lay plans before them which are likely to undergo the ordeal of examination and issue in the removal, or at any rate in a great modification of the defects and evils of the tax. If we could see our way to such a result, I admit nothing would be more rational than to invite the attention of a Select Committee to this subject. But we do not see our way to such a result, and, until we do, I think it will be admitted that it would be an unworthy attempt to escape from our proper responsibility and catch popularity by encouraging an expectation with regard to our own views and opinions as to the income tax, which the issue might not fairly justify. But what has been stated with respect to inquiry during the present Session has been this—There are many Members of this House, hon. Gentlemen of experience and ability, who represent large bodies of the people, who are more sanguine in their views with regard to the great question of the reconstruction of the income tax than the Ministers of the Crown now happen to be; and it is my duty, on the part of the Government, to state that we look on the position of the House of Commons, with respect to an inquiry of this kind, as by no means the same with that of the Government; because, if there be a strong desire on the part of the country, and a large portion of the House to institute an inquiry of this kind, the legitimacy of the object—namely, the removal of the inequalities of the tax being admitted, it may be very proper that such a desire be gratified, and such a Committee be instituted. Under these circumstances, therefore, the Government would certainly not think it their duty to oppose any resistance to the appointment of a Committee. In 1851, when my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary was at the head of the Government, such a Committee was instituted, although I am not aware that any sanguine expectations or definite view were then entertained that it would be practicable to reconstruct the tax or the mode of assessment, but the question was very properly and becomingly submitted to the House of Commons; and always assuming that the Committee will be composed of men of sincerity of purpose, who will go fully into the question, and develop the whole difficulties of the case with the view to find out, if possible, a good plan which they may recommend, whatever the result may be, that will of itself do something to give contentment and satisfaction to the country, which never expects of its representatives more than what is practicable relief. That is the position of the Government with regard to the appointment of a Committee of Inquiry into the income tax. There are two great questions that may be raised besides those of the inequality and justice of the income tax—one is the adjustment of the schedules according to the nature of the income which those schedules represent; and the other is the exemption, or partial exemption, of lower incomes from taxation. The question of the adjustment of schedules, opened to-night by several hon. Gentlemen, is one which would no doubt come under the view of a Committee, and would probably be one of the principal objects of the Committee. Upon that, however, I do not feel it necessary to enter, especially as it has been my duty at other times to trouble the House at great length by stating in very full detail the reasons why I am not prepared to be responsible for making any proposal to that effect.

With respect to the other subject—that of the Amendment now before us—the hon. Member for Lambeth has moved that we should make a total exemption of all incomes under £150. An hon. Gentleman has asked, and asked very properly, what difference the Amendment would make in the receipts of the tax. The hon. Member for Lambeth is perfectly convinced that the practical effect would be such a reduction of expenditure as would render the adoption of his Amendment entirely innocuous. I do not doubt the honesty of his conviction, but what likelihood is there that he will succeed this Session in imparting the same conviction to the majority of this House, so as to induce them to adopt in a working form such a reduction of expenditure? I cannot, therefore, say I am prepared to part with some £500,000 or £600,000 a year on the speculation that the hon. Gentleman will be able to bewitch the House into doing with extraordinary celerity what seems so impracticable. I must be content, then, to meet the proposal by saying that its adoption would impale the financial provision for the service of the year, and leave a balance on the wrong side of the account. I think we could not estimate the loss to the revenue from this proposal at less than £600,000 a year; and I am afraid that amount could only be made up by what I am almost afraid to mention—a further addition to the tax on the other classes of incomes. I admit that this Motion is not to be disposed of by a simple reference to temporary difficulties. It practically involves the most painful portion of the whole case. Everybody must feel that perhaps the most dangerous of all propositions that could be made in a country like this would be an attempt upon abstract principles to devise a graduated tax on incomes, aiming at an adjustment of different rates of assessment, according to the means of the taxpayer. On the other hand, to a very limited extent, and cautiously guarded by wisdom and experience, the income tax does contain, and always has contained, a principle of total or partial relief in favour of the most numerous class in the community. The hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard) said that the limit of £100 a year is the dividing line between skilled and unskilled labour. I think it would be more just to say it is, on the whole, the point that divides between the labouring classes, who subsist on weekly wages, and those who derive their subsistence either from property or from labour employed in other forms. From the time when the income tax was first introduced by Mr. Pitt down to the year 1815, when it underwent considerable alteration, the principle of remission was applied up to a point higher than that which it now applies, because at present everybody with £150 a year and upwards pays the maximum rate, whereas, until 1815, there were remissions for incomes under certain schedules up to £200 a year. Without giving countenance to the general principle of a graduated tax, it may yet always be a question for fair consideration by the House up to what point total or partial exemption should be carried, subject, however, to the most vigilant maintenance of the rule that we will, on the whole, confine ourselves within the limits which our forefathers adopted for themselves, because prescription and experience are better guides in determining what is safe than any abstract idea or opinion of the moment. When he introduced the present income tax, in 1842, Sir Robert Peel, in lieu of the old system of exemp-

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

tions, adopted one fixed limit of £150 a year. That plan was recommended by simplicity of operation, and also by the circumstances under which the tax was reimposed, the rate being moderate, and there being an obvious prospect—which was afterwards realized—that at the end of a certain number of years the House might be enabled to dispense with it if they thought fit. In 1853 the aspect of things had materially changed, and there was not the same probability that the tax might be got rid of at an early period. There was, then, an impatience of the impost on the part of those who were paying it; and, on a careful examination of the effect produced on the expenditure of different classes by the large remissions of duties that had taken place since 1842, it was found that the saving to those whose incomes were between £100 and £150, as the consequence of the new commercial policy, was so large as to render it only just that they should be called upon to bear their fair share of this national burden. In the main, I think, the same thing still holds good. It would be inflicting, not remedying, an injustice to pretend now to revert to the form of the tax introduced by Sir Robert Peel, and to say that all those receiving less than £150 a year have derived so little from the remission of duties, and are so unable to pay, that they shall be relieved altogether, but that all those receiving above £150 have derived so much benefit from that remission, and are so well able to pay, that they shall be left liable to the maximum amount. I do not think that would be a reform or improvement in the incidence of the tax at the lower extremity of the scale, where, unquestionably, its chief difficulty arises. The discussion, however, of changes in the form of a tax is more opportune when you are proposing to renew it for a term of years, instead of, as in this case, merely for a twelvemonth. Another mode of remission suggested by the hon. Member for Hertfordshire (Sir M. Farquhar) is, that a sheer deduction of a certain amount from the lower incomes should be made, leaving the residue subject to assessment. That proposal likewise deserves a careful consideration, if the House should entertain any plan for mitigating the burden on the lower incomes. Something, however, may be said against it. No doubt, as has been stated, it would be satisfactory to a man with £105 a year to know that he had to pay on the odd £5 only; but those charged with the care of the public revenue would hardly view the matter in the same light, for such a tax would not nearly cover the expense of collection. When Sir R. Inglis proposed a deduction of that kind his idea was to apply it to all incomes, those of the millionnaire included. But it can hardly be said that the circumstances of a man with many thousands a year required that £100 or £150 should be deducted from his assessment. Such a principle is obviously absurd, and would only inflict a great loss on the Exchequer without good reason. My hon. Friend, however, proposes that this deduction should only be made on incomes up to £300 a year. That would not avoid the difficulty, that a man with a lower income will be richer than a man with a higher income, because, if at present the man with £99 a year is not so rich as the man with £100, the same thing will happen if your transition point is fixed between £299 and £300. A person once made the statement to me that his employers, without his solicitation, fixed his salary at £149 that he might escape this tax at the time when it did not go below £150. This man, taking a very strict view of his obligations, insisted on paying up his arrears of the tax for all the years during which that arrangement was in force, and he even offered to give the Government interest on the money besides. Certainly that was a very remarkable case of conscientiousness. I think I have given conclusive reasons why we should not now entertain any proposal of this kind, and why, if we ever do entertain it, we should follow the safe guidance of experience and tradition rather than lay down new and arbitrary methods of settlement.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I am hardly satisfied with the tone of the right hon. Gentleman respecting the tax now under consideration. The trumpeter gives an uncertain sound. The right hon. Gentleman appears to be quite prepared to assent to, though not to propose, the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the character and incidence of the income tax. He says that ten years ago, when the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs was First Minister, such a Committee was proposed and carried in this House. It is quite true. The tax had then been some ten years in existence, and there had been no Committee to inquire into its character and operation. When Sir Robert Peel revived the tax, after an interval of thirty years, he was guided in the regulations which he established by the traditionary experience which he found existing in the public offices; and, applying that with admirable tact and talent to the circumstances with which he had to deal, he framed an Act which, upon the whole, operated, so far as the revenue was concerned, very satisfactorily. It was only after some years of experience, after the country had been disappointed in its expectation that the burden would last for but a limited time, and when it seemed probable that this tax must continue for a considerable period, that there arose that general feeling of discontent which about 1850 was so strong both in the country and in this House. Then it was that the Government assented to inquire into the principles and operation of the tax. But what was that Committee? The right hon. Gentleman says that a Committee to inquire into such a subject ought to be formed of men highly qualified by their earnestness of purpose and scientific acquirements for the investigation of such a question; and that its investigations ought to be conducted with an entire devotion of time and ability. Well, what was the Committee of 1850? It was formed of the best men in the House. Its proceedings were chiefly conducted by the late Mr. Hume, a very earnest man, one who had had great experience upon financial subjects, and one who took an interest in the operation of this tax which, as will be remembered by those who sat in Parliament with him, was of a remarkable character. That Committee sat for two years, and if ever any Committee exhausted a subject it was that Committee on the income tax. There was not a philosopher, there was not a practical man, whose information or whose thought was calculated to enlighten us, who was not examined before that Committee. You had examined great economists, like Mr. Mill, and the most experienced actuaries, like Mr. Newmarch. You had these characters multiplied before your Committee to give you the result of their labours, their knowledge, and their experience. As I have said, that Committee sat for two years, and you have in your library the valuable results of its labours and its lucubrations. What was the practical consequence? Very shortly afterwards there was a change of Government. Of the Government which was in office when the income tax expired I happened to be a Member. There was then in the country great discontent with the tax, and in this House a feeling which I am not exaggerating when I say that it was one which no Government could pass by with indifference. The Government, after deep deliberation, determined to make a moderate, but absolute difference between the assessments under Schedule A and Schedule D. On what condition did they make that difference? But on condition that you should entirely put an end to all exceptions, to all remissions, and to all exemptions, and that you should levy the tax upon incomes as low as was consistent with the collection of the tax. I do not say whether we were right or wrong, but at any rate the principle of making a difference between permanent and precarious incomes was applied with moderation, and upon conditions of the most rigid character, and totally opposed to those propositions that we now hear of from both sides of the House. Why, where is the man who can draw the line between wages and income? Who can define what is manual labour? Is the clerk who gains £150 a year by the hand which is always driving a quill to be placed in a different category from the man who uses a spade or operates as an auxiliary to a machine? Well, Sir, we arrived at that conclusion. Right or wrong, it was not arrived at without deep consideration, and was not adopted except upon rigid conditions, the essence of those conditions being that there should be an end for ever of exemptions, exceptions, and remissions. Our policy was opposed. It was opposed, Sir, with great ability and with success by the right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. He separated the income tax from all the other taxes of the country, and said, "This is an immoral tax. This is a tax not to be tolerated except for a moment in an emergency of the country—at some public exigency, when, in fact, philosophical and scientific criticism on the principles of taxation ceases, and all men are ready to make sacrifices for the assistance of their country. This is a tax, he said, which is not to be tolerated as a permanent feature of the taxation of any country, and the policy which you recommend must be stigmatized and put an end to." What was the policy which we recommended? It was our opinion that an income tax of moderate amount must be—

Mr. Disraeli

I do not say a permanent feature, because that might be looked upon as an extravagant phrase even in these days, but that it must be a feature of our financial system for a considerable time. Therefore, we had to deal with a tax which we thought must be a feature of our financial system for a considerable time with reference to public opinion and upon conditions which we thought would be conducive to public safety. The present Chancellor of the Exchequer, then in Opposition, would not listen to anything of the kind. He said, "This is a moral enormity. We find it a necessity owing to the state of the finances of the country; but we cannot at all adopt your principles of financial policy. We must put an end to this tax. We must find a Government that will terminate its existence, and will grapple with the question in a statesmanlike and efficient manner." Well, you have grappled with the question in an efficient manner. The Government of 1852 were turned out of office because they did not deal with the income tax in a scientific and satisfactory manner, and because it was necessary that that tax should not be a permanent feature of your system of taxation, but that an expeditious method should be had recourse to to abolish it for ever. Then you had that great scheme upon which I need not touch, which is known as the subject of the most successful oration of modern times. Since the oration of Demosthenes' De Corona nothing has been more successful. It gained for the eminent orator who delivered it a fame which has lasted for seven years. For seven years he has been the idol of the country, because the people knew that in 1860 they would be relieved from the income tax. I must say that in the history of man I know no destiny so much to be envied and so successful as that of the right hon. Gentleman. The bottle conjuror was successful, but he was successful for only forty-eight hours. No doubt those forty-eight hours were hours of great excitement. That the country should believe that at the end of forty-eight hours he would be able to enter into a pint bottle was an amount of credulity that must greatly have elevated the man who had produced it in his own opinion; but the right hon. Gentleman has enjoyed the position of the bottle conjuror for seven years. That is a long time. You take a house for seven years; it is the term of a lease; and the person who has been the hero of a popular delusion for seven years enters into one of the first categories of human achievement. The Chancellor of the Exchequer will not allow even these passing remarks upon the events of his distinguished career, because he says that circumstances occurred after he had entered into this engagement with the country which entirely released him from the promises which he had made to an admiring nation. We have all touched upon that subject once or twice, and it is quite unnecessary to dwell upon it. Unfortunately, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will always defend himself, which is remarkable in a person of his surprising abilities, because if he did not defend himself, his position would be a very good one. We all recollect that in 1853 he most unnecessarily entered into a compact with the country. It was not a contract that in 1860 the income tax should be put an end to. It is absurd for a moment to suppose that. A Minister must of course defer to the circumstances with which he has to deal. He is the creature, and often the slave, of events which are ever occurring. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer found in 1860 that the finances of the country did not permit the repeal of the tax, the continuance of which he had impressed upon the nation would sap the morality of the country, he would have appealed to the people not in vain upon high reasons of State to bear it a little longer. The Chancellor of the Exchequer entered into a special contract with the public. He told them that in 1860 there must necessarily be a considerable remission of taxation by the falling in of terminable annuities to the amount of upwards of £2,000,000. He stated that those £2,000,000 would form a fund upon which the country might count, and that there was a fair certainty that his prescient policy would be realized and consummated. But the right hon. Gentleman this year has actually come forward and with those £2,000,000 in his hands has ostentatiously appropriated them to another purpose and for another result. I have never heard from the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the moments—I will not say of his insolent, but of his triumphant, rhetoric, or of those milder tones in which he addresses us over the table when he tries to persuade us that the income tax is the best tax in the circumstances, an answer on that subject. To-night, instead of denouncing the income tax as an immoral tax, as an unconstitutional tax, as a tax which saps all the principles of domestic happiness and public security, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has told us there is a good deal to be said against the income tax, but, after all, the same may be said against every tax. Contrast this confession of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with those oratorical invectives which in the seven years during which the country has been so fondly expectant of the felicitous consummation of 1860 we have heard from the right hon. Gentleman. But I am not doing justice to the Chancellor of the Exchequer when I say that he entered into a contract with the public upon which he has successfully traded that he would, at least as far as the terminable annuities were concerned, attempt to relieve the country in 1860 of this burden. Hon. Gentlemen who were then Members of the House must recollect his speech on the Budget of 1857. The Chancellor of the Exchequer tells us now that circumstances have occurred which have prevented the accomplishment of his promise and the fulfilment of his policy. I shall not stop to say that the circumstances to which he refers, and by which a great increase of the National Debt has been occasioned, were brought about mainly by a Cabinet of which he was an eminent member, and by his influence in the Cabinet on the subject of our finances, which I believe was injurious to the honour and interests of the country. Let that pass. But in 1857 you had a Budget brought forward by a right hon. and much respected Gentleman who is now a colleague of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—I mean the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department. You heard that Budget; it was received with great respect and listened to with great attention; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who then sat below the gangway, could not contain his indignation at that Budget. He denounced it, he denounced all the principles of taxation which had been laid before us by his present colleague as worthy of our acceptance; but the right hon. Gentleman did more than that. In 1857 he adhered to the policy of 1853, the policy which, during the interval he had always sustained, and he told the House that if, by any combination of circumstances, he should preside over our finances in 1860—which was then less likely than it has since turned out to be—he would be prepared to consummate the policy which he had laid down in 1853—

Mr. Disraeli

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It may be convenient I should state that the right hon. Gentleman is entirely at fault as to what I said.

MR. DISRAELI: Matters of fact are stubborn things, and they are not disposed of when the Chancellor of the Exchequer, rising in a very irregular manner, gives you to understand, on his ipse dixit, that you are mistaken. I make that statement upon my recollection, upon the authority of the records of this House, and I believe upon the recollection of every hon. Gentleman now present who was a Member of the last Parliament. We are now told it is not convenient to deal with a tax of these gigantic proportions. A tax of gigantic proportions! Who, let me ask, has made it so? There was a Minister once who said it was a tax so intolerable, so immoral—for that was the favourite anathema—one so injurious to the domestic happiness and so fatal to the public spirit of the country that, not only it could not be tolerated except in an emergency, but that immediate steps must be taken for its gradual and certain abolition. You have an Act of Parliament framed for that purpose. Can it be believed that the same Minister who took measures to insure that every year a portion of this tax should cease has come forward in 1860 virtually to propose doubling that tax, and accompanying his proposition with what statement, let me ask? Does he tell us, as the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs tells us every night, that the country is in danger, and that we are on the eve of grave events? On the contrary, the Chancellor of the Exchequer says that he could not feel justified in making this proposition if he thought it likely to be a permanent arrangement. I want to know on what grounds the Chancellor of the Exchequer thinks it will not be a permanent arrangement. But what I wish the House to observe is that after all the promises and professions we have had as to the reduction of a tax which struck at the morality of the country we have this tax now proposed to be doubled by the very same Minister who has for seven years obtained and enjoyed the confidence of the public because we believed it was his policy to terminate the obnoxious impost. And how is this proposition introduced to our notice? Strange to say, by a declaration that, so far as the right hon. Gentleman can judge, though there are great objections to the income tax, these are objections to which every other tax is liable. What, then, is the conclusion to which we must arrive? We must believe either that the Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1853 had not sufficiently considered this question, had not gone into all the bearings of a tax of which he spoke in language so unmeasured, or that his conduct must have been, what I do not believe it could have been, characterized by a little of that immorality which he ascribed so freely to the income tax. That is totally impossible, and therefore I can only suppose that in that eager moment, on that memorable occasion in 1853, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer laid down his policy respecting the income tax, he had not considered the subject sufficiently, and that he spoke in a crude and immature spirit. The only other conceivable supposition is that the right hon. Gentleman, after the experience he has had, feels it his duty to come forward now and propose that which he denounced before, and which I myself believed to be most unwise—namely, that he should throw off himself and the Government the duty of directing the country upon this important tax, and should endeavour to lay upon the House of Commons, by appointing a Committee of inquiry, a responsibility which no Minister, but, of all Ministers, which he should never for a moment attempt to relinquish.

Question put, “That the words ‘and fifty’ be there inserted.”

The House divided:—Ayes 24; Noes 174: Majority 150.

Bill to be read 3^d To-morrow.

STAMP DUTIES BILL.

CONSIDERED AS AMENDED.

Bill considered, as amended, in Committee.

Clause 17,

MR. BENTINCK said, he proposed to ask the House to omit this clause. It repealed the 7th of George II., which was framed for the express purpose of putting an end to the practice of gambling in the funds, commonly called time bargains. The enactment was originally passed for three years, but it worked so beneficially that it was made perpetual, and had been in operation up to the present time. To repeal the enactment because it was to a certain extent inoperative was not the proper mode of proceeding, for that would countenance every description of gambling that the ingenuity of man could devise, and they would have no right afterwards to break into houses on suspicion that gambling was carried on, or to punish the detected parties. The proposition in short struck a heavy blow at the morality of the country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was more remarkable for his eloquence than the extreme courtesy with which he treated opponents, did him the honour of saying that there was extreme confusion in his mind on the subject of this Bill; but he, on the other hand, believed that the ideas of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were marvellously at variance with all sound reason and practical sense. The right hon. Gentleman laid great stress on his first argument; he said none of his distinguished constituency had remonstrated against the announced intention of repealing Sir John Barnard's Act. Probably that distinguished constituency had never even heard of the Act; the law as to time bargains was not likely to be much discussed in that seat of piety and virtue which the right hon. Gentleman so ably represented. It was, therefore, not a very sound argument. He then contended that time bargains stood precisely on a par with the purchase and sale of shares in railway or other companies. Now, time bargains were exactly the converse of such transactions. The sale of shares was a bond fide transfer of property. The right hon. Gentleman who seemed to know everything, really did not know what a time bargain meant. It was a vicious arrangement between two persons, both of whom might be equally penniless, by which they agreed to run the chance of which should lose and which should win on the contingency of the price of stocks on any given day and the price of that day week. It was said that the law against these bargains was a dead letter; to a certain extent he admitted it, but that was no reason why the law should be repealed. It was rather a reason why the House should remodel it and make it effective. Then the right hon. Gentleman asked a most extraordinary question. He asked, as if in doubt, whether making time bargains could be considered an immoral practice or not. If he could not see that it was immoral, could he perceive the immorality of any species of gambling? Then, with that extraordinary method of arguing peculiar to the right hon. Gentleman, he pleaded that the gentlemen connected with money transactions in the city were highly respectable individuals.

Why, what had the respectability of persons engaged in large mercantile affairs to do with the malpractices of men who met on the Stock Exchange solely for the purpose of gambling? The right hon. Gentleman said he was not prepared to admit that time bargains were wrong in the sense in which he (Mr. Bentinck) had spoken of them. He had described them as the worst and most pernicious mode of gambling ever devised; if the right hon. Gentleman could not see it, his ideas on the subject of gambling must be of a very peculiar description. He asserted that dealing with all kinds of property involved a certain amount of hazard, and had instanced the practice of forestalling and regrating; but they were nothing like time bargains. Actual property was bought and sold, and the seller got money for money's worth. It should be recollected that these time bargains materially affected the value of all funded property; the small property of those who had invested all they possessed in the funds was influenced and altered by the practice which the right hon. Gentleman was so anxious to countenance. That of itself was a sufficient ground for objecting to the repeal of Sir John Barnard's Act, which was proposed solely to obtain the penny for the stamp on each time transaction. The proceeds would be excessively small, and for this they were asked to sacrifice the character of the Government and the country. Again, the law as it stood was by no means inoperative. The brokers having no means of recovering any sums of money which they might risk in time bargains were extremely averse to have anything to do with them unless they were perfectly satisfied as to the solvency of the parties who sought to employ their services. Was the noble Lord at the head of the Government, who took such an active part in 1853 in trying to put down gambling in London, prepared to carry out the singular views of his colleague on the practice? Would the noble Lord hazard the reputation he acquired in 1853? Sir John Barnard, he understood, was, by a singular coincidence, one of the noble Lord's ancestors; if he consented to this clause it would be enough to make the shade of his ancestor blush. It would give a legal stamp to a kind of gambling with which more villany was mixed up than any other, for the sake of a few wretched pennies of revenue.

Amendment proposed, to leave out Clause 17.

Mr. Bentinck

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, that he did not agree with the arguments which had been used by the hon. Member, but still he thought that some explanation was required, as the clause under notice was utterly inoperative, and not worth the paper on which it was written. It professed to repeal the 7th of George II., but the Act only lasted three years, and was succeeded by the 10th of George II., which perpetuated it. The clause, therefore, repealed an Act which had expired three years after it passed, and left untouched the only Act on the subject which was now in existence. With respect to Sir J. Barnard, every Gentleman knew that Sir J. Barnard took part in the great debates of 1733, and was the person who opposed Sir R. Walpole. The Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day was burned in effigy, Sir R. Walpole was assaulted in passing through the Court of Requests, and Lord Chesterfield was dismissed from his office of Gold Stick in Waiting, because he opposed Sir R. Walpole's measure for turning the system of Customs into a system of Excise. If they wished to repeal the 10th of George II., it seemed to him that it was not by a clause in a Stamp Duties Bill that it should be repealed. The Act of Sir John Barnard was become perfectly nugatory. It had been decided, over and over again, in the courts of law, that it did not apply to the great system of gambling in foreign funds, but only to gambling in the funds of the day, which were English funds. There was the 7th and 8th of Victoria, which applied to such transactions, and all the courts of law held that they applied to all gambling, and all wagers, whether in cases of stock jobbing, or railway scrip, or foreign bonds. Therefore he agreed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that Sir J. Barnard's Act was perfectly useless. It was a sort of Act which, when pupils with pleaders, young lawyers always made use of when they wanted a sham plea. It happened once, when a tailor sent in his bill, a sham plea was put in that a Bengal tiger had been delivered in satisfaction of the debt, and an attorney's clerk having made affidavit to that effect, a verdict for the defendant was returned. He was opposed to the clause as a useless one.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that his hon. and learned Friend must feel that he had made the most of the very notable discovery on which he had hit. He could not dispute with his learned Friend that the 7th of George II., c. 10, had been enacted to endure only for three years, and by another Act, the 10th of George II., c. 8, the former Act was made perpetual, and the latter had no operation except to perpetuate the earlier Act. That being so, he agreed with his hon. and learned Friend that it might have been better not to have made an express reference to the former Act, but only to the Act which perpetuated it. Still he could not allow that the clause would be a dead letter on account of its reference only to the 7th of George II., because he did not see what operation the Perpetuation Act could have if the original Act was annihilated. There would, however, be an opportunity afforded of correcting any defect in the clause either at the present stage or on some future occasion. As to the objections of the hon. Member (Mr. Bentinck) to the seventeenth section, he did not think them well-founded. The Act to which they referred, whatever its merits, had been undoubtedly, almost from the time of its having passed into law, a dead letter. The Act began by a very vituperative preamble against a class of people, not then in such good esteem as at present, the stock-brokers. So far as it applied to stock-jobbing, he need not say that it had been utterly inefficacious; and when the hon. Member opposite asked for its continuation, he did not of course desire that the class of persons in the City of London engaged on the Stock Exchange should be put an end to. He rather applied his objections to the second provision of the first section, which provided for the rendering void of all contracts in the nature of wagers and other contracts, of a particular description, being gambling contracts, with reference to dealing in stock. Sir John Barnard's Act was provided for those purposes, with the most cumbrous and entirely useless machinery, principally to be exercised through qui tam actions at law, and by Bills in Chancery. With respect to that machinery the Bill appeared to have been absolutely a dead letter. For the last 100 years there had not been shown in the Court of Chancery any practical, or, at all events, any successful, application of its provisions for these purposes, and, at law, the Act had been equally nugatory. It remained, therefore, for him (the Solicitor General) merely to deal with the question raised by the hon. Member as to repealing such sections of the Act as seemed to prevent or restrict gambling or wagering in stocks. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone had anticipated him in reference to that point, by mentioning that the dilatory and unsatisfactory mode of procedure to which he had referred had been superseded and rendered unnecessary by a recent Act, the 8 & 9 Vict., c. 109, generally known as the Gaming and Wagering Act; the 18th section of which provided that all contracts or agreements, whether in writing or otherwise, by way of gaming or wagering, shall be for all purposes and under all circumstances void. This Act was in full force and vigour, and therefore, in repealing an old enactment, prohibitive of a particular class of gaming and wagering, they were in no way interfering with that later Act, which would continue in operation, and which absolutely and entirely put an end to every contract having reference to gaming or wagering. The effect of the present measure, by which the former Act was to a certain extent repealed, was virtually little more than to get rid of an abusive and vituperative preamble which had proved obnoxious to stockbrokers and others whose pursuits brought them into connection with the Stock Exchange.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, it was natural that mistakes should at times be made, more especially when dealing with the cumbrous volumes of Acts of Parliament, but when a mistake had occurred he thought it much better that it should be at once confessed. He had been amazed to hear the hon. and learned Solicitor General argue the proposition that a clause which repealed an Act that had come to an end somewhat more than 100 years ago could be stretched so as to repeal a wholly different Act, which made the former one perpetual; and as the Act prohibited time bargains in the stocks at the present day he would not insult the good sense and understanding of the House by debating a question which was not arguable. He agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone in thinking that this clause, if it passed, would become a perfectly dead letter, and would not alter the existing state of the law. But since the Solicitor General had addressed the House the question had assumed an entirely new shape, and it was consequently most important that before going further the history of this clause should be distinctly remembered. The Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed, as a part of his financial scheme, to impose a tax on contracts for the purchase and sale of stock. The gentlemen connected with the Stock Exchange, who were he believed of the highest respectability, contended that if a tax was thus about to be imposed on their transactions, they ought, at all events, to be relieved from the difficulties under which they had hitherto laboured, because by Sir John Barnard's Act time bargains could not take place with any faith in their validity. The Chancellor of the Exchequer acceded to this proposition; he stated that in his view Sir John Barnard's Act was unwise in prohibiting bargains of this kind, and that he was prepared to propose a Bill repealing that Act. Time bargains, as every one knew, were contracts in which one party agreed to sell at a future day stock which he did not possess and which he did not intend to buy. This circumstance being well-known to the other party, they mutually intended to settle on the day fixed upon, according to whether the price of stocks had risen or fallen in the meantime. This was the class of contracts distinctly struck at by Sir John Barnard's Act, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer expressed his willingness to repeal. The Solicitor General, on the other hand, told them it was a delusion to think that time bargains or wagering contracts were to be made legal; and he stated that the only object of the present Act was to remove from the statute-book a preamble which was offensive to the stockbrokers, through its describing them as a highly discreditable set of people. He hoped the gentlemen of the Stock Exchange would like the description which had been given; but they certainly would find that they had been hitherto in a fool's paradise, for, trusting in the promise which had been given, they believed a new vista was opening and that they were to have the power of making time bargains to any extent in return for the 1*d.* which they would contribute to the Exchequer on each of these bargains. The hon. and learned Solicitor General, however, declared that they had no need to go back 100 years to Sir John Barnard's Act, as there had been recent legislation on the subject which rendered a time bargain, as a contract made by way of wagering, null and void; and that not by any cumbrous process of the Court of Chancery, but by a fresh, vigorous, green statute of the present reign. He was quite willing to accept that description, and it was therefore clear that the House was called on to pass a Stamp Act, not for the sake of imposing or renewing duties, but in order to expunge from the statute-book an offensive preamble—a purpose to which he had never before known a Stamp Act to be applied. A solemn explanation had been given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the reasons for postponing the measure to that evening; and now they were told by the Solicitor General that this had all been much ado about nothing, that the law was not to be altered, but the sensitive minds of stock-jobbers were merely to be relieved from the disagreeable terms in which Sir John's Barnard's Act spoke of them. More ludicrous treatment of a grave question he had never known. The clause as it stood, the hon. Member admitted, was not worth the paper it was written on, for it would leave the old Act untouched, while the cumbrous proceedings in Chancery, which had never been resorted to before, would never be resorted to again. As time bargains were not to be legalised, it was unnecessary for him to trouble the House with the observations which he should otherwise have felt it his duty to make.

Sir Hugh Cairns

MR. HUBBARD said, he conceived that the imposition of the stamp duty on contracts, if it were expedient, ought to have been made without any consideration given or received by the Members of the Stock Exchange, and that if Sir J. Barnard's Act were objectionable it ought to have been repealed independently of anything in the way of concession. He could not agree with the opinions expressed by the hon. Member for West Norfolk, for he believed the Act to be a standing disgrace to the statute-book. It was the remnant of an antiquated and bigoted policy. It struck at the very root of liberty in transactions of buying and selling. Nothing tended more to maintain the steadiness of the funds in this country than the existence of a large body of men who were always ready to enter into operations in that particular article. It was a mistake to suppose that the operations were all in one direction. There were habitually as many ready to buy as to sell. The noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs made a speech the other night reflecting in severe, but not too severe terms on the conduct of a near political neighbour of ours. The next day on returning from the City he was asked by several Members—"Was there not a great panic on the Stock-Exchange to-day? Did not the funds experience a great fall?" But his answer was, that, though there certainly was a feeling of agitation and apprehension, the funds had only fallen about a quarter per cent. The existence of a body of men, ready to take advantage of any depreciation in the funds, had, no doubt, arrested the fall at a quarter per cent, when it would otherwise have been 3, 4, or 5 per cent, considering the formidable nature of the speech. In fact, but for the presence of those men, and the operations deprecated by the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) the very event which he most dreaded must occur. He begged to differ with the hon. and learned Gentleman on that side of the House (Sir H. Cairns), who, when he told the House what constituted time bargains, said that they were mere gambling transactions. He stated a time bargain to be an offer for sale of £100,000 stock by one man, stock which he never had or would have, and which was offered to a man equally unprepared to take it. He (Mr. Hubbard) did not deny that isolated transactions of this kind might occur—but such were not the transactions which ordinarily took place on the Stock Exchange. The ordinary course of dealers was to sell for the next settling day, at the middle or end of the month, a certain amount of stock which they had in their own engagements purchased. But the operations of Sir J. Barnard's Act was to make illegal every transaction which was not consummated upon the spot. Unless a man could at once deliver over the stock sold he became the participator in a time bargain. But this disability was not confined to stocks and shares; it operated on all kinds of bargains. The whole of our foreign commerce was carried on by time bargains. It was impossible to sell upon the spot. Cargoes were bought in foreign countries to be delivered at a distant day; and were they to be told that these operations were illegal? While the necessities of commerce and the stimulants of common interest led traders to make these bargains, there had not been wanting men who, adverting to this act of disability, had tried to evade those bargains when it suited their purpose. And it had led to the further inconvenience that, in the event of the buyer's insolvency, the honest merchant had been defrauded of his dividend. The most honest and straightforward merchants in the City of London had had their transactions branded as illegal on account of the interpretation of this law in the Bankruptcy Courts. He hoped that the Government would not allow the matter to rest where it was, but would remove the disability from time bargains in stocks and shares as well as in goods.

MR. BUTT thought it would be absurd to pass the clause if, as the Solicitor-General had stated, the effect of the Wagers Act would be to leave time bargains exactly in the same position as now. His great objection to the clause, however, was that it was tacked to a money Bill, and if the House of Lords attempted to exercise the discretion which they undoubtedly possessed, and struck it out, the House of Commons might be disposed to treat it as a breach of their privileges, and refuse to pass the Bill altogether.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was not much moved by the objections made to this particular clause; and he thought the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite showed that he did not quite clearly understand either the operations of the Stock Exchange or what fell from his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General. No demand had been made by the members of the Stock Exchange for an amendment of the law. But, after the stamp was proposed on contract notes, a communication was made to him through the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Glyn), that the Act of Parliament known as Sir John Barnard's Act might be repealed, as by that Act transactions which entered into the daily course of their business were prohibited, though the Act itself had grown obsolete, and they thought it was but just that they should be free from this bond when it was proposed to put a stamp upon the notes by which these contracts were carried on. The Government thought it was but fair to comply with that request. But now the hon. and learned Member for Youghal (Mr. Butt) had raised an objection to the clause, appearing in this Bill, which he thought a perfectly good one. In truth, it was his intention to have proposed the repeal in a separate Act; but finding the clause inserted in this Bill as it was drawn up in the Revenue Office, he allowed it to pass. He quite saw the force of the objection, however, that the fact of this clause being inserted in a Money Bill would oust the jurisdiction of the House of Lords; and therefore he would withdraw the clause, and would give notice of his intention to-night to move for leave to introduce a new Bill on the subject to-morrow.

MR. HENLEY said, he must complain that the right hon. Gentleman had given no explanation of the views of the Government whether time bargains were illegal or not. The Solicitor General said that the repeal of Sir John Barnard's Act would leave these time bargains exactly where they were before; that they would not be legalized, but that the Wagers Act would apply to them. But the right hon. Gentleman had not told them what was the opinion of the Government on this point, which was not an unimportant one. The discussion began in the complaint that Government was about to legalize gambling by putting on it a penny stamp. Well, was that the intention of Government or was it not; and if so, did they mean to repeal the Wagers Act, as well as Sir John Barnard's Act? He wished further to know whether Government intended to reprint this measure, for there had been so many Amendments proposed by the Government, and those Amendments had been made in such confidential whispers between the Secretary to the Treasury and the Speaker, that he believed there was no Member of the House who now knew how the Bill stood.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that, as direct reference had been made by the hon. Member for Norfolk to the part he took in the passing of the Act for putting down gambling-houses, he would offer a few observations to the House. But he thought he could give the hon. Gentleman another instance which was more appropriate. In the time of Charles II. a law was passed making all bets on horse-races above the value of £20 illegal, and subject to a penalty, which might be recovered by a qui tam action. The hon. Gentleman's lamented relative (Lord George Bentinck) was actually sued under that Act, and when a Committee of the House was appointed to sit on this subject, of which he (Viscount Palmerston) had the honour to be Chairman, a Report was made, and in consequence of that Report it was felt that this was an obsolete system of legislation which did not belong to the present age. Consequently an Act was passed repealing that statute, and relieving from any penalty those who made wagers upon a horse-race. He thought the present question was to be viewed upon precisely the same principle. He would not enter upon the legal question, but would take the hon. Gentleman upon his own ground. Viewing this as a simple question of a wager upon the future price of a given amount of stock, it fell, in his opinion, within the same category as a wager upon a horse-race; and upon the same principle as that by which the House of Commons thought fit to relieve persons who made wagers upon horse-races, he said they should also relieve from liability those who entered upon time bargains. By so doing he thought they should not be disparaging the memory of Sir John Barnard, who introduced an Act no doubt very well suited to his own age, though not to the present.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. MALINS said, he thought the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer had exercised a wise discretion in withdrawing the clause, and hoped he would take more time to consider the points that had been raised. At present bargains might be made in reference to all kinds of merchandise, without being liable to the penalties for gambling.

MR. LAING said, the few Amendments that had been introduced were intended to carry out the various suggestions that had been made in the course of conversation on the previous evening. At present the Wagers Act applied to many transactions upon the Stock Exchange, without which it would be impossible to dispose of the immense quantities of stock that were in the market. It was for the convenience of the public that these transactions should take place; and the object of the present measure was to render legitimate the operations of the middle men, who acted for the public convenience.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he must deny that wagers on horse-racing were at all analogous to time-bargains. But what he rose for was to point out the services which his hon. Friend the Member for West Norfolk had rendered to the Government, in preventing them from proceeding to legislate in too hasty a manner, and thus avoiding the blots which had been pointed out to-night, and which they had corrected, but which would have been inserted in the Bill, if the Government had been allowed to proceed in the hasty manner they at first insisted on doing.

MR. BOVILL said, he would suggest that, as it was admitted that this Bill had received neither the assent of the Solicitor General nor the Attorney General, it should now be remitted for their Amendments.

Question, "That Clause 17 stand part of the Bill," put, and negatived.

In reply to Mr. T. BARING,
THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHE-QUER said, that the 3*d*. stamp could not apply to dock warrants.

Bill to be read 3^o To-morrow.

House adjourned at a quarter after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Saturday, March 31, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^a Stamp Duties ; Income Tax:

Royal Assent.—Consolidated Fund (£850,000); Mutiny ; Marine Mutiny ; Endowed Schools ; Benefit Societies Rules Amendment.

STAMP DUTIES BILL.—INCOME TAX BILL

Read 1^a, and to be printed ; and to be read 2^a on Monday next ; and Standing Orders No. 37 and 38 to be considered in order to their being dispensed with.

House adjourned at a quarter past One o'clock to Monday next, half past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Saturday, March 31, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Sir John Barnard's Act.

3^o Income Tax ; Stamp Duties.

INCOME TAX BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHE-QUER: Sir, it may be convenient that I should mention the order in which I propose to take the remaining financial business before the recess. I propose to-day to read a third time the two Bills on the orders—the Income Tax Bill and the Stamp Duties Bill. On Monday I propose to commence with what are known as the Customs Charges Resolutions; and after those to take the second reading of the Wine Licenses Bill. If not objected to I would also read a second time the Bill for the repeal of Sir John Barnard's Act, if the House shall give me leave to introduce it to-

VOL. CLVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

day. It cannot pass this House till after the recess, but inasmuch as there is a charge depending on it, I trust the House will expedite its progress as much as possible. On Tuesday I should report such Resolutions as the Committee on Customs Act may think fit to adopt on Monday, and insert them in the Customs Duties Bill.
There has been already inserted in it a clause with respect to drawbacks on wine.
It will be advisable that the Bill should then be reprinted, that it may be seen with all its provisions as a whole; and when the House reassembles after the recess I will take a convenient opportunity—not for several days after the meeting, however—of asking the House to put the Bill through the remaining stages. With respect to the Wine Licences Bill I reserve to myself liberty, presuming it be read a second time on Monday, of committing it pro formâ on Tuesday, with a view to certain Amendments which it may be worth while to introduce. Several very good suggestions have been made referring to matters of detail —some to mitigations of charge and some to provisions against the abuse of authority on the part of magistrates in granting licences—which I would introduce; and as it may be convenient for the House and for the public likewise to see the Bill with these suggestions embodied, that Bill must be reprinted also. In Committee of Ways and Means it will be my duty to ask for the charges on licences, which are a necessary supplement of the second reading of the Wine Licences Bill, and with respect to which I should have no change to propose, except perhaps one or two minor adjustments in way of mitigation. These charges, if adopted by the House, would then be inserted in Committee on the Bill on Tuesday, that stage being taken pro formâ, and then hon. Members would have the opportunity of seeing the whole measure in the precise form in which the Government intend to submit it for the final consideration of the House. With this explanation, Sir, I beg to move the third reading of the Income Tax Bill.

MR. HENLEY: Sir, I wish to call the attention of the House to the manner in which this particular Bill has gone on.
It is a Bill of very great importance, and on Wednesday, after the hour when, ordinarily, public business is not proceeded with if there be any dispute—because if there be the least question you cannot go on, according to the forms of the House—a clause was introduced which had not been printed, and which nobody, except the Members of the Government, knew anything about. I must enter my protest against that mode of conducting business on an important taxing Bill. I do not mean to say that the clause is an improper one. It may be a very convenient way of granting the sort of appeal given in that clause; but I do protest against clauses which are of consequence, whether for good or evil, being introduced into Government Bills of such importance when nobody knows anything about them. The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head; but I would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was the clause to which I referred printed? Did anybody know anything about it? Was it not proposed after a quarter to six o'clock, when every one leaves the House supposing that nothing but routine business will be proceeded with? All I can say is, if it were so, that is not the course which has ordinarily been followed. Before any clauses are introduced into a Bill, the common practice is to print them, that hon. Members may know what they are legislating upon. But that was not done in this case. With regard to the Bill itself, I have nothing to say against its being read a third time; but I have considered it my duty to call attention to this point, because I think that the observance of the ordinary forms of this House is not only a matter of great convenience, but also of the greatest advantage to the conduct of public business. With regard to the order in which the business of the House is to be taken next week, as sketched out by the right hon. Gentleman, I have no objection to offer. Being quarter sessions week, many hon. Members who are connected with country business will not be able to be here on Monday, and therefore I shall hold myself free, if the Wine Licences Bill be read a second time on Monday, to take any course I may think necessary in Committee when that stage arrives. I am not sorry to hear that the right hon. Gentleman proposes to modify some provisions in the Bill; some of them—and I especially refer to that clause with regard to the interference of magistrates—are so objectionable in their present shape that they have been made the subject of much comment. I hope, however, to see them in a different guise when they come before us again. With these observations I do not object to the third reading of this Bill; but I do hope that, in future, if clauses of an important nature are to be introduced into a Government Bill they will be printed and notice given of them, so that this House may know what they are doing.

Mr. Henley

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH: I beg to corroborate the view taken of this matter by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire. I must say I have seen communications pass between parties who carry on business at the table and those on the Treasury Bench which were entirely inaudible in the House, and which I afterwards found resulted in the insertion of clauses without any knowledge on the part of hon. Members who took an interest in the subject, and which, had they known of them in time, they would have opposed.

Bill read 3^o.

On the Question that the Bill do pass,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think it quite right, Sir, that all matters appertaining to the business of this House should be very strictly watched and criticised, and I am always glad to hear such criticisms made; but the right hon. Gentlemen is not accurate in the statement he has made, as I think I can show. I frankly own I have been indebted to the courtesy of the House on more occasions than one for consenting, at an unusual hour, to pass a particular stage of this Bill, and postpone discussion till a future stage, with a view to the general convenience of this and the other branch of the Legislature. Nobody can reproach the right hon. Gentleman with inattention to his Parliamentary duties. He is so constant in his attendance on the proceedings of this House, as well as so valuable in the assistance he gives in all public matters, that occasional absence on his part is always sure to be excusable. But, Sir, I must state that the Bill was not brought on upon Wednesday after the time when public business ceases, but before that time. It was concluded after the time when public business ceases, but in the presence—I do not recollect of what Members—of a number who take an interest in the matter, and by whose consent the Bill was carried forward, while it was in the power of any one of them, by a simple objection, to stop it. In fact, to show that full notice was taken of all that took place in regard to the insertion of the clause referred to, I may mention that one hon. Gentleman put the question whether it could then be regularly introduced, which was ruled in the affirmative. With regard to the clause not having been printed, the remark may be technically correct, but substantially it is not so. It relates to a point of relief raised by the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir H. Willoughby) who gave a notice, which was printed in the Votes, of a clause for the purpose of giving an appeal, and what we proposed and inserted in the Bill was really an Amendment of his Motion. Technically it was not the hon. Baronet's clause, for it was drawn up differently, but it had the same object in view, and a clause in such cases cannot always be printed in the Votes.

MR. HENLEY: The right hon. Gentlemen says that the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham gave notice of such a clause; but I do not think that ordinarily speaking, the House would suppose because any hon. Member gave notice of a clause therefore the Government were going to adopt it; or, adopting its spirit and principle, would bring up a clause of the same kind. Hon. Members are not generally so fortunate in getting the consent of Government to amend taxing Bills. All I can say is, that when the Government make up their minds to amend a Bill in any particular it would be well to print the clause or clauses proposed to be inserted in the usual manner, and then there can be no objection.

Bill passed.

STAMP DUTIES BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved the Third Reading of the Stamp Duties Bill.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: I wish, Sir, to draw your attention to a question which arises on the proceedings connected with this Bill in relation to the forms of the House, which I think it important should not be overlooked. I would ask whether there is not an irregularity in the Bill which strikes at one of the most important privileges of this House. We know very well that no tax can be imposed on the subject unless founded on Resolutions of the whole House in Committee. One tax proposed by this Bill is on contracts for the sale of stock. Now, there was a Resolution of the House in Committee upon that subject, but that was a Resolution to this effect,—that, provided the Act which is called Sir John Barnard's Act be repealed, there should be imposed on contracts for the sale of stock a certain duty. That Resolution having passed a Committee of the whole House, involving a condition precedent—namely, the repeal of Sir John Barnard's Act—a Bill was introduced containing a clause proposing to repeal the Act; and by the same Bill it was proposed to impose the duty on contracts for the sale of stock. We had last night a discussion on that clause, the result of which was that it has been withdrawn, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given notice of the introduction of a Bill to repeal Sir John Barnard's Act. The matter, therefore, stands thus:—That Bill has not yet been introduced; Sir John Barnard's Act has not been repealed. The course that Parliament may take with respect to the repeal cannot be certainly known, and in this Bill, which imposes a stamp on contracts for the sale of stock, there is no condition precedent; it is a positive imposition of a stamp duty on all persons who deal in stock, the condition precedent not having been complied with. The question I would submit to you, Sir, with great respect, is this, whether the Bill, so far as it proposes to impose a tax on the sale of stock, is warranted by the Resolution of the House, I respectfully submit that it is not. I contend that until Sir John Barnard's Act be repealed it is not competent to the House, under this Resolution, to impose a tax upon these contract notes; and I therefore submit that the proper course for the Government to pursue is to strike out of this Bill the words which refer to contracts for the sale of stock, and to deal with that subject hereafter either in another Bill or in that by which it is proposed to repeal Sir John Barnard's Act. If that Act be repealed the Resolution of the House will warrant the imposition of this tax.

MR. SPEAKER: On referring to the Resolution I find that it was a provisional and conditional one. The terms are, "Provided that the Act passed in the seventh year of the reign of King George II. shall be repealed," and so on.

MR. DODSON said, he wished to know whether a stamped form would be provided for certified extracts from the registers of baptisms, marriages, and burials.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The Commissioners of Inland Revenue will be required to provide both impressed and adhesive stamps for such documents; but I am not aware that we have any power to compel the use of a particular form of words. I am much obliged to the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir H. Cairns), who is, I think, quite correct in his statement, that a condition was inserted in the Resolution which, owing to the omission of the clause repealing Sir J. Barnard's Act, is not now followed in the Bill. When we last night came to the conclusion that, in deference to the privileges of the House of Lords, it would be better to deal separately with the subject of that clause, I did not observe that an Amendment would consequently be required in the schedule. The hon. and learned Gentleman has pointed out that necessity at the most seasonable time, and I shall propose to withdraw the Motion for the third reading of the Bill, and to recommit it, in order to insert in the schedule words which will affix to the imposition of the tax the same condition as was originally specified in the Resolution. [Sir H. CAIRNS: Contingent taxation! You can't do that.] I do not know that. It appears to me to be clearly within the powers of the House, and I am not prepared to admit that a tax which is to accrue upon a certain contingency is a novelty in any sense. I shall, therefore, propose to go through the necessary form of recommitting the Bill, with the view—if that, Sir, meet your approval as a matter of order—of bringing the schedule into exact conformity with the Resolution.

MR. SPEAKER: As to the matter of form, there have been many occasions upon which a similar course has been pursued. The order must be discharged, and the Bill be recommitted. As to the matter of substance, it does not come within my province to give any decision.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would then move that the Order for the third reading of the Bill should be discharged.

Motion by leave withdrawn.

MR. HENLEY said, he hoped that if the Bill had to be recommitted it would be reprinted. Amendments of an important character had, as he believed, been introduced which it was very desirable that the House should see; and as it would occasion no delay, he trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would accede to his suggestion.

MR. DISRAELI: This is not a mere matter of form, because the principle of contingent taxation is a most important one. I am not at this moment prepared to say that there may not be precedents for its adoption, but at the same time I have not them at hand. Taxation is always founded upon an estimate submitted by the Minister for the service of the year, and all propositions for taxation bear a relation to that estimate. Any departure from this salutary course may seriously affect the financial system of the country. If the principle of contingent taxation be admitted, we may find that our expenditure and our revenue do not balance. This is therefore not a matter of form merely, but involves a most important principle. I assume, as a matter of course, that we shall not be asked to go into Committee on the Bill to-day. Even as a matter of form, notice of the recommitment would be required; but, as a principle of great importance is involved, I take it for granted that time will be given to us to make ourselves thoroughly acquainted with the subject, so that we may bring to the Committee the result of the reflection and information which are so necessary.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: I cannot understand the importance which has been given to this matter by the speeches of hon. Members opposite. There is no question of contingent taxation at issue. All that will be proposed to the House will be to adapt the schedule to the language of the Resolution. If any objection attaches to contingent taxation, it is one which applies to your own Resolution. Your own Resolution is framed in these words, "Provided the restrictions on dealings in the public funds" contained in a certain Act shall be repealed then "for and upon every note," there shall be a certain stamp. We propose now to put into the schedule precisely the same words as were adopted in the Resolution of the House,—“that, provided the restrictions in dealings in the public funds contained in the Act of so-and-so shall be repealed by any Act passed in the present Session, then from and after such repeal these duties shall attach.” Therefore there is not the smallest objection in point of principle, unless that objection be carried to the extent of affirming that your own Resolution was unconstitutional and improper.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: No doubt the hon. and learned Attorney General has not the least objection to that which is proposed, but there is a graver question—whether there is not an objection to it founded upon the forms of the House. I venture to say that the objection does not apply to the Resolution. A Resolution is in its nature temporary and provisional, merely to stand until a Bill is brought in and passed, and therefore the object of this Resolution being framed as it is, is to show that it is intended to introduce the Bill which is referred to as a condition precedent before you introduce the Bill imposing the tax. That which the Resolution says in effect is this :—"Let there be a Bill passed in this Session repealing Sir John Barnard's Act, and then let a Bill be brought in and passed which will impose a tax upon contract notes; and I venture to think that no precedent will be found in which a Bill has passed this House imposing a tax not directly and absolutely, but upon a certain contingency, which is a speculative contingency that Parliament will do something else by some other Bill. If there be such a precedent there may be no reason why we should not follow it, but if there be not, it would be a most inconvenient and irregular practice to introduce upon the present occasion, and one about which there will be a great deal to be said. I understand that the Motion for the recommitment of the Bill cannot be made until a future day. When we see the words which it is proposed to insert in the schedule, and the precedents which the Government, if it can find them, will then bring forward, will be the time to consider the proposition. In the meantime, I apprehend that the House would not think it advisable, without notice and without precedent, to adopt such a proposal at once.

MR. MILNER GIBSON: The hon. and learned Gentleman is mistaken when he alleges that a Resolution relating to the imposition of duties is in all cases a merely temporary arrangement and provision, lasting only until a Bill is brought in. In the case both of Customs and Excise the duties are levied immediately upon the Resolution being passed. I contend that when you agreed to the Resolution in this instance you affirmed the principle of contingent taxation, if you choose so to describe it. The objections ought to have been taken at that time. I am informed that if the course which has been suggested by my right hon. Friend is not adopted, it will prolong the sitting of the other House of Parliament, and will lead to much inconvenience. I cannot see that this is anything more than a technical objection, to which an importance has been given which it does not deserve, and I hope that there will be no further opposition to the course proposed by my right hon. Friend.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he considered that the House had very imprudently agreed to the Resolution on the subject of the Stamp Duty on contract notes. The difficulty which had arisen was an instance of the evils resulting from this hurried manner of transacting the public business. The condition precedent, namely, the repeal of Sir John's Barnard's Act, had not taken place; and it was clear that the Resolution would not justify the passing of the Bill as at present framed. He hoped that the Government would accede to the suggestion which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) for reprinting the Bill with the Amendments. The present Bill contained so large a number of Amendments that its own parents would not know it. Many of these Amendments had been introduced by the Secretary of the Treasury at a late hour, without any explanation whatever, and it was most important that the House should be fully aware of their nature. The provisions of the Bill were such as to tend to fetter every transaction of commerce, and it was most unfair and unjust that the House should be called upon to pass it without knowing the nature of the Amendments which had been introduced.

MR. J. C. EWART stated that great interest was felt with respect to the Bill by the commercial world, and expressed a hope that the Bill would be reprinted before passing through its final stage.

MR. LAING said, that the Amendments which had been referred to as having been introduced late on the previous evening were only three in number, and were intended to meet objections which had been raised principally by the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone. These Amendments were of a purely technical nature, and did not affect the general operation of the Bill. The importance of passing the measure that day arose from the circumstance that the revenue to be derived under it would amount to about £1,000 a day, and thus if its becoming law were delayed until after Easter, the country would lose about £14,000.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he hoped that the proposal to reprint the Bill with the Amendments would be acceded to. It was a measure which concerned much the mining and the banking interests, and interfered with the transactions of all the commercial classes of the country. The objection urged against reprinting the Bill was that the delay would cause a loss of £1,000 a day to the revenue, and if not passed before the Easter recess the total loss would not be less than £14,000. But he contended that the gain of this sum would be but a poor compensation for the litigation and annoyance which might arise from passing a Bill in an incomplete or ill-considered form.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I do not accede to the doctrine of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir Hugh Cairns) opposite, but, as no serious loss to the revenue will be involved, I am prepared to meet his objection by withdrawing from the Bill the part of the schedule which refers to contract notes. [Sir H. CAIRNS: That is what I suggested.] I did not understand that. Well, then, I will omit from the schedule the words relating to contract notes, and leave the whole question to be dealt with in a subsequent measure. With regard to the reprinting of the Bill, I may observe that the Amendments which have been made have been principally designed to remove from the Bill certain words with respect to which it was suggested that difficulties might arise. There is but a single case in which new words have been inserted in the clauses, and these simply refer to the mode of cancelling stamps on the various documents, and involve no extensive or general change in the terms of the Bill. The effect of the words introduced is to provide for cancelling stamps, by impressing as well as by writing upon them, and this alteration has been made in accordance with the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone. If the Bill is required to be reprinted, it will cause delay and consequent loss to the revenue, and I therefore hope that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire will not insist upon seeing the Amendments in print before the Bill passes.

MR. HENLEY said, that when he had suggested that the Bill should be reprinted he understood that it was to be re-committed on a future day, and that therefore its printing would cause no delay. As that course was not to be adopted, his observations did not apply.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH complained that considerable inconvenience was frequently occasioned by communications being made to the Chairman by Members of the Government in so low a tone that they did not reach the ears of the Members of the House.

Mr. Seymour FitzGerald

MR. LOWE: The course which the Government proposes to take is this:—We propose, in conformity with precedent, to re-commit the Bill at once, in Committee to strike out the part of the schedule relating to contract notes, to report immediately to the House, to read the Bill a third time, and to pass it. That is a course which is sanctioned by precedent.

MR. KER inquired whether the omission of contract notes from the operation of the Bill would affect the revenue.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Only to a limited extent.

Order for Third Reading discharged.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee; Bill re-committed with regard to the Schedule; Considered in Committee.

House resumed; Bill reported; as amended, considered; read 3^o and passed.

SIR JOHN BARNARD'S ACT, &c. REPEAL BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved for leave to bring in a Bill to repeal the Act 7 Geo. II., c. 8, commonly called Sir John Barnard's Act, and the Act 10 Geo. II., c. 8, which made the former Act perpetual.

MR. WISE said, he thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was bound to have made some statement to the House with respect to his object in introducing this Bill. Sir John Barnard's Act was passed for the purpose of preventing "stock-jobbing." That Act had been found to work so well that it had been made perpetual, and he doubted the policy of repealing it. There could be no objection urged against the buying and selling of stock and public and other securities; but "stock-jobbing" was a thing which he hoped every hon. Gentleman in the House would endeavour to do all in his power to prevent. He was anxious to have an assurance from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the effect of repealing this Act would not be to promote the injurious practice of "stock-jobbing."

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, that those who had drawn up this Bill had appeared to have totally overlooked the existence of the Act of the 8 & 9 Vict., which was directed against all kinds of "gaming and wagering," and therefore applied to stock-jobbing and wagering in time bargains. The statute 8 & 9 Vict., c. 109, was passed to prevent qui tam actions in cases of betting under an old statute of Charles, which was supposed to have become obsolete, but under the provisions of which numerous actions were brought against Lord George Bentinck and others. He was counsel in that case for the informer who had brought the actions, and anything more absurd could not be conceived than the proceedings which were necessary to be taken in those actions. The principal witness in the case swore that he had burned his books, and he could not state anything whatever as to his transactions with Lord George Bentinck. The House had consequently agreed to pass an Act which would relieve the defendant from penalties accruing under an Act which referred to a state of things that had become entirely obsolete. He believed that the Government were wholly ignorant of this Act of 8 & 9 Vict., when they decided upon repealing this Act of Sir John Barnard, because that Act equally applied to wagering. The Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to state whether it was his intention to derive a revenue from wagering transactions on the Stock Exchange. These dealings in the funds no doubt took place at the present time to a very large amount, but it was a very different thing to license and sanction them, as would be the case if this Bill were to pass. If the principle of allowing these wagerings were to be applied to the Stock Exchange, it should be made equally applicable to transactions at Tattersall's. What took place at the "Corner" was perfectly patent and known to the world. Everybody knew the nature of the betting that was going on there. There was nothing to prevent any person at Tattersall's offering or taking, for instance, 40 to 1 on the double event of Lord Palmerston's horse winning the Derby and the passing of the Reform Bill in the present Session. If it was the intention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to obtain a revenue from contracts entered into for wagering transactions on the Stock Exchange, he could not do so under the provisions of the present Bill, for the Act of the 8 & 9 Vict. would prevent him, and it would be necessary to repeal that Act as well as Sir John Barnard's.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that, in the presence of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, he should be slow to offer an opinion of his own on any legal point. But Sir John Barnard's Act, considered along with other legislation, placed members of the Stock Exchange under a peculiar law, exclusively applicable to them. In the opinion of those gentlemen the effect of the Act was to proscribe and render penal, not only what were called and understood to be wagering transactions, but likewise the regular and ordinary form under which the whole of that vast and beneficial business of dealing in the funds was conducted. He, therefore, now intended to repeal the Act treating in an exceptional manner this particular class of pecuniary transactions, leaving them subject to the general provisions of the law as determined by the Wagering Act; and, in laying on the table what he hoped would be merely a repealing measure, care should be taken not to interfere in any manner with the operation of the Wagering Act.

Leave given.

"Bills to repeal the Act of the seventh year of King George the Second, chapter eight, commonly called 'Sir John Barnard's Act,' and the Act of the tenth year of King George the Second, chapter eighth, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL, and Mr. LAING."

Bill presented, and read 1^o.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he wished to state that as some attention had been drawn to the matters proposed to be dealt with by the Bill, he would not fix its second reading until the 19th of April.

House adjourned at a quarter-after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, April 2, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^a Trustees, Mortgages, &c.

2^a Stamp Duties; Income Tax.

3^a Dwellings for Labouring Classes (Ireland); Stamp Duties; Income Tax.

THE TYNE HARBOUR OF REFUGE.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE wished to correct a statement he had made the other evening with reference to the sum expended on the works now in progress at the mouth of the Tyne. He had read from the Report of the Harbour of Refuge Commissioners that the sum of £750,000 was recommended by them as the total cost of efficient works for a good harbour of refuge at the mouth of the Tyne. That was quite correct; but he stated incidentally that £500,000 of this sum had been already expended, which he found was not the fact. The sum actually laid out was only £142,000.

PARLIAMENTARY BOROUGHS (IRELAND).—MOTION FOR RETURNS.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE moved an address for—

"Return of all Towns in Ireland, exclusive of Parliamentary Boroughs, containing a population of 3,000 or upwards, specifying the County in which each such Town is situated, and showing the Number of Occupiers rated at above £4 and under £6, and at £6 and upwards but under £8, and at £8; And also,

"Returns showing the Area, Population, Income Tax, Number of Occupiers rated at various Amounts, Number of Parliamentary Voters, &c. in each County in Ireland, and showing the Area, Population, Income Tax, the Number of Tenements rated at various Amounts under £10, Number of Voters, &c. in each Parliamentary Borough in Ireland."

The noble Marquess said that the Irish Reform Bill which had been introduced into the other House of Parliament was, in his opinion, so complete a mockery that he could not understand why the Government had taken the trouble to bring it forward. So strongly did he entertain that view with respect to it, that if it should ever come up to their Lordships' House, which he hoped would not be the case, he should deem it to be his duty to oppose its passing into a law. For his own part he had not heard that any desire for Parliamentary Reform had been exhibited in Ireland, or that the question was one which had taken the slightest hold of the minds of the Irish people. But if it were deemed necessary that some alteration in the electoral system in that country should be made, he thought due consideration should be shown for those large constituencies which were not adequately represented. He might also observe that there were in Ireland boroughs so poor and having constituencies so small that they were to a great extent naturally subject either to proprietary or to other corrupt influences; while on the other hand there were populous places in Ireland that were at present either wholly unrepresented or very inadequately represented. It was most expedient in any measure of Reform which might be passed that such cases should be placed upon some more satisfactory footing than that upon which they at present stood. He held, for example, in his hand a Return of no less than sixteen boroughs not one of which had a constituency exceeding 300 registered electors, and that number, it must be borne in mind, was considerably larger than the number who voted at the last election. He might add that of the sixteen boroughs to which he had alluded six had a constituency of less than 200, so that they afforded a good ground for the hand of the Reformer to work upon. And how, let him ask, was it proposed to deal with these cases in the Government measure? According to certain returns which had been laid before the House, the result of the change which that measure proposed to effect would be that not one of those boroughs would have a constituency of 400; that twelve would still have a constituency of less than 300, and four a constituency of less than 200. That being the proposed operation of the measure, he could not, as he had said before, look upon it otherwise than a perfect mockery of Reform, to disturb the existing system for the attainment of such a result as that. Now he would not completely abolish the representative system in all such small places; what he should propose in most cases would be to group those boroughs in such a way as that they might have a constituency somewhat respectable in point of numbers—in such a way, for instance, as that no constituency should number below 500, while the population which it represented should not be less than 12,000. He had said that the large constituencies in Ireland were inadequately represented, and he might, in support of that opinion, mention the county of Cork, which, with a population of 563,000 and 15,700 electors, had altogether only six Members; the county of Down, which, with a population of 328,000 and a constituency exceeding 11,000, had only three Members; Tipperary, which, with a population of 331,600 and 9,467 electors, had only four Members; and Galway, which, with a population of 297,000 and a number of electors exceeding 5,000, had only two Members. There was also the county of Dublin, which, although the number of its inhabitants was not more than 143,000, yet was of greater importance, and which, with a constituency of 6,200, returned only two Members. Those were, in his opinion, points well worthy the attention of the Government in dealing with the subject of Irish Parliamentary Reform.

The Marquess of Clanricarde

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, the noble Marquess had not merely anticipated the discussion of that Reform Bill which he had expressed a hope would not come up to their Lordships' House from the House of Commons, but had, to a certain extent, sketched out a counter-measure of his own. Now, while his wishes with respect to the fate of the Government Bill were quite different from those which his noble Friend entertained, he must decline following him into a discussion of the details of that or any other measure which might be introduced on the subject. The Government Bill involved, he was prepared to admit, no proposals of immense magnitude. It was not, for instance, of a character "to take away one's breath," if he might be allowed the use of an expression which he had of late on one or two occasions seen in print. He might, however, observe that the Irish people would not, in all probability, be disposed to think that equal justice had been dealt out to them if the small boroughs in that country were, as the noble Marquess suggested, to be disfranchised, while no such course was to be adopted with regard to boroughs of the same description in England. The noble Marquess seemed to be of opinion that it would be advisable that a certain number of those boroughs should be grouped together, but in order to effect that object it would be necessary to alter the proportion of the borough to the county representation, inasmuch as no substitute could otherwise be found for those boroughs he wished to see disfranchised. He might add that the population in boroughs and that in counties in Ireland stood to one another in proportions different from that which was the case in England or Scotland. The county population in Scotland, for instance, was 2,000,000, of which the town population exceeded one-half; while in Ireland, with a population of 6,000,000, the town population did not exceed 1,000,000. Under these circumstances, the noble Marquess would see that there would be considerable difficulty in adopting in Ireland the changes which he recommended. There could, of course, be no objection to the Returns required by the noble Marquess, on the understanding that the population should be taken according to the last Census.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, he did not think the Irish Reform Bill was a measure in itself of very great importance; indeed all reference to Ireland might very well have been omitted in the present legislation, were it not that if that had been the case the Irish people might have thought they were treated with neglect. But whatever might be the character of the Reform Bill for Ireland, in other respects it would not be denied that it contained some very great anomalies. Some of its provisions were of a very extraordinary character, and he could not help calling attention to one which had attracted considerable notice—he meant that clause which provided that Irish Peers should in future be enabled to sit as representing Irish constituencies in the House of Commons. On that clause there was undoubtedly an extraordinary unanimity of opinion as well on this side of the water as on the other. How it was possible to conceive that such a power should be granted to Irish Peers he could not imagine. Irish Peers had already the privilege of representing their own body in the House of Lords, and now it was proposed that they should enjoy another franchise,—namely, that of representing their own counties and boroughs in the other House of Parliament. How could that clause recommend itself to the House of Commons? It was too much to suppose that the present Irish Members would commit political suicide by supporting a clause the effect of which must be to create the most formidable competition against themselves in every constituency throughout the country.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he did not now propose that any disfranchisement should take place in Ireland, except to the extent which was contemplated in England, by depriving constituencies of one Member when the population was below a certain amount. The boroughs of Athlone and Portarlinton each returned a Member to Parliament. He found that under the Government Reform Bill four additional voters would be added to the constituency of Athlone, which would thus amount to 258; the increased roll of voters for Portarlinton would number 140. He did not believe that by grouping these boroughs together, and allotting one of their Members to some large constituency, any injustice would be done to the 398 voters of whom the joint constituency would then be composed.

Motion agreed to.

SMITHFIELD MARKET.—QUESTION.

LORD EBURY rose to inquire, Whether it is the Intention of Her Majesty's Government to allow any Part of the Site of Old Smithfield Market to be appropriated for Building Purposes? The noble Lord said he had always taken a deep interest in the affairs of the metropolis, and had spent twenty years of his life in endeavouring to remove the vested interests of Smithfield Market from that great centre of the town. Having got rid of them he had since been employed in endeavouring to prevent their resettling themselves on that at present vacant space of ground in the shape of a dead-meat market. He had attended with deputations to both the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) and the noble Viscount now at the head of the Government to ask that they would not allow old Smithfield to be covered with buildings. He might state that Smithfield had been granted to the Corporation of London, to be held so long as it was used as a cattle market; but when that was removed to another locality the site of Smithfield reverted to the Crown, and the Crown now claimed the right to hold it. He believed that the Corporation of the City at first demurred to the Government interpretation of the terms of the charter; but there could not, he thought, be any doubt that when the market was removed to Copenhagen Fields—whither, however, it ought not to have been removed, for he contended that it ought to have been removed wholly out of town—the ground reverted absolutely to the Crown. When that removal took place he formed one of a deputation to the noble Earl at the head of the last Government, requesting that the area should not be built over, and both from that noble Earl and more recently from the Government of the noble Lord now in power he received the assurance that there was no intention to build over the area. This was so far satisfactory, because there was no part of London where there was so dense and squalid a population as that which was found in the immediate neighbourhood of Smithfield and the adjacent localities of Snow Hill, Clerkenwell Green, Long Lane, Cow Lane, and Field Lane. It was most important to the health of the people in those localities that this open space should be kept clear of buildings. That large population had no other space whatever for their children to play on. But, although he had received an assurance from both Governments, neither of them had taken a step in the matter, but had left the ground in the same state in which it was left when the market was removed some years ago. The Government having done nothing in the matter the City authorities had proposed that the space should be appropriated to a dead-meat market, and for other purposes to which they might think proper to apply it. Their Lordships should recollect that there were no squares or open places in the City for the recreation of the people. He thought the Government should have taken possession of the ground in the name of the Crown, have railed it off, and have made it into a playground for the poor children of the neighbourhood. The reason why he had asked the question of which he had given notice was because he understood a plan had been submitted by certain parties for making a great railway terminus on the site of Smithfield. The company was not in posse but in esse, for an Act had been obtained from Parliament for making a railway which should bring the Great Northern and the London and North Western Railways to that part of the town, and the company had proposed to the Government a plan under which they would occupy the greater part of Smithfield. He hoped he should receive an assurance from the noble Duke that the Government did not mean to sanction this covetousness on the part of the Corporation of London. He wished to know whether the Government would persevere in keeping the space vacant, and further, whether they would take possession of it in the name of the Crown.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, the noble Lord was probably aware, though he had not stated it to the House, that the City had at that moment a Bill before the other House of Parliament sanctioning the formation of a dead-meat market on the site of Smithfield. Communications had taken place between the City authorities and the Home Office on this subject; and though no decision had yet been come to by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State he was bound to tell the noble Lord that the proposition had been received not unfavourably. At the same time he might state that the matter was still under consideration, and no answer which would at all compromise the Government had yet been given. He did not know at what stage the Bill had arrived, but he apprehended that some arrangement, involving the sanction of the Crown, must be come to before the Bill reached their Lordships' House.

The Marquess of Clanricarde

STAMP DUTIES BILL.
INCOME TAX BILL.

BILLS READ 2^a; 3^a; AND PASSED.

Orders of the Day for the Second Reading, and for Standing Orders Nos. 37 and 38, to be considered in order to their being dispensed with in the said Bill, read.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE: If I rightly understand the wish of the House, from the desire which was expressed on a former day by two or three noble Friends, and from the tacit assent of the remainder, I apprehend that it is not now desired to enter into a discussion at the present moment either of this measure or of the Income Tax Bill; but that a discussion should take place on the general financial scheme of the Government when some three or four other Bills are brought before us after Easter. If that be the feeling of the House, I shall act more in conformity with it by abstaining from debating the question, or from defending an enactment which there is no desire at present to assail. I shall, therefore, simply explain to your Lordships that the general scope of this Bill is to extend to various other articles of agreement in writing that principle of penny taxation which has been adopted with very great success for some years, and has produced, on the whole, a very considerable revenue. It was first adopted in the case of the Post Office by my noble Friend (Lord Monteagle) when Chancellor of the Exchequer in a former Government. It was carried further by my right hon. Friend the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, who imposed an uniform rate of 1d. on receipt stamps; a step further was made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the late Government when he imposed a similar stamp on bankers' cheques; and we now propose to extend the principle considerably further by imposing a small tax, varying from a penny to sixpence, on various other documents. I do not now enter into the question of stamps for a higher amount which are to be found in the present Bill. I am quite aware that objections have been raised to the measure on the ground that it interferes with trade and creates impediments of an undesirable nature. It is impossible to deny that any tax, however small, must have that tendency; but when it is believed—whether rightly or wrongly, I purposely abstain from entering into that question—that the general measures of the Government are largely calculated for the relief of the trade of the country, we have thought it not unfair that it should be called on to contribute a compensation to the revenue to an extent which it is well able to bear. With this short explanation, I beg now to move the Second Reading of these Bills, with the intimation that, if your Lordships should be willing to agree to it, I shall then move the suspension of the Standing Orders Nos. 37 and 38, with a view to both Bills being read a third time and passed.

Motion made and Question proposed, That the Stamp Duties Bill be now read the second time.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly; Committee negatived; Standing Orders Nos. 37 and 38 considered, and dispensed with; and Bill read 3^a, and passed.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE then moved that the Income Tax Bill be now read the second time, and said as their Lordships had been kind enough to allow him to pass the former Bill without a single word of observation, he would not further intrude upon their Lordships' time even with any explanation of the only two remarkable features in this Bill—that was to say the imposition of an additional penny in the tax, and why it was only imposed for one year. He apprehended that these points would all be raised in the discussion that was to take place after Easter, and, therefore, he would abstain from expressing any opinion whatever on them now.

Bill read 2^a; Standing Orders read, and dispensed with; Bill read 3^a and passed.

House adjourned at a Quarter before Six o'clock, till To-morrow, Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, April 2, 1860.

MINUTES.] NEW MEMBERS SWORN.—Sir William Russell, for Norwich; Edward Warner, esquire, for Norwich; The O'Connor Don, for Roscommon.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Prisons (Scotland); Police and Towns Improvement (Scotland) Act Amendment; Fisheries (Scotland); Public Charities. 3^o Bankrupt Law (Scotland) Amendment.

DIFFERENTIAL DUTIES.—(FRANCE).

SIR GEORGE LEWIS brought up Her Majesty's Gracious Answer to the Address presented to Her relative to the Differential Duties on shipping in French ports.

Answer to Address [29th March] reported, as follows :—

I have received your Address praying that I will enter into Negotiations with the Emperor of the French, with the view of making a Treaty for the reciprocal abrogation of all discriminating Duties levied upon the Vessels and their Cargoes of either of the two Nations in the Ports of the other; and for procuring such alterations in the Navigation Laws of France as may tend to facilitate the commercial intercourse and strengthen the friendly relations between England and France.

And I shall not fail to give such directions as may appear to Me to be best calculated to promote the object which you have in view.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY WITH FRANCE.—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Mr. Speaker, in laying [these papers—further Correspondence relating to the Affairs of Italy—upon the table, I wish to state shortly and generally their contents, and also to say a few words on the present state of affairs, as far as I can do so consistently with my public duty. We have thought it right to lay before Parliament the correspondence with M. Thouvenel, and in answer to a despatch which had already appeared in the public papers. That closes with a despatch from M. Thouvenel. We have replied on our part that we intend to keep the question of the neutralized parts of Savoy separate from the general question of the annexation of that province. There are likewise among this correspondence papers from Switzerland, containing an appeal to the Great Powers who signed the Treaty of Vienna on behalf of the neutrality of Switzerland, and a request that those Powers will meet in conference upon the subject. We have expressed no objection to going into conference, if that should be thought the best mode of dealing with the question. The papers also include a copy of the Treaty of Turin, which has been communicated both by Earl Cowley and Sir James Hudson. In the second article of that Treaty it is stated that it will be for the Emperor of the French to come to an understanding with the other Powers with respect to the neutralized portions of Savoy. We conclude, therefore, that there will be a serious examination of this important question, that it will be discussed with reason on all sides; and we hope that such propositions may be made as will be satisfactory to Switzerland, and will meet the views of the Powers of Europe generally.

LIGHTS AND BUOYS.—QUESTION.

MR. RIDLEY said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the Commissioners appointed on the 3rd day of December, 1858, to inquire into the condition and management of Lights, Buoys, and Beacons, have made their Report; and, if so, when he will lay it upon the Table of the House.

MR. MILNER GIBSON replied that the Report of the Commissioners had not yet been made, in consequence of the necessity of procuring extensive Returns from the Light House Authorities. He should be very glad to do anything in his power to promote the end in view, and he did not doubt that he should be able to lay the Report upon the Table before the close of the Session.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that in the absence of his noble Friend Viscount Palmerston, he wished to move, that upon Thursdays after Easter, and till Whitsuntide, Government Orders of the Day have precedence of Notices of Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,—

“That upon Thursdays, after Easter and till Whitsuntide, Government Orders of the Day have precedence of Notices of Motions.”

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he had no wish to embarrass the Government in the conduct of the public business, and was convinced that difficulties had been thrown in their way which would shortly render necessary the adoption of some remedial measures; but at the same time he thought that it was rather early in the Session for the Ministry to take possession of Thursday, which was one of the only two days a week that independent Members had for their Motions. He observed that the Motion was not to take possession of Thursdays till the end of the Session, but only those intervening between Easter and Whitsuntide. The fact, however, was that practically the Thursdays after Whitsuntide were of no value whatever to private Members, because they had not the slightest chance of getting through with any measures which were not in an advanced state at that time, seeing that they would only have the Wednesdays on which to discuss them. A practice had arisen in the House which had met with great favour, the discussing many public questions on the Motion of the adjournment from Friday to Monday, and the Government had shown an evident disinclination to interfere with it. He could not, however, but think that that practice must cause considerable inconvenience to the Government in retarding the transaction of business, and, if it continued, it would soon be necessary to adopt some arrangement for the more equal division of the time of the House between the Government and independent Members. During the last few weeks the Government, instead of having two evenings a week for their business had only had Mondays and three or four hours on Friday. On Friday last, for instance, the debate upon the adjournment of the House lasted so long that the Bills of the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not come on until 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning, when they were considered so hurriedly that he believed sundry errors had crept into them. He was of opinion, under these circumstances, that some better arrangement would have to be made for the conduct of public business; but at the same time he thought that it was only fair to private Members that the proposition now made by the noble Lord should be deferred till a later period of the Session.

MR. LINDSAY said, that he very much agreed in the views which had been expressed by the hon. and gallant Member. There was no precedent for taking Thursdays away from independent Members until after Whitsuntide, and he did not wish to create one. If they gave the Government too much time, they might be disposed to bestow less care and attention upon their measures. He admitted that independent Members frequently occupied too much time on Friday evenings, but thought that some arrangement might be made to meet that evil. The Government now had Mondays, Fridays, and Wednesdays—[“No, no!”] Well, then, he would say Mondays and Fridays; they had the same right of balloting for Tuesdays and Thursdays as was enjoyed by other hon. Members, and they had this advantage, that they had greater facilities for keeping a House, though on a recent occasion even they had not found that task a very easy one. The only object of the Government in taking these Thursdays must be to gain more time for their measures. He thought, however, the Government had already too much time given to them, and that they would not require more if their measures were better considered and more matured. There were certainly exceptions in that respect. For instance, the Budget, which, in his opinion, was a great and well-considered measure, had not occupied more time than was absolutely necessary, and was now pretty far advanced. Another great measure, the Bankruptcy Bill, had been so well considered and matured by the Attorney General that it had passed its first two stages without opposition. Had the amendment of the representation of the people been as well considered, and the views of persons both in and out of that House concerning it as well ascertained, he believed that a measure upon the subject—he did not say one that would have satisfied all parties, but one that would have been generally acceptable to the country—might have been passed in a fortnight. He was afraid the Reform Bill would occupy months in Committee, and perhaps fail to give satisfaction after all. He thought the Government should not seek to deprive private Members of Thursday till after Whitsuntide. He should take the sense of the House on the Motion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was sorry to hear the hon. Member say that he should take the sense of the House on the Motion, but he hoped at all events he would reserve his own vote until he was convinced that the request of the Government was an unreasonable one. The demand which the Government had made was really one prompted by a sense of public duty and public convenience, as well as by a regard to the state of public business. So far as his recollection went, there was no charge he had heard more frequently, and he must add very often more justly, brought against administrations than the charge that, by introducing very important measures at a very late period of the Session, they rendered it impossible for the House to give them due attention, and so had caused unnecessary delay in legislation. Now, whatever might

he said of the measures of the present Government, it must be admitted that they had taken some pains to bring forward, at the very outset of the Session, the most important measures which they intended to submit to Parliament. How did those measures stand. The hon. Member had said that the Reform Bill would occupy a month in Committee: but was that not one reason for taking time to discuss it? He had also said truly that the Attorney General had devoted great pains to the consideration of the Bankruptcy Bill; but he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) believed it to be the expectation of his right hon. and learned Friend that that Bill, however well matured it might have been, must necessarily, from its very nature, occupy a considerable portion of the time of the House in Committee. It was obvious that that Bill, unless sent to the House of Lords at a comparatively early period of the year, would not pass into law during the present Session, because the noble and learned Lords who guided the deliberations of that House would naturally take part in the question, and would require ample time for its consideration. It was true that owing to the great kindness of the House very considerable progress had been made in the measures of finance, but at the same time he could not calculate upon requiring less than from four to six entire evenings after Easter, to get rid of the various questions which still remained for discussion in connection with the Wine Licences Bill, with some particulars of the Paper Duty, with the question of the Malt drawbacks, and several other questions. It must also be remembered that the House was in a very backward state as regarded Supply. They had had only one or two evenings given to Supply, and it would be absolutely necessary that the House should devote several evenings before Easter to the subject. What was the available time at the disposal of the Government? He had listened with interest to the sanguine views of the hon. Member, who said that the Government in addition to Mondays and Fridays, had virtually got Wednesdays and Tuesdays and Thursdays. If could be shown they had got even a moiety of that very sanguine estimate the Government would have no reason to complain. He admitted that on two occasions the Government had occupied a portion of Thursday—once for some hours with the Bankruptcy Bill, and again for about an hour and a half with the Reform Bill:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

[An Hon. Member: The Tenant-right Bill.] It was likewise true that the Tenant-right Bill was introduced at a late hour on Thursday last. But on an average it would appear that the time which had been really at the disposal of the Government was only one evening and a half each week. The business of the Friday previous commenced, so far as the Government were concerned, at eight o'clock, when half the night was gone. The Government business of the preceding Friday commenced at nine o'clock, when more than half the night was gone. They had been obliged to compensate themselves for the many inroads upon their time by seeking for scraps and fragments at the end of other evenings. Members were kept until the latest hour on Friday evenings waiting for the Government business, until a miscellaneous, he was going to say, farrago, but he would say assemblage of subjects, had been disposed of in the singular manner in which they were commonly disposed of upon such occasions. Between Easter and Whitsuntide there were but five weeks available for discussion, which represented, even taking the sanguine estimate of two nights a week, ten nights available for the Government. Now, several nights would have to be given to the Estimates, from four to six would be required for the financial measures; the Bankruptcy Bill must be got into Committee before Whitsuntide; and something, he presumed, must be allowed for the second reading of the Reform Bill. He confidently submitted that he had made out a good case for that additional time, amounting to about five days, which the Government wanted between Easter and Whitsuntide.

MR. DISRAELI said, he was always disposed to accede to the requests of the Government for facilitating the progress of business, but at the same time it did occur to him that on the present occasion the request had not been brought forward and supported by those reasons which ought to induce the House to agree to it. In the first place, the Motion was made without the noble Lord who moved it condescending to offer a single reason in its favour. Since then the Chancellor of the Exchequer had brought his great powers of argument to support it; but, after all, what was the result of the argument the right hon. Gentleman had used? It was neither more nor less than this—that independent Members ought really to have no days at all. That was the legitimate conclusion, and no doubt the Government business would be in a much more advanced and satisfactory state if hon. Gentlemen had no privileges at all on two days of the week. There was, indeed, one argument of a more limited character in favour of the Motion, and that was, that at present the Government suffered very much from the arrangement which subsisted with regard to Friday. But he begged to remind the right hon. Gentleman that it was the head of his own Government, the leader of that House, who opposed the Motion which would have put an end to that which many hon. Gentlemen thought a great inconvenience and an abuse. He agreed, on the whole, though with conditions, to the course taken by the noble Viscount; but it was not open to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the part of the Government, to complain now of the conduct of the House with respect to proceedings on the Motion for adjournment on Friday, when the Government, by their principal representative, had decided that the existing arrangement was convenient to the House and advantageous to the conduct of public business. After all, generally speaking, had the Government any right to complain of the manner in which their business had been received by the House? They had brought forward measures of considerable importance, which met with opposition from the majority of the Gentlemen who sat on the other side of the House on principle, and legitimate opportunities were taken to oppose them on principle, but the House studiously refrained from embarrassing the Government on matters of detail, because they thought that, having decided by a large majority on the principle of the measure, and there being many difficulties of detail, it would be unfair to take advantage of those difficulties. In consequence of this great progress had been made in the measures, and it did appear to him somewhat unreasonable that hon. Gentlemen should now be asked to give up their privileges on Thursdays in the interval between Easter and Whitsuntide, when it was remembered that the Government had not only been treated with great moderation on the part of the House, but also had availed themselves, he believed, on four occasions, of those very nights. As independent Members had not yet had fair opportunity of bringing forward many Motions which they might think important, and had given up many of their opportunities without demurring, he thought it unreasonable that they should be deprived of further opportunities in the interval between Easter and Whitsuntide. Therefore it was, he conceived, his duty, though he performed it somewhat reluctantly, to oppose the Motion.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he must admit that all the important measures brought forward by the Government this Session—he might perhaps mention one exception—had been met by the House in a spirit of fair discussion, and that no delay had been interposed beyond that which was necessary to enable hon. Members to express their opinions. He disclaimed therefore altogether the notion that this Motion was brought forward in any spirit of complaint. Possibly, in the case of the exception he had referred to—the Reform Bill—the Government might have some reason to complain of the manner in which the second reading had been opposed, but really this proposition was not made in the interest of the Government, but rather in that of the House. It mattered but little to the Members of the Government, who were compelled to be in town the greater part of the year, how long the Session lasted, but it was to the interest of the public service, and in an imperial sense to the interests of the House itself that the business of the Session should not be unnecessarily delayed. It was in accordance with the ordinary practice for the House at a later period of the Session to adopt the arrangement which they were now asked to assent to, and the only difference in the present instance was that the House was asked to give that assent somewhat earlier than usual. But the reason was obvious: the circumstances of the Session were exceptional—there was an unusual pressure of public business, which it was necessary to get through—and it was for the House to take its choice, either to give the Government the Thursdays for that purpose, or to sit till a later period. There was this Session, much earlier than usual, a large accumulation of important measures which it was essential to the public service should be proceeded with, and the proposition therefore was in fact offering to the House the means of getting through that business, which must be got through, at a period of the year which would suit the convenience of hon. Members generally, so that they might be enabled to bring the Session to a close at a time beyond which hon. Members wished not to remain in town. Hon. Gentlemen had spoken of the time which the Government had for proceeding with the public business of the country as compared with that which was at the disposal of private Members of the House; but the real fact was that the Government had only the Monday and about half of the Friday which they could call their own, while private Members had the Tuesday, the Wednesday, the Thursday, and the privilege of raising discussions upon the Motion of adjournment to the Monday—one-half in fact of the Friday. Now he must say, with all respect for the House, and with every regard for the privileges of private Members, that this was a most unequal division of the public time. The right hon. Gentleman opposite said that he (Viscount Palmerston) refused when a Motion was brought forward for that purpose on a former occasion to interfere with that faculty or power which private Members possessed of bringing forward Motions on the question of the adjournment of the House from the Friday to the Monday. That was quite true, and he did so because he thought it undesirable to interfere with the privilege which, by the established usages of the House, hon. Members had of bringing forward important questions of pressing interest on that day, which otherwise they might find it difficult to bring to the attention of the House; and though he must say that that privilege had been rather largely used of late, he did not think it would be wise on that ground to abolish it. The Government, nevertheless, did not propose to interfere with that privilege, but only on the ground of the pressure of public business, in some degree consequent upon the extensive use which had been made of that privilege during the present Session, to take, with the consent of the House, one other day, on which those measures which were of general public importance should be proceeded with. After the explanation of his right hon. Friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) of the measures which would have to be gone through between this and Whitsuntide, and, considering that it only proposed a temporary arrangement, he hoped the House would consent to the Motion.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON observed that in reference to the statement of the First Lord of the Treasury that there had been one exception to the mode in which the Government business had been suffered to proceed, he (Sir J. Pakington) must remark that the Reform Bill was the one measure of all others to which no complaint could apply; and if that measure had lingered in its progress the Government must admit that the fault did not lie with the Opposition. The noble Lord could not suppose that in the case of a Bill of that importance the House would proceed to the second reading at once and without discussion. He had been led by a person connected with the Government to expect that if the debate on that measure was not resumed last week it would be resumed this week; at any rate the delay had not rested with the Opposition, but with the Government, and it had been their own plan to postpone that discussion till the day for which it now stood. With respect to this Motion, he must observe that the Government had already had the greatest number of Thursdays during the present Session for proceeding with their own business. Tuesdays and Thursdays were considered as days set apart for private Members; but the Government had already, to a considerable degree, trenched upon this right. He would remind the noble Lord that this was a matter which lay very much in the hands of the Government themselves. If the system of desultory conversations on the Fridays was to continue, it ought, for the sake of the Government and of the transaction of public business, to be placed under some restriction, for nothing was more unsatisfactory than the way in which private Members, under the mere pretext of the Motion for adjournment, monopolized half the Government evening with discussions so ill-conducted that it was almost impossible to understand what was talked about. This was a matter which the Government should consider before they proposed to encroach on the rights of independent Members. He trusted the Government would not press the present Motion, but defer taking the Thursdays until after Whitsuntide.

Viscount Palmerston

MR. RICH said, that considering the many assaults which had been made by successive Governments upon the privileges of private Members, he thought that they would do well to make a stand and resist this Motion. It would be a dangerous precedent to depart from the practice which had so long prevailed without a special reason being given. At the same time he admitted that the Government Friday had been rather unscrupulously encroached upon, but some provision might be made for the more regular conduct of business on that evening.

MR. BENTINCK said, it appeared to him that the Government had not made out any case in support of the proposal of the noble Lord. The Government said they had been prompted in their proceeding by a sense of public duty; but the noble Lord admitted that there had been no unnecessary delay, and the fact was the Government had encumbered themselves with too much business, and had miscalculated the time necessary for getting through the business which they desired to transact. The fault must lie with themselves, and it was most unfair on their part to propose a new mode of dealing with their own difficulty. The noble Lord said that this was only a temporary arrangement, but what the noble Lord called a temporary arrangement would possibly pass into a most dangerous precedent and ultimately become the practice of the House. The principal point to which he meant to advert was, that the whole tendency of the practice of Governments drawn from both sides of the House had been for some time past to stifle the right of independent Members. He hoped the House would not accede to this proposal, and that private Members, on the contrary, would be induced to compare the time now at their disposal with the time which used to be allotted to them some years since. Then Gentlemen could raise a debate on a petition as well as upon almost every question. That right had, however, been extinguished, and it was matter for consideration whether independent Members should not now claim the restoration of their old privileges.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he thought that there was nothing unreasonable in the request of the Government. What was it that they asked? They merely asked that four Thursdays between this and Whitsuntide should be given to the public business. It was urged that it would be an exception to their usual practice; but was not this an exceptional Session? They had the Reform Bill to discuss, and if the proposal of Government was not acceded to they might sit until December.

MR. DEEDES said, he doubted very much whether the noble Lord, if the arrangement suggested were agreed to, would advance the Government business. The Government, in his opinion, would do much better if they gave up the Fridays to private Members, and took the Thursdays themselves. By this means they would avoid the loss of time consequent on the miscellaneous discussion on the ordinary Friday Motion for adjourning the House to the Monday.

MR. CLAY said, he thought that, under present circumstances, looking to the exceptional amount of business before the House, the Motion was a reasonable one; but it should be understood, if granted, that it was not to be converted into a precedent. [Laughter]. Hon. Gentlemen might laugh, but he (Mr. Clay) should certainly be content with the assurance of the Prime Minister that no precedent would be made of the Motion.

LORD STANLEY said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel French) had described this as an exceptional Session. So, in one sense, it was; though not perhaps in the sense in which the hon. and gallant Gentleman intended; because there had not for many years past been a Session in which so much time, which should be at the disposal of independent Members, had been in practice appropriated by the Government. Turning back to the last few weeks, he found that on Thursday, the 1st of March, there was a discussion on Customs' Duties; on March 8, the Address in favour of the Treaty was moved; on the 15th, there was another debate and a division on the Customs' Duties, and the Bankruptcy Bill was introduced; on Thursday the 22nd, there was a discussion on the Reform Bill; and on the 29th, one upon the Income Tax and Stamp Duties. There had absolutely not been one Thursday from the beginning of the Session down to the present time, of which a part at least had not been devoted to Government business. The demand made by the Government was an exceptional one, for which, at this time of the year, there was no precedent within his Parliamentary recollection. Nor was there any justification for such a demand in the state of business. Parliament had begun to sit considerably earlier than usual; the Government—and he said it to their credit—had taken the earliest opportunity of bringing on the most important business of the year; and their financial business was in a state of greater progress than usual at this time of year. On what ground, then, did this demand rest? Generally, it was true, the Civil Service Estimates had been presented before April; and it was not usual to have one set of Army Estimates submitted, and then withdrawn that others might be substituted in their place. But there was no good reason for acceding to the Motion, which, as had been said, would be set up as a precedent hereafter. If independent Members too easily surrendered their Thursdays, then they would not be likely to get them at a similar period another year. As to the discussions on the adjournment which took place on Friday evenings, if the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) were again to submit his Motion on this subject, it would meet with a very different reception from that accorded to it before. But he believed it to be the general feeling on both sides of the House that such a demand as was now made, could not reasonably be pressed upon the House.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he would remind his noble Friend (Lord Stanley), that when the Government had taken Thursday evenings for forwarding their measures it was after the notices of Motions had been disposed of—a course to which he could hardly conceive any objection could be made. He would ask the House to consider the important change which had of late taken place in regard to the amount of legislative business which the Government were called upon to undertake and conduct through Parliament—a change which was by no means conducive to the progress of business. According to the old custom, the Government hardly ever brought in any measures. They proposed their Budget and their Estimates at a certain time; but there the duty of the Government ended, and Members who wished to bring in measures on any subject did so. Of late years, however, as everybody knew, the House had insisted that the Government should take up any important subject which happened to require legislation. He had tried in vain to resist the pressure; but the House had always said in such cases, “This is a question for the Government, and it will be disgraceful in them if they do not deal with it.” In that way one subject after another was forced upon the Government, and the result was to throw upon them the responsibility of preparing and passing through Parliament at least ten times as many measures as they were formerly required to undertake. But while the amount of labour had been increased by the compulsory pressure of the House, there was on the other hand a diminution in the time during which it must be performed, and as his noble Friend had shown, of the business days of which the week consisted one and a half only went to the Government, the other three and a half being, according to the practice of the House, taken up by private

Lord Stanley

Members. Thus the Government which had three-fourths of the whole legislative business of Parliament in its hands, was left with only one-fourth of the time. His hon. Friend (Mr. Rich) thought the present arrangement satisfactory, because it was the old established practice. Now, what was the working of this old established practice? A number of important Bills were brought in by the Government at an early period of the Session—take as an instance the Bankruptcy Bill; it was brought forward with great applause, it was afterwards read a second time with still greater applause. In Committee, however, it would very probably be found that the few objections which had been raised on the second reading would swell out immensely. Points deserving of careful consideration would be raised. The House would take great pains in order to settle the clauses in such a way as should be most satisfactory to the commercial community. Much time would necessarily be consumed in this way, the Government having meanwhile to carry the Estimates and transact the ordinary business of the year; and perhaps, in the month of July the Bill would pass a third reading. It would then be sent up to the House of Peers, where it would be declared impossible for the law Lords at such a time of year to attend to so many details; and the whole time of this House as well as the legislative skill and ability which had been bestowed upon the measure would thus be utterly wasted. The Government simply wished to improve the system under which the business of the House was conducted. They thought it would be desirable, instead of having discussions upon a variety of subjects leading to no definite conclusion, to have a system established under which the attention of the House would be directed to the substantial legislation of the country. If, however, such a proposition were objected to, he thought that the suggestion of the hon. Member for Kent (Mr. Deedes), would be an improvement upon the present practice, because the Government could then get Thursdays for their own business instead of Fridays, which would be given to the House. At present the Government were only able to obtain a portion of the Friday.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, he would beg leave to suggest a plan by which the Government could get their measures forward between Easter and Whitsuntide without disturbing the established rules of the House. The noble Lord spoke smilingly and mysteriously of a certain important measure that had been postponed from day to day. He presumed that the measure regarding the representation of the people was the one alluded to. But how was it that a measure affecting the constitution of the country should be received with such indifference, and in such an apathetic and sneering manner by all parties inside and outside of that House? He thought if the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs would but allow his "poor little Bill" to be dropped and buried under the floor of the House, with a requiescat in pace, everything would go on well, and there would be no tears shed over it, and the Government would have little difficulty in proceeding with their other measures.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH submitted that it had been shown that the Government had monopolized almost all the Thursdays already. They had, further, the power of encroaching upon the privileges of private Members by resorting to an expedient which was sometimes adopted to arrest the progress of a measure or debate which was objectionable or inconvenient to them. Under such circumstances he did not think that the Government could fairly ask for any further accommodation from the House; above all, they had no right to ask private Members to surrender to them those few remaining privileges which they possessed. He hoped that the House would not assent to such a proposition.

MR. PAULL said, he would remind the House that he had proposed a Resolution with a view to the transaction of the business of the House in a more convenient and orderly manner. The Government, no doubt, had two days in the week assigned to them for their business, but it could scarcely be said that they had the full advantage of those days. He thought that those days should be given to the Government without interruption. That was the object which he had in view when he had made his proposition. At the same time he was not disposed to forego the privileges already possessed by private Members. He should support any arrangement that would give the Government the full advantage of two days in the week without interruption, but at the same time he was opposed to the proposition of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie). He thought that the House was generally desirous of preserving the privileges of independent Members in submitting certain questions for consideration on Friday evenings. It was, in his opinion, most objectionable to introduce any precedents interfering with the privileges of private Members; because if they once established a precedent of the kind it would be most difficult to retract it.

SIR CHARLES DOUGLAS said, he did not think the House had any just reason to complain of the Government proposition, when it was considered that, in addition to the two days at their disposal, hon. Members exercised largely the privilege of bringing forward questions on the Motion of adjournment to Monday. He did not think, however, that the Government would gain their object if they pressed the question against the feeling of a large minority of the House. He hoped, therefore, the Government would well consider that point before they divided the House. He, in common with some other Members, had been returned to that House for the purpose of endeavouring to reform it, and he believed the country would not be satisfied unless they brought that question to an early issue. There would only be five weeks after they met again before Whitsuntide, and unless the Bill passed that House before Whitsuntide, there would be little chance of its passing the House of Lords this Session.

MR. WALPOLE said, the question had been discussed upon two grounds, which ought to be kept perfectly distinct. The one was the special ground, applicable only to the present year. The other was the general ground, applicable to the mode in which the course of business was usually conducted. In regard to the special ground, he did not think that a case had been made out for assenting to the proposition of the noble Lord. Ordinarily speaking, the financial statement of the Government was not proposed until after Easter; and all the measures consequent upon that were usually taken in the months of May and June. During the present year the financial statement had been very properly brought on at an early period, and that circumstance had apparently thrown into the background the Resolutions in Committee of Supply. In regard to financial measures they were clearly in advance, and he was inclined to think that in the general business of the country they were not more backward than in former years. Consequently, he did not think that a special ground had been made out for interfering with the right of independent Members in bringing forward their Motions on the proper opportunities. But he owned he was struck with the general ground urged by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. It seemed to him that they had really come to the stage when it would be well for those who guided the deliberations of the House and his right hon. Friends on the front bench below him to consider what new mode, for the arrangement of the public business, might be conveniently adopted. When he wished to press on the Government was this—it seemed to him that unless the Government obtained the general acquiescence of the House to their proposition, they would be rather losing time in the progress of business than gaining it. He had looked at the Notice Paper for the Thursday after the holidays, and he found upon it two Notices and one Order of the Day of the Government—that for the repeal of Sir John Barnard's Act. No other business was as yet set down, and it was impossible as yet to ascertain what business might be fixed for that day besides that to which he had referred. But would they be justified, upon so short a notice, in depriving independent Gentlemen of the opportunity of discussing the two first notices already set down for the first Thursday after the Easter holidays? His opinion was that the Government ought to give notice of their intention to bring forward a proposition after Easter to consider the best mode of disposing of the business of the House on Tuesdays and Thursdays, and particularly in reference to the course of business on Fridays. He believed by that course they would facilitate business much more satisfactorily than by pressing their proposition at that moment. He doubted very much whether the Motion before the House would not occasion much disappointment amongst the independent Members of the House. He, therefore, urged upon the noble Viscount the propriety of withdrawing the present proposition, and of bringing forward a distinct proposition on the subject immediately after Easter as to the general course of business, when he believed the great body of the House would give him their support.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH remarked, that he was anxious that the Government should have their two days clear for the discussion of public business, but without infringing on the rights of private Members.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he thought it would be necessary, if they intended to make any alteration in the course of business, that it should be made before Easter. He concurred with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Walpole) in thinking that it would be useless to press the proposition unless with the general assent of the House, inasmuch as it was purely a question for the general convenience of the House and the public, and not one in which the Government was specially interested. He believed, however, there was a very general opinion that the practice which had grown up of taking the greater part of Friday night for the discussion of general questions should be checked, or some compensation given to the Government for the loss of time which they thereby sustained; and, if he was not mistaken, there was a very general feeling in favour of the Motion proposed a few evenings ago by the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Paull). He would take the liberty of proposing an addition to the Motion of his noble Friend (Lord J. Russell), which he hoped would be acceptable to the House. It was to add the words "and that Notices of Motion have precedence of all Orders of the Day on Fridays." That proposal was, of course, limited to the time between Easter and Whitsuntide, and the effect of it would be to make an experiment for that time of the Motion proposed by the hon. Member for St. Ives.

Mr. Walpole

Amendment proposed, at the end of the Question, to add the words, "and that Notices of Motions have precedence of Orders of the Day upon Fridays."

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman did not intend to call upon the House to affirm his proposition at the present moment. The right hon. Gentleman should first give notice of his intention to move the addition of those words. What had been stated as to the disappointment which the adoption of the Resolution would occasion to independent Members was, in his mind, a strong argument in favour of due notice being given of the proposition. He was very sorry at having unintentionally stood in the way of the adoption of the Motion of the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Paull) in which he concurred, by assenting to the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) to refer the question to a Select Committee. He thought the best plan would be to refer the whole case to the consideration of a Select Committee after Easter.

LORD HARRY VANE said, the subject was not before the House for the first time. The Motion of the hon. Member for St. Ives and that of the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) had necessarily had the effect of calling attention to the subject, and he could not but think that without an inquiry by a Select Committee the House was perfectly prepared to decide the question. He thought Government had no reason to complain of the conduct of the House this Session, seeing that a great number of Thursdays had actually been given up to them. But there was a general feeling that the time of the House was much wasted by the desultory discussions which took place on Fridays. He hoped therefore the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman would be acceded to.

MR. A. MILLS observed that they had wasted an hour and a half in this discussion. He hoped that Government would accede to the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Walpole) and postpone the subject till after Easter.

MR. AYRTON said, he objected to the House being hurried into the adoption of any such changes as were proposed, and therefore he wished to urge upon the Government the propriety of withdrawing the Motion, and bringing it forward after Easter. If Thursday were made a Government day instead of Friday, it would probably come to be felt that the public business of the week was over; hon. Members would leave town, and the House would be counted out every Friday. He would suggest to the noble Lord to amend his Motion by giving all Orders of the Day precedence on Thursdays, so as to include the Bills of independent Members as well as those of the Government.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I rise to a point of order. I wish to know from you whether it is competent to the House to change a Standing Order without notice.

MR. SPEAKER: I do not understand this to be a Motion to change a Standing Order of the House. If this Motion were carried, the Standing Order would remain. It is only proposed to make a change for a certain number of days between Easter and Whitsuntide. I do not think, therefore that it is necessary to repeal the Standing Order for this purpose.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the words of the Standing Order itself were, "unless the House should otherwise direct." Of course the addition he proposed would be a direction to the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, it was the opinion of the Select Committee which sat to consider the forms and procedure of the House, that even the suspension of a Standing Order ought not to be made without notice. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Henley) had on Saturday drawn attention to the fact that several hon. Members who were chairmen of quarter sessions would be absent on the present occasion. Now, in the category of Members who attended quarter sessions were many hon. Gentlemen who took a most useful part in the business of the House. There were other and grave reasons why changes in the procedure of the House should not be made without notice; but upon this ground alone he should support the suggestion of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) that this change in the Standing Order ought not to be made without notice.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he could not consent to give up both Thursday and Friday for Government business. But the change proposed by his right hon. Friend (Sir George Grey) was in the nature of an experiment during the interval between Easter and Whitsuntide. If the experiment did not succeed the House could go back to its original practice. If, on the other hand, the change was found to be an improvement upon the present practice, if it favoured the despatch of business—if, above all, business came on when Members anticipated it would be taken, it would then be easy to make a change in the Standing Orders.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The House divided:—Ayes 150; Noes 126: Majority 24.

Upon the Question that the Motion, as amended, be agreed to,

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he thought that the change proposed was a very unwise one, and would tend only to prolong indefinitely the conversazione with which the House was regaled every Friday evening. It would be much better to arrange that on Fridays the Orders of the Day should be proceeded with at a specified hour, say seven o'clock.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he would repeat his objection, which was as strong against the Motion as a whole as it was against that portion of it which had been already adopted. The Standing Orders ought not to be changed or suspended without notice, and he would urge the House not to decide rashly a question which might seriously influence the future course of business.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN thought the House had better try the utility of the Resolution just agreed to for a few weeks after Easter, and if the inconvenience which was feared really arose, he would be the first to vote against the plan.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE observed that if the privileges of independent Members were curtailed by the Government, it must be expected that those Members would avail themselves of every opportunity that might present itself for the purpose of discharging their duty to their constituents. He regretted that such Motions should be forced on against the general wish of the House.

MR. BENTINCK said, he wished to protest against the idea that the change was only to be an experiment, and to express his fear that if once sanctioned it would be established permanently. If independent Members were prepared tamely to submit to the arrangement proposed, they might as well put on their hats and leave the House.

Main Question, as amended, put.

The House divided:—Ayes 142; Noes 117: Majority 25.

Resolved,

“That upon Thursdays, after Easter and till Whitsuntide, Government Orders of the Day have precedence of Notices of Motions, and that Notices of Motions have precedence of Orders of the Day upon Fridays.”

MR. DISRAELI:—In consequence of the vote to which the House has just arrived, considerable changes must take place in the conduct of public business. In the course of a few hours the House will adjourn, and it would be convenient if the noble Lord could give us some information as to the mode in which the public business will be conducted after Easter. I would remind the House that there are two subjects of great importance—of great interest to the House generally, but particularly important to the great Liberal party—namely, the measure for the abolition of church rates and the measure for the reform of the House of Commons. Now, it so happens that by the change which has taken place in the order of conducting the public business it is impossible for the church-rates question, which is a notice of Motion, to come on on Thursday, which has now become an Order Day, and the notice given by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs for the resumption of the debate on the Reform Bill cannot now come on on Friday, the 20th, because that Order Day has been transformed into a Notice Day. Now, it would be very much to our convenience if the noble Lord would inform us when the resumption of the debate on the second reading of the Reform Bill will be taken, and also if the hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock (Sir J. Trelawny)—if he is in the House—will favour us by stating what are his intentions with regard to the third reading of the Church Rates Abolition Bill?

Mr. Newdegate

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, the arrangements proposed are, that we should take the Navy Estimates on Monday after the re-assembling of the House; on Thursday the finance; and on the Monday following the second reading of the Reform Bill.

MR. MALINS said, that there was a Bill of extraordinary length, consisting of 570 clauses before the House—the new Bankruptcy Bill—he begged to know when that would be taken?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he could not then answer the Question.

COLONEL KNOX asked whether it would be army or Navy Estimates on the Monday?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, they proposed to take the Navy Estimates.

COLONEL HERBERT said, that with regard to the Army Estimates the House had been informed that they had been delayed in consequence of the return of several regiments from India. As this must necessarily occasion great delay, he begged to ask upon what day they would be presented again?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that a considerable portion of these Estimates had to be reprinted, and the immense mass of figures in them took time. He would, however, lay them on the table on the first day the House met after the recess.

SARDINIA AND THE DUCHIES.

QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government have advised Her Majesty to recognize the annexation of Bologna, Tuscany, Modena, and Parma to the kingdom of Sardinia; and, if so, whether he is prepared to state the reasons which have induced the Government to tender such advice to Her Majesty?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, in reply to the question of the hon. Gentleman, I beg to state that the King of Sardinia has not taken any new title, but his dominions have been enlarged by the annexation of Lombardy; and I have no hesitation in saying that we have advised Her Majesty to consider the new part of the King's dominions as forming part of his kingdom of Sardinia. The hon. Gentleman probably knows that as soon as the Austrian troops left Bologna, the Papal authorities left it likewise, and the country was left without any Government. In Tuscany, as soon as the Grand Duke left Florence, the grand-ducal authorities also left. At Modena the same thing occurred. The Duchess of Parma showed more courage and determination, but still she was obliged to leave her dominions. These different states have re-constituted themselves of their own accord, and annexed themselves to the dominions of the King of Sardinia. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to go further into the matter and inquire into the causes which induced the people of those states to leave their former sovereigns, and their motives for so doing, he will have to give notice of a Motion on the subject.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE asked whether the noble Lord had any objection to produce any recent correspondence between the Government and Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Rome, Mr. Russell?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, there was no Chargé d'Affaires at Rome. Mr. Russell was only an Attaché to the Ministry at Florence. He had laid on the table from time to time some letters from Mr. Russell to the Home Government, and he did not think there were any more which it was necessary to produce.

CUSTOMS ACTS.—COMMITTEE.
House in Committee according to Order; Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.
(In the Committee.)

Resolution 20,
“That in aid of the Charges of Customs' Establishments incident to the conduct of Trade and to the statistical accounts thereof there shall be charged as follows upon all articles, except Corn, Grain, or Flour, and Timber and Wood goods, upon the importation thereof,—

Per package or parcel	s.	d.
Animals, per head	0	1
Goods in bulk, for each unit of entry

With power to the Lords of the Treasury to frame regulations for adjusting the amount of such payments in certain cases by altering the unit of entry, or quantity, or number of goods which is to form the unit of entry for the purpose of this charge, so that the charge shall, as little as may be, exceed one quarter per cent on the goods of the lowest value usually imported under the denomination; and every person entering goods for exportation at the Custom House shall be required to present to the proper Officer of Customs a copy of his bill of lading in respect of such goods, with a correct endorsement thereon of the particulars and value of the goods comprised in such bill of lading, and that such copy of the bill of lading so presented shall be deemed the entry outwards for such goods, and be charged with a duty of 1 6”

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there was no necessity to trouble the Committee with any lengthened details, but merely to explain the relation in which this Resolution stood to the original Resolution No. 11. At that time it was proposed to make a charge of 1d. upon all articles of import and export alike, with certain adjustments, so as to keep it within a certain proportion of the value of the goods. It was also proposed to levy charges on articles removed in bond and on operations in warehouses. The total proceeds of these charges as originally proposed were calculated at £420,000—namely, £300,000 from the penny charge; £60,000 from the charge on goods removed; and £60,000 from the charge on operations in warehouses. But there were various points, particularly in respect to the charges on goods removed and on operations in warehouses, which were received with a great deal of doubt, distrust, and even disapproval by those classes in the mercantile world immediately affected by them; and he was bound to say that, as originally framed, they would probably have tended to restrict the application of the warehousing system, which was so highly beneficial to the country. There was some difficulty in the application of the penny registration to the trade, particularly the export trade, which for revenue purposes was not so easily managed as the import trade. The export trade had entailed the principal sacrifice which he was about to make. At one time he was disposed to get rid of the difficulty felt in the adjustment of the penny rate, by reverting to a charge ad valorem of 2s. 6d. per cent. Doubtless that charge would have had some great recommendation. It would have been levied in a very simple manner, and it would have had the effect of establishing that immediate relation between the statistical accounts of the country and the value of the goods which would have made it, to a certain extent, the duty of the Custom-house officers to check the value of the goods, and in that manner would have enabled us probably to attain what he had always looked upon as a most important public object apart from the fiscal operation of the Resolution—namely, a much greater correctness of the statistical accounts of goods of export. The accounts of the exports on which we so much relied, on which we founded such important arguments, and which formed the basis of a considerable part of our political policy, were in many of their details exceedingly inaccurate. [Mr. NEWDEGATE: Hear, hear!] The objection to the ad valorem duty was that it offered—not to merchants, but to the smaller agents—perpetual temptation to petty fraud, therefore he entertained with great willingness a proposition on behalf of the mercantile community to substitute a fixed sum, to be levied by way of stamp on bills of lading outwards, and the Government were disposed to regard this proposition the more favourably because it tended to increase the accuracy of the statistics. The usage at present was for three bills of lading to be drawn and given to the parties concerned. These were countersigned by the different persons who were responsible, and they were liable to bear a stamp of 6d. each. The proposal had been that in all cases a fourth bill of lading should be given similarly countersigned, and certifying to contain an accurate account of the goods. That would supply, according to the estimates of the proposers, from £100,000 to £120,000 to the Exchequer. Taking, however, the bill of lading as they now proposed to do, with the stamp of 1s. 6d., they did not estimate that it would yield more than £60,000. As the plan was originally suggested to Parliament he should have expected to raise a considerably greater sum than that from the penny charge on exports. They had reckoned on obtaining nearly £300,000. As the plan now stood it would produce on imports about £170,000, and on the stamp on bills of lading outwards £60,000, making together £230,000; thus involving a sacrifice of some £70,000. Nor was that the whole amount of reduction as the other Resolutions would yield considerably less, even if they stood as they now did, than under the original estimate. The second Resolution related to goods removed under bond, and would produce somewhat less than it would have done under its original form. The Estimate at first stood at between £50,000 and £60,000; now it was about £50,000. The third Resolution dealt with charges on operations in warehouse. The rate on those operations had been so much reduced that instead of producing from £60,000 to £70,000, the Resolution in its present shape would produce only £30,000. There was still an indisposition on the part of many Gentlemen connected with the trade to see this principle of charge for operations in warehouse adopted. They did not dispute its justice but its policy in respect to the convenience of commerce. He was not prepared to abandon the Resolution, but as those who were opposed to it were still engaged in considering what substitute less open to objection they could suggest, he was quite willing to let the question stand over till after the Easter recess. On the whole, then, there would be a surrender of revenue, as compared with the original Estimate, of from £100,000 to £120,000, even assuming the third Resolution to be either passed or replaced by one equally productive. That surrender they might safely venture to make. The state of the revenue was good, and the changes of arrangement that had been made in the course of their discussions had been favourable to the Exchequer rather than otherwise. The sacrifice he had mentioned would, therefore, not impair the stability of the calculations for the year, especially as they would still attain the objects of policy which they originally had in view. Effectual precaution had now been taken under the first Resolution against the oppressive operation of the penny charge on packages. As regarded certain imports that simple impost would prove very onerous, the most conspicuous illustration of this being the case of boxes of fruit imported from the East, and which were used for filling up irregular spaces in cargoes called "broken stowage."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman. Some time since he (Mr. Newdegate) had brought under the consideration of the House the fact that the exports from the port of Liverpool were grossly overvalued. There were now no duties on exports, and no one could anticipate that the exporter would undervalue his goods, because he could gain no advantage by undervaluation, which would be used against him in the market to which his goods were being sent. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he would take any additional steps to provide that the declared value should be more accurately given than heretofore. The trader was not likely to cry down his own goods before they reached their market, and he believed that the declared value had been considerably exaggerated. During a laborious course of examination, the actual value of the imports and exports of this country, for seven years, he discovered that the declared value of goods exported was generally above the real value, very considerably above the real value of the goods. Then with regard to the imports, he was afraid that notwithstanding the right hon. Gentleman's statistical arrangements increased accuracy, a greater accuracy, or even equal accuracy with that which had been obtained under the system that had hitherto prevailed, could not be hoped for. When there was an ad valorem duty it was the business of the Custom-house to ascertain the value of the imports. They, therefore, became cognizant of their value; and the statistical department of the Board of Trade was furnished with information which now they had lost; for when all duty upon the great bulk of the articles imported was abolished, the inducement to accurate examination ceased. It appeared to him that they would have the quantities given of the exports and imports, but nothing more, under the proposed arrangement. He asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he thought it possible, or whether he intended, to adopt means to ensure increased accuracy with regard to the declared value of our exports?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER did not think that the hon. Gentleman was accurate in his impression that the value of the exports was systematically overstated. On the contrary, the exports were often not entered at all, not unfrequently they were entered twice over, sometimes they were entered too low; sometimes too high; but he did not think there was reason to believe that they were systematically overstated. On the contrary, he would be inclined to think that they were understated. He did not think there were adequate motives for overstating the value, and, speaking in the presence of many hon. Gentlemen who were well informed on the subject, he judged by this reason, that up to the year 1845 they had an ad valorem tax of 10s. per cent. When that tax was levied upon the exports there was a motive for understating the value. Trade at that time was growing rapidly; still that 10s. could have hardly had any material effect on an undervaluing of the return, and this the figures showed. When that tax ceased there was no sudden start, no great increase in the returns immediately, although an increase occurred some years afterwards. He thought, therefore, it was unnecessary to check the import returns upon this ground. But the values were delivered to the Customs at present by junior clerks of mercantile establishments, and they were not attested by responsible persons upon a bill of lading. It were desirable that this attestation should be secured; but as regarded the imports he thought no additional security would be necessary. He did not think any additional security was required.

MR. LINDSAY said, that he doubted very much whether the right hon. Gentleman would obtain all he expected from his proposals. At present there was a large class of goods imported in small packages, known amongst shippers as "broken stowage," and which were taken for half freight by shipowners, because they could be conveniently used for filling up small spaces. The result of this tax of 1d. on packages would be that a number of small ones would be put into one large one, and not then being useful as broken stowage, they would be charged full freight, and thus the consumer would pay double what he paid before. Again, the great bulk of our imports were now free of duty, but a charge would be created on all by this penny tax. At the Custom-house journal and ledger entries would be required for every penny or sixpence that was charged, so that in many cases the cost of collection would be greater than the revenue obtained. The additional 1s. 6d. on the fourth bill of lading he understood was merely for the purpose of securing correct statistical returns to the Custom-house, not for raising an additional revenue. But its operation would be extremely unjust. If a bill of lading represented goods not worth more than 5s., it would be taxed 1s. 6d.; while one representing £10,000 would only pay the same. To carry out the system would entail an immense amount of labour, much more than the Chancellor of the Exchequer supposed. He hoped that this Resolution also would be deferred until after Easter.

MR. T. BARING said, that though the amended Resolutions were preferable to those originally proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the grave objection remained that they introduced fresh complications into the operations of trade—subjected those engaged in trade to petty and vexatious payments—and introduced a system which it had been the object of past legislation to put an end to by simplifying as much as possible the process of buying and selling. No doubt after the sanction given by the House to the removal of duties upon a variety of articles which he believed ought to have been maintained—a removal which would neither benefit the revenue nor the consumer—he admitted that some substitute must be found. A more regular substitute, however, might have been found than this 1*d.* charge upon every package—especially when the right hon. Gentleman was obliged to leave a regulating power to the Lords of the Treasury. He thought that the penny system was an erroneous one. It had succeeded remarkably well in the Post Office; but there the rate had been reduced to a penny from a much higher amount; here a penny was imposed where nothing had been paid before. It would make the operations of trade and shipping a constant series of taxes from beginning to end, and when they began to add pence to pence on every small transaction throughout successive stages on the same articles, it was clear that, in the aggregate, it must produce a monstrous effect. If England was to be the emporium of foreign trade, the imposition of such charges as these must be most damaging. Competition was already smart enough, and the moment when a heavy income tax was being put on Schedule D, which included traders, was most inopportune for inventing a new tax of this character. At present statistical returns were obtained from the Custom-house clerks without any additional expense, and there was no need to levy a new penny tax for that purpose. They were taking off indirect taxation which really affected hardly anybody, and putting direct taxes on traders and merchants. The tax on dock warrants affected London peculiarly. The tax on bills of lading had been suggested by the mercantile body to the Chancellor of the Exchequer as a substitute for all those obnoxious pence; but having got the suggestion he adopted it, and retained all the other taxes.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER—No, no. As the Resolution stood originally it was a penny upon imports and exports as well. Now it is a penny upon imports; and instead of putting it on exports, we tax the bill of lading.

Mr. T. Baring

MR. T. BARING said, that the exporter ought to pay as well as the importer. Though the charge on bills of lading was objectionable, it might have been admitted as a substitute for the other little vexatious charges. There was no use in testing the opinion of the Committee, and the sufferers from the right hon. Gentleman's plan must bear it.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he did not share in the general objection to these charges; but if at any time they produced more than was anticipated from them, the mercantile interest would have a fair claim for their reduction. He thought that the penny tax on packages would be collected without much trouble, and would produce much more than was expected. As to the unit of entry he saw no great difficulty in carrying out the arrangements proposed by the Resolution. Nor did he think that the duty on packages would have the effect of diminishing the quantity of goods brought in under the denomination of "broken stowage." There would be no difficulty in so arranging the unit of duty in all cases that shippers of goods in all parts of the world would know perfectly well what peculiar circumstances they had to meet. The proposed tax on bills of lading would lead to great advantage in ascertaining the quantity of our exports. The bill of lading was in effect a contract between the shipper of the goods and the owner of the ship, and was not likely to be far wrong on either side. The fourth copy of the bill of lading would answer all the purposes of a declaration of value, and afford a very satisfactory means of arriving at the quantity and value of the exports of this country.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer to the manner in which the cross-Channel trade might be affected by the Resolution. Hitherto the trade from Ireland to England, even although the goods were intended to be re-shipped in England, had not been considered export trade, nor had goods crossing from England to Ireland been regarded as import trade. It appeared, however, according to the wording of these Resolutions, that goods sent from Ireland to Liverpool to be re-shipped, would be subjected to a double charge. He therefore asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he would be good enough to see that such precautions were taken as would prevent that from being the case. Then, with regard to the statistical returns of the Irish trade, it was a singular fact that though Ireland exported many millions' worth of goods per annum, yet as they were re-shipped from this country, no notice whatever was taken of them in the returns as forming part of the export trade of Ireland. From one port alone, Belfast, many millions' worth of linen were exported every year; but in the returns its exports were only stated at a few hundred thousand pounds. It would be desirable to have a correct record established, and this he thought might be done by adding the name of the place at which the goods were manufactured and from which they were sent to the particulars of value already proposed to be required in the bill of lading. This would show the place that bond fide exported the goods. In reference to the power of adjusting the amount of payments required by these Resolutions, he presumed that the Treasury, in whom that power was to be vested, would not be able to exceed the amount proposed by the Resolution, but would simply be able to fix any sum below that amount. The words of the Resolution "so that the charge shall as little as may be exceed $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent on the goods of the lowest value usually imported under the denomination" were vague and would seem to give the Treasury the power of fixing an amount higher than the maximum named in the Resolution. He would suggest they should run "shall in no case exceed $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent" and so on. Then with respect to the mode of ascertaining the value of the goods, it was proposed that the shipper should give that information. It would, however, be impossible to depend for accuracy upon the shipper, beyond which disputes and mistakes might occur, which would be completely avoided if the invoice price of the goods were on all occasions adopted. One serious objection to the proposed tax on bills of lading was its inequality, seeing that one bill of lading might be for £10 and another for £10,000. He thought it was a charge not justified by the motives assigned for its imposition, besides which it would have a tendency to hamper trade, and when imposed the pressure against it would lead to its removal.

MR. HANKEY said, his objection to the charge on bills of lading was that they had not heard any satisfactory account from the Chancellor of the Exchequer respecting what it was to be a substitute for. It was not one of the original proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and was made after strong objections had been urged against many of the minor details and charges originally proposed for adoption. He (Mr. Hankey) had no objection to a tax being imposed upon both outward and inward bills of lading, but before he agreed to it he should like to have an assurance that the tax on packages would be given up. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had invited an expression of opinion from the City of London on this subject, and he (Mr. Hankey) had presided at a meeting where the utmost unanimity prevailed, and the opinion of that meeting was decidedly averse to this tax, but they had consented to it on the understanding that it was to be in substitution of the proposed charge on packages. Now it seemed that they were to be saddled with both.

MR. CAVE said, he did not agree with what his hon. Friend opposite had said. He preferred the present measure to that which had been indicated in the opening statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; not that he gave his approval to the measure; on the contrary, he considered the collection of statistics a mere pretence. It might be a subject of question whether the cost of collecting statistics for the benefit of the community should be saddled on the commercial classes. At present, however, it actually fell upon those classes, because the servants of the dock companies collected the information at the expense of the importers, and the Custom-house officers took it at second hand without further inquiry. To lay a tax on bills of lading for the same purpose would be to imitate the conduct of the Russian officers, who, before quitting a village where they had been living at free quarters, presented a bill for the wear and tear of their teeth in eating dinners provided for nothing. The measure was most unwelcome to the commercial classes, as being a mere revival of numerous small charges, which had long ago been abandoned, as most embarrassing and inconvenient. The extra amount of account keeping such charges rendered necessary was most serious. Besides which the delay occasioned by them in clearing a ship might lead to the loss of a wind and of a voyage. He had known instances of fifty tons of goods stopped in consequence of an error of a few shillings, and carts and vans sent away empty from a considerable distance, and every extra charge increased the chance of such mistakes. The most serious objection to the proposed tax was that it would lead to embezzlement. There was no greater source of embezzlement than that of entrusting clerks and carmen with small sums of money to pay these charges. To say that the proposed tax was a relief to the commercial classes was absurd. It was something like a highwayman stopping a traveller and stripping him, and then giving him his own shirt and trowsers to go away with. He (Mr. Cave) was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman was going to reconsider his proposition with respect to charges in bond. The real effect of the scheme, as originally proposed, would have been to drive away to foreign countries many of the operations now carried on in this country, especially in respect to articles on which the duties were low. Thus the bonding system would be injured, for the importer would naturally prefer to pay the duty and perform the operations out of bond. He thought the general effect of the whole measure would disappoint the expectation of its framer, and that it would turn out that a scheme which professed to open up new channels of commerce would be found, on the contrary, to choke up those which already existed.

MR. MITCHELL said, he felt bound to support the fresh taxation now proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, having given his support to the general principle of his scheme. But he wished to say a few words as to the way in which this tax would operate. The right hon. Gentleman, wisely in his opinion, reduced the duty on exports to a much lower point than the duty on imports. The charge on the exports was calculated to bring in only £60,000; while the charge upon imports would bring in £190,000 a year; and as the exports were rather larger in amount, it was quite clear that the charge upon imports would be at least double that upon exports. The charge looked small upon paper, and it was so small that the importing merchant would not be able to charge it on the consumer. It was too small a charge, amounting only to 6d. per ton, and the whole of it would fall upon the unfortunate merchant, and would in many cases increase from 25 to 50 per cent the income tax which he paid, under Schedule D, to the Government.

Mr. Cave

So that this was, in fact, a special tax imposed on the mercantile classes.

MR. HORSFALL said, the question was not whether they would have any of these small taxes, but what was the best form in which they could be levied. He accepted the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as a compromise, and not because he agreed with its principle. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, he was bound to say, had most courteously received every representation that had been made to him. He (Mr. Horsfall) had himself introduced a deputation which had proposed a tax on both outward and inward bills of lading, but that was found objectionable, and therefore the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed the present tax, which he (Mr. Horsfall) was prepared to accept as a compromise. Nevertheless he should like to hear from the right hon. Gentleman that he was willing to abandon the tax altogether. If passed this Session, he had no doubt that a tax of that kind could not be of long continuance. With regard to the over valuing of goods sent from Liverpool, he was at a loss to assign any reason for so doing; but there was sometimes carelessness on the part of the Custom-house clerks, and they were sometimes obliged to guess at the value, owing to the invoices not having come forward at the time of shipment.

MR. CHILDERS said, he thought that the Committee was bound to admit the two propositions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—the one that a certain portion of the deficiency created by the repeal of taxes must now be made up; and the other that it must be made up by taxes incident upon trade. But in the actual proposition before the Committee he would suggest some modification. It was a question whether the charges proposed by the Resolution were properly speaking Customs' charges at all. Duties of Customs were invariably raised either according to weight, quantity, or value; but these were rather in the nature of landing or wharf. Again, he had another objection. The Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to raise under this Resolution £230,000, and it was to be raised "for defraying the cost of that part of the Customs' establishments which was incident to the conduct of trade." But so far from £230,000 being necessary, £50,000 would be as much as would be required for that purpose. He thought the country would be entitled to complain, if £230,000 a year was spent on establishments used only for the conduct of trade and collecting statistical returns. The hon. Member for Sunderland had very correctly stated that this charge would add very much to the cost of the Customs' establishments. The great mass of the expenses of the Custom-house was caused by the collection of the duties on duty-charged goods, the operations with respect to free goods being exceedingly simple. He wished, then, to know whether these charges or fees were to be treated as duties on duty-charged goods, or whether some other mode of dealing with them would be devised. In the latter case the objection he had stated would fall to the ground. He thought he could suggest a substitute not obnoxious to the objections to which the proposed charge was liable, and yet capable of raising the required revenue. The House was aware that all operations between the Custom-house and merchants were carried on by entries which were put into the Custom-house by clerks of the merchants, either simple in duplicate or triplicate. Now, instead of putting on a charge such as was proposed in the Resolution, and which would be a varying charge, he would propose to the right hon. Gentleman to put on a uniform stamp of one penny on all entries. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer were to require that all entries, documents, shipping bills, or whatever else they might be, should be subject to a uniform stamp of one penny, he would be able to collect, if not as much as this Resolution would produce, at least sufficient to defray the charges for which this revenue was to be raised. With respect to the second part of the Resolution, which imposed 1s. 6d. on every bill of lading, it was to be recollected that already bills of lading were subject to a charge of 6d. each; but that charge might be accepted as the means of collecting more satisfactory statistics than could at present be obtained.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought that the complaint of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Hankey), that he had adopted the suggestion with respect to the taxing of the bill of lading and giving nothing in return, was rather hard; because the duties which he surrendered would be very much larger than anything which he would get from the bill of lading. The bill of lading would not yield more than £60,000 a year upon a sanguine estimate, while the 1s. 6d. per cent which he had given up would have yielded upwards of £150,000. The hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Cave), seemed to think that the stamp duty of 1d. under this Resolution was imposed in respect merely of the statistical department; the charge was of a more general character incident to the conduct of trade. It might be true with respect to the great dock establishments in London, which were so admirably organized that they stood in lieu of the services required from the Custom-house; but that was not the case with respect to other ports, where the returns made by Customs' officers were taken as the very best authority by the merchants themselves. With respect to the observations made by the hon. Gentleman who spoke last, he must observe that he did not think the hon. Member correctly understood the practice of the Customs in reference to the service rendered by that department. The hon. Gentleman proposed as a substitute the charge of 1d. upon every entry and paper of whatever description passed by the Customs affecting commerce and trade. Now, in the first place, he had no means of estimating what would be the produce of such a tax, and the hon. Gentleman did not say what he calculated it would yield; but, so far as it was a valid objection to this Resolution, that it would multiply small charges and give complication to accounts, it applied with tenfold force to this substitute. There was not a single act of any kind that was done by the proprietors of goods in warehouse, for instance, whether of removal, re-packing, or otherwise, to which it would not apply, and he confessed he thought it would not be expedient to adopt it. The sum proposed to be levied would require to be paid when the first entry was passed through the Custom-house. It would all be collected at once, and there would be no complication of accounts whatever. In conclusion, he desired to express his opinion of the perfect fairness of the admission that a Resolution of this kind should be considered part of the measures to which the House had already expressed its assent.

MR. CHILDERS inquired whether these charges would pass through the Customs' books in the same way as the ordinary duties?

MR. CRAWFORD said, he apprehended that there could be no difficulty in instructing the Customs' department to keep a separate account of this duty, so that if it were subsequently found that the amount of duty was out of proportion to the cost of collection the mercantile community might have the benefit which might naturally be expected under these circumstances.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, a separate account would be kept of all these charges, and the fullest means given to ascertain what was their produce, with a view to any proposal that might afterwards be made respecting them. As regards the collection of them, that would be conducted as far as possible by stamps prepared for the purpose, and which, no doubt, would be very extensively used for the convenience of parties. His right hon. Friend at the head of the Customs assured him that the whole operation would be a matter of the greatest simplicity, and would not interfere with the extensive reduction of the establishment which he promised.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to impress on the right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer the propriety of reconsidering this charge of one penny. He was anxious that, if it was not necessary to amend the Resolution, the Government, in bringing in the Bill, should have a complete schedule of charges to which the merchant could refer. He also wished to ask whether the penalties would still be applicable as before? [The CHANCELLOR of the Exchequer: Yes.] He was going to suggest that the penalties would be exceedingly heavy in proportion to the proposed rates, and he hoped the subject would engage the attention of the Government.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolution 21:—

“That in aid of the charge of the Customs’ Establishment incident to the Warehousing and Removal of Goods under Bond, there shall be charged (irrespective of any duties of Customs, or other charges payable by law, and in addition thereto), a Customs’ duty at the rate of 10s. per £100 on the amount of Customs’ duty payable on such goods as shall be warehoused, and removed under bond from any warehouse in any port or place to any warehouse in any other port or place, and at the rate of 5s. per £100 on the amount of Customs duty payable on such goods warehoused but not removed, to be paid in each case on taking such goods out of bond for home consumption; provided that tobacco shall only be chargeable with half the above rates, and that no more than the sum of 5s., in addition to the sum of 5s. per centum, shall be chargeable upon a single delivery of sugars for refineries when removed under bond.”

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the charges upon warehouse operations of all kinds, including the removal, were estimated at about £120,000 a year, and it was proposed in lieu of that to have a fee taken upon all warehoused goods when delivered at the warehouse, irrespective of their being removed, to the amount of 10s. per cent. But no sooner had that proposal been made than considerable opposition arose from some classes of Gentlemen engaged in trade, who observed that the cost to which the country was put by the warehoused goods was extremely different, and expressed a great preference for the principle of the Resolution in comparison with the new and uniform proposal. When the Resolution was proposed to the Committee originally, he ventured to state that it had in view an important object of policy—namely, to provide some self-acting regulator of the warehousing system. By degrees that system—speaking now only with regard to ports—had received an extension which was very costly to the country, for the convenience, in many instances, of very small communities, and without any compensating advantages to the Exchequer. It was needless to go into details or names of places, but it was within the knowledge of those who heard him, that a number of very small places enjoyed warehousing privileges at the cost of the Crown, which was the cost of the public, simply because they were ports of importation. They enjoyed the privilege, not with respect to the goods which they imported, in regard to which, it might be natural enough to grant it; but in regard to goods which they did not import at all, and only received from importing places. The consequence was that large towns in the interior became desirous of having warehousing privileges extended to them. Manchester very naturally, and very fairly took the lead in the movement, and obtained, on condition of bearing the necessary charge, the concession of warehousing privileges. But as it was subjected to the condition that the town should in one form or another bear the charge, Manchester complained of having to bear the cost where the deliveries amounted to hundreds of thousands a year, when little, insignificant places, because they happened to be ports, enjoyed warehousing privileges, and had warehousing establishments maintained at the cost of the public, and goods removed to them without any charge, and without at the same time being called upon to contribute one farthing to the cost of the Customs’ establishment. A desire spread in the country, as a natural consequence, for the extension and multiplication of warehousing privileges at the cost of the public. He did not see where the demand was to stop, unless the places themselves were in some degree or some manner made to contribute. On grounds, therefore, both of policy and of justice, he thought the proposal of the Government sound and wise. He would also submit to the Committee that there ought to be some difference made in the charge when the goods were removed in bond. However small that difference might be, yet it would operate in the nature of a regulating charge. It would make the inhabitants contribute something towards the cost of the warehousing establishment, and would operate powerfully in preventing undue demands for the extension of the system inwards throughout the country, while on the other hand it would enable the Government to give fair scope to the extension, where the cost of the Crown was not likely to be very great. The charge was not a Customs' duty, but a fee upon goods which had gone into the warehouses and were delivered from it. The parties upon whom the charges fell in the first instance would not be the importers of the goods, but the retail dealers in the country. The charge would be paid upon the delivery of goods, and by the persons to whom they were delivered. Great objections had been made to a charge of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, but he was happy to understand that the tea trade were now perfectly satisfied with the charge as it now stood, of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. There was an exception in the case of tobacco, because the charge was levied not on the value of the goods, but on the amount of duty, and the duty on tobacco was higher out of all proportion than any other duty. It was therefore proposed that the charge on tobacco should be mitigated by one moiety. The charge upon goods removed had been also fixed at $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and if the principle were sound that there should be a contribution towards the cost of these warehousing privileges, then he submitted to the Committee that the charge imposed was a fair one. The charge would be 5s. per cent, and if they took the rate at which money could be obtained at 4 per cent per annum, the 5s. would represent 21 days' interest upon the money payable for the goods. It was not fair to call upon the public for the charge of these warehousing establishments. These were the grounds on which the second 5s. was imposed. The only way of regulating the extension of the system was to call on the parties themselves to make a moderate contribution towards the cost of the establishments, and there was no way of doing this more fairly than by a small charge on the goods when removed. A special provision, however, was to be made for the particular case of sugar. Sugar cost in removal comparatively little to the Customs, for it was delivered from bond in very large quantities, and it was therefore proposed that for 5s. any single quantity of sugar should be delivered for refineries out of bond. The effect of this would be to substitute instead of 5s. per cent, a charge almost inappreciably small. The produce of the whole Resolution would be about £50,000—a considerable reduction of revenue as compared with that which would have accrued under the original proposition.

Mr. Crawford

Motion made, and Question proposed,—

“That the words, ‘That in aid of the charge of the Customs’ Establishment incident to the Warehousing and Removal,’ stand part of the proposed Resolution.”

MR. DALGLISH said, the Resolution, as it stood, was calculated to confer unfair advantages on the larger over the smaller ports, and to have the effect of giving the tea trade an advantage of the quarter per cent. He should, therefore, move the following Amendment :

“Resolution 21, line 2, leave out ‘and removal.’ Line 4 to line 7, leave out ‘10s. per £100 on the amount of Customs’ duty payable on such goods as shall be warehoused, and removed under bond from any warehouse in any port or place, to any warehouse in any other port or place, and at the rate of.’ Lines 8 and 9, leave out ‘but not removed,’ and ‘in such case.’ Line 11, leave out ‘and that no more than the sum of 5s., in addition to the sum of 5s. per centum, shall be chargeable upon any single delivery of sugars for refineries when removed under bond.’”

Amendment, proposed, to leave out the words “and Removal.”

Question put, “That those words stand part of the proposed Resolution.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 64 ; Noes 50 : Majority 14.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

MR. CHILDERS suggested that a much more equitable plan, and one by which the revenue might be more easily collected, was to impose a small annual fee upon the warehouses themselves. As he was aware that he could not move this as an Amendment, he would ask the House to reject the Resolution, so that, if rejected, the Chancellor of the Exchequer might consider the propriety of coming to such an arrangement as he had suggested.

MR. W. MILLER said, he begged to second the proposition of his hon. Friend (Mr. Childers), as he entertained great objections to the proposed charge upon removals.

MR. VANCE said, the inhabitants of the city he had the honour to represent (Dublin) contributed very largely to the Customs of the country, and this charge would fall on them particularly heavy. By false legislation they had been deprived of their foreign trade, and were obliged to import, for instance, their teas from Liverpool or London. They laboured under various charges for entering goods in bond. They had to pay 1s. for every entry, either of goods coming into or going out of bond, and 2s. on every Customs' entry for warehousing goods imported from foreign ports. The result was, they would have to pay the charges already imposed, as well as the extra charges proposed to be placed on them by the Resolution. If these new imposts were placed upon them they ought to be relieved of the old; and he believed the merchants of Dublin had made very strong representations to the right hon. Gentleman on the subject. He quite agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Belfast (Sir H. Cairns), that it would be most desirable to have some statistics of Ireland, with regard to its exports, and also of the coast Channel trade, because it was stated that Ireland contributed only a certain amount to the revenue. That amount was merely taken from the sum obtained by the dues paid in the Custom-house; but it should be remembered that they paid the duty upon tea, and many other articles in Liverpool, of which no record whatever was made; and Ireland was taken to contribute much less to the taxation of the country than it really did. He must enter his strong protest against those charges on account of warehousing.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the question of the statistics of Irish taxation had already been under discussion that evening, and the Government intended to make inquiries with a view to ascertain whether those statistics could be improved. With respect to the Motion for rejecting the Resolution the seconder had based his support of that Motion upon his objection to the charge upon removals. That charge was only a matter of £8,000 or £10,000, but the whole Resolution involved a sum of £50,000, and surely the hon. Member would not deprive the revenue of that amount simply because he objected to the smaller sum, especially as there would be other opportunities for explaining his objections to the charge upon the removal of goods. The suggestion of the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) to impose an annual tax upon each bonded warehouse was most startling, and one that he did not think the House would agree to. There were 1,200 bonded warehouses in the country, and to call upon the proprietors of those warehouses to pay £50,000 a year, at a time when Parliament by remitting duties was excluding from them a large class of goods, and thus, to some extent, taking the bread out of their mouths, was too violent a proposition. The £40,000 upon warehousing was generally recognized as a fair charge by the retail dealers who would have to pay it, and he thought the Committee would not deprive the revenue of that amount because of any objection to a lesser amount for removals.

Mr. Childers

MR. CHILDERS remarked, that the principle had always been laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it was the consumer who paid the taxes upon all articles.

MR. CRUM-EWING said, he objected to the favour shown to sugar for refineries.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed, he was willing to omit the words "for refineries."

MR. CRUM-EWING: And rum?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, rum had, by an accident of legislation, actually obtained a protecting duty, and therefore he would recommend the hon. Member not to enter upon any discussion upon that subject.

MR. T. BARING said, he wished to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to pass the Resolution as it now stood, or whether it was to undergo any modification?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied, that the only modification would be that in the place of the word "duties" would be substituted "dues," or "charges," and he also proposed to strike out the words "for refineries."

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he would appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to whether it would be desirable for so small a sum as £12,000 to incur such dissatisfaction at the outports, and occasion such an amount of inconvenience to retail dealers at those outports, as would follow from the charge. He objected to the principle of taxing large outports, which amply paid for their Customs establishments, in order to cover the deficiency in small ones which did not pay. Let them apply that principle to the Post Office revenue, and they would be obliged to put a large impost on towns which paid for their postal establishments, in order to compensate the Post Office for the expenditure in small places whose letter traffic did not pay. He would venture to ask whether it would not be better for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to reconsider the Resolution.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that unfortunately the hon. and learned Gentleman was not in the House when he made his statement upon this subject, and fully explained the object of the Resolution. The charge on removals was not for purposes of revenue, but to provide a self-acting regulation instead of having a great warehousing system throughout the country. He would not, however, preclude himself from reconsidering the principle suggested by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Dalglish) in a modified form.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he thought the small places should be required to pay their own expenses, and hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not insist on such a petty tax as that now proposed.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he thought that the small trader would not only have to pay for the accommodation in his own town, but he would have to pay for the accommodation in London; in other words, he would not only have to pay the proposed 5s. in his own town, but an extra charge in large towns. He did not think they ought to endorse any legislation which would impose a differential duty, and place the traders and consumers in small towns at a disadvantage with those of the larger towns. The result would be to produce a differential price of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent on tea and other articles. He hoped, when they went into Committee on the Bill, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would yield to the very strong expression of opinion in regard to this matter, because the Resolution had been carried only by a small majority.

Motion made, and Question,—

"That the words 'of Goods under Bond, there shall be charged (irrespective of any Duties of Customs, or other charges payable by law, and in addition thereto), a Customs due or charge at the rate of Ten Shillings per £100 on the amount of Customs Duty payable on such goods, as shall be warehoused and removed under bond from any warehouse in any port or place to any warehouse in any other port or place, and at the rate of Five Shillings per £100 on the amount of Customs Duty payable on such goods warehoused but not removed, to be paid in each case on taking such goods out of bond for home consumption; provided that Tobacco shall only be chargeable with half the above rates, and likewise that no more than the sum of Five Shillings, in addition to the sum of Five Shillings per centum, shall be chargeable upon any single delivery of Sugars when removed under bond,' stand part of the proposed Resolution."

put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.
House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Thursday 19th April.

REFRESHMENT HOUSES AND WINE LICENCES BILL.—SECOND READING.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [26th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. CROOK said, he rose to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that there were two parties who objected to this Bill. He rose to advocate the claims of one of these parties. With the licensed victuallers he had no sympathy or desire to contribute to their objects. He appeared before the House simply as the advocate of the opinions which the temperance societies of this country had expressed in their petitions, and which petitions had been largely signed by persons who were not members of temperance societies. He desired not to be understood on the present occasion as advocating any prohibitory system or a Maine law. The temperance reformers had not come before the House for such a purpose, but simply in the interest of general sobriety. They waived their peculiar views at this time, and took issue with the Chancellor of the Exchequer on his own conditions. The right hon. Gentleman had recommended the Bill to the House as a wise and good measure, calculated to promote sobriety, although he confessed that, while he expected it would lead to a large increase in the consumption of foreign wine, he did not anticipate any sensible diminution of the sale of spirits and beer. The question, then, for the House to consider was the effect this measure would have on the sobriety of the country. The petitions presented to the House by those who disapproved of the Bill contained 120,000 signatures. In the borough he represented (Bolton) there had been two large public meetings, which had pronounced unanimously against the Bill. Thirty out of forty-eight of the members of the Town Council had recorded their opinions in petition against it, although not more than five or six of them were connected with temperance societies. There were also twenty-one Christian ministers of Bolton who had expressed in writing their deprecation of the Bill; and he was not aware that there had proceeded from that town a single petition in favour of the Bill. Indeed, he was not aware that so much as one petition from any part of the country had been presented in support of the Bill. He could not put his finger on any person who wanted the Bill. The temperance advocates, at all events, sympathised with the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the shudder to which he confessed in the contemplation of the multitude of people who were already licensed by the Legislature to distribute intoxicating drinks. At the present moment 105,000 individuals were specially set up by law to administer to the comforts or to corrupt and demoralize and debase the people; and it was considered that they were amply sufficient to distribute any further importation of foreign wine. This Bill would immensely increase the facilities for the consumption of intoxicating drinks, and in the same proportion increase the facilities for intemperance. In the borough of Bolton there were 120 public-houses and 240 beerhouses, which was quite enough for a population of 60,000 persons. It was estimated that an equal number of shops would take out wine licences under this Bill. Would that be at all calculated to promote sobriety? On the other hand, would not such increased facilities tend greatly to augment the consumption of intoxicating drinks? Wine being constantly on the counters of general shops would be very dangerous to young people and servants, and they would frequently be disposed to give a preference to those shops which offered the temptation. He believed that the houses of the licensed victuallers and the beershops were nothing like so dangerous as those places would be. He might remark, further, that the provisions of the Bill were in direct opposition to the Report of the Committee of Inquiry which sat in 1854, of which the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton, the now President of the Poor Law Board, was Chairman. In short, the Bill rendered the labours of the Committee quite useless, and would prevent the House acting upon their Report at any future time; and he wondered why the right hon. Gentleman had not proposed to allow ardent spirits to be sold by every shop. The Committee of 1854, in the most emphatic manner, decided that no intoxicating drink should be sold without a licence, and that in no case should it be less than £5 a year; but under this Bill licences could be had for three guineas a year; so that for 2*d.* a day any shopkeeper might have a licence to sell wine, and if he only had a little bread and cheese, he might possess the power of selling it to be drunk on the premises. The main point of the Committee's Report was, that the facilities for the distribution of intoxicating drinks should be largely reduced; while this measure of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have a totally contrary effect. He would appeal to hon. Members who were fathers of families, or commissioners of the peace, whether they could, in the face of such facts, conscientiously support the measure? Again, he would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he had the approval of the clergy or of dissenting ministers, the heads of police, chaplains of gaols, or boards of guardians in his favour? Had there been one public meeting in favour of the Bill? Nay, more; was there any friend of the Bill who dare call a public meeting? If this was so, surely the Bill ought not to be passed by the House. If, however, it should unhappily be imposed upon the country, he did trust that the local authorities, representing the people, would have given to them a discretionary power to prevent, suspend, or annul all licences under the Bill, in any district where two-thirds of the ratepayers were opposed to it. He trusted, however, that they would reject it altogether.

Mr. Crook

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR said, that he did not rise to second the Amendment, for all the reasons advanced by the hon. Mover. He was not there as the representative of any society, or of any body of men whatever; but he desired to give his testimony as the Recorder of a large town in the North of England, that no one in the habit of attending the criminal courts could resist the conviction that three-fourths—he might say five-sixths—of the crime of the country was directly referrible to the demoralizing influences of the low public-houses and beershops. He did trust, therefore, that this Bill would not become law. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had more than once declared to deputations which had waited upon him, that he did not bring this Bill forward simply as a fiscal measure, but more especially as a social and moral question. It stood before the House, recommended on fiscal, sanitary, and moral grounds, and he thought he should be able to show that it ought not to be accepted on any of those grounds. Look at it first in a fiscal light. He owned he did not look forward to any great increase of refreshment houses from the operation of the Bill, and therefore he thought the fiscal benefits anticipated from it by the right hon. Gentleman were greatly exaggerated. Light French wines were not suitable to a northern climate, and it was stated by Mr. M'Culloch that the only effect of a reduction of duty would be a reduction of revenue, and that even if there was no duty on such wines as it was now proposed to introduce, beer would still continue to be the chief drink of the people. Another great authority, the right hon. Gentleman himself, in 1856, declared that light wines would never be very largely drunk in this country. What then became of the argument of the right hon. Gentleman that a pure and wholesome wine would now be supplied at a cheap rate. The cloven foot was revealed by The Economist, in which paper he observed it stated that French wines might be easily strengthened for the British palate by the introduction of a little brandy. It was patent to every one that the advantage which the French expected was not a better market for good wine, but a market where they could get rid of their bad vintages. In the words of Horace—

“ Vile potabis modicis Sabinum “ Cantharis,”

which he might familiarly translate, “ They were to drink wretched claret out of pewter pots.” Then as to the moral and social aspects of the question. There had been no demand for this Bill by the public; and although there had been hundreds of petitions from persons, independent of publicans and teetotallers, against it, he had not heard of a single petition in its favour. It was a fallacy to suppose that in wine-growing countries the population were more sober. He believed that the consumption of alcohol was more than double per head in France than which it was in England, and he was supported in that opinion by the observations of such men as Horace Greely and Fenimore Cooper. The inducements to drink in England were abundantly sufficient, and the Legislature ought to pause before they thrust upon the people greater facilities and temptations. The process of reasoning appeared to be that because there must be a treaty with France wine must be freely admitted, the revenue must suffer, and to recover the loss this Bill must be passed; but that was a line of argument against which he protested. Besides the objections which he entertained against the principle of the measure, he must say that in the form in which it now appeared it was the most clumsy piece of legislation he had ever seen in his life. Every shopkeeper, whether a tailor or tobacconist, might take out a licence, and every customer might be exposed to the temptation of this wine being recommended by the shopkeeper. Every oysterman and every orangewoman would be obliged to take out a licence, and the evil which would follow was that, with French wine they would introduce a French police. It was not at the dictation of the temperance societies, but by his own instinct, as a lover of constitutional freedom, that he implored the House not to sanction such an inquisitorial system as would allow the police to come into honest men's houses, whether they sold wine or not, simply because they were obliged to take out an eating-house licence. In the neighbourhood of Southampton there were many beautiful spots to which picnic parties resorted in the summer months, and any one who allowed the use of a room wherein they might consume their own refreshments would have to take out a licence and be subjected to the supervision of the police. The evil, however, was not in the licence, but in what followed the granting of the licence. It was a monstrous provision that the police should have the power to enter houses under these licences at their own discretion, and he implored the House not to sanction the placing of this inquisitorial power, in so unguarded a manner, in such hands. Clause 12 of the Bill gave most extraordinary powers to magistrates. Notice of every application was to be sent to the clerk of the magistrates, and if within thirty days an objection was sent from the magistrates to the Excise Office that the house was disorderly, or was not a bond fide eating-house the licence was not to be granted. There certainly was no precedent of such extraordinary powers being given to the magistrates without any inquiry. It was in reality worse than the French system. Then, again, there was no definition in the Bill of a bond fide eating-house. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had entered into a philosophical disquisition of the connection between eating and drinking; but his argument proved too much. It proved that a man ought to have liberty to drink beer with his victuals if he liked it better than wine. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: So he may.] That certainly was not the effect of the Bill. Foreign wine was all that was provided for. There was a clause against adulteration in the Bill; but it only struck at the small retailer; the wholesale importing adulterator was left entirely untouched. He (Mr. D. Seymour) protested against the foreign element which characterized that measure from first to last. He opposed it on fiscal grounds, and he opposed it still more on social and moral grounds. When the Beer Bill was passed the cry was "Cheap ale for the million." Now the cry was "cheap wine for the million;" but there was not a magistrate throughout the country, not a single person who had to do with the administration of justice, who did not feel that the Beer Bill was an utter failure, and that its evil effects were every day growing worse. He hoped, therefore, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be warned by the experience of that Bill not to persevere with a measure which would have the effect of offering cheaper temptations and cheaper inducements to crime.

MR. KER SEYMER said, he was not surprised at the opposition offered to this Bill. He had not been very favourably impressed with the financial scheme as a whole; but when the Chancellor of the Exchequer came to this part, he remarked to the hon. Member who sat next to him, "That's the best part of the Budget, and will be the hardest to carry." The right hon. Gentleman had to deal with two most important and well-organized bodies, differing in everything but opposition to this Bill—the licensed victuallers and the teetotallers. The opposition of the first, he was afraid, would be most formidable; for a moral opposition was rarely so powerful as a selfish opposition. The teetotallers, however, who conscientiously believed that every man who drank a glass of light wine was an incipient drunkard, and that every fermented liquor was poisonous, and that its sale ought to be prohibited like the sale of arsenic, were not fair judges of such a proposal as this. They were banded together, as the title of their association stated, for "the total suppression of the liquor traffic," and they were, of course, opposed to a proposal for extending that traffic. The proposal had been quite a God-send to the United Kingdom Total Abstinence Alliance. For some years they had had their paraphernalia of agitation so well understood and so well paid in this country, their processions, their meetings, their testimonials, their cheap publications, and so on; but as yet they had never got into Parliament. On this occasion, however, they were represented by the hon. Member for Bolton (Mr. Crook), and they boasted to have presented 1,200 petitions against this Bill, all of which, it would be seen, concluded with a prayer for the establishment of what was called the Permissive Maine Law, which meant that in any town or village where there happened to be a majority of water-drinkers, nobody should be allowed to drink a glass of beer. Such an enactment as that would never do for England; and the people who entertained such views were not fair judges of this proposal. There were also many other persons—ably represented there by the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Hardy)—who, not holding extreme views, and not wishing to "rob the poor man of his beer," yet looked with alarm on this proposition. But he would ask them, had any man, with a couple of shillings in his pocket, the slightest difficulty, under the present system, in getting drunk on spirits? However well intended, the present restrictive system did not operate as a check on drunkenness. Having, therefore, made a sacrifice to introduce French wines, was it not reasonable that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should endeavour to give their consumption a fair chance? The great body of the labouring classes would doubtless still drink their beer, the favourite beverage of Englishmen; but those who wished for wine should be allowed to have it. The question which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had really had to ask himself was, "Should the only path to wine be through the ginshop?" In this city of anomalies no anomaly struck the intelligent foreigner half so forcibly as to find that in numerous refreshment houses where barons of beef, fish, and poultry were displayed in the windows, he could obtain nothing to drink with his dinner but water. The Chancellor of the Exchequer wished, therefore, to bring eating and drinking together; and nothing could be more conducive to temperance. True, he did not allow persons to drink beer as well as wine; but in this he had made a concession to the licensed victuallers, who now turned round and reproached him for it. As far, however, as the proposal went, it proceeded in the right direction, though he (Mr. K. Seymour) confessed that he was for a system of free licences to sell all spirituous liquors. The points reserved by the Bill for the discretion of the magistrates were the right points; although the measure required to be made a little more stringent. It avoided granting to magistrates the objectionable power of deciding on what were the wants of particular districts—a power which many magistrates would far rather not be called upon to exercise. They were, however, to have authority to inquire into the character of the house as well as into that of the persons frequenting it. But it would be desirable that their power of inquiry should also extend to the character of the occupant of the house. By the Bill the justices were to have a veto on the granting of the licence from the Excise, but no mode of appeal was provided to some superior authority. This omission might, however, be corrected in Committee. Many magistrates would shrink from being entrusted with a power, a mistake in their exercise of which was not open to some remedy. The proposed provisions for punishing contraventions of the rules were mainly taken from the Beer Bill, and were sufficiently stringent; but the greatest safeguard in this respect would consist in the power of the magistrates to refuse the renewal of the licence. The great evil of the Beer Bill was that the justices had no control of that kind. The signatures of householders were perfectly valueless as a guarantee for the character of the keeper of the house, many respectable persons signing their names to applications for licences from mere good-nature, or as a matter of course. As far, then, as legislation could secure the good conduct of these houses the Chancellor of the Exchequer had provided for it. The recommendations of the Select Committee had been carried out as regarded putting these refreshment houses under the authority of the police. It was well known that in many of these places spirits were illegally sold, and great tippling went on in them. In his own neighbourhood the officers of Inland Revenue had not shown themselves as active as they ought to have been in detecting persons who sold spirits without a licence, thereby injuring the fair trader. In this matter the licensed victuallers had a just ground of complaint; but, in their strange infatuation, they had wholly omitted it from their catalogue of grievances. At present wine licences had not a fair chance, as the foundation of the present licensing system was beer. The magistrates granted a certificate for an alehouse. Then the alehouse keeper went to the Excise and got a beer licence. Having obtained that, he might afterwards obtain a spirit licence also; but he could not get the spirit licence without first having a beer licence. Now, it was notorious that many of the public-houses in this country had fallen into the hands of the brewers, although they had no return showing to what extent that had taken place. When, however, by some great catastrophe the veil was withdrawn, the public got a peep behind the scenes, and saw how the brewers were mixed up with the licensing system. In the case of Calvert's bankruptcy, it was found that out of £750,000 invested in the business the sum of £468,000 was not invested in the proper business of brewing, but in public-house property,—that was to say, either in buying up public-houses, or in lending money to publicans, over whom they thereby obtained the greatest influence. The publican derived a very small profit from the sale of beer, and looked to the sale of spirits for his compensation. That could hardly be called a system promotive of temperance. No connection like that between the brewer and the publican existed between the wholesale grocer and the retail grocer, by which the latter was compelled to take all his tea and sugar from the former. If such a connection were really to be established, the retail grocer would not be able to serve his customers so well, and he would soon find a rival shop opening, and taking away all his trade. The licensing system, however, deprived the public of this wholesome check of competition in regard to liquor. If a great brewer bought up fifty public-houses in a particular locality, he knew that the magistrates would not license fifty more, and he therefore felt himself quite safe. He was sure of his investment, and knew that the houses would remain to take his beer to any extent. The brewers, doubtless, sent out perfectly good beer to the publicans, but the latter were tempted, by the low price at which they had to retail it, "to pump," as it was said, "the New River into it." That fact had been established before the Select Committee. To give it a fictitious strength they sometimes, but not to any very great extent, added noxious drugs to the liquor. The Beer Bill had not been very successful, but in his opinion the beer-seller never had a fair chance. Having to compete with the licensed victualler, who made his great profit on spirits, he had to resort to all sorts of shifts for a living. The first thing which such a person did was to make an effort to rise in the world by becoming a licensed victualler. But though nothing could be said against his character, though there was no ground for complaint in the manner in which he had conducted his shop, or in the accommodation which he afforded to the public, his application was almost invariably refused at the instigation of counsel on behalf of the licensed victuallers, on the ground that there were already sufficient houses in the neighbourhood. No arguments, therefore, ought to be drawn from the case of the beershop-keeper in illustration of the probable result of an extension of the licensing system. Now, a beershop-keeper who, under this Bill, kept an eating-house might take out a refreshment licence, and having obtained that, he would be entitled to a wine licence. The measure, however, did not provide for the hours his house might be kept open. For the sale of beer the hours were fixed—but what was the hour he would be allowed to keep open for the sale of wine?

Mr. Digby Seymour

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: We propose to assimilate the hours precisely to those of the beershops.

MR. KER SEYMER said this was the very point he was anxious to come to, but he would even go further, and say that in large towns, containing a population exceeding 50,000, beershop-keepers who had obtained wine licences should be allowed to sell beer equally with wine as late as 12 o'clock at night; because if the two things were kept separate, and the shop was allowed to remain open for the sale of wine but not for that of beer, the temptation to sell the prohibited article would be so strong that the rule would certainly be infringed, and the House had no right to place men in such a position. He now came to the case of the real and powerful opponents of the Bill. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, he believed, had done the wisest thing in his power in laying on the table the memorial of the licensed victuallers, which could not be too widely circulated. He (Mr. K. Seymer) had given notice of a proposition in relation to this subject, which, however, he should not propose in a Committee of Ways and Means, but should reserve for some future occasion, when he should submit it as a distinct question to the consideration of the House. The memorial to which he referred commenced by stating that it was proposed to give to every person applying for a licence the power of selling wine for consumption on the premises. This was not true; a licence would by no means be granted unless the applicant had complied with certain requisites. The house for which licence was sought must be bond fide rated at £20; it must not have been of a disorderly character, or frequented by disorderly persons. Then the petition of the body complained that their business was perpetually threatened with change. He was their truest friend when he told them openly that they would always be threatened with change until they consented to carry on their business on the same principle as every other was conducted—that of free competition. The licensed victuallers had received fair warning by the Report of the Select Committee, and they ought to have looked the matter in the face and have adopted that principle, subject only to such regulations as were inseparable from the nature of their business. They now complained that they were the victims of irksome restrictions. He was not aware of any to which they were subject which did not arise from their peculiar calling; if there were any of an unjust or vexatious nature, by all means let them be abolished, but let not these rules be made the pretext for continuing a monopoly which on no reasonable grounds could ever be tolerated. They also alleged that restrictions as to hours were imposed on them which did not exist with regard to any other class. This likewise was a misrepresentation. The beershop-keepers were confined to certain hours, while the licensed victuallers, save on Saturday and Sunday, were not restrained within any limits. On his way home from the House of Commons, which kept very bad hours, he constantly saw ginshops full of drunken men and women, at a time when the beerhouses were by law closed, and when those establishments which it was proposed by the present measure to create would likewise be closed for the night. Another of the liabilities which the victuallers, according to their own statement, incurred was the burden of collecting the greater portion of the vast revenue derived from beer, spirits, and wine. The money, doubtless, was drawn from the public, but he had been under the impression that it was the Excise Commissioners who collected the revenue; and if they once admitted the principle of exceptional legislation in favour of those who dealt in articles paying revenue indirectly to the Crown, they would have grocers and others coming forward to claim exclusive privileges. Another of these arguments was that the victuallers were the victims of a system of morality which had forced protection upon them, though they had not sought it. They might not have sought protection, but he must say they had taken very kindly to it, and they had carried out the principle to the utmost of their power. Last week thirty applicants for licences in Finsbury were refused, and in no case was there any objection to the character of the applicants. On Saturday nineteen others were refused in Wandsworth alone, to all of whom the same remark might apply, and in every case the licensed victuallers had been legally represented. They tried to frighten the House by an enormous claim for compensation — something approaching the sum of £50,000,000. Having already drawn that sum from the country, they now sought to establish a claim for a like sum, which would amount to £100,000,000 in all. That was a strong proposition which the Chancellor of the Exchequer would do well to look to. But they seemed to forget that there was such a thing as the good-will of a business, whether it was free or restricted; and those gentlemen did not state how much of the £50,000,000 was to be given for the good-will and how much for the monopoly. In support of their demand they referred to the compensation granted to lawyers and proctors. For his part he was of opinion that the compensation granted in the latter case was far too large, and the country certainly was not prepared to repeat the step which it had been induced to take. But in the one case there was some reason why Parliament should act liberally, for it had destroyed the occupation of an entire class; in the other, unless the Maine Liquor Law were carried, the business of the publicans could never be done away with. They tried to persuade them that hotels would become infamous; and all those stories with which in childhood they were familiar, about beds sinking down into charnel-houses and travellers being attacked by banditti were revived; but it was too much to expect that men in the 19th century would believe that these things would come to pass because persons with refreshment licences were allowed to sell a glass of wine. Some ill-natured people said that there was no need for innkeepers to be in league with robbers; that they already did all the robbery themselves by their exorbitant charges. But, without going so far as that, he must say it was absurd to talk as if in England, in the middle of the 19th century, the same scenes happen as in Terracina and other parts of Italy, where every man looked like a brigand, and probably was one. Then they said that they were the only persons who paid for licences to carry on their trade. This, again, was a great mistake. The wholesale wine and spirit merchant paid twenty guineas a year to carry on his trade at the same time that he was subjected to unrestricted competition. Then they turned round, having already persuaded the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give up his intentions with regard to the beer licences, and they said this was not free trade. But it would not do for them to attempt to mystify the public with questions of free trade in this way. This was not a question of free trade at all. The question of free trade was only involved in this matter as far as the restriction of the number of persons engaging in it was concerned, and no one could doubt that the numbers were restricted. But then they were told that this was a proposition for the extension of drinking. Now, were the publicans really opposed to the extension of drinking? Of course not: drinking was that by which they all made their living. It was not drinking in itself that was objected to, but the places where the drinking took place. Drinking in a wineshop was frightful, drinking in a beer-shop abominable; but drinking in a ginshop was all that was moral and proper. Then they tried to catch a few Conservative votes by the statement that the wineshops would be frequented by Radical politicians. He had no doubt that wherever Englishmen met they would talk politics ; but were they never talked in public-houses ? Was not the phrase "a pot-house politician" proverbial ? Conservative as he was, and not over favourable to the ministerial mode of extending the franchise, he was not at all alarmed that these wineshops would be turned into political clubs. Then they were told that this measure would sap the morality of our female population. Women, they were told, were ashamed now to appear at the bar of a public-house. But if these public-houses were the temples of virtue their occupiers described them to be he could not understand why women should be ashamed to be seen there ; but here he must protest against the gross libel that had been thrown on the women of the middle classes, that they would go to these houses for the sake of tippling. Every one would recollect the abominable insinuation made by the daily organ of the publicans, that a respectable man going into one of these houses after this Bill was passed to eat a bun might find his wife lying dead drunk in the back parlour, and his daughter still more disgracefully employed in the attic. That was a gross libel on the middle classes, which was only worthy of the quarter in which it appeared. Then the publicans said that the sums they paid for their licensed houses were guarantees for good conduct. Now, that sounded very well in theory, but in practice it was all moonshine. From the Returns which he had moved for on a former occasion, it appeared that no house ever was, in fact, shut up, however badly conducted it might be. When matters became very bad, the occupier transferred his licence to another, of course receiving what he gave for it. The new man went on for a time, till he was complained of, and then the house was transferred again, but the house was never shut up, and it was carried on on the same principle, and that was what they called a safeguard for the public morals. Now this was the case for the publicans as stated by themselves. He had endeavoured to show that the teetotallers were not fair judges upon this question, that those who were anxious to promote temperance were needlessly alarmed at this measure, and that the opposition of the licensed victuallers to it was purely a selfish opposition. He, therefore, hoped that Parliament would sanction the Bill of his right hon. Friend.

Mr. Ker Seymer

MR. HARDY said, the course he had formerly taken on the licensing question must be his apology for now addressing the

Mr. Ker Seymer

House. He did not impute to the Chancellor of the Exchequer any intention wilfully to corrupt the morals of the country, or any other object than that of increasing the revenue of the country, which he no doubt believed could be effected without injuring the public morals. The course taken by the hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Ker Seymer) was one which it was always easy to take, but it did not go to the real question at issue. It might or it might not be true that the brewers possessed a great number of public-houses; it might or it might not be true that the licensed victuallers were pursuing only their own selfish ends; it might or it might not be true that the United Kingdom Alliance was utterly mistaken in its course. But these were all beside the real question, which was whether or not it was necessary or advisable to increase the facilities for the sale of intoxicating liquors in this country, and whether the course taken by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was calculated to increase the revenue without injuring the morals or disturbing the social order of the country. With respect to the brewers and the licensed victuallers and the United Kingdom Alliance, he stood clear of them all. There were no brewers with whom he was intimately acquainted, or in whose prosperity he was at all interested any more than as every man must take an interest in the prosperity of an enterprising class of men in the country. He might, however, say that he did not believe in the cry that was raised against the brewers. It was admitted on all hands that they sent out good and pure articles, and if they were mixed and adulterated afterwards, the brewers were not to blame. He ventured to say, with respect to the brewers, that if perfect free trade were established to-morrow, still, with their capital and the number of houses they possessed, they would be able to hold their own, and would always be found at the head of the trade. With respect to the vested interests of the licensed victuallers, it was perfectly true that they were placed in a system which they found established long before they entered the trade, and under which all their interests had grown up. But he was far from imagining that their interests would suffer to the extent of £50,000,000, as by some was alleged, or, indeed, that they would be injuriously affected at all for the present. What might follow afterwards was another question. He was not called upon, nor, indeed, was he prepared to defend in its entirety the present system of licensing. He admitted that there were many points in which it might be improved. But, in his opinion, it was just and right that those who had charge of social order in the country—the justices of the peace—should, as far as possible, have full control over places where numbers of people assembled, and where by the consumption of intoxicating liquors they were led into the commission of offences, and it was desirable that the magistrates should have the initiative as to pronouncing upon the fitness of the persons by whom, and the places where such liquors might be publicly consumed; but he was not altogether satisfied with the appeal, which at present existed in the manner of licences. In most parts of the country it had become a mere matter of form, because the Quarter Sessions seldom or never interfered with the decision of the Petty Sessions. In such cases it would be better that there should be no appeal, and that the responsibility should rest with the magistrates who really decided the case. In other instances, however, benches of magistrates at Quarter Sessions acted upon the principle of allowing free trade, and granted licences without any reference to the decision of the justices below. That was an equally objectionable course; and rather than have this he would abolish the power of appeal altogether; but he thought it was not impossible that in the course of these discussions something might be struck out which would satisfy the public, and at the same time check the undue increase of drinking houses and their establishment in unfit situations. Before proceeding further, he must say one word with respect to the United Kingdom Alliance, whose representative had moved the rejection of this Bill. For his own part he had not intended to object to the second reading, though now the question was raised he would vote with the hon. Member; but as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had expressed his willingness to make alterations in Committee, he had intended to move certain Amendments there if the Bill should reach that stage. He felt justified in voting against a Bill which he disapproved with the hon. Member who represented the United Kingdom Alliance, although he could not agree in the principle of that body in making practically no distinction between the use and abuse of strong liquor. He could not agree with the Alliance in proscribing or prohibiting, even by a permissive Bill, the sale and use of liquors, merely because their abuse was dangerous, and he did not recognize the right even of a majority to interfere with the rights of others. Suppose the majority in any place were of opinion that the practice of allopathy was injurious to the health of the community, were they to prevent the minority from resorting to that mode of cure, and insist upon putting down all practice in the place except that of homœopathy or hydropathy. If he was to have a divorce he would rather it should be at his own suing than at the instance of other parties and without his own consent. So much then for the two parties opposing, and untruly said to be the only opponents of the measure. He came, now, to the primary object of the Bill in the eyes of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which was revenue. He was disposed to agree with the hon. Member for Southampton, that the revenue would not be materially increased by this Bill; that the Bill would be a failure so far as it referred to the introduction of French light wines into this country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, however, anticipated a considerable increase of revenue. In arguing the question he was bound to assume that the Estimate would be realized, and that there would be a large consumption of the stimulants to be imported. The present consumption of intoxicating liquors in this country, including all kinds, was put down at 684,000,000 gallons; and as the Chancellor of the Exchequer told them the other night that the further introduction of wine would make little difference in the consumption of spirits and malt liquors, they must add to the present consumption of spirits and malt liquors an unlimited number of gallons of light wines. But comparing the number of the population with the quantity of liquors already consumed, he could not think that any increase in these “nervous stimulants” as the Secretary to the Treasury called them, could be made with advantage. It was said that free trade in drink should be encouraged, not only with reference to the Revenue, but in order to get rid of the existing restrictive system, to introduce competition, and to put down adulteration. Those who said so seemed to suppose that nothing of the kind had ever been tried before. Why, up to 1496, there was perfect freedom of trade with respect to ale, and the first power given to Justices was something like the negative power which the Chancellor of the Exchequer now proposed to place in their hands. They had the right "to reject common selling of ale." It proved a complete failure, and in the reign of James I.—that happy period, to which we had been referred, when French wines were largely consumed in this country—further restrictive measures were adopted in order to put a stop to the "odious and loathsome sin of drunkenness, the source of every crime," which then prevailed. Those measures, however, were ineffectual and Defoe said that drunkenness at the Restoration; began its reign, and for forty years continued without diminution. Yet, in the reign of Charles II., the people of England followed the French habit of drinking light wines. At one time claret was largely consumed in Scotland. A jug of it, as Lord Cockburn states, was sold for 6d. in the streets of Leith; but they would see from the Memorials of Lord Cockburn's Life and Times, that people got drunk on that which was now put forward as a certain means of stopping intoxication, and it is very questionable whether in Scotland it was not always qualified by a dram of usquebaugh. In the reign of George II. there was a great deal of legislation with respect to gin, which was then a comparatively new liquor, the introduction of which was fraught with the most pernicious results. One Act after another was passed with the view of stopping its sale, but in vain. It was at that period that a statute was passed prohibiting it to be carried about in barrows and sold in the streets, and confining the sale to dwelling-houses. It is recorded that at that time signs were publicly set up "drunk for 1d., dead drunk for 2d., clean straw for nothing." An enormous duty was put on gin, as well as a large licensing fee in the hope of checking the sale, but the distillers then took wine licences, and gin was sold under various names—such as spiced cordial, "Saugree," &c., and the consumption increased until the evils became intolerable. For two years licences were altogether refused in the City of London in the licensing system which lasted up to the Act, introduced for the first time, introducing for the first time restrictions on the Beer Act was recommended that if beer was sold to increase the comforts of give them a more who it would improve the

Mr. Hardy

ing classes by drawing them away from the temptations to be met with in common public-houses, and introduce them to houses of a better order. Those were the promises held out by the Chancellor of the Exchequer of that time. He asked had one of them been fulfilled? Had it not been found that the establishment of beerhouses had been one of the greatest curses of the country? Had they added to the comforts of the poor? Had they improved the morals of the peasantry? Some years ago, when he had charge of a Beer Bill, a brewer who largely supplied beerhouses, told him in a letter "that the whole system was rotten, and atrociously demoralizing, and that, though in the trade, he would willingly see the Beer Bill entirely repealed, although a very heavy sum had been laid out by his concern in that trade." He added "I trust you will not falter or yield up your Bill to any party." In a Committee which sat some time ago the system of beerhouses was most fully considered, and it was shown that they had failed altogether—that, so far from checking, they increased drunkenness; and that the multiplication of such places was in itself an evil of the first magnitude. The hon. Member for Dorset was a Member of that Committee, and he signed its Report, and yet he was now calling on the House to increase the number of these drinking places under a new name. For what was the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer? Why it was to perpetuate the evil and to increase it by giving wine licences to beerhouses. The right hon. Gentleman did not touch upon this subject in his address to the House in introducing the measure, but an hon. Friend had discovered the blot. The clause in the statute, which prohibited beerhouses from selling wines of every description, was repealed by the fifth section of the proposed Bill; and if, therefore, a beerhouse should become an eating-house, from that moment the keeper would be enabled to go to the Excise and, subject to the conditions mentioned in the Bill, to take out a wine licence in addition to his beer licence. Thus by the

step, but by driving houses, even those under the direct control of the magistrates, and others originally respectable, to practices which are degrading to their own character and most injurious to morality and order." It was clear, therefore, that excessive competition led to improper practices in order to make public-houses and beershops attractive and alluring to the peasantry and the poorer classes, and the appetite so grew by what it fed on that the creation of the beershop system had proved nothing more or less than the creation of a system to encourage drunkenness. But it was still said that the chief thing wanted was competition. At present, in spite of monopoly, so attractive was this trade, so growing the habit which it supplied, that there were about 121,336 of these houses. In 1856 their proportion to the whole population was 1 to 176, to the males of all ages as 1 to 87. In 1841 they were to the males over 20 years of age as 1 to 42; to males and females as 1 to 88. But in 1856 they had so increased that they were to the males over 20 years of age as 1 to 38; to males and females as 1 to 80. He thought he had good ground for asking the House to pause before they increased the number of houses which supplied these nervous stimulants to the people. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the magistrates had an impossible duty to perform, the Legislature making them judges of the quantity of liquor to be consumed. That argument was unworthy of the ingenuity and logical mind of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. On what principle could it be said, if the number of houses for the supply of drink was as 1 house to 80 persons, that there was any difficulty in procuring any quantity of liquor? If it was meant to be said that by diminishing the number of drinking-houses the quantity of liquor consumed would probably be diminished, he would agree to the proposition, for he thought that the multiplication of these houses was an evil, and in itself a temptation to the drunken man. He appealed to the experience of hon. Gentlemen whether when cases of assault, or other criminal cases arising from drunkenness, came before them—whether it was not the fact that the men had not got drunk at one house, but had, after staggering out of one at a comparatively early period of the evening, met on their way home with fifty other temptations, by giving way to which they had been rendered hopelessly drunk and so became easy victims to plunderers on the look out for such prey, and he could mention a case which lately came before him where, after two men had been drinking together at different places all the evening, the landlord at the last sold one of them a bottle of gin, by drinking which in the street he got nearly dead drunk and while in that condition was robbed by his companion. Whenever it was found in respect to any of these houses that there was such a disobedience of the law, the licences ought to be swept away, without regard to the proprietor, or what were called "vested interests." It then became a question of public order, and public order ought to be supported. The hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. K. Seymer) stated that he had observed drinking houses open at every hour of the day and night, and after that statement could any man contend that either in this great metropolis, or in any town in the country, there was not an ample supply of public-houses? The hon. Member was fond of free trade, but would he carry out his principles so far as to allow every tenant on his property to have a licence? There was not a proprietor of land who did not stipulate that beershops and public-houses should not be opened on his property without his consent; and therefore let them not legislate in that House on false pretences, but, with the honest feeling which actuated them in their own private capacity, when checking drunkenness in their villages, check it in like manner throughout the country. But this system of free trade was to cause the sale of pure wine and wine only, and this was said in the face of the Report of the Committee of 1854, from which it appeared, on the evidence of Sir R. Mayne, that the free vintners who had the free sale of wine in this city, instead of selling wine only sold spirits under the cover of wine. If the present Bill should pass into law, what security would there be that the same thing would not be done in the beershops? And, indeed, if allowed to sell wine, why on principle should those shops not be allowed to sell spirits under the system of free trade? The Chancellor of the Exchequer said a man ought to drink where he ate. But if he preferred brandy or gin with his meals, why was he not to have it as well as wine? The Bill was founded on a principle that went further than the Bill itself; it put in the thin end of the wedge, which the hon. Member for Dorsetshire was anxious to drive home, and opened the door for free trade in articles to which the principle to free trade ought never to be applied. It was said that eating and drinking, now separated, would be combined under the operation of the present Bill; but it struck him that in the class for which these places were intended more was drunk after dinner than at dinner. ["No!"] At least that used to be the case. He wished to know for whom these eating-houses were intended. He found that in 40 towns in Scotland every 149 persons supported a dram shop, while it took 981 to keep a baker, 1,061 a butcher, and 2,281 a bookseller. In Newcastle it was stated that there were 21 eating-houses to 55 spirit merchants, 425 public-houses and 76 beershops. How could they be sure, when people went to an eating-house, that they went there to eat? In fact the licensed victuallers, as their name shows, were established as eating-houses. Many now are so, with the exception of those abominable ginshops of which no one can speak in terms of too great detestation. There were many provocatives to drink, and those who liked it never wanted an excuse. As Dr. Aldrich said:—

“ Good wine, a friend, or being dry, Or lest you should be by and by,
Or any other reason why.”

In fact any person wanting drink would find it, and it was not expedient to over-multiply his facilities, for the supply created more demand. But for whom were these eating-houses intended? Not for those who had families. No one wished to entice them there. Then they must be for the unmarried men, or, at all events, men away from their homes. They would go to the eating-houses only during the short dinner hours. Having, however, found drink in these houses they would repeat their visits. Not that they would go altogether for the drink; men went to such places for company. The appetite for eating was soon satisfied; the appetite for drink was increased by gratification. Licensed victuallers found comparatively little profit in supplying food; their profit came from drink, and it was, consequently, for drinking and not for eating, that they made their main provision. So it would be in the winehouses. The sale of that which brought most profit would be pressed. Then, to come to the question, did free trade apply to this subject? It was admitted that with respect to the houses licensed under the Bill, stringent regulations would be required, and that the police must have free access to them. Were these things consistent with free trade? Was the object of the Report of the Committee, over which the President of the Poor Law Board presided, free trade? Free trade favoured the development of trade, but the purpose of all these regulations was the restriction of trade. The object of that Committee was to get rid of a great number of the public-houses. As the right hon. Chairman of that Committee had said in a letter to Mr. Caudelat, “ it was hoped by the changes they proposed that the character of the public-houses generally would be raised and their number limited.” But, the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer the other night referred to the case of Liverpool and Manchester as illustrating his doctrine. A relative of the right hon. Gentleman, a magistrate of Liverpool, took it into his head that free trade was a good thing in the matter of public-house licences; by a majority of one the magistrates carried a Resolution to that effect. What was the consequence? In every instance applicants got licences, and soon there were 1,520 public-houses in Liverpool. At the same time Manchester, with as large a population, had only 450. According to the doctrine of the right hon. Gentleman, the effect of this should have been to bring things to their natural level and to check drunkenness. But the fact was that every one of these houses was reduced to an insane competition. Mr. Robertson Gladstone stated in his evidence that the parties who kept them were going through the Bankruptcy Court, and yet crowds were pressing into the trade. The effect of this state of things was thus indicated:—

Mr. Hardy

“ From the returns furnished to the Committee it was proved that the average number of committals for drunkenness in eight of the largest towns in England under the operation of the licensing system was 1 in 393; while Liverpool, the theatre of the experiment of the system recommended by the Committee for universal adoption, was 1 in 20, or about 20 times the amount of drunkenness that exists in the towns regulated by the present licensing system. In free trade Scotland the average per town was 1 in 40, or, in round numbers, 10 times the amount of the towns in England. In free trade Ireland, 1 in 34, or 11 times the amount of the English towns.”

This might not be a strictly accurate statement, for he found that in Liverpool they took up more readily for drunkenness; while in other places they took up only those who were both drunk and disorderly; but, at all events, the numbers were very remarkable, and showed what had been the effect of free trade in licensing public-houses in Liverpool, and when the Chancellor of the Exchequer referred to the number of public-houses in Liverpool which were the resort of thieves, he should remember that it was under a system of free licensing that they existed. In Manchester the magistrates put on the rein, keeping the public-houses very much on the same level as they had been for many years before. It was not for him to say whether they had not carried restriction too far; but their restrictive system could not be fairly tried, for they were check-mated by the Beer Acts, and in spite of them, in consequence of the Excise licences, 1,400 or 1,500 beer-shops sprang up in that city. Beer, however, was not so deleterious as spirits; and in Manchester, as he had shown, drunkenness was far less prevalent than in Liverpool. Again, some years ago there was free trade in public-houses in Dublin. And what happened there? In the year 1841 there were taken before the magistrates 23,443 persons. Out of these, 23,014 were more or less affected by drink. Free trade in drink, then, it was clear, produced drunkenness. Was there, then, any call for this Bill on the part of the public? He ventured to say that the national feeling was strong against it, meetings had been held in the West Riding of Yorkshire against it, and many magistrates and others from that part of the country had been in communication with the Chancellor of the Exchequer on this subject, and he believed some of their Amendments had been embodied in the Bill. But the right hon. Gentleman said he was about to remedy all the evils of the system by imposing new restrictions. And now he came to the important question, could they pass this Bill without injuring social order and public morality? By the stringent veto which he gave to the magistrates the right hon. Gentleman thought to provide an irrefragable guard against these houses becoming instruments of immorality. What was the check which the magistrates had under this Bill? They might, in the first place, say that a house was not an eating-house, and then the Excise would not grant a licence. Then it was important that they should know what an eating-house was. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said there would be no difficulty in the magistrate's ascertaining what was a bonâ fide eating-house. But he said, also, there was an immense difficulty in a magistrate ascertaining the requirements of the neighbourhood. And he gave them a question which was very much more difficult to solve. A confectioner, he said, should be entitled to a wine licence. Well, what was a confectioner? Many persons in the House and out of the House said it would be perfectly innocent for a person to get a glass of light French wine with his biscuit. And if this could be confined to a high class of confectioners, he (Mr. Hardy) should have no objection. But as to light French wine with a biscuit, whoever asked for it? There could be no better test than in the precincts of the House. There were Members of Parliament constantly going to the counters in the lobby. But did they ask for a glass of claret with their biscuit? Had there ever been there a demand for that kind of wine. But to go further. The high-class confectioner might have his sherry on the counter. But would the low-class confectioner? Suppose a man painted confectioner over his door, and sold buns and sponge-cakes, was he a confectioner? If such men were to be entitled to a licence, every immoral house in the metropolis would only have to stick up a few cannisters full of biscuits into their windows to enable them to get a licence for the sale of wine. Then with regard to the eating-house, the definition given of an eating-house by the Bill was most remarkable. It was any house where animal food was sold, or other food, with which fermented liquors were usually drunk. He was sorry to say that he knew of no food with which it was not usual to drink these liquors. It was throwing a duty too difficult and delicate upon magistrates to determine what were eating-houses under such a definition. What justice of the peace, if he were called upon to say whether a man who had pork pies for sale, which certainly contained animal food, or mutton pies, biscuits, gingerbread, cakes of all kinds, kept an eating-house or not—could safely tell the Excise that such a place was not an eating-house. No man could perform such a duty conscientiously; for it would be impossible for him to arrive at a just judgment. Then again the proposal would open the door to every sort of house to get these licences. How, in that case, were beershops to be checked? They perhaps could not represent them as disorderly houses; there might be no means of fixing upon them that opprobrium. A beershop-keeper might have had a disorderly house; but he might shift his residence to a few doors off, and that house could not be called disorderly.

The right hon. Gentleman had provided no check in respect of the character of a man. He refused to put the character of the applicant in question, or the fitness of the particular premises, so that houses might be provided with back entrances and other contrivances to prevent the inspection of the police. He refused to take notice of the question of locality of the houses, so that they might be opened in out-of-the-way places and be frequented by people who wished to keep out of the way of the police. The Bill therefore did not provide any sufficient check as to the nature of the house itself, or as to who was a confectioner. There was no effectual check upon disorderly houses, and anybody might get a licence if he so wished. Then the Bill gave no power to the magistrates where the locality or the premises were unsuitable, or where the character of the occupant was bad. But even supposing the Bill did all that was pretended and professed, did it do them in a way which Englishmen would stand? What was the mode? Was it in harmony with the other legislation of the country? They proposed to put into the hands of the magistrates a secret and irresponsible power, which would render them odious in the eyes of all Englishmen, because they were to exercise their veto in secrecy. But was it only the magistrates who received this power? From whom would they receive their information? What enormous power did this Bill practically place in the hands of the police? They were the persons who informed the magistrates of all that was going on in the neighbourhood. They would say to the magistrates—this is a man of bad character; the house he is about to open is not a real eating-house; he affects to sell provisions, but it is really a house of another description; and thus a house might be condemned as disorderly before it was opened. The licence would be refused in secret, and the man would be unheard. These questions at present came before the magistrates at Special Sessions, where they were watched by the reporters of the public press. Thus a check was placed upon the magistrates, and he ventured to say, that if the Government were to put forth a little of their pressure upon the magistrates, and make the licensing system a reality and not a sham, they would find the magistrates ready to put down the disreputable houses, and would have decent and respectable places of entertainment throughout the country. He knew that at every Special Sessions the police came forward with the list of places, and said whether they had or had not heard a report against any of those places during the year. And this was a most important check. But the plan proposed by this Bill was to give a secret arbitrary power, for the exercise of which the magistrates would not be responsible to any man. Thus, in the case of an honest magistrate, they were putting a burden upon him such as no gentleman in England ought to bear. At present magistrates acted freely and honestly, because they acted openly. But by this Bill they led them into temptation—and so odious would the system become in a twelvemonth, or even less time, that it would break down the whole of the guards provided by this Bill, throw every thing into confusion, and sweep away the licensing system, without the Legislature having duly considered what they were to substitute in its place. In the early part of the Session he (Mr. Hardy) had asked for the Report of the Commission on the Forbes Mackenzie Act. A Commission had been sent into Scotland to inquire into the operation of that Act. It was an Act restricting the sale of wine and spirits, and the houses which supplied wine and spirits. The preamble of that Act contrasted in a most remarkable manner with the provisions of the present Bill. It recited that great evils had arisen from certificates granted, and enacted that, for the sale of wine and spirits in Scotland, no confectioner or dealer in provisions or eatables of any kind shall receive a licence to sell wine or spirits to be consumed on the premises. A Commission, as he had said, was appointed to inquire into the operation of the Act; and, whilst waiting for the Report, the Legislature of this country was called upon to pass an Act for England and Wales upon totally different principles. That Commission was composed of several eminent and enlightened men, and Sir G. Clerk's name was sufficient to guarantee an impartial and disinterested inquiry. Was it not important that the House should know what the Report of these Commissioners said? He hoped he was not detaining the House; but this was a subject on which he felt a deep interest, and he hoped the House would pardon him. Then it was said that this Bill by promoting free trade would prevent adulteration. But only a few days since the hon. Member for Birmingham introduced a Bill to stop the adulteration of articles of food and drink.

Mr. Hardy

But the House well knew that the statutes relating to publicans and beer-sellers contained restrictions of the most severe character against the adulteration of beer and spirits, yet the attempt to put down adulteration had entirely failed. The hon. Member for Stafford had informed the House that bread was often made of plaster of Paris, and that cayenne was nothing but brickdust; so that a man after eating this adulterated bread, and then endeavouring to rectify his digestive organs by the stimulant of cayenne pepper, ran a chance of having his internal economy entirely walled up. In all these articles free trade prevailed. Under the most perfect system of free trade, therefore, adulteration still prevailed; and did the right hon. Gentleman seriously hope to put a stop to it by this new piece of legislation, and with that object did he really mean to give these licences at random? The permission to sell wine in single bottles was a matter of minor importance. Yet there was a great deal in what had been said by the hon. Member for Southampton. One of the chief evils that had been put down in Scotland was the presenting servants who came to make purchases for their masters and mistresses at shops with wine or spirits over the counter, and therefore grocers had been prohibited from selling or giving spirits or wine to be consumed on the premises. Was there no danger of this system extending itself, and was it so certain that tradesmen would not change the Christmas boxes given to servants from money to wine, and so introduce disorder into houses where it had never existed before? He thought that subject was worthy of considerable attention. He had already treated of some of the social features of the measure; but there was another question which he would wish to put. Was it likely that this Bill would succeed as a matter of revenue? He confessed he thought not. By this time it was pretty well seen which way the taste of the mass of the people was extending. It was not to be supposed that a supply of milder stimulants would stop the sale of stronger liquors. The case might be compared to that of the newspapers which were vigorously written, but might in politics or other respects be objectionable. People asked one another, why do you not take in a good respectable family paper? The light wines might represent the Family Journal. They were what would be considered harmless, and to those who had been in the habit of drinking stronger liquors insipid. And as the "family papers" disappeared from circulation before the more spirited and racy journals, so people would not for French wines abandon the more exciting stimulants for which they had a greater affection. The right hon. Gentleman said that in countries where light wines were consumed drunkenness did not prevail. Upon this point he (Mr. Hardy) had not been able to obtain distinct information, but Fennimore Cooper, the American novelist, declared that in Paris he saw more drunken people by going into the right quarters than ever he saw in London. There were no fewer than 360,000 of these wine-shops in France, and it was ascertained also that out of 1,100 homicides 400 were committed in these places. With respect to Sweden, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given some information which he was glad to hear. Some time ago he had occasion to comment upon the case of Sweden, and he should be delighted to hear that she had rescued herself from the reproach to which she then seemed open. In Sweden there had been an unlimited right to distil, enjoyed by every peasant; and in Alison's History it was stated that under that system, notwithstanding the thinness of the population, there were 150,000 distilleries, the consequence being a degree of immorality in some of the towns unparalleled in any European capital. It was stated by Dr. Wald of Königsberg that, in the conscription of 1852 for a district of Western Prussia (in the very neighbourhood of the German wine country) out of 174 young men examined for the army only four were declared admissible by the surgeons, the remaining 170 being physically incapacitated by dram-drinking. In the face of such facts as these he could not accept for Gospel the general assertion that wine-drinking countries were free from the evils which in this country arose from drunkenness. He was happy to observe here a gradual decrease in the consumption of strong liquors, which was due partly to the efforts of temperance societies, to the improved education and increased facilities for information and amusement possessed by the masses, and, more than all, to the better houses which had been, and which he trusted were being built, in various parts of the country for the labouring classes. This want was at the root of many evils, for if men had comfortable homes, they would not seek in the well-lighted, warm, and sanded rooms of beer houses enjoyments which they did not find under their own roofs. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, however, anticipated a considerable revenue from the operation of the present Bill; but was such an increase desirable, was it not, he would ask, the fact that a steady decrease in the consumption of spirituous liquors had taken place of late years in proportion as the consumption of tea, coffee, and cocoa became more widely spread? Was the House prepared to put a stop to such a state of things? Did hon. Members seek to supply the place of the articles which he had just mentioned by the introduction of wine? If so, did they expect that the light wines of France were to form the staple products of consumption? Was it the fact that the taste for such wines would be found to exist, except among the higher classes? He was told that a large quantity of wine was imported into France from Spain, which admitted of being mixed with alcohol to a great extent to suit the English market, so that if it were introduced into this country we should only have spirit-drinking in another shape, and upon what principle could they stop short of actual spirits when this act was once in operation? The right hon. Gentleman had told us that the year 1860 was to be a memorable year. The noble Lord (Lord John Russell) was to make it memorable for a political revolution, and the right hon. Gentleman for a fiscal revolution. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer wished to add a Social Revolution. And the right hon. Gentleman enthroned on his grand measures of 1860, and resting there upon his fame says, like Jack Cade on London Stone, "I charge and command, that the conduit run nothing but claret wine this first year of our reign." He (Mr. Hardy) believed that it would not be claret, but the old established liquors of the country, which would find their way through the conduits which the right hon. Gentleman was opening. He warned the Chancellor of the Exchequer against attempting to raise a revenue which it was desirable should fail him in the end. The more the people improved, the more he would lose; the more the people ceased to drink, the more loss there would be to the revenue—never more wanted than at the present moment. He warned him, therefore, to build his reputation on something better than establishing houses for increased intoxication, as he believed would be the effect of the Bill, which would produce increased competition amongst those who already could not live fairly out of this trade, but only by low and debasing incitements to bring men to drink in their houses. He said that if the right hon. Gentlemen added a new class to the 121,000 houses which already existed, he would be doing his best, against his own intention, against the will of his constituents, and against the will of the moral part of the community—and against, he trusted, the sound sense of that House—to demoralize the people of this country.

Mr. Hardy

MR. AYRTON moved the adjournment of the debate.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was with regret that he acceded to the adjournment, but as there were many Gentlemen who wished to speak, who had not spoken, he could not resist the Motion.

Debate adjourned till Thursday, the 19th April.

House adjourned at a quarter-after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, April 3, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Bankrupt Law (Scotland) Amendment.
Royal Assent.—Stamp Duties; Income Tax.

Their Lordships met; and having gone through the business on the paper,

House adjourned at half-past Five o'clock, to Tuesday the 17th instant.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, April 3, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Land Improvement (Ireland); Land Improvement (Ireland).

STAMPS ON NEWSPAPERS.

QUESTION.

MR. W. EWART said, he rose to ask the Secretary of the Treasury (in the absence of Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer), Whether any decision has been come to respecting the maintenance or discontinuance of the Impressed Stamp on Newspapers?

GENERAL BUCKLEY said, he would beg to ask, Whether any allowance will be made to Newspaper Proprietors on the Stamps they consume as Cheque and Receipt Stamps, placing them on equal terms with Bankers, who now receive an allowance of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent?

MR. LAING said, there was no alteration in the intention of the Government, as it had been announced by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to discontinue the privilege of re-transmitting newspapers bearing the impressed stamp. It was proposed to continue the option of using the impressed stamp for purposes of convenience, so as not to cause a loss of time in attaching adhesive stamps to newspapers before they were posted. But, as regarded other details, it would be more convenient to postpone any questions respecting them until the Bill was introduced.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

QUESTION.

LORD STANLEY said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether it is his intention to bring in a Bill in the course of the present Session for the reconstruction of the Council of the Governor General of India; and whether it is his intention to bring in a Bill for the amendment of the Law relating to the Civil Service of India?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that both of these subjects had been under his consideration since he acceded to his present office, and it was his intention to introduce a Bill dealing with them, and also another Bill for the amalgamation of the Supreme and Sudder Courts, after Easter. He should have been glad to bring in the Bills before the vacation, if the state of business had offered any prospect of making progress with them; but, unfortunately, such a step would have been utterly useless.

ADJOURNMENT FOR EASTER RECESS.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON moved that the House at its rising should adjourn till Monday, the 16th instant—a Motion to which he imagined there would be no opposition.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had no intention of dividing the House upon the Motion of the noble Lord, but he wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board in what manner the number of houses at various amounts of "gross estimated rental" in the cities and boroughs of England as given in the Return upon the Table of the House were ascertained, and he begged to introduce the question with a few words explaining his reasons for asking it. He thought it was desirable before they broke up for the Easter holidays to know how far the Government Returns were really reliable as an indication of the number of voters which would be added to the cities and boroughs of England under the new Reform Bill. When he addressed the House on the second reading of the Bill, he stated his opinion that these Returns were not only delusive, but that they had actually deluded every Member who had addressed the House, including the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs himself, and he also stated the grounds of that belief. No doubt the noble Lord intended that the figures shown on the statistical Returns should be a bond fide indication of the number of voters who would be added to the constituency under the new measure; but he believed that the mode of proceeding was this—not that the number of tenements in each city or borough which were actually rented at the amount stated was shown, but that the Return was founded upon a statement of the number of houses in different places which had been estimated by local valuers at different amounts for the purpose of rating. The difference was very material, because it was notorious that the rateable value was always put at a much lower figure than the actual rent of the premises. He thought it most desirable that they should have this point cleared up. He was followed in debate by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who said that he believed that he (Sir John Pakington) was mistaken, and gave as his reason that although the Returns showed the numbers of freemen in each place, they did not show the scot-and-lot voters. In support of his opinion he (Sir John Pakington) had named the towns of Pomfret and Newark, for this reason, that they showed more strongly than almost any other the great anomaly, that the number of £10 voters on the register were actually more numerous than the £10 houses returned. At first he did not understand that anomaly, but he believed that the explanation was that which had been given, that they did not represent the actual letting value but the rating value. The right hon. Gentleman had told him that the explanation was to be found in the admission of the scot-and-lot voters; and as in those two towns there were a number of scot-and-lot voters, he was not prepared to dispute that he had good reasons for making that statement. He knew nothing about those two places, but he thought it was a great pity that the Returns professing to give information, and which were supposed to be correct, should show the freemen and not the scot-and-lot voters. The right hon. Gentleman was probably not aware of the fact that there were no less than forty-four boroughs in those Returns which all presented the same anomaly—namely, that the numbers of £10 registered voters was greater than the number of £10 houses in the borough. There were no scot-and-lot voters in the borough of Droitwich, which he had the honour of representing; and yet hon. Gentlemen would find that the number of £10 registered voters at Droitwich was 392, while the number of £10 houses was only 327. It was therefore but reasonable to entertain alarm on account of the large number of voters of one class which could be added to the register beyond those shown by the Returns; because his observation did not apply to the forty-four boroughs only, but to every place in the list—because no doubt everywhere, in a varying ratio, the custom had been to estimate property for rating purposes at a lower amount than the actual rental. He believed also that in cases in which an owner compounded for the rates of a number of houses, small tenements, the person so compounding was entered as a unit instead of the number of houses for which he was rated being entered. He wished to know whether this was so, because that would make a still greater addition to the estimated number of voters.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he believed he was in a position to allay the alarm of the right hon. Baronet, and to assure him that the Returns were not incorrect in the points to which he had referred. He believed they were the most complete and accurate Returns which had ever been presented to the House upon a similar subject. So far as he understood the observations of the right hon. Baronet, they had reference to two grounds of error. One he inferred from discrepancies in the electoral lists with reference to £10 householders, and the other from an assumption that the property had been taken as the means of ascertaining the number of persons to be entitled to vote. It was very likely to be the case, as the right hon. Baronet had observed, that in a great number of boroughs there was a larger number of persons on the electoral list than there were £10 occupiers. It depended upon the revision of the electoral list in what state the list was left in the possession of the overseer, and that state would determine the return made. There were many places in which, owing to there having been no contested election, the register had not been properly revised for many years, and therefore there would remain upon it the names of persons who were dead or disqualified, or who had ceased to live within the borough. The Return which was called for, and usually presented, was a £10 occupation, a £10 tenement return; but many persons got upon the list whose qualifications were made up partly of land and partly of houses, and who, therefore, would not appear in the £10 occupation list; and there would be in addition in some places the scot-and-lot voters. That would account in a great measure for the discrepancies. The right hon. Baronet supposed that the Returns to which he referred merely represented the property, and therefore gave no idea of the persons who would be entitled to vote. That, however, was foreseen when the Returns were ordered; and therefore a special circular was sent to the clerk of every union to institute the most careful inquiries in all cities and boroughs within his union as to the persons who would be entitled to vote under the particular qualification referred to; and the Returns had been made on that principle. The right hon. Baronet was aware that under the Reform Act the overseer was the person who was directed to make out the electors' list. He made out that list from a column in his book entitled "Gross estimated rental." The overseer was directed under the Act of Parliament as to the form in which to make his entries. He had two columns "Gross estimated rental," and "Rateable value," and he made out his list from the former. The Returns, therefore, were made from the very lists which were submitted to the Revising Barristers, and upon which the present House of Commons was returned; and they were drawn up also, as he had stated, with special reference to the persons who would be entitled to vote. With respect to the Compounding Act, the right hon. Baronet seemed to be under the impression that where a landlord compounded for several places they were all entered as a unit, and the occupiers of those houses were not put down as entitled to vote. There certainly had been considerable difficulty in obtaining the Returns of all the occupiers of houses, because in some cases only the name of the owner who had compounded appeared in the rate-book; but great pains were taken in those Returns to procure the names of all occupiers; and he believed that when the House resumed the consideration of the Reform Bill there would not be any fact, required to give information on the subject, of which they would not be in possession.

Sir John Pakington

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had not got a distinct answer to his question, which was—What the figures in the various columns of the Returns really represented? Did they represent the number of tenements actually let at a certain rate in those places, or did they represent the number of tenements which appeared upon the rate-books as estimated for the purpose of rating?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS: That is precisely how I understood the question, and I have answered it. I stated that the Returns represent the persons, and not only the property which is available to the charge for rates. Care was taken that they should not merely represent the property which is entered on the overseer's book, but also the persons who would be entitled to vote having the property.

MR. EDWIN JAMES did not think there would be the least blame due to the Government if it should turn out that the Returns were fallacious, because the difficulty of obtaining correct returns must be known. But at the same time the House ought to know to some extent the increase of voters which would be added by the Reform Bill. When the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) stated that the Bill would not add more than 210,000 new electors to the existing constituencies, he (Mr. James) believed him to be in error by at least 200,000 or 250,000. Every effort was used, no doubt, to get the actual occupiers; but the great difficulty arose from the owners compounding and being rated instead of the occupiers, who, consequently, were not included in the Returns. A foot-note to the Return itself stated that in Norwich alone there were 12,162 tenements rated to the owners instead of the occupiers, which were not included in the Return, as the rate-book did not afford the means of distributing them under the several heads of Returns. In the metropolitan borough which he represented, the return showed that somewhere about 500 would be added, but he believed the addition would be from 5,000 to 6,000 persons, none of whose names appeared on the rate-books. In Finsbury, the returns of the parishes of Islington and St. Luke's, which formed part of that borough, did not contain the numbers of persons occupying tenements rated to the owners instead of the occupiers; but he was told that there they would have between 8,000 and 10,000 occupiers entitled to the £6 franchise. A landlord might have a whole street of houses, each sub-divided into two or three lettings. If the landlord did not himself live in it, there might be four or five voters in each house. It had been decided that it was immaterial what amount of rate the tenant paid—that if he paid but 2s., and that was all the rate assessed upon his tenement, he paid all the rate assessable, and therefore was entitled to the franchise. He was convinced that when the Returns were narrowly examined, it would be found that a £6 franchise would extend the right of voting to between 200,000 and 300,000 persons in addition to the number stated by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the future occasion referred to would be the proper time to examine the validity of the proofs which the hon. and learned Gentleman had brought forward, and to state the reasons for the conclusions at which the Government had arrived. At present he would only say that he believed the hon. and learned Gentleman's statement was very much exaggerated. It proceeded on the assumption that every man who was included in a composition would be entitled to vote under the Reform Bill. But that measure would enfranchise only those tenants who occupied houses of a certain value, and who should not only become liable to the payment of rates but should actually tender the payment of them. As to the observations of the right hon. Member for Droitwich, the Return itself called attention to the facts referred to by the right hon. Gentleman, and showed that the point to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred had not been overlooked by his noble Friend. There was another Return to which he would call the right hon. Gentleman's notice, presented on the 5th March, of the number of registered electors on the register in each county and borough in England and Wales for the year 1860, in proportion to the population, showing the number of scot-and-lot voters, and according to that Return it appeared that in about fifty boroughs there were scot-and-lot voters, the number being in some very few, but in many very large, and he was inclined to think that in most of the forty-four boroughs to which he alluded the number of scot-and-lot voters was large enough to account for the apparent anomaly to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred.

MR. BENTINCK said, it was impossible to overrate the importance of this matter, and he did not think that any satisfactory information had been given to the House by the Government. He had submitted the Return on the table to a good authority, who stated that the Returns showed that the numbers rated between £10 and £6 were much less than the numbers whose estimated rental was between £10 and £6; but as the franchise was to be fixed on a £6 rental, the Return stopped short at a point where it was most desirable it should be continued; and the question was raised whether the £6 rental franchise would not give the right of voting to a large number who were not rated at £6, and perhaps not at £5; so that it would be desirable to know how many were rated between £4 and £6, and how many who inhabited tenements of £6 rental were entitled to vote under the new Reform Bill. As far as he was able to understand the Returns presented to the House, he believed that the noble Lord the Member for London was wrong in his calculation about 100 per cent. It was indispensable that the House, before coming to a decision on the Reform Bill, should have in its possession reliable Returns, so that the House might know what it was doing, and not legislate in the dark.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that it was perfectly certain, from the extract which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bentinck) had read, that his correspondent either did not understand the subject of rating, or had not carefully examined this Return, inasmuch as his criticism was wholly inapplicable to it. The Government did not desire to take credit for doing that which was their manifest duty; but he wished the House to observe that the Return which was now on the table was the first attempt which had ever been made to lay before the House a complete statistical account of the basis upon which it was proposed to found the new extension of the franchise. The Return had been prepared with the greatest care and he hoped the House would understand that the efforts made by the Government to obtain accurate information were honest and sincere. The House would certainly not believe that they had any sinister object in seeking for this information. The Return which had been laid upon the table, unquestionably, as he believed, exhibited an accurate abstract of the poor-rate books in the different towns to which it related, and that was all which in the nature of things could be obtained. He wished the House clearly to understand what was the nature of that information—because it was certainly not understood by the correspondent of the hon. Gentleman. According to the existing law the rate-books contained two columns, and one was the gross estimated rental. That column showed, or ought to show, the rent really paid by the tenant. ["No, no!"] That was the supposition, and his belief was that in the great majority of instances it did fairly exhibit the real rental. Perhaps the right hon. Baronet had confounded two different things. In the first branch of this Return would be found abstracts of that column of the rate-book. The second column of the rate-book contained the rateable value—the amount upon which the rate was actually assessed. That column, in the first place, was liable to certain legal deductions; it was considerably reduced from the gross estimated rental, and sometimes it was further reduced by improper deductions made by the overseers. Therefore, he quite admitted that the rateable value did not exhibit the rental; but what he said was that the first column of the rate-book in the great majority of cases did accurately represent the gross rental. The second branch of this Return showed the rateable value. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bentinck) said that this Return did not go low enough, and that they did not know the total number of persons whose rental was £6, because, he said, the rateable value was lower than the rental. Undoubtedly, the rateable value was lower than the rent; but the rateable value here was given distinct from the gross estimate of rental, and it was only by comparing the two, that Gentlemen could see the difference between the number of persons at the rateable value of £6 and the number of persons at the gross estimated rental of £6. He could not but think it would turn out upon investigation that the figures contained in this

Sir George Grey

Return for the gross estimated rental of £6—with the exception, no doubt, of tenants compounding for their rents—would accurately represent the total number of occupiers at that amount, subject, of course, to the further reduction which would have to be made for various causes connected with the occupation. He thought it would be found that the column, £6 rental, in those cases in which there was no composition for small tenements, accurately represented the maximum number of persons enfranchised under the new Bill. With regard to those cases adverted to by the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Pakington), in which he said the number on the register was greater than the number of £10 householders exhibited on the Return, he would find that explained, in the great majority of instances, by the addition of scot-and-lot voters. If the scot-and-lot voters were deducted the discrepancy would disappear. The excess in other cases might be owing to the causes which had been already suggested.

LORD STANLEY stated that in the borough which returned him to Parliament the increase of the constituency, as calculated in the Return before the House, would be 50 per cent; but the result of careful local inquiry showed that the increase would be from 90 to 100 per cent upon the existing constituency.

MR. MALINS thought it quite evident that the Returns were made on a principle calculated to be very fallacious. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone stated that after careful examination the proposed Bill would add 450,000 electors, instead of 220,000 to the borough constituencies; his right hon Friend, (Sir J. Pakington) had received letters from various boroughs informing him that the number of electors under the Bill would be much larger than that stated in the Return; and the noble Lord (Lord Stanley) had declared that, instead of 50 per cent, the number of electors in his borough would be increased from 90 to 100 per cent. When by the side of these statements it was remembered that the Foreign Secretary had made a strong impression on the House by affirming that his Bill would only add 220,000 to the borough constituencies, he asked whether the point now under discussion did not raise considerations of the highest possible importance in connection with the subject of Reform. Could any hon. Gentleman say that under such circumstances they could take such a step as that of reducing the county franchise from £20 to £10, and that of boroughs from £50 to £6 without apprehension? The Government were making an experiment upon the constitution of the country which, as men of all parties acknowledged, was fraught with the greatest peril. ["No!"] The hon. Member for Birmingham, and those who agreed with him, might think that there was no danger in intrusting the representation to mere numbers, without regard to education or property; but it was impossible to go into society or to converse with hon. Members generally without finding a widespread apprehension of the consequences which would follow from the admission of such a horde of voters. If, then, there was danger in giving the franchise to 220,000 additional voters, what was the peril when they found that the total number enfranchised in boroughs would be nearer 500,000? The Government had, no doubt, acted with fairness in making these Returns, but the fact that it was the first attempt to obtain accurate information on the subject afforded conclusive evidence that the Returns could not be depended upon. He hoped the House would not be induced to take this leap in the dark on a subject in comparison with which all others that could come before them sank into insignificance.

MR. AYRTON thought that much of the difference of opinion which had been expressed arose from confusing two things which were really quite distinct. One question was as to the number of persons in the towns of England who occupied houses of £6 value. Now, in point of fact, every working man in the least degree skilled in his calling paid a rent of 2s. 6d. a week, or over £6 a year. Theoretically, therefore, all these persons would be entitled to vote, but in point of fact, none of them would. Take the Tower Hamlets as an example. In that borough there were 84,000 houses, and theoretically there were now 60,000 persons entitled to vote, but in reality under 30,000 were on the register. This was owing to the difficulties which the Bill of 1832 threw in the way of a vote, and which the present measure perpetuated; the result being that while, if you adopted the theoretical view of the case, you would find 500,000 or 600,000 persons entitled to vote in boroughs, practically that number was restricted to one-fifth or one-sixth. Under the existing law no man who lived in a compounded house could get a vote unless his landlord chose; and altogether a very large number of persons were and would be unable to get the votes nominally conceded to them by the Act of 1832 and the present measure. It was a mere matter of speculation how many persons, more or less, would be entitled to vote under the present Bill.

MR. BONHAM - CARTER believed, from inquiries he had instituted, that the Returns in question had been prepared with greater care, and were distinguished by greater accuracy, than any before made on this question; but they could only be Returns of the first column of the rate-book, which in different parishes necessarily varied much, according to the construction of the person who levied the rate. There was no doubt a discrepancy in some of the Returns, but that arose in a great measure from persons who occupied houses also occupying land. In some of the smaller boroughs the difference was striking. Thus in Wallingford there were 369 persons on the register, but only 357 occupiers of £10 houses. At Cricklade there were 470 persons on the register, but only 385 £10 occupiers. The subject of compounding was an important matter, and he hoped the House would obtain full information.

MR. JOHN LOCKE wished to know when a Return upon this subject which he had moved for some weeks since would be produced. It was most important that the House should know the real number of persons occupying houses the rates for which were compounded for by the landlord, because every one of them could claim to be on the register. With regard to another point, he should like to know how the Government made up their calculations. As regarded the borough of Southwark, the Government Returns were tolerably accurate, except that they had taken the register of 1858 as their guide, instead of the register of 1859. The number of electors in 1858 was 10,600; but in 1859 it was upwards of 11,000. In the column showing the number of houses rated at £10 and upwards, 16,000 was inserted, leaving a difference of 6,000 between the number of electors and the number of qualifying houses. The expected addition to the constituency by extending the franchise to £6 occupiers was 3,000; so that the real addition to the constituency might be about 9,000. He wished to know whether the 200,000 increase spoken of by the noble Lord was expected to arise only from the new £6 voters, or whether on the calculation of the number of those who were at the present time entitled to be upon the register but were not there? The compound householders seemed to be entirely left out of the calculation; yet in the borough of Southwark there were whole streets occupied by compound householders. He hoped that the Government, during the recess, would turn their attention to providing a proper machinery for the working of a new Reform Bill. There were several Corrupt Practices Bills introduced by private Members before a Committee, and it was absolutely necessary that a Reform Bill should be accompanied by something of that kind to make it work. It would be impossible to add so many electors to the constituencies and leave them without any assistance to enable them to vote. In the Reform Bill of the late Government there was a provision for additional polling places; but in the present Bill there was nothing of the kind.

MR. SPEAKER intimated that as the Corrupt Practices Bill and the Reform Bill were measures before the House to be discussed upon a future occasion, the hon. Member was irregular in commenting upon them at present.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he was not aware he was out of order; and it appeared to him that the observations he was making were in some way pertinent to these Returns. He was only following the example of other hon. Members. The hon. and learned Member for Wallingford not only made a long speech of his own on the subject, but repeated the speech of everybody else.

MR. NEWDEGATE observed, that the Returns before the House were extremely vague. The hon. and learned Member for Southwark had pointed out some of their manifest absurdities, so that he (Mr. Newdegate) would not go further into that matter. He rose for the purpose of calling the attention of the Government to the fact, that the House had no information at all as to the numbers which might be added to the county constituencies by the Reform Bill, with the exception of a Return which he had moved for in 1854, which was of rather old date now. He had intended to move for a further Return; but he believed his hon. Friend the Member for Northamptonshire had given a notice on the subject, and that the Poor-Law Board were at present preparing a Return in consequence of the Motion of his hon. Friend. He (Mr. Newdegate), however, hoped the House would not find themselves in this position—that when they were asked to proceed with the Reform Bill after Easter they should be told that the Returns were not prepared. He objected to their proceeding to pass an important measure without being in a position to judge of the effects of it; and he therefore asked an assurance that the House should not be asked to consider the important change in the county constituencies proposed by the Reform Bill of the Government without further information. The House wanted the bases of the calculations made by the Government, and for this they ought to have Returns of the numbers rated at £10, £20, £30, and £50 respectively. Indeed, they ought to have a Return of even those rated so low as £6, inasmuch as the rating valuation was much below the rental. He hoped the House would receive the reasonable assurance which he now begged to ask for.

Mr. Ayrton

LORD-LIEUTENANCY OF LONDON-DERRY COUNTY.—QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, the noble Lord at the head of the Government was aware of the statement which had been made, that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in defiance of precedent and custom, had chosen to appoint a legal functionary to the office of Lord Lieutenant of the county of Londonderry. It had been stated that this legal functionary did not possess property in the county beyond a small leasehold of 100 acres, while the qualification was £200 a year in fee. He wished to know whether during the recess the noble Lord would direct inquiries to be made whether the gentleman to whom he had referred possessed the amount of property necessary to qualify him for the office to which he had been appointed?

DISFRANCHISEMENT OF BOROUGHES. QUESTION.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR wished to put a question to the noble Lord which had reference to the boroughs proposed to be partially disfranchised. The House was aware that in 1831 the Government took the test of population for their disfranchising clauses; but that test was objected to and abandoned, and they resolved in the Reform Bill, which became law in 1832, to adopt the test of the number of houses and of the amount of direct taxation in considering the question of disfranchisement. Lord Melbourne at that time directed Lieutenant Drummond to make such a return on this principle as would show the relative importance of the boroughs, and on that return the Government of the day proceeded in their disqualifications. He wished to know whether, seeing the present Government had reverted to the test of 1831, instead of taking that of 1832, they would direct a Return to be made, on the same principle as that made by order of Lord Melbourne, of all boroughs returning two Members to Parliament, and containing less than 10,000 inhabitants? Such a Return would be of the greatest possible interest, as showing the relative importance of the various boroughs.

MR. DEEDES suggested that the Reform Bill should be postponed until after the next Census, which would be taken next year. They could then take the Reform Bill with more justice to all parties. He wished to know what business would be taken immediately after they met again? He understood the noble Lord to say that on the 16th the Naval Estimates would be taken. Upon referring to the Notice-book in the Library, the first Order of the Day for the 16th was the second reading of the Ecclesiastical Commission Bill, and the third Order was the second reading of the Highways Bill. As these measures were immediately in the hands of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, it would be a matter of convenience to Gentlemen interested in both those measures if the right hon. Gentleman would state when he thought it would be in his power to proceed with those measures.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that neither of these Bills would be proceeded with in the first week after Easter.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON was understood to assent to the inquiry suggested by the hon. Member for Roscommon. With respect to the Return referred to by the hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke last, it was very difficult for the Government to call for Returns at the suggestion of other persons. If any hon. Member chose to move for a Return which was likely to throw useful light on any subject that would come under the discussion of the House, the Government would, of course, offer no objection to its production.

Motion agreed to.

House, at rising, to adjourn till Monday, 16th April.

LAND IMPROVEMENT (IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE.—FIRST READING.

MR. HENNESSY moved for leave to bring in a Bill to facilitate the improvement of land in Ireland, but said in the absence of a great many Irish Members he forbore to enter into any details.

MR. CARDWELL thought it was desirable that those hon. Members who objected to the measure which he proposed should have an opportunity of introducing one themselves. He was therefore glad that the hon. Member for the King's County had given notice on this subject. He should offer no objection to the introduction of his Bill.

Leave given.

"Bill to facilitate the improvement of Land in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HENNESSY, Mr. POLLARD-URQUHART, and Sir RICHARD LEVINGE."

Bill presented and read 1^o.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS JURISDICTION.—LEAVE.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE asked leave to bring in a Bill to abolish the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts in Ireland in cases of defamation, and in England, Wales, and Ireland in cases of brawling. He said he ought perhaps to apologise to the Irish Members for interfering in this matter, but having already introduced a Bill to abolish those Courts in England and Wales, he was requested by persons connected with Ireland to introduce a similar measure for that country. He proposed to place the jurisdiction of the Irish Ecclesiastical Courts on the same footing as the English Courts in cases of defamation, and to abolish the jurisdiction of the Courts altogether in cases of brawling in England and Ireland.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS wished to make one remark as to the proposed abolition of any proceeding in the Ecclesiastical Courts against brawling. His attention had lately been directed to that subject. As he understood the matter, at present brawling in church was purely an ecclesiastical offence. Unless there was a breach of the peace there was no power of maintaining order in a church except by a suit in the Ecclesiastical Courts. His right hon. Friend proposed by this Bill to repeal that remedy without substituting any civil remedy. Doubtless a suit in the Ecclesiastical Courts was a very costly and cumbrous proceeding; but a civil remedy ought to be substituted if the law were to remain in its integrity.

COLONEL FRENCH could not understand what induced the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock to attempt legislation on this subject. He (Colonel French) had never heard of any complaints of brawling in churches being made in Ireland. If such an offence existed, he thought that Irish Members would be fully competent to deal with it. He objected to all such amateur statesmen trying their 'prentice hand on Ireland.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE reminded the hon. and gallant Gentleman that the general complaint of Irish Members was that the law of England was not extended to Ireland. He could assure the hon. and gallant Gentleman that he had been informed that the offence of brawling in churches did exist in Ireland, and that he had been requested by some Irish gentlemen to introduce a measure for that country similar to the one he had introduced for England and Wales. In reply to the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department, he believed that there was a statute of Queen Mary which provided a civil remedy in civil courts for this offence of brawling.

Leave given.

"Bill to abolish the Jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts in Ireland in cases of defamation, and in England and Wales and Ireland in cases of brawling, ordered to be brought in by Mr. EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVERIE and Mr. MELLOR."

LIBERATION OF MR. TARRANT.

QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. EDWIN JAMES,

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that on the receipt of a despatch from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, the Governor of Hong Kong, in conformity with that despatch, put an end to the imprisonment of Mr. Tarrant, the editor of The Friend of China. Mr. Tarrant was now and had been for some weeks at liberty.

AUSTRALIAN ELECTIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. WYLD said, he wished to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if any communication has been received respecting corruption, intimidation, and bribery at the recent Australian Elections, and whether there is any objection to lay these Communications before the House?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that in the self-governing colonies of Canada and Australia no official reports were sent to the Colonial Office relative to the domestic and internal affairs of those colonies, such as the conduct of elections. There were, therefore, no official reports on the late Australian elections that it would be possible to bring before the House.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, till Monday, 16th April.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, April 16, 1860.

MINUTES.]—NEW WRIT ISSUED.—For Harwich, in the room of the hon. William Frederick Campbell, now Lord Stratheden.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.—For Londonderry City. William M'Cormick, esquire.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Census (England).

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

On Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair,

STATE OF THE NAVY.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, that before the right hon. Gentleman left the Chair he wished to make some remarks upon the Navy, which was not in such a healthy state as he should wish to see. It would be remembered that, in a previous Session, the noble Lord now Secretary to the Admiralty called attention to the great discrepancies in the accounts of the dock-yard expenditure for some years past, under the management of several successive Boards of Admiralty. The noble Lord then stated that these discrepancies amounted to a deficit of no less than five millions; and that much of the public money had been thrown away in the constant alterations and extensions made in the form and length of ships. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington) had since called on the Surveyor General of the Navy to account for these unnecessary and expensive changes. But it appeared on reference to the facts, with regard to the Lyra, the Racer, and the Immortalité, the vessels which had been specified, that the Surveyor General was not to blame. Still the complaint was in many respects too well founded, for the Orlando and the Mersey were the only ships laid down in 1856 that were completed in strict conformity with the original drawings without any alteration. He confessed he was astounded when he saw the sweeping accusations that were made against the Surveyor of the Navy, for if that officer had been guilty of the enormous extravagance which the charges against him alleged, the matter ought not to be slightly passed over by that House, while if the Secretary to the Admiralty had been mistaken in his calculations, he (Sir Charles Napier) was sure the noble Lord would be the first to make the amende honorable to the Surveyor General, for otherwise an accusation of this sort made against an officer, if not answered or withdrawn, would be handed down in Hansard for ever afterwards. The fact was, that between 1830 and 1845, as appeared from some Returns for which he (Sir Charles Napier) had moved, about £50,000 had been expended in altering ships' sterns, and during the eleven years that Sir Baldwin Walker had been Surveyor General, there had only been £550 spent on such alterations. The expenditure for altering sailing ships to screw ships was quite a different matter from that of laying a ship down on the stocks, and then capriciously pulling her to pieces. The progress of science had such an effect upon the whole system of the navy as to render sailing ships almost useless; and both the late and the present Lords of the Admiralty were right in turning all the sailing vessels into screw ships fit for service. They had at last a steam navy of 23 screw ships of the line, 19 frigates, 9 block-ships, 4 mortar ships, 15 corvettes and sloops, 26 gun-vessels, 161 gunboats, 4 troop-ships, and some other classes, making a total of 319 screw ships, besides 112 paddle ships, and 32 building; altogether, 463. By the alteration which had been lately made, and which the House, no doubt, approved, the country had at last got a very large and powerful steam fleet, though the getting it had cost a great deal of money. Successive Governments of late had allowed the French to go ahead, and therefore it became necessary to expend enormous sums of money to enable the navy of this country to recover its proper position. The whole of the alterations had been effected with green timber; and this did not agree with the old timber, which the ships were originally made of, so that by the time when the whole of the navy should be converted into screw vessels it would be requisite to begin to repair the ships over again. Consequently the country need not expect a diminution in the Navy Estimates next year. The country had likewise got, after a long struggle, a Channel Fleet, consisting of ten sail of the line, but the difficulty which still existed was how to man that fleet. So far as he had been able to understand, the Channel Fleet was but indifferently manned, and it was not yet complete. There was a great want of petty officers; they were chiefly pensioners, and this ought not to be, for as everybody who had ever been to sea must know, the petty officers were the backbone of a fleet. This was owing to the Channel Fleet being paid off in 1857, when the petty officers were turned adrift to get other employment how they could. Many of them went to America, and it would take years to bring back the fleet to the condition in which it was in 1857. Another defect was the want of midshipmen, though some years ago the Government put in such a number of young cadets that they did not know what to do with them, and Lieutenants were promoted to make room above. Just let the House consider the position we should be in supposing a war were to break out, because of the want of these officers. There was hardly a ship with more than two midshipmen, and there was a great deficiency of mates. He would advise, therefore, that mates should be borrowed from the merchant service till the youngsters now under training should be fitted for the vacant posts. He had often complained, and felt bound to do so again, that no encouragement was given to the lower classes to rise in the navy. The importance of this as an aid to effective discipline had been recognized by the Admiralty in their circular with regard to the promotion of shipwrights in the dockyards. The distinction in the navy between common seamen and petty officers was not sufficient to give the petty officers due command over the men. The pay of the first class petty officer was £41 1s. 3d.; the second class, £36 10s.; and below that, £33 9s. 2d.; whilst the seaman's pay was £26 or £27. It depended chiefly on the petty officers to keep up discipline among the men. Since the present Board of Admiralty had been formed they had heard a good deal about mutinies, as for instance on board the Princess Royal and the Edgar. He thought the Admiralty was much to blame, for if they had taken rigid and proper steps he did not think these mutinies would have taken place. Mutiny used to be considered a serious offence, but now it seemed to be treated very lightly, but unless decisive steps were taken it could not be known where these mutinies would stop. The warrant officers indeed were placed on a better footing. Their pay was £122 8s. for the first class, £103, and then £86 13s., so that there was an immense difference between warrant officers and petty officers; and the Government allowed a warrant officer to become a commissioned officer, and gave him £100 for outfit; and he understood that if a petty officer became a warrant officer he would be allowed something for outfit also. But it should be remembered that the position of warrant officer was now almost the highest one that was open to the ordinary seaman to obtain, though formerly the seaman could sometimes rise to be a mate or lieutenant. The neglect of the warrant officers' widows had been a most objectionable feature of our system. The widows of captains or lieutenants had been allowed pensions, though they would probably be in less need of them than those of warrant officers. The Government, however, had at length, and very properly, allowed the warrant officers' widows to claim a pension; but they had done so in a very shabby way. If a man was made a warrant officer in December, and died in January, his widow received a pension; but, if having been a petty officer ten or fifteen years, and having gone through ever so much hard service, he died in 1859, his widow was left to starve. On this account much discontent was felt. He trusted the Government would correct themselves and reward the warrant officers as they deserved. He had said they had a Channel fleet, but they did not make the use of it they ought to do. The Channel fleet was now ten sail of the line; but in the position the country was in at the present moment, they ought to have the means of increasing it; and he thought they might increase it without putting the country to great expense. The Commission had recommended that there ought to be more Marines in the garrison towns. They ought to have them, and if fewer Marines and more seamen were on board ship, they might, on an emergency,

Sir Charles Napier

by shifting the seamen to other vessels, and supplying their place with Marines, soon double the fleet. This had been impressed on the Government over and over again, but without effect. It was said, "Oh, we can't get seamen." Why, then, had the Admiralty cut down the bounty from £10 to £2 or £3? The fleet was not yet complete, and from what he had heard, it was not manned as a British fleet ought to be. He was not one of those who thought that corporal punishment could at once be remitted, as he was of opinion that it would be impossible to maintain discipline if that system were at once abolished. As he was upon that subject, he would read from a return of the punishments that had been ordered and inflicted during a period of five years. He found that in 1854 there were throughout the whole fleet 1,214 men punished, and that the number of lashes inflicted was 35,479; but only 196 were inflicted by order of a court-martial. In 1855 the number of men punished was 1333, and the lashes inflicted 14,226; in 1856 the number of men punished was 8,397, and the number of lashes inflicted 44,492; but only 476 were inflicted by a court-martial; and in 1857 the number of men punished was 1,087, and the lashes inflicted were 35,000. He was much surprised that the Commission for Manning the Navy had not taken into consideration whether there were not some means of diminishing corporal punishment. There was a plan, and a simple one, by which that might be effected. Petty officers should be placed on a more respectable footing, and their pay should be increased. If that course were taken, they would obtain a better class of men for the service, whom there would be no necessity for visiting with corporal punishment. He did not approve of the manner in which the men were punished. The captain had the power of disgracing petty officers, and then of punishing them through another tribunal. That was too great a power to place in the hands of the captain. He, for one, would not allow such a power to be conferred upon him, but would have the men tried solemnly by court-martial, which tribunal should have the power of dismissing them—a sentence by which they would lose their pay and the value of their past services. That would be considered a very severe punishment by the men; but, if that punishment were not severe enough, they could add imprisonment. Then with regard to the sailors. They must remember that a sailor worked very hard to get a pension of sixpence a day for ten years, and that he worked still harder and longer to get a shilling a day. If he conducted himself improperly therefore he should be tried by court-martial; and the knowledge that he was liable to be dismissed from the service, would have a considerable effect in deterring him from the commission of offences. Looking at the few instances in which, according to Parliamentary returns, corporal punishment had been inflicted by sentence of court-martial, as compared with the number of cases in which it had been inflicted by order of the captains, he thought that this power should be taken away from the latter. If that man was tried by court-martial, and was liable to lose his pension, he held that the knowledge of that fact would have a great tendency to diminish offences. He thought it would have a great effect if the power of inflicting corporal punishment were taken away from the captain. Seeing that societies were being formed all over the country to abolish corporal punishment, he believed it would be impossible to maintain it long, and they ought to consider what would be the best substitute. The Government had better immediately stare the matter in the face, and endeavour to reform the bloodthirsty code which at present existed. Almost every one of the Articles of War prescribed death, or some other severe punishment, and how could they expect men to enter the service, when they knew they were subject to death? Death was awarded for the offence of sleeping in the watch; yet it was notorious that the law was a perfect farce, for a man was often ordered down to sleep by his superior officer. He trusted the Government would be prepared to take some step in reference to this matter, in the course of the present Session. If not, he should feel it his duty to bring forward a Motion on the subject himself. There was one other matter of complaint, and that was with regard to the discomfort of the hulks. He knew them to be most uncomfortable, and it was impossible to maintain discipline on board them. He thought he should be able to show that there was no necessity for hulks. Ships were now ready at the different ports to receive the men, except as regarded perishable stores. A ship should be ready to receive her crew on the first day of being put into commission. With reference to paying off, he had observed with regret that the Admiralty had reiterated the order which had been so much complained of. He perfectly agreed with Admiral Bowles that it was not necessary, and was not wise, after men had been abroad two or three years, to keep them on board without seeing their wives and families. It was most unreasonable and unwise to do so. If a ship came home, and was to be paid off, the whole of the crew, officers and all, ought to be turned over into one of those ships which he had shown were ready to receive them, and the men would then have an opportunity of taking off all their clothes, and all the other little things that they had accumulated. It was bad economy too. They all knew that when ships were going to be paid off, the captain was impatient and the men were impatient, and the remaining stores were turned over in a slovenly manner. He was sorry to say he had done it himself. It was only the other day that he saw at Portsmouth bran-new cables, which had never been used, and which were cut. If the ships which were to be paid off were carefully unrigged, under the supervision of the superintendent of the dockyard, a great saving would be effected. The Admiralty had made a great blunder in the matter of the Princess Royal, and the mutiny which arose on board that ship was entirely their own fault. Their mode of proceeding was extraordinary and unjustifiable, for they had 180 men tried in block by court martial, under circumstances which rendered it impossible to ascertain who were innocent and who were guilty. He hoped they would hear no more of cases of that kind. He had shown that, instead of ten sail of the line for their Channel fleet, they might easily have twenty. He would now show how without a single halfpenny additional expense they might have eight more. They had in their different ports eight block-ships, but he would have a line-of-battle ship at each of the different large ports. The Admiralty had at last managed to place a real ship at Liverpool, and to withdraw the block-ship, which was an object of derision to all the sailors visiting that port. At present there were eight block-ships, which, if an emergency arose, would be compelled to remain in port and run great risk of capture by the enemy. Yet those block-ships were considered as our reserve in case of war, to be manned by the Coastguard, assisted by the Coast Volunteers. Now the House had been very much misled with regard to the Coastguard, and he was sorry to say that he had unintentionally assisted to mislead it. He stated last year that the Coastguard consisted of 8,200 men. The Manning Commission recommended that they should be increased to 12,000. Now Admiral Martin, who had been in the Admiralty himself, had published a clear and sensible pamphlet, in which he showed that the only reliable number of the Coastguard was 3,200. That was the amount of their reserve, if the statement of Admiral Martin was correct, and he was just got from the Admiralty, and the Admiralty must have known it, although they put down the number of 8,200 in the Estimate. As to the Coast Volunteers, the Commission themselves described them not exactly as sailors, but still as men upon whom they could depend. What ought they to do with the Coast Volunteers? He would tell them. He dared to say that the noble Lord at the head of the Admiralty had looked back to the sea fencibles of former days. He (Sir C. Napier) thought that they ought to return to the sea fencibles; but if not let them take the Coast Volunteers for what they were worth. Only a few of them could go aloft as they were trained mostly to work the guns. He would place those men on board the block-ships, for no other purpose than to remain in their ports. Those vessels had had their steam power reduced to 200 horse, and their masts and yards had been also reduced; so that they could not sail or steam. They were only fit to remain in port; and he should propose that the Coast Volunteers should be placed in them; and he would get rid of all the men in the Coastguard who were not seamen. If that were done they would be able to send eight additional sail of the line to sea at a moment's warning. There were six vessels ready to replace the block-ships, namely, the Mars, the Cressy, the Colossus, the Marie, the Lion, and the Goliath; and the sooner the exchange was made the better. Now he came to the question of the reserve. The last time he made inquiry about it, he found that the number of men on the reserve list was only between 600 and 700; so that, adding those to the Coastguard force, estimated at 3,200, we could not count on more than 4,000 men, if so many, coming within the description of a reserve. They had been told, both by the Secretary to the Admiralty and the Member for Halifax (Sir C. Wood) that France could man the whole of her fleet whenever she pleased. The men destined to serve in the French navy were all regularly organized and could be promptly drafted on-board ship. On the other hand, the men we had enlisted on the reserve were far from being efficient. They were not even so good as those who served in the Baltic. He was not blaming the Admiralty for that, they were doing their best; but he blamed the Government for reducing the bounty from £6 to £2 or £3. The Commissioners of last year recommended an increase of Seamen Gunners, and for that purpose suggested that their pay should be augmented, and that five years' service should count as six in reckoning for pensions. He was not aware whether the Government was resolved on carrying out that proposal. The Commissioners also recommended an increase in the allowance of provisions, and that suggestion had been adopted; but what the Government gave with one hand they took away with the other. They had decreased the savings, and he (Sir C. Napier) believed that nine-tenths of the seamen in Her Majesty's service would have preferred the old arrangement. The recommendation of the Commission with regard to clothing, bedding, and mess traps had been agreed to, and a very great boon it had proved to the navy. The allotment system had likewise been established; but it took nearly six weeks before an allotment could be paid. Now, he would ask the House, how in God's name was a seaman's wife to subsist in the meantime? He considered that the arrangements ought to be such that the wages might be paid over the day after the allotment was made. In 1852 a Commission, composed of excellent officers, recommended that besides the Channel fleet, there should be a reserve of 10,000 men always in the home ports; but what was the good of going to the expense of a Commission if its suggestions were not attended to? Seeing the way in which the Report of 1852 had been neglected, he (Sir C. Napier) moved for another Commission to go over the ground again; and that Commission had reduced the number of the reserve to 4,000, in addition to the Channel fleet and the guard-ships. He (Sir C. Napier) did not complain of that reduction; but had the other suggestions of the Commissioners been carried out? They recommended, for instance, that a large ship like the Britannia should be stationed at Plymouth, and that there should be four additional training vessels. Had either of these things been done? They also recommended the establishment of school ships. Had school ships been established? [Lord CLARENCE PAGET: There is one preparing.] One preparing! The Commissioners recommended that the Merchant Seamen's Fund should be re-established. Had that been done? The noble Lord (Lord C. Paget) held his tongue, and he (Sir Charles Napier) took it for granted that it had not. They were told that the Coastguard would be entitled to admission into Greenwich Hospital; but did any one think that that offered any temptation to seamen to join the force? When the Report of the Commission which was now sitting on the hospital was published, the House would be thunderstruck to find how shamefully and disgracefully the institution had been managed for many years past; in fact, an admission into the hospital was hardly worth a man's acceptance. Another recommendation of the Commission was in favour of a better regulation for the payment of wages when a ship was fitting out. He believed the Admiralty were considering this point, but they always considered things so long that probably a year would elapse before the recommendation of the Committee could be carried out. The Commission on Manning the Navy further contemplated a reserve force consisting of 4,000 Marines in the home ports; 12,000 Coastguards, 6,000 Marines, 5,000 short-pension Marines, 3,000 short-pension Seamen, 20,000 Royal Naval Volunteers, and 10,000 Naval Coastguards and other forces, making a total of 70,000 men; but how many had the country really got? They had not got the 4,000 Marines in the home ports; the Coastguards numbered 3,200 men instead of 12,000; the Marines were of the full force of 6,000, but they had no short-service Marines; of short-service Seamen they had 190 instead of 3,000; of the Volunteers there were 700 instead of 20,000; and how many Naval Coastguards there might now be he was unable to say. Surely this was a matter that required to be looked into. If the Admiralty were to give the short-service pension men to understand that if they joined the reserve allowance would be made for past services, they might be induced to come forward; but at present they would not do so, especially as they were liable to be sent off immediately to distant parts of the world. The Commission wound up by expressing their opinion that the reliefs at the home ports should be speedily raised, but they all knew that they were not being speedily raised, and that a period of seven years might elapse before the reserve could be established under the present system. The Commissioners on National Defences recommended an expenditure of no less than £10,000,000 in fortifications, but he doubted the wisdom of such a course. There was, for instance, Alderney, on which £300,000 had been spent, and on which it was proposed to lay out another £100,000 this year. But what was the use of Alderney? It was not even a harbour of refuge. It was a mistake to say that it looked into Cherbourg. They could only keep four or five ships of the line in the harbour, and that part of the Channel was too dangerous to have a fleet cruising about in it. Again, they had just been building forts at Portsmouth and Cosham, and they had recently discovered that a few guns planted on Portsdown Hill would blow them and the harbour and dockyard at Portsmouth to pieces. It would be far better to spend the money on Armstrong's guns, by means of which they could attack any place. Yet he heard that there was not a single Armstrong gun on board a man-of-war. The other day he asked for a return of the number of Armstrong's guns, when the noble Lord at the head of the Government said the Secretary to the Admiralty was not in his place. The Secretary was now present, and, perhaps, he would answer the question. Having spoken of all these numerous defects with regard to the navy, he might be expected to state his own opinion of what was the proper course to be taken; and he would do so, although he knew he should not be popular. The only certain way of manning the navy in case of war breaking out was by calling the seamen out by a proclamation, imposing a penalty on all captains of merchant ships for detaining a man falling under the terms of the proclamation, and paying the men the high bounty. Calling them out by proclamation was a system of impressment; but if the Government expected men to come forward voluntarily at the present moment they would be deceived. If they wanted men in the navy they must resort to the same means as a mercantile man or a millowner—namely, offer a good market price for labour. If they wanted sailors they must offer pay sufficiently high to induce them to come forward and enter the service. To expect men to enter for low wages would only lead to disappointment; it would be found to be impossible to get them without high wages. That was the only fair and just way of obtaining them, but hitherto the House of Commons had refused to adopt it. They contented themselves with giving them a penny or twopence a day for good service, but that was not the way in which they would ever get the men to come forward. He had stated to the House the only way which, as he believed, they would ever get the navy thoroughly, efficiently, and immediately manned; and if the House refused to adopt it the responsibility would rest with themselves. At the present moment he did not believe there was an officer that would say our British fleet at the present moment was in a position to meet any well disciplined adversary. They ought to be morally certain that British sailors and British officers—such men as they had on board their ships—would be able to vanquish any enemy at sea in any part of the world. There ought not to be a chance of failure; there should hardly be a single doubt as to the power of a British fleet to drive a hostile fleet back into its ports, as used to be done forty years ago. This could only be secured by carrying out the recommendations of the Royal Commission. He hoped to see those recommendations more fully carried out by the Government; but if the Admiralty should refuse to do their duty in this matter, he (Sir Charles Napier) should think it his duty to bring forward a substantive Motion on the subject, in order to put the country into a proper state of defence.

Sir Charles Napier

Sir Charles Napier

Subject dropped.

POST-CAPTAINS ON THE RESERVED LIST.—OBSERVATIONS.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he rose, pursuant to notice, to call attention to the case of Post-Captains on the reserved list. He regretted that the advocacy of the claims of these gentlemen had not been undertaken by some officer belonging to the Royal Navy; but at least it could not have fallen into the hands of any one who was more thoroughly convinced of the hardship and injustice of their treatment, and he trusted that the short statement he was about to make would induce the Admiralty to reconsider the decision to which they had come with regard to them; to grant the prayer of those veterans; and to relieve them from the reproach of being refused, for the few remaining years they had to live, that small increase of pay which they believed to be their due. On the 25th of March, 1851, in consequence of the overcharged state of the Navy List, an Order in Council was issued, beginning a system of retirement; and, as an experiment, 50 commanders were selected for their eminent services as being proper to be placed on the reserved list, for the purpose of being promoted to the rank of post-captain, and to rise (as he should show) by seniority to the rank of admiral. The Order in Council stated that the number of commanders on the active list would be reduced to 450—firstly, by promoting 50 commanders to the rank of captain; secondly, by increasing to 100 the list of commanders promoted to the rank of retired captain under the Order in Council of 1840; and thirdly,

“By placing on reserved half-pay all commanders who have not served afloat, or in the packet or revenue service, within 20 years, or who are physically incapable of service, and by continuing from time to time to remove such officers from the active list to reserved half-pay. Officers who may be thus placed on reserved half-pay will be allowed to retain all the advantages they now enjoy of rising in pay or rank, or of receiving the Greenwich out-pension.”

[Lord C. PAGET.—“Read the next paragraph.”] The next paragraph was as follows:—

“The system of promoting by brevet will be abandoned. Fifty lieutenants, however, will be promoted by selection to the rank of commander, to be placed on reserved half-pay, in the same manner as specified in the case of commanders promoted to be captains.”

The letter to the 50 commanders thus promoted to be captains, from the First Lord of the Admiralty, stated that in consideration of their services he offered them this promotion, and that if they accepted the offer it would not prevent them from being eligible for a commander's out-pension for Greenwich. In 1854 Captain Allen was appointed to a Greenwich out-pension, and subsequently two other captains on the reserved list received similar appointments. But another captain who applied in February, 1856, was refused the out-pension, on the pretext that by a recent regulation he was not eligible to be put upon the Greenwich out-pension. He held in his hand the commission issued to these officers, which in all respects resembled that issued to post-captains in active service, except that the words, “for rank only,” were inserted in the corner of the document. An hon. and gallant Gentleman now no more (Captain L. Vernon)—to whom he could not allude without expressing the great loss which the House had suffered from his untimely fate—had recently read a letter from an officer high in the Admiralty, calling upon a gentleman (Mr. Churchward) to continue a series of graphic sketches of the services of these very officers, in order to satisfy the country that they were entitled to be placed on the reserved list. One of these officers, Captain Gordon, applied to be admitted to an out-pension at Greenwich, and he received an answer, signed by Mr. Phinn, stating that his name had been placed in the list of candidates, and that at the proper time his claims would be taken into consideration. At the same time he was informed that the object in granting these pensions was the relief of officers who might be old, wounded, or disabled, and that if the pension were granted he would be ineligible for further employment. It appeared, therefore, that his application had been entertained by the Admiralty, and that he had received intimation that it had been duly noted. When Captain Gordon rose to the grade of captain, which entitled him to have his pay increased to 12s. 6d. a day, he wrote to the Admiralty on the subject, and was informed by Mr. Romaine that being on the reserved list he was not entitled to any increase of half-pay. He renewed his application, but the Admiralty refused to enter further into the question. This, then, was the case as it stood. As all of their commissions were dated in 1851 none of those gentlemen could have risen to the grade which entitled them to an increase of pay till the past year; but the views of former Admiralties on this point might be gathered from the fact that three of these very officers, as he had stated, had obtained the captain's out-pension for Greenwich since their retirement; and he believed that if the views of the Admiralty which first granted the retirement had been still adhered to they would now have received their increase of pay without any difficulty. The whole case rested on the construction of the Order in Council, and he must leave that to be dealt with by hon. Gentlemen who were more accustomed to argue legal questions than he was. When he first took up the case of these officers, he heard from several quarters that their services did not entitle them to this consideration. He, therefore, applied to O'Byrne's “Naval Biography,” with a view to extract the services of those gentlemen, going through their names alphabetically. But he confessed that by the time he came to the letter C he found such an amount of service as to convince him that it was quite unnecessary to go farther. There was only one name under the letter A. There were eight under the letter B, all men of high service, and amongst them was Captain Bevis, who, he did not hesitate to say—though he knew it was a bold word—was the worst-used man in the British navy. He was at Copenhagen; and first lieutenant of the Galatea, in the action off Madagascar, where three frigates and a brig, under Captain Schomberg, engaged three French frigates and took two of them. The action was fought in a calm, or nearly so, and the Galatea was most severely handled; notwithstanding this, Captain Bevis was allowed to remain a lieutenant for eighteen years after the date of that action. And now they refused to allow him more than 6*d.* a day higher than the pay he would have received had he continued a commander. These were the services of the men whose case he brought forward. He hoped, therefore, the Admiralty would reconsider their decision, and not allow these veterans—for most of them were above 70 years of years—to be deprived of their just rights by what he could not help designating as a quibble, and would save them from the reproach of feeling that their claims to the gratitude of the country were no longer acknowledged.

MR. LINDSAY said, he agreed with the hon. Member for Portsmouth to a certain extent. He had no doubt that the gallant captains referred to deserved well of their country, and that the half-pay awarded to them fell far short of those deserts, but, on the other hand, he would ask the House to consider the enormous cost to the nation which the system of half-pay entailed. From the Estimates before the House for the current year he found that £690,000 was the amount voted for half-pay to officers of the Navy and Royal Marines, and that £488,000 additional was voted for pensions and allowances. This was really an enormous expenditure. The present system of retiring allowances could not but be unsatisfactory to the men who received these sums; it could not be otherwise than unsatisfactory to the Government who made the Estimates; and, most of all, was it unsatisfactory to the House, whose duty it was to provide the amount. He thought it was high time that the whole question of reserve and retired lists should be carefully looked into, because in consequence of it there was a large amount of dissatisfaction among the officers themselves, as there were a very large number of officers—more especially above the rank of lieutenant—who were knocking in vain at the door of the Admiralty for employment. They felt that there was no possibility of obtaining employment, and that if every ship in the British navy were commissioned to-morrow, there were still great numbers of officers who would not and could not be employed. The gallant Admiral (Sir Charles Napier) had complained that there was now only an average of two midshipmen to each ship of war, but would the gallant Admiral wish to go back to the times when the average was about eight—a state of things which eventually saddled the House with an enormous amount of half-pay. Instead of bringing more midshipmen into the service, his plan would be rather to bring the petty officers forward, to give them a higher grade, to make a greater distinction between them and the able-bodied seamen, and so giving the petty officers much of the duty to do that was done by midshipmen. In this way two good effects would follow. They would be spared the necessity of rearing up officers whom they could not afterwards employ, and they would encourage the able-bodied seamen in the merchant service to enter the Royal Navy, in the hope that they would reach the superior grade of petty officers. Without following the gallant Admiral through the whole of his speech, he might yet say a word respecting the Royal Commission, of which he had the honour to be a member, but from whose Report he had the misfortune to dissent. With all due respect to the gallant Admiral, he thought it would not be so very easy to follow out the recommendations of the Commission; but even if that were done, the object which the Commission had in view would, he believed, be still unattained. If they wanted to draw men from the merchant service, they must appeal to the officers of that service by giving them some honorary rank, some distinguishing badge which, without raising them to the same rank as naval officers, would raise their social position in this country, and more especially abroad, and constitute them officers of the reserve which had been recommended. But to do the Admiralty justice, he must say they had used every possible exertion to carry out the recommendations of the Commission. The hon. and gallant Admiral thought it might be ultimately found necessary to resort to impressment. He did not think so. If our shores were in danger of invasion, men would not be wanting to resist and overcome it. But if we were to fight other battles than our own, then we might find difficulty indeed in obtaining men from the merchant service. His main object, however, was to call attention to the enormous and constantly increasing expenditure on the navy. In 1852 it amounted to £5,800,000; in 1853 to £6,300,000; in 1858 to £8,800,000; in 1859 to £11,770,000; and this year the amount of the Vote was £12,800,000. And there was no expectation that the expenditure would stop at this point. He asked the House what was the meaning of it? What was this enormous outlay for? Against whom were they arming? Against the United States? Against Russia? Against Prussia? Every one had a feeling as to the Power against whom we were arming, but none cared to express it. It was best, however, to be honest, and to speak it out at once. We were arming against France, and France was increasing her expenditure as much as we were. Her annual expenditure was as great as ours—about £72,000,000. Why were these enormous charges kept up? It was because we were afraid of France, and France was afraid of us. It was monstrous that the two most intelligent and most highly civilized nations upon the earth should go on in this way; and he asked, whether something could not be done to prevent it. We had entered into a treaty of commerce with France, and great friendship was professed between the two countries; but what a mockery were such professions when, at the very time they were being made, both countries were heavily taxing their people to keep up these enormous armaments! He strongly recommended that some understanding be arrived at in order to prevent so much waste going on from year to year. Something might certainly be done if the right mode were adopted. France had no reason to be afraid of attack from England, and he felt that France had no intention of attacking England. The Emperor of the French was much too enlightened a man not to know that it was his interest, as well as the interest of Europe, to keep at peace with England. Many hon. Members might differ from him

Sir James Elphinstone

(Mr. Lindsay) upon that point, but that was his honest belief, and he felt convinced that those Members who might happen to entertain opinions from which a majority of the House dissented ought to express them frankly. But if they were to maintain those armaments, the question next arose whether they might not attain that object for a less sum than they were at present expending. That was a subject to which he was anxious to call the attention of the House. The late Government, feeling, as he took it for granted, that out naval expenditure, and more especially the expenditure in our dockyards, had risen to an enormous amount, had appointed a Commission to inquire into the outlay in the dockyards, especially with regard to the building and repairing of ships. Some of the charges contained in the Report of that Commission were exceedingly graver. It was alleged, for example, that 20 per cent could be saved in the cost of new works alone; that great changes were required in the mode of superintendence so that additional machinery was required to save manual labour; that alterations were necessary in the mode of receiving timber and stores. Then, going into particulars, the Commissioners asserted that while at least 20 per cent could be saved in the construction of new vessels, the cost of building vessels was much higher in some yards than others. They mentioned, for example, that while a corvette of 1,400 tons, built at Devonport, cost for shipwrights' labour £6,450, or £4 8s. 3d. per ton; another, built at Woolwich, cost £10,065, or £6 17s. 8d. per ton; and another £10,119, or £6 18s. 5d. per ton. So that the cost of labour for the last was one-third more than that of the first. Then, a frigate, of 2,651 tons, built at Portsmouth, cost £14,033 in shipwrights' labour, or £5 5s. 10d. per ton; another, of 2,355 tons, built at Chatham, cost £9,357, or £3 19s. 7d. per ton. As to another class of ships, the Mersey, of 3,727 tons, cost for shipwrights' labour £3 19s. 7½d. per ton, while the Orlando, of the same burden, cost £5 4s. 8d. per ton. These were serious charges, and no satisfactory answer had been given to them either by Sir Baldwin Walker, Mr. Chatfield, or any other person. It was said that the cost of labour was higher in some dockyards than others; but this could not account for the difference, nor would it account for the different cost of material. In both there must be greater waste in one dockyard than in another. His noble Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty had told them, upon a former occasion, that he found it impossible to ascertain from the accounts how a certain sum of £5,000,000 had been expended, and that subject seemed to be still involved in mystery, although his noble Friend certainly appeared to have done his best to throw some light upon it, for he had recently laid on the table of the House an analysis showing the respective cost of different ships, and enabling them to trace more readily than they could formerly have done where the money went. A Royal Commission of Inquiry had been proposed. But his opinion was that, in the first instance, the allegations of the Report of the former Commission should be referred to a Committee of that House who should examine the Commissioners and also the officers who had sent in answers to the Report. If that Committee should be unable to arrive at a conclusion, then let a Royal Commission be appointed to inquire whether it was possible to reduce the expenditure upon the construction of new ships. This would be a definite object, and it would satisfy the just expectations of the country. There was another point to which he had called their attention in the course of the last Session, and upon which he had as yet been unable to obtain any satisfactory information. By a paper which he held in his hand he found that the average price actually paid by the Admiralty for anchors, according to the Estimates, was £3,434, while the market price was only £1,428, thus showing the Government was paying nearly three times as much as the same number could have been provided by the most eminent firms. He had moved for a copy of the contract and the price paid from 1841 to the present date, by which it appeared that the price paid was materially reduced in 1842, and again, and still more, in 1850. The prices for anchors in the table from 1842 to 1849 were £1 16s. per cwt. from 20 cwt. and under 30 cwt.; £2 8s. above 30 cwt. and under 50 cwt.; and £3 5s. above 70 cwt. and under 95 cwt. Now, it so happened that he held documents also from the Storekeeper of the Navy addressed to a City firm, which showed that the price paid by Government in 1845 was precisely the same as in 1841, and that no reduction had been made at all. He left it to the noble Lord to reconcile the discrepancy. One or the other must be wrong. There was no secret about the writer; it was Mr. Dundas, and there was no mistaking his signature; for no one who did not know what was meant would be able to understand it. Assuming its correctness, what was the country now paying for anchors? He had made a calculation of the cost of four anchors to the Admiralty at the present time, and found that the average cost to the country of the four anchors was 180s. per cwt., whereas the current price was much lower. The most eminent manufacturers of the country were willing to supply for 94s. 6d. the same class of anchors for which the Admiralty were paying 180s. to their contractor. However grave this charge, he was not surprised at it. He believed the dockyards were costing the country a great deal more than they ought. He believed that £9,000,000, or at most £10,000,000, would, under proper management, go as far as the £13,000,000 they were about to vote would go. Therefore, if they were to continue this heavy expenditure, which he did not believe to be at all necessary, they must have a further and a more searching inquiry into the management of Her Majesty's dockyards.

Mr. Lindsay

SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR said, that the gallant officers whose case had been brought before the House by the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir J. Elphinstone), had been induced to remove from the active list, in the hope that as time passed their position would not materially differ from that of the officers remaining on the active list, and they felt themselves aggrieved because they had not shared in the awards which the other classes had received. The subject had been frequently brought under the notice of the Admiralty, and he trusted the noble Lord would be able to deal satisfactorily with their claim. A subject equally deserving attention was the case of the widows of warrant officers, which had been touched on by the gallant officer the Member for Southwark. A certain degree of consideration had been extended by the Admiralty and the Chancellor of the Exchequer to this class, an arrangement having been made by which from January, 1860, these widows were to receive their pensions. But it was in evidence that from the year 1830 till now a number of these widows with their children had been compelled to seek relief from the different unions, and he hoped some measure of relief would also be extended to them. The Navy Estimates were rightly held to be enormously large, but he did not believe the country would refuse the amount requisite to do justice to the widows of deserving officers. Several instances had come under his own observation, when serving in a distant part of the world, in which warrant officers had lost their lives by climate and exertion. The carpenter of his flagship, after performing his duties with great ability and assiduity, and with much care and economy in superintending repairs and the handling of stores, died on his passage home a few months prior to the period from which this order would take effect, and had left a widow and several children in great distress. Such cases ought to meet with the consideration of the Government. He agreed up to a certain point with what the gallant Member for Southwark had said in reference to the Channel fleet; he believed their rules were not as good as they might be, and that in certain ships the conduct of the men had not been so steady and satisfactory as all well-wishers of the Navy must desire. But it must be borne in mind that both officers and men on board these ships had been placed in a position of great temptation. In any previous period of our naval history ships with their full war complement had never been kept in the home ports during the entire winter season. In future a different arrangement would probably be made, and by an altered distribution of vessels in different quarters of the globe, a recurrence of such irregularities would be avoided, and a greater efficiency to the service would be secured. There was also a great deficiency in petty officers, which was a very important consideration, because the discipline of a ship to a great extent depended upon them. He thought hardly sufficient encouragement was given to petty officers in the shape of increased pay, and otherwise to create the necessary spirit of emulation among the men to attain the position of a petty officer. He quite agreed with the hon. Member that it was very unwise to have too great a number of midshipmen and cadets in the navy, which tended to clog the service and interfere with the course of promotion. He thought with the hon. Member for Sunderland that the national dockyards were not managed with all the economy possible; but many of the differences between the cost of the same class of ships which the hon. Member had been unable to reconcile were entirely owing to the various modes of keeping the accounts in different yards. He admitted that the expenditure of the naval dockyards was exceedingly heavy; but the work done in them was of the very best kind, and it was unfair to look at the cost alone without taking into consideration the quality of the work. If, however, an inquiry was to take place, it should be full, fair, and impartial. As to the important question of manning the navy, he was glad to hear that the Government intended to carry into effect the recommendations of the Manning Commission. He fully approved the proposal to keep 1,000 seamen gunners in the home ports as a reserve force, and the plan of a standing reserve of seamen. The Marines, too—a body of whom it was impossible to speak too highly—might well be increased by 5,000 or 6,000 men. The difficulty of manning the navy had always been great; the Admiralty had never been able to get a fleet together without considerable difficulty in manning it. A system of general impressment could never be resorted to again; it would not be desirable or justifiable, except, perhaps, to the extent of an impressment afloat. With an enemy at sea, and a sudden necessity for men, he did not suppose an admiral lying with an unmanned fleet at St. Helen's could allow a merchant ship to come up Channel without taking some of her sailors for the public service. The number of seamen in the mercantile marine had greatly increased; but their money value to the naval service had not yet been quite ascertained. The commercial marine of the United States was very large; but there was this curious fact connected with it. A Report to Congress a few years ago showed that of 150,000 men sailing from American ports only 9,000, or about 1 in 12, were Americans born. Of the crew of the Ohio, a ship of the line, consisting of 1,000 men, only 182 were native Americans. The rate of pay was a most important question, which the Admiralty would be compelled to take into serious consideration. Representing as he did a seaport, he had frequent opportunities of hearing various complaints. No one class were satisfied; all seemed to think their services of greater money value; and the moment certainly had arrived when a question of this sort should, in a comprehensive spirit, be investigated. The fact was, the cost of seamen had increased, and he believed the Secretary of the Admiralty would be compelled to take into consideration the pay of the men as well as that of the other classes who composed the naval service. The system of manning had been often spoken of as a money question, and it was so certainly; for there was a great difficulty in obtaining men to man the navy, and how that difficulty was to be got over had yet to be considered. We were in alliance with a great and powerful and friendly nation, but our position in relation to that country was most unsatisfactory, when the position of our relative navies was considered. He remembered that after the close of the long war in 1815 there was great difficulty in manning the fleet. At that period 140,000 men were paid off, and when the expedition to Algiers was undertaken nothing but the gratuity of two months' pay could get them together again. In the Russian war the House voted 30,000 seamen, but there never were in reality above 22,000 in the service. He regretted to say that, as regarded the mercantile seamen who had been referred to by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay), the Government had been unable during that war to obtain more than 1,000. With regard to the defences of the country, it struck him that there ought to be a force reserved for the manning of the navy, and he looked upon it as highly important that this country should have something like a volunteer force to fall back upon. He was of opinion that the disembodiment of the Militia was not a wise course, and that resort ought to be had to the ballot. In 1803 the total military force of the country—when neither her population nor her wealth reached half its present amount—was, including the Volunteers, 615,000 men. It was, quite evident, however, that the patriotism of the English people had since that period undergone no diminution, and it only rested with the Government to give the national feeling due effect.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished before the Speaker left the Chair to allude to the position of the officers on the captains' reserved list, and to express his belief that the claims which they put forward, and to which reference had been made by the hon. Member for Portsmouth, were not without foundation. Had he been aware that the subject would have been entered into that evening, he should have had the Order in Council which bore upon it at hand, in order to substantiate the view which he entertained; for, although that document was somewhat loosely worded, he could not help thinking the construction which was put upon it by the officers to whom he referred in their memorial was more reasonable than the interpretation of the Board of Admiralty. He under those circumstances, trusted that the Board would be able to take a generous view of the matter, and he might add that they would be enabled to do so with the less difficulty because of the fact that the list of officers in question must be regarded as an expiring list, and that the number of names on it was very limited—only about 100. This was one of those numerous lists which were the result of a succession of contrivances which had been resorted to for a long period as a substitute—and a miserably bad substitute they were—for a good system of retirement and promotion. He did hope that before this Session closed the noble Lord opposite would be enabled to announce that the Admiralty had adopted a system of retirement that would be satisfactory to the profession. Whenever that desirable end was attained there would be no more necessity for creating from time to time those little lists, which as he had said were mere substitutes, and very miserable substitutes, for what was due to the navy, and what the Admiralty were bound to provide—namely, a well regulated system of promotion and retirement. When his noble Friend (Lord C. Paget) brought forward the Navy Estimates he did intimate that the Admiralty were meditating a system of retirement which they intended to announce; such was the general understanding; he hoped his noble Friend would not now object to state that the Admiralty still entertained that intention, and that before the Estimates were concluded he would be able to inform Parliament what was the nature of the scheme they proposed to adopt. He had no desire to detain the House longer on this question, but he sincerely hoped the Admiralty would take a liberal and generous view of the claim which these gallant officers had made.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, he was sorry he had not been present when the case of these officers were brought forward by his gallant Colleague. Indeed he only rose in consequence of some expressions which had dropt from the right hon. Baronet who had just sat down. It had been his fate to draw up the order on which this claim was founded, and he could therefore give evidence as to what the intention was. He should have no objection, on the contrary he should be glad to hear that the Admiralty took a favourable view of these claims; but, on the other hand, he was bound to say, what he had stated to the claimants themselves, that the order never was intended to bear the construction they put upon it. In neither the letter, which stated the intention of the Admiralty, nor in the Order in Council which carried that intention into effect, was there anything to sustain that construction. The letter was not loose, but perfectly clear, and drew a plain distinction between the two classes. What it did was this:—It placed on the redundant permanent half-pay list, officers who had not served for twenty-years or who were incapable, promising them they should rise and enjoy all the advantages they had on the active list; but to those who were promoted under the arrangement it made no such promise. It gave them promotion and not prospective advantages. It never was the intention to give them more. It did not even in words do so. He quite admitted the gallant services of these officers, many of whom he had himself placed on the list, and he should be very glad if the Admiralty, on a fair consideration of the case, could take any view that might be favourable to them; but he must say, as a witness, having himself drawn up the order and the letter of the Admiralty on which the vote in Parliament was given, that it was not the intention of that order to give these officers what they now asked.

Sir Michael Seymour

MR. HENLEY said, he thought the great amount of the Navy Estimates this year warranted every hon. Member in making almost any observations on them which came strongly before his mind. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) had alluded to the Report on dockyard expenditure, its voluminous nature, and the various subjects with which it dealt. The gallant Admiral the Member for Southwark (Sir C. Napier) also alluded to the deficiency in the supply of timber in the dockyards. That deficiency was commented on by the Commissioners in very strong language. It was almost impossible to speak more decidedly than they did on this subject. The Report of that Commission, as had been stated, was, naturally enough, referred to the various officers of the dockyards and of the Admiralty. It was sustained by no less than twenty-two witnesses; eighteen of whom spoke in the most positive and general terms, four qualifying their statements by reference to the kind of timber. The Report was very strong—

“The store of timber, thick staff plank, and deals is not sufficient to meet the ordinary demands of the service and ensure their being properly seasoned before being converted.”

They go on to say—

“In all the yards the Commissioners have found a uniform want of large timber and deck deals.” To six superintendents and many of the officers under them this grave matter was referred. All the disputes which had taken place between the various parties who made this Report and counter Report—this blast and counter-blast, had been as to labour. They all agreed that the labour was costly and that it was well done. There was a difference as to whether it cost more than it ought to do. No one could for a moment doubt that just in proportion as the labour was costly they ought to be careful that the material on which it was expended was good and properly seasoned. A great deal was said by Government of work that was done cheaply being “scamped.” They all knew that cheap work was apt to be scamped; but scamping in material was much worse than in labour. Scamping in labour was much more easily seen and more easily remedied if discovered; but scamping in the timber used in shipbuilding was most destructive. That made the ship rotten; it must then be opened, and it was very difficult to say what the cost of that might be. The Minute of the First Lord of the Admiralty on this subject was so full of sound sense that he could not forbear quoting it.

“They (the Committee) observe the shipwright officers devote their attention too much to the quality and rapidity of the work, and too little to the cost.”—(Par. 935.) “In this remark the Committee seem to have overlooked the essential difference between ships of war and merchant ships. Wherever the services of a ship of war are required it is indispensable that the ship should be in all respects efficient. The question of cost, however important, is insignificant compared with the efficiency, because the value of the ship’s services cannot be estimated by a price in money. The detention of the ship for some necessary repairs may be a national calamity; its inferiority as a ship of war may be attended with national dishonour.”

This was a great truth, and they did not often meet with one expressed in better language. But did not this apply equally to the timber of which a ship was made as to the labour expended on her? What was the use of applying such good labour to improper materials? One of the five gentlemen who had to make this Report dissented from his colleagues. What did he say as to timber? Mr. Chatfield, master shipwright, says, at page 118:—

"It is a fact not generally known, perhaps, but which ought not to be overlooked, that the value of timber alone in building a ship is equal to the value of all the other stores and the labour added together."

In this grave matter of the deficiency of timber, on which the evidence was uncontradicted, not one of the six superintendents took any notice whether the Report was true or false. Was it wrong to call that a grave charge? The First Lord of the Admiralty himself, alluding to the allegation of the Committee, that the store of timber was insufficient to meet the ordinary demands of the service, said, and said very naturally, that, if that statement were correct, it conveyed "a grave censure upon the Board of Admiralty." Curiously enough, the Controller of the Navy did not condescend to notice that charge at all, although he made comments on the finding of the Committee on two other points. Mr. Chatfield also wholly passed it by. When therefore, men holding high official positions, while treating the Report as highly condemnatory of the system, remained silent upon a charge which they admitted to be grave, one was almost compelled to assume that they assented to its truth. What was the evidence on which the charge rested? The matter was not only serious in itself, but doubly serious because the Board of Admiralty had come to a decision upon it that was not founded on any evidence before the House. They might have good grounds for their conclusion, but they had not set them forth. The three master-shipwrights at Portsmouth, Devonport, and Chatham—gentlemen who must be supposed competent to give an opinion on this subject—had borne testimony to the same effect. Mr. Lang, master-shipwright, stated that the large English timber had always been deficient, and that there ought to be three years' stock. At Portsmouth, Mr. Abethell said, there ought to be a larger store than at present; it should be equal to four years' consumption. Mr. Eadie, another master-shipwright, said the stock ought to be doubled. Mr. Moore, foreman at Devonport, said that, as a rule, the large timber was not seasoned. Mr. Peake stated that they were very short of large timber at Devonport; that they were using this year's supply. The timber-inspector at Sheerness said they were so short that they were actually using "green timber." Mr. Rice, master-shipwright at Woolwich, said they had not sufficient store; that

Mr. Henley

"some pieces were used as they came in." It was unnecessary to trouble the House with the opinions of the other gentlemen, but there was the concurring testimony of eighteen witnesses, all in Government employ, to the purport already described. It was, however, only fair to notice the evidence of the four gentlemen, also in the service of the Government, who made qualified statements on the same point. Mr. Brown, who had acted as foreman at Portsmouth, stated that he did not know how the store stood at present, but his impression was that the timber lately converted was dry and seasoned, except the sternposts of the large ships. That was not a very unimportant exception. Next, Mr. Laslett, timber-inspector, said, in his judgment, the timber ought to be two years in store, except "the large and compass timber." The storekeeper at Woolwich said they were pretty well off except in "sternposts and under-pieces." Mr. Watts, first assistant to the Surveyor-General, gave rather odd evidence. He thought they had between two and three years' average consumption in stock. The master-shipwright said it ought to be four years'; so that Mr. Watts's testimony was not very strong. But Mr. Watts went further, and added, "We want 60,000 loads this year;" and he expected to get only 30,000. That evidence was given in 1859. Now, the Storekeeper-General said that in 1859 the consumption would be 55,000 loads. The witnesses who made the qualified statements to which he had just referred did not therefore in any degree shake the immense mass of testimony on the other side. He now came to the mode in which the Admiralty had met this question. The First Lord had drawn up a memorandum on the subject, which was afterwards confirmed by the Board. The Board took no notice of the matter, except by passing—as was probably the ordinary course—a short Minute agreeing to what the First Lord said. The First Lord, in his memorandum, observed that the finding of the Committee as to the insufficiency of the stores, if correct, implied a grave censure on the Board of Admiralty; but he added that the Committee did not explain "what they considered to be the ordinary demands of the service." The First Lord continued—and this was a passage deserving the special attention of the House—"The Storekeeper-General has given a satisfactory answer to the statement." That was the only thing on which the First Lord founded himself. The Storekeeper-General showed that although the expenditure of timber during the last two years had been unprecedented, yet the stores had been in excess of the establishment; and he went on to say it was to be hoped that such a high rate of timber expenditure would not be necessary in future years, and therefore it was not expedient to increase the permanent establishment of ship-building timber. Strangely enough, the First Lord of the Admiralty, following, it was to be supposed, in the wake of the Storekeeper-General, made no allusion whatever to the question of the timber being seasoned; and, from the way in which the Storekeeper-General treated the matter, he did not seem to regard it at all the business of his department to express any opinion as to the seasoning or not seasoning of the timber. He merely answered all the claims made upon him, and if a man asked him for a stick of timber he gave him one, whether it was fit to use or not. That was a proceeding about as sensible as to give a pair of shoes to a man who wanted a pair without any regard to the size of his foot. It was to be doubted whether anybody, looking curiously at the Report of the Storekeeper-General, would agree with his Grace the First Lord, that it was satisfactory because in his (Mr. Henley's) opinion, that Report appeared entirely to confirm the statement of the Committee. The Storekeeper-General commenced his paragraph in answer to the Committee by setting out a long array of figures showing what had been the supply of timber in various years, and giving the actual consumption from 1830 down to 1858 inclusive. He then went on to say,

"I need scarcely observe that the expenditure of shipbuilding timber since the year 1858, and still less within the last twelve months, cannot reasonably be regarded as meeting only the ordinary demands of the public service."

He did not notice that part of the Report which referred to the timber being seasoned and fit for consumption, but went on to say that the present consumption of shipbuilding timber, of large scantling, was unprecedented, that the consumption of timber during the years 1857 and 1858 was double that of the years 1837 and 1838, while the receipt of shipbuilding timber in those years was more than five times what it was in 1837 and 1838, and that the stock of timber on the 30th June last was in excess of the establishment by 6,500 loads. What did all this come to? Up to the beginning of the year 1858 what was called the establishment of timber was 53,000 loads; in that year it was raised to 60,000 loads. Had not the Storekeeper-General afterwards given the figures he should have thought that the reference to the years 1837 and 1838 was intended to mystify, and throw dust in the eyes of the House, because of all the evils which followed the Reform Bill, there was none which was greater, and none which more conduced to the removal of the Reformers from office, than their shameful neglect of the navy. He believed it was now admitted on all hands that these two years, 1837 and 1838, formed the crowning period of the deficiency of timber, and that during those years the store was so fabulously low that it was hardly possible to conceive how any one could have had—he was going to say—the impudence, but, at all events the face, so to have diminished the stock of materials for the Queen's navy. The Surveyor however had given the actual figures. He did not know whether the Returns which had been supplied to the House were worth the paper upon which they were printed, because in the answers as well as in the evidence, things peeped out which raised a doubt whether these accounts were very correct. For his own purpose, however, he was entitled to use them as figures supplied by the Government, and to treat them as correct. As he understood the Minute of the First Lord, the Admiralty had come to the conclusion that a store of 60,000 loads of timber was sufficient for the future. He had already shown by the evidence taken before the Committee, and he would endeavour to show by other figures, which would not easily be disputed, that whether they looked to the number of men in the navy, to the number of vessels, to their quality, or to the greater wear-and-tear in screw vessels, as compared with sailing ships, such a store was totally insufficient to meet the ordinary demands of the service, to say nothing of those extraordinary demands which might arise from losses by sea, or in time of war from damage if not loss by the enemy, and which did arise from the more rapid decay of the timbers of steam-vessels occasioned by the heat which was within them, and by the vibration occasioned by their machinery. The Storekeeper-General had furnished them with a return of the supply and consumption of timber in the navy from the year 1830 to the present time ; and they also possessed information from other papers as to the number of ships and men in the navy during the same period. From these facts, which furnished the only elements for coming to a sound conclusion upon this subject, it was demonstrable that a store of only 60,000 loads was not sufficient to keep up a supply of timber properly seasoned and fit for conversion. In the period from 1830 to 1844—which included three of the periods of five years into which the Storekeeper-General had chosen to divide the consumption—the greatest number of ships in the navy, at any one time, was 620, the average number 589, the greatest number of steam-vessels 112, the average number of men 33,000 (omitting the odd figures). The permanent establishment of timber at the same period was 53,000 loads, and the average yearly consumption 16,200 ; so that the establishment contained rather more than a supply for three years ; and he would presently show that the stock kept was always more than the establishment. Between 1845 and 1854 the greatest number of vessels in the navy at any one time was 690 ; the greatest number of steamers 205 ; the average number of vessels of all kinds 655. The number of seamen had increased to 43,000. The permanent establishment of timber remained the same as during the previous fifteen years, but the average annual consumption had risen to 25,000 loads. He was not seeking to cast blame upon any particular Board of Admiralty, but only endeavouring to show that, since the necessity for creating a steam navy had arisen, the stock of timber had not been kept up in proportion to its consumption. In 1845, the consumption of timber being 25,000 loads per annum and the establishment only 53,000 loads, it was clear that the timber, instead of being in store between three and four years, could only be there, upon the average, for a little more than two years. During the fourteen years from 1845 to 1858, both inclusive, the greatest number of ships in the navy at any one time was 927, the average number 720, the number of steam-ships 478—a vast increase in the number of that class of vessels which caused the greatest consumption of timber—and the number of seamen 48,000. The establishment of timber up to the beginning of 1858 was, as he had said, 53,000 loads ; it was now 60,000. But what was the annual consumption ? 28,000 loads. Therefore, the stock was still only equal to a little more than two years' consumption. Nor did that represent the whole of the case—not by a good deal. The late First Lord of the Admiralty, when explaining the Navy Estimates last year, stated that in the last ten years, though three line-of-battle ships and a fraction had been ordered by successive Boards, two and a fraction only had been produced. But it had been always held, even up to the time of the Reform Bill, that to keep up the navy three line-of-battle ships should be built every year. That had become almost a household word. A proportionate number of frigates should also be built. That had not been done, and the deficiency which had been caused was the reason why we were now paying £13,000,000 for the navy this year, which sum would probably be increased next year. But that was not half the evil, because they had been told by one shipwright that they were putting green timber into ships, and by another that they were using timber direct from the forest. But if ships were built of green timber they could not be expected to last very long. He might mention another fact. The whole quantity of timber received from 1830 to 1858 was 631,000 loads ; the quantity used in the same period was 636,000 loads ; and in 1859 the storekeeper had 65,000 loads in hand. It was clear, therefore, that in 1830 there must have been a stock of timber larger than the establishment. But the case did not end here. Among the papers recently presented there was an account by the present Surveyor of the Navy of the amount of timber required to build three line-of-battle ships, one frigate, and two corvettes, sailing and steam-vessels respectively of the same rates. The sailing vessels required 15,700 loads, and the steam-vessels 22,000 loads, being a difference of 6,300 loads. Seeing, therefore, how our steam navy had increased, and what would be the probable expenditure for the next few years, there could be no doubt that if the supply of timber had been short hitherto, it would be still shorter in future. No amount of money, said the Storekeeper-General, could procure large supplies, consisting exclusively of timber of the largest dimensions, and undoubtedly the present wants of the service were not easily met. England, he added, could not supply them, and cargoes of shipbuilding timber imported from foreign countries could not consist only of the largest sizes, even if such timber of hard and durable quality and unobjectionable weight was forthcoming in abundance at the ports of shipment. That was a most important and suggestive statement. They might get metal to any amount, shipwrights to any number, but seasoned timber could not be got at all, and the supply of raw timber was not over-abundant. A gallant Admiral (Sir Charles Napier) had said that England might not always have the command of the Channel. Suppose their supply of timber from abroad was interrupted even for a few months. That was a contingency which ought to be guarded against, and they could guard against it only by having in stock a supply of timber sufficient to meet, not only the ordinary demands of the service, but any extraordinary demand which might suddenly come upon us, exposed as our ships were to tempests, decay, and an enemy. Those were the extraordinary risks that they had to guard against; and he could not think that 60,000 loads, which appeared to be the establishment fixed by the Admiralty, would be enough. He did not wish to cast blame upon any one, but he thought it desirable to call attention to the most important part of this Report. It must be remembered that this supply of timber was of far more importance than workmanship. It should be remembered also that the timber was distributed amongst six yards. He had shown that the supply in the aggregate was not sufficient, but when they came to divide that into six parts the deficiency became more apparent. The two great arsenals of Portsmouth and Plymouth ought to have an abundant supply, because they could not tell what demands might be made suddenly upon them. Everybody who knew anything of timber knew that that which might be sufficient in the aggregate was not sufficient when divided; there might not be sufficient for naval officers to pick out the proper pieces for particular work without going to timber that was unseasoned, and, consequently, unfit to be used. It must be remembered that the ships must be kept up, whether they were in commission or in ordinary. If we had 900 vessels now, it would not do to let them rot and perish, because they were not manned by seamen and sent to sea. He found that 203 steam-vessels in commission had been dealt with in the way of repairs, and that the average expense of materials on each of those vessels—not labour, but materials—was £325 each. There were 211 vessels in ordinary dealt with, and the expense of materials for the hulls was £449 each. It would, therefore, be seen that the expense of the vessels in ordinary was greater than the expense for those in commission. [Lord CLARENCE PAGET: What Return is that?] It was headed “fitting and refitting,” and was numbered 174. This Return showed that even if they were so fortunate as to have fewer vessels in commission they would not on that account save the expense of materials for the hulls. He had the figures with respect to sailing ships, but as they were not accurately given he was unable to draw any conclusion from them; but the figures in respect to the steam-vessels were quite enough to show what the fact was, and that even if the number of men were reduced to the average of the last few years, it must not be supposed that the expense of maintaining the vessels would be got rid of. The whole expense of putting the establishment of timber in a proper state would be simply an expense, once for all, of about £300,000 or £400,000. But, whatever might be the cost, the country would be secure, with a proper store of timber, of having well-seasoned materials for the work to be well done.

Mr. Henley

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, it was very important the House should be distinctly informed what course the Admiralty intended to pursue on the Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the state of the dockyards. That Report was one of immense value and of great public interest. It had been prepared by men of large experience, official standing, and who were quite capable of understanding what they inquired into, and they stated that 20 per cent might be saved to the country in the building of new ships. There were, it was true, two Gentlemen, Government officials, who pursued the red-tape system, and they defended that system in the best way they could. He would tell the House that nobody was more anxious to maintain the efficient state of the navy than himself, but when the House was asked to vote such large Estimates, it was quite time they were inquired into. If they took the years from 1832, the commencement of the Reformed Parliament to 1838, it would be found that the average expenditure on the navy in those seven years was £4,770,000 while the expenditure in 1858 was no less than £8,800,000, and now it was proposed to ask for £12,800,000 for the year 1860-1861, being about £8,000,000 more than the average of the seven years from 1832 to 1838, and £4,000,000 more than the Estimates of two years ago. Now what, he would ask, was all that for? It was most extraordinary and unaccountable to him. Were they preparing for war with some nation? But there was no other nation than that of France which could compete with them. Now, what had been the course adopted for the last seven years? The expenditure upon the British Navy from 1851 to 1858-1859 had been about £86,000,000, but the expenditure upon the French Navy during the same period had been £46,309,000. The two countries appeared to be going into a sort of contest as to which of their navies should be the most efficient and the largest in the number of screw ships, yet France had placed this country in a condition of fear and apprehension by the creation of a navy which cost little more than half the expenditure upon the English Navy. What was still more extraordinary was, that the whole expenditure upon the French Navy two years ago was £4,600,000, while the Estimates of this year for the wages and victuals of seamen in the English Navy amounted alone to £4,900,000 or £300,000 more; and he believed that the French Navy was not now more extensive. The gallant Admiral (Sir M. Seymour) had spoken in high terms of the character of the ship-building carried on in our yards; but he (Mr. Williams) wished the noble Secretary to the Admiralty to explain how it happened that in the principal dockyards in the kingdom there was so great a difference in the wages of shipwrights engaged upon vessels of precisely the same tonnage and character? At Chatham, the cost of wages was £4 8s. 2d. per ton; at Devonport, £4 10s.; at Sheerness, £6 2s. 7d.; and at Woolwich, £6 18s. This was most monstrous, and he wished to know why the cost at Woolwich was 50 per cent more than at Chatham. He was also perfectly astonished at the vast quantity of timber which had been paid for. At the termination of the French war we had 240 sail of the line, now we had only 59 afloat and on the stocks, and yet during that interval we had expended upon timber and wages, in the construction of ships, no less a sum than £88,000,000. There must have been some gross mismanagement somewhere. No attempts, however, was made to check the system until the late Commission; and he thought, after the disclosures which they had made, it was high time that this House should interpose to prevent the mismanagement which prevailed in our dockyards. A Commission of efficient men, who thoroughly understood every branch of the subject, would probably do more effectual service with this view than even a Committee of the House.

Mr. W. Williams

SIR HENRY LEEKE said, he was one of those who would have the most efficient ships that could be obtained for the purpose. He would even go beyond the gallant Admiral, and have every guard-ship in port and ordinary fully efficient. At every port there should be two, and they would thus form a fleet the ships of which would be of the largest size and of the most efficient character. That was what he would do if he were a First Lord. The gallant Admiral had alluded to the subject of corporal punishment. He (Sir H. Leeke) was acquainted with many seamen in the fleet, and they were anxious that he should express a few words regarding their views on the subject. He was deeply interested in their welfare, having commanded many of them and having lived with them. A short time ago he was in conversation with them on the subject of corporal punishment, and they said, "Parliament men don't know much about it. You had better send the case down to us, and what would take them two or three nights to settle we would settle in an hour." He (Sir H. Leeke) said, "But you would not have corporal punishment, would you?" "Oh! wouldn't we," said they. "I thought you would like to have it done away with," he rejoined; "I am not, although I detest flogging, for doing away with corporal punishment. I think its abolition would be fraught with great danger to our fleet." Their answer was, "No, Sir." He was quite sure that the men themselves would not like to have it done away with. An instance occurred the other day, in which, on board one of the ships, some of the men conducted themselves in such a disgusting way that the seamen of the ship called on the captain of the ship to punish the men, but it was not done, and the case was reported to the admiral, who said that he would avoid punishment if possible, but that if it occurred so frequently he would enforce it, and that to withhold it would be productive of mischief. It was intimated, after remonstrance, that if the thing occurred again the man would be severely punished ; and so he was, to the great delight of the rest, if he might use such an expression with reference to having a fellow-creature flogged. For his own part he detested flogging, and never slept for two or three days before or after it. Two men were afterwards flogged, and it was now one of the best of the ordinary ships in the service. This was a proof, he thought, that the men preferred the cat, or corporal punishment, to be continued, for their own protection, to its being done away with. He had commanded a large ship under Admirals Parker and Napier, in a fleet consisting of ten sail of the line, and a great number of steamers. During the twelve months he commanded in that fleet only twelve men were punished. His own ship was the Queen, with 1,050, and he only punished two men in three years ; going far to prove that the necessity of corporal punishment in that and other ships was as good as done away with altogether. As a general principle he would not punish the men, except under the most outrageous circumstances. With reference to the reserve captains in the Royal Navy, he thought they were very hardly treated, and whatever construction the right hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir F. Baring) might put on the Order in Council, he thought the terms of it were perfectly clear, and that these officers were entitled to progress in their rank, and have an increase in their pay. There was not an officer in the service who was not grateful to the hon. Member for the way in which he had taken the matter up. He did not rail at the measures adopted by the Board of Admiralty, for he believed it was composed of gentlemen who were most anxious about the service, and desirous of keeping up its prestige, and no one more so than the noble Lord the Secretary of the Board, who had often to append his name to letters, however displeasing to his feelings, that emanated not from himself but from the Board. These officers wished to progress in their rank, and have their pay increased ; but, according to the letter signed by the noble Lord it would appear they were to remain as they were, somewhat, if he might so say, in the position of an old hulk, until broken up. Some of them had seen great service, and had passed the greater part of their years in it ; and there were two or three of their number who, if he were called upon to hoist his flag to-morrow, he should really like to have as his flag captains. He should like to have a captain who was a seaman. He did not ask for an officer who was a steam officer. In action he wanted a seaman by his side, and not one conversant with the engine-room. It was not his business to rail at the Board of Admiralty and the measures adopted by them. If he received an order from them he obeyed it, with all under him, with the utmost cheerfulness ; but in that House he was in a different position, as a Member of Parliament and a citizen, and it was his duty to assist these officers provided he thought their claim to be a just one, and he called on the House, the Admiralty, and the country, to say whether these officers had been properly treated. He would instance the case of one gallant officer, who was a midshipman in the Gibraltar in Lord Hotham's action, who was at the evacuation of Corsica, at St. Vincent, attack on Teneriffe, bombardment of Cadiz, who was at Copenhagen, and who served on the coasts of France and Holland, and who was made commander for his long and gallant and meritorious services. That was an officer who had only 6*d.* a day increase after being made post captain. If any man in the service were deserving of reward, it was assuredly men of that description. They had passed the best of their days in the service of their country, and had taught the young men in the service to uphold the honour of England's flag, and the Admiralty would not be doing too much by putting them on the same footing with their more fortunate brethren, for were a war to break out many of these men were as well fitted to command a line-of-battle ship as any commander of the present day. They did not, to use the words of the Report in the blue-book, expect to be employed, but they did ask for additional pay. A sum of some £2,000 a year would suffice to meet it, and 2*s.* a day, or £30 a year, would be a great addition to the pay of those worthy officers, who only received an income of some £180 or £185 per annum, and that would enable them to get an extra servant, or provide themselves with additional conveniences and comforts.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: I rise, Sir, to advocate the cause of the Reserved Captains of 1851, cordially agreeing with the sentiments of the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir J. Elphinstone); but I have received much discouragement from the statement made by the right hon. Baronet the Member for the same borough (Sir Francis Baring), himself First Lord of the Admiralty formerly, and one whose public and private character are in this House the credentials of truth and honour. He assures the House that he it was who framed that Minute which constituted a reserved list of captains, and did so with the clear understanding, both in his own mind and in the minds of his colleagues in office, that the advantages which he held out was to be restricted simply to the advancement of such officers to the rank of captain receiving the graduated pay of junior captains. On the other hand, these officers contend that in accepting that advancement, while they surrendered all expectation of a good-service pension and the hope of employment or active service, except in case of emergency, nevertheless they retained a firm belief that they would continue to rise and receive a proportionate increase of pay agreeable to their seniority in the same manner as if they had been placed upon the active list of captains. This is not the impression of the right hon. Baronet (Sir Francis Baring); but may I remind the House that these officers have done their duty whenever called upon, and accepted, in many instances, that advancement for the good of the service, and to enable their younger brethren to obtain promotion. I heard with equal regret and astonishment the statement of the hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for Devonport (Sir Michael Seymour), that the United States employ no less than 150,000 sailors, of whom one-fourth only consisted of American subjects. I entertain no fears; I believe assuredly that, in the unhappy event of a war being forced upon this country, a considerable proportion of our merchant seamen, being unable to serve in their ordinary calling, and numbers of our seafaring population, would crowd into the Royal Navy with the same zeal and alacrity, loyalty, and devotion, which have been evinced in the Volunteer Corps on shore. We have now 180,000 merchant seamen, and with the certain prospect of such an augmentation of brave and devoted men, I can see no ground for ignoble despondency. The nature of a seaman is to love a roving life, and to be averse to the discipline of a man of war; and, therefore, in the despite of pensions and other boons, the time of peace is not that in which we ought to look for them in any abundance. Of these 180,000 sailors, 23,000 are mates, and 60,000 able seamen, and of the remainder, ordinary seamen constitute a large number. I earnestly desire to see an efficient reserve maintained; and in the year 1853, I, with this purpose, impressed upon the Government the necessity of stationing ships at all mercantile ports for the training of men for the navy, under the command of officers of high character, possessing the happy union of temper and ability for this duty. If that suggestion had been acted upon, we should now have possessed (as I proposed the entry of 4,000 lads, from fourteen to eighteen years of age, annually) a reserve of between 20,000 and 30,000 young able seamen upon whom we could have relied in case of need. Every encouragement should be held out by the Admiralty to officers to induce them to acquaint themselves and become familiar with the new modes and instruments of naval warfare; the same zeal should be urged, indeed, upon the whole service. But, unhappily, numbers of the lieutenants have lost all heart, so few are their chances of promotion. There is a remedy; it is this: let those officers, after a certain number of years' service, be advanced to the rank of commander with an increased pay; but not, as at present, be retained on their present list to discourage others. The hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. W. Williams) complains that the Navy List is overcrowded. This is quite true, in consequence of the unusual longevity in that department of the service. The protracted period of war from 1794 with scarce intermission to 1815, maintained with many nations, necessitated the employment of a thousand sail of men of war and a corresponding number of officers, of whom three-fourths, on the restoration of Peace in 1815, were placed on half pay. Every year, every month and day, reduces their number, and I believe no money will be, or is more cheerfully voted than that which is devoted to the officers or efficiency of the navy, which in a war would be indispensable, and in peace time is no less serviceable and important in securing the mastery of the seas for the ocean path along which the wealth of England is brought home, has been kept clear and open for centuries, only by the presence of the ships that carry the British pendant.

Admiral Walcott

MR. BENTINCK said, that before adverting to the subject under discussion, he was anxious to tender his thanks to his hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir J. Elphinstone) for the graceful and feeling allusion he had made to a recent melancholy event. He believed there was no hon. Member on either side of the House who would not readily acknowledge that the amiable qualities and the great ability of the late lamented Member for Berkshire (Captain Liecester Vernon) were such as to render his untimely end a source of the deepest regret. [Cries of "Hear, hear," from both sides of the House.] He (Mr. Bentinck) entirely concurred with the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark in the observation that the naval expenditure of this country must be of an increasing character; but he could not forbear reminding the House that the Government had inaugurated a new financial policy, the obvious result, if not the avowed object, of which must be so to cripple our financial resources as to render the maintenance of the national defences next to impossible; and he asked how they could reconcile the conflicting positions of, in all probability, decreasing resources with an increasing expenditure. Reference had been made during the debate, by the gallant Admiral, to recent disturbances on board some of Her Majesty's ships. He (Mr. Bentinck) believed the real cause of those disturbances was referable to the whole tendency of recent legislation and the existing state of public feeling to resist authority. In the navy disgraceful occurrences of that kind were constantly occurring, and he believed there was no Member of that House who would not say that when discipline ceased to exist in the navy the navy itself might as well cease to exist altogether. In the case of the mercantile marine the tendency of their legislation had been such that, in the case of disputes between masters of vessels and the men, the former were sometimes compelled to have recourse to what must be regarded as very unjustifiable acts. The gallant Admiral opposite had referred to the subject of bounties. There might no doubt be cases in which a system of bounties might be beneficially resorted to, but he believed those cases were of an exceptional character. In most instances where bounties were resorted to the fault lay with the Admiralty in not providing the means of keeping up a regular supply of seamen for the service. But here, again, he believed the origin of the evil was to be found in that House. There was a constant struggle between the Board of Admiralty and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was always making use of every expedient to make the two ends meet, and driving the Board of Admiralty to practices of which they were ashamed. The system of bounties was one of extravagance in the long run, and he believed that if they were to pay their seamen well, so as to preserve them to the navy, they would not only add to the security of the country, but effect an actual saving of money. The hon. and gallant Admiral (Sir C. Napier) had called attention to the marked difference between our system and that of the French in obtaining levies of seamen, and had shown that the French system was such that they never did really disarm, and it would be well if this truth were impressed upon the country generally. Complaints had been made of the enormous cost of building, and the large outlay of public money at the docks. Every one admitted that the work done in the dockyards was admirable, yet the cost was enormous; but he quite concurred in the observation, that it was utterly impossible in the present state of things that an efficient reduction in our expenditure could be arrived at. He attached no blame to any Board of Admiralty, past or present, and he contended that the proposal for an inquiry into the cause of the extravagant expenditure in the dockyards was waste of time. The cause was evident: it was in the system, in the fact that men were placed in a responsible position who could have no acquaintance with the profession; that men who had this acquaintance were placed in irresponsible positions, and that the Board of Admiralty was made a stalking horse for political jobbery. If they wanted to have efficiency and economy they must have at the Admiralty a continuous system, managed by persons continuously responsible and wholly independent of political movements, and they must place at the head of it a man who, by profession and reputation, was admitted to be thoroughly competent to undertake the whole management. They had heard something about the price of anchors; and he had no doubt the Admiralty paid twice as much as they ought to do for their anchors; but this arose from the same cause. His right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) had brought before the House the important question of timber, and he impugned the figures and calculations of the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty. His right hon. Friend made out his case with that clearness and force which always distinguished him; but he could not agree with him when he impugned the conduct of the noble Duke.

He believed that if they were to have a civilian at the head of the Board the noble Duke was as good a man for the position as could be got, and he knew that his noble and gallant Friend (Lord C. Paget) had worked hard to remedy the abuses of the Admiralty. But it was impossible fully to remedy those abuses under the present system which his noble and gallant Friend knew to be perfectly indefensible. They had been told time after time that if any private building yard was carried on upon the system pursued by the Admiralty, the Bank of England would not be able to keep them going six months. He believed that the great body of officials at the Admiralty time after time had been doing their best to remedy abuses, but that they found them beyond their control. The expenses of the navy were likely to increase year by year, and it was of the utmost importance that they should watch with the utmost vigilance the expenditure of every shilling in the dockyards. [Mr. WILLIAMS: Hear, hear!] The hon. Member for Lambeth cheered, but his views and those of that hon. Gentleman were very different upon this subject, for he considered it a penny wise and pound foolish policy to restrict expenditure when it was shown to be necessary. He would not grudge the most liberal outlay for the navy, and all he asked was that the money should be judiciously applied. Till the House was prepared to grapple with the great evil of the system all Committees of Inquiry were useless, and in the discussion of details they were only wasting their time, and wasting millions of the public money.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he would not then make any remarks, but when the House went into Committee he would take the opportunity of answering the various statements that had been made.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.—NAVY ESTIMATES.

House in Committee; Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

1. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £160,280, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Salaries of the Officers and the Contingent Expenses of the Admiralty Office, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1861."

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he had one or two observations to make upon the Vote under consideration, but before doing so he would proceed to reply to the various points that had been referred to by the hon. Members who had addressed the House during the evening.

Mr. Bentinck

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he rose to order. He wished to know whether the noble Lord was entitled to make a general statement in Committee when a particular Vote was before them?

THE CHAIRMAN said, that it was not usual or convenient that general statements should be made on a specific item, but, no doubt, the noble Lord, the Secretary to the Admiralty, would exercise a sound discretion relative to the explanations which he might think proper to make. He would only request the noble Lord, in order somewhat to limit the discussion, to confine his answers to the particular votes before the House.

LORD LOVAINE said, that the Committee was placed in an awkward situation in consequence of the noble Lord declining to answer the various questions put to him by various Members until the right hon. Gentleman had left the chair, and the first Vote was proposed in Supply. He thought that the course taken by the noble Lord was rather unfair towards the House.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that no exception could be taken as to the shape in which the rule of the House was explained by the Chairman. The course taken by the noble Lord was most objectionable. They had had a long debate in the course of the evening in which several questions of serious importance had been raised. He submitted that it was the duty of the noble Lord representing the Admiralty to have given frank and direct answers to those questions put to him before the House went into Committee, and he was bound to enter into those matters with that freedom which he could alone do in the course of the debate. He (Sir J. Pakington) maintained that it was a complete departure from the rules of the House for the noble Lord to enter into a general statement at that time. The noble Lord had sat through a long debate and had heard a variety of matters discussed upon the question of the first Order of the Day. To his (Sir J. Pakington's) astonishment the noble Lord rose and said that he should make no answer then to the questions that had been put to him, but that he should reserve the statement he had to make until the Speaker had left the chair. The noble Lord now proposed on another question altogether to deviate from the old established practice and the recognized rules of the House ; to offer explanations to all those matters that applied only to the former debate. The Chairman he (Sir J. Pakington) was bound to say had placed the question of order in its proper light, and had pronounced his opinions on the rules of the House, in accordance with the judicious manner which characterized his deportment generally as president of Committees. The rules of the House laid down that in Committee of Supply no hon. Member could refer to any Vote, except that immediately under consideration. The noble Lord was, therefore, not now at liberty to enter into that statement which he should have made in the course of the evening's debate, when he had a legitimate opportunity of doing so.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he could not concur with the observations of the right hon. Baronet who had just spoken. It was quite true that, according to the strict rule of the House—a rule which it might be sometimes very convenient and proper to adhere to more closely than was done—no hon. Member ought to speak except upon the question actually before the chair. If that rule were strictly enforced, when the Chairman moved the adjournment of the House with a view to the discussion of some topic or other which was totally unconnected with the question whether the House should adjourn, hon. Members ought to be stopped and called upon to reason only upon the question why the House should adjourn. If the strict rule of the House were to be enforced, the noble Lord the Secretary for the Admiralty would have to discuss the establishment of the Admiralty, but it would be perfectly competent for the House in discussing the Vote before it to allude to anything that might be said for or against the constitution of the Board, in regard to every branch of the service. His noble Friend, in adopting the course he had done, had consulted the convenience of the House, and was perfectly entitled to discuss and to answer upon that Vote of the Committee anything that might have been said in the course of the evening in regard to the good or bad management of the naval service. In his (Lord Palmerston's) recollection nothing was more common than that a person charged with the conduct of any branch of the public service should defer his remarks till the House went into Committee. Surely no hon. Member who had sat in the House more than one Session could fail to recollect frequent occasions in which a similar course had been pursued with regard to the Army Estimates and other matters. To Members, such a course gave an opportunity to repeat their objections, and to discuss and consider the answers which were given in Committee—and he would undertake to say, from his personal recollection, that the course was perfectly usual. If his noble Friend had replied before the House went into Committee, hon. Members' mouths would have been closed, whereas they would now have an opportunity of making a counter reply. With all submission to the Chairman, he must take leave to say that the charge of the right hon. Baronet was wholly unfounded, and that the noble Lord, in the course he was taking, was acting within the strict rules and practice of the House.

LORD LOVAINE remarked that if the views of the noble Viscount were correct, the judgment pronounced by the Chairman must be wrong. The hon. Gentleman stated that the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty was bound according to the rule of the House to limit his observations to the particular Vote before the Committee, whereas the noble Viscount insisted that he was at liberty to refer to the thousand and one questions which had been alluded to in the course of the evening.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, when he called attention to the point of order, he bore in his mind a circumstance that had occurred on a former occasion, when an hon. Gentleman who was now in India (Mr. Wilson) had the conduct of the Civil Service Estimates in that House : a general discussion arose upon the subject, and many explanations were sought for in regard to them. The hon. Gentleman to whom he referred, however, declined to answer the objections made on that occasion until the House went into Committee. The consequence was that a general debate arose, which occupied the entire night, and ended, if he remembered right, in an adjourned debate. He mentioned that fact to show the inconvenience of such a course. If it were regular for the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty to enter into a long statement then, and to refer to the various topics brought under discussion that evening, it followed, as a necessary consequence, that other hon. Members could also enter into a discussion of all those points. He put it to the noble Lord whether he was really consulting the interests of the Government in laying down such a doctrine. If the noble Secretary were now permitted to discuss de omnibus rebus et quibusdam aliis, the same course would of course be open to hon. Members generally on every Supply night, and the most voluminous debates would therefore be the consequence. He submitted it was the duty of the Committee to adhere strictly to the immediate subject before them.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, it had been his duty on former occasions to bring forward the Army Estimates, and at those times, and when upon the first Vote, he had entered into a detail of all the Votes, and had explained everything connected with the Army Estimates. Surely, therefore, his noble Friend was entitled to make any observations he pleased as to the conduct of the navy, and answer any objections which had been made as to the manner in which that department of the public service had been conducted.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he wished to remind the noble Viscount that the noble Secretary to the Admiralty had already made a statement, and had gone largely into the first Vote. He presumed, therefore, that the noble Lord would have an opportunity of discussing each Vote seriatim.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE contended, if the noble Secretary of the Admiralty were to be allowed the indulgence claimed for him by the noble Viscount, other hon. Members should have the same opportunity of entering into all those subjects in reply.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, his only object had been to study the convenience of the House. He did not wish to shirk any explanation, nor to decline entering into or answering any questions that had been put. If he had erred it had been rather through ignorance than from bad intention. The first duty he had to perform was to take notice of the Motion which his hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir J. Elphinstone) had made in reference to the reserve captains of the navy. The hon. Baronet had made his observations, if he might be allowed to say so, with a great deal of adroitness, and had spoken in very strong terms for the benefit of those officers for whom he was interested, and he believed there was scarcely a Member of that House—

LORD LOVAINE said, he again rose to order. He could see nothing in the Vote before the Committee which in any way related to the subject referred to by the noble Lord.

Sir Henry Willoughby

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he would defer the explanation he had to offer in regard to the case of the reserved post-captains, although he regretted to do so, as many Gentlemen were naturally anxious to hear it. He hoped he would be in order in replying to the observations of the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley).

LORD LOVAINE remarked, that the subject of timber came under Vote 10.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: Very well, then I will confine myself to the Vote before the Committee, and simply move that the Vote for the expenses of the Admiralty Office be allowed.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he wished to draw attention to the fact that the Vote for the Admiralty Office was continually on the increase. This year it was larger than it was the year before by £143,230. His great objection to the Vote, however, arose from his conviction that the constitution of the Admiralty was incompatible with the proper management of the naval business of the country. As long as the Admiralty was presided over by a man destitute of practical experience of naval life, the same absence of order and economy would be observable as at present. The First Lord had to discharge duties which, as a civilian, he could not possibly know anything about. The professional man who acted as a sort of "dry nurse," being generally selected by the First Lord himself, was as likely to be inefficient as not, and even if fit for the post his advice was often disregarded, or perhaps not asked for at all. Each member of the Board had a particular department allotted to his charge, but general questions were discussed by the whole Board. Very often, however, the First Lord gave orders which his colleagues knew nothing about. When the right hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham) was First Lord, and assumed the responsibility of acting in that manner, Sir J. Pechell, a very conscientious officer, protested against it; but all members of the Board were not equally independent. The perpetual changes in the Board which took place under the present system could not fail to be prejudicial to the service. There had been six First Lords in ten years, and even the naval Lord was changed like the rest. He believed that one of the chief causes of the discontent which had prevailed in the navy for some time past was that the sailors were confined too closely to drill at

Portland, and debarred from the privilege of going ashore, which they used formerly to enjoy. Drill was always irksome to a sailor. When carried too far, it invariably produced discontent; and when the men were called off from "leave," the irritation was sure to be increased. The patronage of the Admiralty was practically in the hands of the First Lord, and it was not easy to see how that was to be prevented. The First Lord claimed a certain share of the promotions and appointments as his own private patronage, and indeed seldom asked advice as to the disposal of any of it. The Duke of Somerset was the present First Lord, and how had he distributed the patronage? He had bestowed a command on Admiral Milne—a very excellent officer certainly, who, while captain, had been in constant service, but had been for eleven years a Lord of the Admiralty. Admiral Milne was a canny Scotchman, and had retained his seat at the Board under both Whigs and Tories. He was now despatched to the North American station. Then there was Admiral Bruce, a very excellent officer too, who had had three commands running. He had commanded on the coast of Africa, was removed thence to the Pacific, and was now installed at Portsmouth Dockyard. Admiral Bruce was a very good officer, as he had said, but then he was not the only good officer in the service. The next was Admiral Fanshawe, who had held four previous commands, and had not remained in any one of them long enough to complete his time. He was, no doubt, a very excellent officer; but he was not the only good officer in the service. They were doing everything they possibly could to prevent the Commander in Chief or the Secretary at War constantly keeping the same officers in each department of the army, and the same thing ought to be done with regard to the navy. The next appointment of the present First Lord was Admiral Elliott, who was removed from the Channel squadron to Portsmouth, then to the Admiralty, and now to the Mediterranean. He had not the least objection to any of these officers, but it was very hard that officers who were equally as good should not have a chance of gaining experience. It might be necessary to change the First Lord with each change of Administration, but the other Lords should be put in for a certain time—say five years—and one changed every year, so as to keep up a constant supply of experienced men. It was not his intention to oppose the Vote, but he should take an early opportunity of submitting a substantive Motion upon the subject.

MR. W. WILLIAMS asked what was the reason for the amount of this Vote being larger by £14,000 than it was last year?

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY remarked that one source of the increase was the employment of temporary clerks. But there was one item, the last in the Vote, which required explanation. It was for "fees and expenses of the marshal of the Admiralty Court, and for disbursements of the solicitor in law suits." Three years ago the sum voted was £4,000; last year, or the year before, it was increased to £6,000; it was now £7,000. How, he asked, did the increase arise?

LORD LOVAINE said, that some explanation was also needed of the increase of charge for clerks, from £18,732 last year to £19,210, when it was remembered that the packet contracts had been transferred to the Post Office. He would take the opportunity of stating that Mr. Clifton, the head of the steam department, brought under his notice the whole of the documents relating to the Churchward contract, and consequently that he was not amenable to the censure which the right hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir F. Baring) had passed in the course of a recent debate, under the supposition that he had not done so. He believed Mr. Clifton to be a most active and intelligent public servant.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he thought the gallant Admiral had fallen into the very same fault for which he had called him to account. He had not only wandered away from this Vote No. 3, but had gone into the army. The only fault which the gallant Officer appeared to find with the patronage of the Duke of Somerset was that he promoted good officers.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER explained that what he found fault with was the keeping of some good officers constantly employed to the exclusion of others who were equally good.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, when they had got a good man to take a command, he thought it best to give him another command when the opportunity occurred. The Duke of Somerset, however, had not appointed any officer to a command without consulting and obtaining the unanimous approval of the professional members of the Board. The noble Lord had asked what was the cause of this increase from £18,732 in the year of 1859-60, as regarded clerks, to £19,210 this year. The increase was from several causes. First of all, there had been an addition to the second-class clerks, and a reduction of the third-class clerks, in fact making them into second class, and the next was, the progressive increase of salaries. The noble Lord spoke highly of the superintendent of the packet service, an eulogium which the gentleman well deserved, and he stated that they had transferred the packet service from the Admiralty to the Post Office. He presumed the noble Lord thought there ought to be a corresponding reduction in the expense. No doubt, under ordinary circumstances there might be a reduction, but the work which had been entailed upon the clerks, both at the Admiralty and Somerset House, by the augmentation in the fleet, and by the immense increase of work going on in the dockyards, had obliged them not only to keep up the establishment, but to appoint a vast number of temporary clerks. It might be said that the strength of the establishment was below the exigency of the service, but they trusted that the present pressure was only temporary, and he should be very sorry to suppose that they were likely for the next few years to employ 20,000 men in the dockyards. As long, however, as this extraordinary amount of work was going on they must be prepared to increase their establishments in a commensurate degree.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE said, he thought it would be truer economy to increase the establishment at once, than to go on employing temporary clerks by whom the work would be only imperfectly done.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, as he had received no reply to his question, he would move that the Vote be reduced by £1,000.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he begged the hon. Baronet's pardon. He had forgotten to state that the law expenses were remarkably heavy this year. There was an old dispute relating to the dredging of the harbour of Milford Haven, which had been referred to arbitration, and which of itself had cost about £1,000.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the explanation of the noble Lord as to the increase on the Vote over last year was not at all satisfactory to him, and he would, therefore, move that it be reduced by the whole amount of £14,323. He believed there was no other way to check this constant tendency to increase than to refuse passing every Vote for which they did not receive a satisfactory explanation.

Lord Clarence Paget

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the proposed Vote be reduced by the sum of £14,323."

MR. LYGON reminded the hon. Gentleman that £1,700 of this increase was caused merely by the transfer of £1,700 from Vote No. 11 to the present.

MR. WHITBREAD reminded the hon. Gentleman that the clerks whose salaries he thus proposed to refuse had been engaged on the faith of an Order in Council.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

2. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £287,725 be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Salaries and Expenses of the Coast Guard Service, the charges for the Royal Naval Coast Volunteers, and Royal Naval Reserve, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1861."

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he wished to know whether the 9,500 men borne on the Coastguard service were all seamen who might be depended on to be called out as a reserve; because Admiral Martin, who had been for two years at the Admiralty, had stated in a pamphlet to which he put his name that this was a mere delusion, and, that in point of fact there were only 3,200 men who were fit to go on board ship. Then he observed there was £100,000 voted for the Royal Naval Reserve, he wanted to know what number of men there were in the Reserve, and how it was proposed that this money should be spent. He also wished to know if it was the intention of the Admiralty to send really good and effective men of war to the different ports in room of those lumbering and inefficient block-ships that were a disgrace to the navy. If he did not receive satisfaction on these points he would divide the House against this Vote.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he believed that a code of regulations had been issued with regard to the Reserve, which was far too complicated for the purpose. Admiral Martin, who had paid great attention to this question, made several valuable suggestions with respect to this force in his pamphlet. He suggested, among other things, that the definition of able-bodied seamen was not complete, as it at present ranged from the man who could steer a river steamer to the man who was a complete and thorough seaman. The regulation of this Reserve was placed under the management of the shipping-masters, which he believed was one great cause that prevented the success of the scheme, for sailors never looked a shipping-master in the face without having to pay him a shilling; and therefore they never went near him if they could avoid it. The rational way would be to put this force under the control of an officer of high qualifications, with an efficient staff under him. He would urge on the Admiralty to create a new department for the special management of this force, and he had no doubt they would soon get plenty of men, for he believed the system had never yet had a fair trial. With regard to the Coastguard, he recommended that all who were not real seamen should be got rid of as occasion served, and that their places should be filled with able-bodied sailors. He thought it was hard that they did not allow the officers of the Coastguard their full sea time. The duty of a Coastguard man was also extremely arduous, and he probably went through more work than a seaman on board a man-of-war. The only advantages which that service offered were those which arose from enabling them to live with their families. In order to render the Coastguard thoroughly efficient as a naval reserve, he recommended that a large addition should be made to its numbers, and that the men should be thoroughly trained and drilled, so as to fit them for the position of captains of guns, in case they were suddenly required to embark.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT inquired, whether he was correct in believing that out of 7,200 Coastguard men, 1,500 or 2,000 men had no pretension to the character of seamen, and could not be relied on in an emergency.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he hoped the noble Lord would also be able to state how many Naval Coast Volunteers were now enrolled, and to what extent they had come forward for drill during the past year.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, on the 1st instant there were on board Coastguard ships and tenders 3,206 men, which, with 3,438 serving on shore at the different stations, made a total of 6,644 seamen available for the fleet. Besides these, there were 1,386 landmen, whose places would, however, be filled by seamen as rapidly as they were pensioned off. He did not mean to deny that there were able points in the pamphlet of Admiral Martin, but he must add that he dissented from some of its details. That hon. and gallant officer complained, for instance, that men with forged certificates and unfit for their work were received into the Naval Coast Volunteer force; but he (Lord C. Paget) believed that no additional security could be provided for ascertaining whether a man was really an able seaman. The man on presenting himself was first examined by the shipping-master; and, as an additional security he could not be admitted without being taken before the naval officer for the district, who put such questions with regard to reefing and steering and the marks of the lead, as must sufficiently test his ability as a seaman. In fact, if a defect existed in the scheme, it was, as had been pointed out by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), that the preliminary examination was too searching. Admiral Martin was a most excellent and efficient member of the Commission, but he maintained that the statement in which he took pains to show that the men who were being entered could not be depended on was, as regarded the Admiralty, very unfair and unjust. Without incurring the risk of being called to order, he could not refer to the case of the commanders of the Coastguard; but he might state that they were included in the scheme of the retirement of officers, which he was most anxious to have an opportunity of laying before the House.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER complained that this question still remained unanswered, and that the noble Secretary to the Admiralty had given a very poor answer to Admiral Martin's pamphlet. The noble Lord represented that there were 6,000 men ready to go on board ship, while Admiral Martin limited the number to 3,200; and he further stated that there were only 1,300 landmen in the Coastguard, while Admiral Martin held that there were 4,000, who ought to be got rid of as quickly as possible. The noble Secretary further informed the House that nothing could be done by the shipping-master in reference to the enrolment of volunteers without consulting the naval officer, but in a letter which he had received from an officer well acquainted with the nature of this reserve, it was stated, "The sailors complain that they do not understand the regulations—that the shipping-master tells them one thing, and the naval officer another. When men come forward to volunteer they wish to be drilled at once, and not to have it hanging over their heads. Many now regret that they have joined the Reserve, and prevent others from doing so; while efficient sailors are often turned away by the foolish questions which are asked." The noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty might be a very good sailor, but if he were to put before him the shear-block of a line-of-battle ship, and ask him what sized rope he would strop it with, he might feel equally at a loss with Jack to give an answer off hand. The fear of punishment by the lash without previous trial by court-martial likewise operated injuriously on the volunteer force.

LORD LOVAINE said, he wished to know whether any disinclination to enter the Coastguard had been manifested from a belief that the retiring allowance was not as attractive as in former years.

MR. LINDSAY said, he hoped some explanation would be given of the discrepancy between the statements of Admiral Martin and the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty. It was very desirable to ascertain whether those 6,000 men were all really able seamen, or whether any portion of them were mere landmen, who had been put into the Coastguard through favour or patronage. As to the mode of entering seamen for the navy, if they were to be obtained from the merchant service the usual shipping-masters were more likely to get them than naval officers. He believed one of the greatest discouragements to entering the naval service was the objection seamen felt to the present form of the Articles of War, that inflicted the penalty of death for comparatively trifling offences, though, of course, the punishment was very rarely carried into effect. When a man knew that he might be stripped and flogged at the order of some haughty post-captain, he shrugged his shoulders and would not enter the service. Until those regulations were altered they could not hope to get large numbers of men to enter the navy from the merchant service. He begged to ask what had been done with the £100,000 voted last year for the Coast Volunteers; and what would be done with the same sum asked for in the present Estimates?

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to offer an observation on this question of the Naval Reserve, for it did not seem to work very well at present. He had always thought that if the regulations were simplified seamen would be more likely to come in, because then they would understand them, but as they then stood it was not possible for any human being to do so. He could not for the life of him see why the Admiralty would not let the men who entered the navy serve for a month on trial. If a man entered as an able seaman, and if in the course of that month he was found to be inefficient they ought to tell him that he could not be rated as an able seaman, but that he might take his month's pay and go about his business. The thing was as simple as possible; they might, perhaps, lose 4s. or 5s. on the month's service, but it was worth while to spend that in making the trial. They were all very glad to give something to try a horse or anything else they wanted to obtain. The fact was, that able seamen did not like all the questions put to them. It was a sort of school-boy examination, and nothing else. When a man knew himself to be a good seaman he was disgusted at such questions being put to him, and would not expose himself to being so interrogated. He would say that he knew himself to be a good seaman and an honest man. At present he was talked over by some shipping-master and sent to a lieutenant to be questioned, and he was not sure—which was worst of all—that his rating would not be touched, for there was nothing to secure that if he entered on the rating of an A B he would continue to be so rated when he went to sea, because it would be open to any commander of a ship to change the rating. Those were some of the difficulties which prevented men entering the navy, and they might depend upon it that there were plenty of sea lawyers to place them before the men. If they admitted them on probation, their officers would soon see whether they were good seamen or not. After that was ascertained their rating should be secured to them at once, so that they might, if called upon, be in a condition to enter the service permanently. He made these suggestions because he believed that the regulations were to a great degree in fault, for he was certain that if he were a seaman he should not be able to understand them, and that nothing would induce him to enter the service under them. Sailors were not such fools as many took them to be. They could understand what was plain as well as anybody. He believed that if proper and simple regulations were adopted, they would have very little difficulty in getting men to enter the service.

Sir Charles Napier

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that the gallant Admiral had admitted that one of the great drawbacks to men being willing to enter the navy was the use of the lash. This disgraceful punishment did not exist in the French Navy. [Sir C. NAPIER: But the men are shot.] It was only four or five months since a sailor in the British Navy was shot for striking an inferior officer; so that we retained both punishments. But let the lash be abolished in the navy, and there would be no doubt about the Queen's ships being well manned.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT said, he wished to know what were the qualifications of the men who were to be enrolled as Naval Coast Volunteers.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE also inquired what number of men were absolutely enrolled in that force.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, in reply to the question of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth, the number of Coast Volunteers enrolled was 6166. Of these he believed 4,000 were under drill. With regard to the sum of £100,000, about which the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) had inquired, a very small portion of it had been spent, and the rest was returned into the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The £100,000 intended to be voted this year would be immediately expended in fitting up the two ships to be used as training ships for volunteers; each ship to be a school for 2,000 boys. The gallant Admiral (Sir C. Napier) asked whether they were about to station efficient line-of-battle ships as Coastguard vessels. He could only say that that question was still under the consideration of the Admiralty. As to the number of the Naval Reserve, he believed it to be about 800.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he would beg to ask the noble and gallant Lord whether he believed in his conscience that the 6,000 men of whom he had spoken were really fit to go at once on board a man-of-war? If so, the noble and gallant Lord's statement was directly opposed to that of Admiral Martin, who had been at the Admiralty longer than he had, and who said that only 2,300 of the men were fit for service.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that his hon. and gallant Friend was pushing him rather close. From there turns he had received it appeared that 3,438 of the men were first-rate seamen, who had been placed on the Coastguard; and 3,260 had been placed on board Coastguard ships. Of these, some 500, he believed, were on board tenders. He could not venture to say that all these men were first-rate seamen. It must be remembered that this was a great nursery for our seamen; and as men were drafted off into the navy others were taken on board the ships. Men were at first induced to go on board the ships which they saw lying off Dundee, Leith, and other places; and then, finding a seaman's life not so disagreeable as they expected, they went on board the Queen's ships. He believed, however, that all these men would be available for the manning of the navy.

SIR CHALES NAPIER wished to know if these men were all returned to the Admiralty as "fleet men."

LORD LOVAINE asked whether there was as great a disposition to enter the Coastguard service now as formerly?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the truth was, the advantages held out to seamen were so great, that there was not the same anxiety as formerly. Married men were still desirous of joining the Coastguard, as they had the comfort of a cottage on shore; but active seamen preferred remaining in the fleet.

MR. LYGON said, he wished to call attention to the large amount of the item for cottages for the Coastguard men. The sum of £33,000, was an excessive one, and he believed, on examination, that the rent of each cottage was as much as £8. He should not object to the item this year, but unless some change were made he should move a considerable reduction next year. He also observed an item of £190 for the spiritual instruction of Coastguard men. That had not been included in any previous Estimate. If it were intended to represent the whole of the spiritual instruction given to the Coastguard, it was ludicrously small.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that according to a return just made to the Admiralty it appeared that the number of men in the Coastguard ships and tenders was 3206, and for service on shore at the stations, 3438; these were seamen.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, that noble and gallant Lord had not answered his question.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: The number of civilians at employ stations on shore was 1,386.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he knew from personal experience that returns had been made of what were called "fleet men;" perhaps the noble Lord was not aware of this fact. With reference to the block-ships, he intended to move that in the opinion of the House efficient ships should be substituted for the various block-ships now in use. This question had been under consideration, as the noble Lord said it now was, for the last three years, and nothing of a substantial nature had been done. The block-ships would make excellent school ships, and efficient ships of war, ready for active service, ought to take their place at the different stations they occupied.

ADMIRAL DUNCOMBE said, the hon. and gallant Member was not competent to move the Motion he had made. He (Admiral Duncombe) thought with regard to the Naval Reserve that the present regulations were not such as would induce men to enter the service. The articles of war might very beneficially be revised, and the system of flogging so far modified as not to be permitted without the authority of a court-martial. He thought the value of the article—able seamen—was underrated, and hence the reluctance of such to enter the service.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, as he could not make the Motion he desired, he should move that the Vote for the Coast-guard service be reduced by £4,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the proposed Vote be reduced by the sum of £4,000."

LORD LOVAINE said, the evidence given on the Merchant Shipping Committee proved that there was now no such thing as an "able seaman" in existence in the merchant service; the number of able seamen had diminished during the last twenty or thirty years beyond all precedent, and many witnesses in that Committee had recommended that Parliament should enforce a system of apprenticeship. No matter, therefore, what bounty was given it was impossible to get an able seaman.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he would with the permission of the House withdraw his Motion, as he thought it better to bring it forward as a substantive Resolution on a future occasion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. LINDSAY said, the noble Lord's (Lord Lovaine's) statement that the number of seamen had decreased was not correct. [LORD LOVAINE: Able seamen.] Whether a man was a seaman or able seaman was matter of opinion. During the last thirty years the tonnage of British shipping had increased to 2,800,000, and of course there must have been a consequent increase in seamen; and it was a fact that there had been an enormous increase. He protested against a compulsory system of apprenticeship, and contended that there was no necessity for such a measure being adopted, for there were at present a larger number of seamen in the merchant service than was ever to be found in the merchant service before.

Sir Charles Napier

LORD LOVAINE explained that he had said there were not able seamen in sufficient numbers in the merchant service in proportion to the number required for the navy.

MR. LIDDELL said, he begged to call the attention of the Committee to the increase of steam-ships in the merchant service, a circumstance which rendered the service of able seamen to a great extent unnecessary. This, he thought, accounted for the fact that there were fewer able seamen in existence now than formerly, though ordinary seamen could be obtained in any number.

MR. H. B. JOHNSTONE asked, whether it was true that at one of Her Majesty's dockyards an immense number of shipwrights had been discharged and had gone in great bands over to France, that they were asked to give their addresses, because they might be called upon very soon to return, and that they replied that they did not choose to do so, as they were going over to fulfil engagements in the French service?

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE asked, whether it was intended to have so many as 1,000 boys in each school-ship, for he thought it was a bad plan to do so, and that the practice would have a very injurious effect. The block-ships would be good training ships.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the block-ships did not contain the required accommodation. It was intended to have only 500 boys in one ship.

MR. H. B. JOHNSTONE said, he must press for an answer to his question.

THE CHAIRMAN said, it was not a question relevant to the present Vote.

MR. H. B. JOHNSTONE said, he would move that the Chairman report progress.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET replied, that he had not heard the rumour alluded to by the hon. Gentleman, though it was true that a reduction in the number of men had taken place in consequence of a reduction in the Estimates.

Original Question, put, and agreed to.

(3.) £64,322. Scientific Departments.

MR. BENTINCK asked, whether any change was proposed to be made in the mode of supplying chronometers to vessels. At present, if a captain of a vessel had none of his own, he had one given him; if he had one of his own he was allowed two; and if two of his own, he was allowed three. It was a most absurd system, and should be modified.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT suggested that it would be an act of justice that the chronometers which had been purchased by captains and commanders, and which now they would have no further use for, should be sent to Greenwich, and paid for at a fair price if the owners chose to sell. He hoped also that such officers might in future be relieved from the expense of purchasing chronometers.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, there would be no objection to the course proposed. It was a common thing in former days when officers were about to quit the service and to part with their chronometers, for the Astronomer Royal to give to the officers the value. In reference to some other observations which had been made, he might state that three chronometers would be allowed to each line-of-battle ship, frigate, and troop-ship, two to each sloop, and one to each gun-boat. He would add that he should be happy in future to relieve the class of officers who had been referred to, many of whom were by no means wealthy, from the cost of supplying their own chronometers.

Vote agreed to.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE moved that the Chairman report progress.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow; Committee to sit again on Wednesday.

House adjourned at a Quarter after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, April 17, 1860.

MINUTES.] Took the Oath—Several Lords.

PUBLIC BILLS.—2^a Income Tax Divorce Court; Oxford University; Municipal Corporation Mortgages, &c.

TUSCANY.—THE YACHT "MEDINA."

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he wished to put a Question to the noble Lord the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs with reference to a great outrage committed in the port of Leghorn last year on the master and mate of the English yacht Medina. When he was himself at the Foreign Office a complaint was made to the Department on this subject, accompanied by a request that he would ask for redress from the Tuscan Government. The application was made, but very soon afterwards the revolution took place, and the Grand Duke was deposed. In consequence, he supposed, of the confusion which followed, the appointment of the Provisional Government and the events that occurred in Italy, the case had not been attended to; but he had been applied to again from Leghorn by an English gentleman high in the service of Her Majesty, who stated that great feeling had been excited on this matter. He therefore begged to ask the noble Lord opposite what Her Majesty's Government had done in the case of the Medina, and whether there was any chance of redress being afforded by the Sardinian Government, whose authority had now been established in Tuscany?

LORD WODEHOUSE said, it was quite true, as the noble Earl had stated, that a great outrage had been committed by the police at the port of Leghorn on the master and mate of the Medina. Application had been made for compensation to the Tuscan Government, but the matter was suspended in consequence of the revolution. When Her Majesty's present Ministry came into office the application was renewed to the Provisional Government at Florence, who expressed their readiness to compensate the master and mate for the injuries they had sustained. The amount of that compensation was to be settled in this country; and the master and mate, having been examined by two medical men, one of them appointed by Her Majesty's Government and the other by the Tuscan Consul, a report was sent to Florence. The compensation which would satisfy the parties was £1,000 for the master and £750 for the mate; and they had reason to believe that the Provisional Tuscan Government was willing to pay those sums. A further delay had, however, intervened, in consequence of the subsequent events which took place in Italy. After the annexation to Sardinia the matter was referred to the Sardinian Government with a view to complete and carry into effect the intention of the Provisional Government. He assured his noble Friend that in the very distressing circumstances of the case he regretted as much as anybody could the delay which had taken place, but there was every reason to believe that the claims would be shortly discharged by the Sardinian Government.

CASE OF M. TASSINARI.

LORD WODEHOUSE, referring to a debate in their Lordships' House on the 9th March, wished to take that opportunity of referring to a statement which he had previously made respecting M. Tassinari. That gentleman had written a letter to him, which he would take the liberty of reading. It was as follows:—

“ Florence, March 21.

“ My Lord,—It was with much pain and regret that I read in The Times, of the 10th inst., certain statements made by your Lordship, in reply to a speech from the Marquess of Normanby, reflecting upon my honour, and which I feel assured, from your Lordship's high character, you never would have made had your information been more correct upon the subject than it appears to have been. Your Lordship is reported to have stated that I, with eleven other persons, was arrested on a charge of being engaged in a plot, having for its object the destruction of one of the Ministers of the existing Government by the explosion of shells, and that I was examined upon that charge the following day, and ultimately tried. This, my Lord, is a very serious accusation, and ought not to have been lightly made, though, happily for me, it is wholly devoid of truth. No such charge was ever preferred against me in the only examination I underwent, which, however, did not take place until eleven days after my arrest. It is true that your Lordship partially corrected your speech in a note to The Times of the day following, but not in such a manner as to exonerate me. What I was, however, falsely charged with was having given 10 dols. (£2 4s.) to create a reactionary movement against the existing Government, and 20 dols. (£4 8s.) for the printing of circulars. This fact can be ascertained by referring to the sentence of the police-court, which condemned me, without trial, to six months' imprisonment in a fortress. I am unhappily now threatened with deprivation of sight, and could not, in consequence, during the period of my solitary confinement in the common gaol, relieve the irksomeness of my imprisonment by any of those resources of which my fellow-prisoners might have availed themselves; therefore my incarceration told heavily upon me, both morally and physically. Under these circumstances, my wife, though she had no legal claim for interference upon the British Chargé d'Affaires, yet, as the daughter of a distinguished diplomatist who long served his country, and the sister of another now serving with honour and credit, she did not think that she was requiring too much of Mr. Corbett in requesting him to use his influence to procure a mitigation of my confinement; and so far from being insensible to Mr. Corbett's exertions in my behalf, on his telling her that he could do no more in this matter, she then expressed her thanks to him for what he had already done, with a hope that, should any opportunity occur whereby he might benefit me, he would take advantage of it. As your Lordship's speech has obtained extensive publicity through the press, I hope you will do me the justice to make the refutation also public through any channel your Lordship may think fit.

Lord Wodehouse

“ I have the honour to be,

“ Your Lordship's obedient humble servant,

“ Cavalière Brigadière TASSINARI.”

The only remark he wished to make upon this was, that he had not said that M. Tassinari was charged with having been concerned in a plot for throwing shells into the house of one of the Tuscan Ministers, and when he saw that assertion imputed to him in the newspaper reports he wrote a letter to The Times explaining what he really had said. What he had said was, that the plot with which M. Tassinari was charged was suspected by the Tuscan Government to have some connection with the throwing of the shells. But he was quite ready and willing to believe that M. Tassinari, whatever might have been his hostility to the then existing Government of Tuscany, would not have been guilty of complicity in any such attempt as that of throwing explosive shells. He regretted that any statement he had made should have given rise to misapprehension.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he was glad to hear the explanation which the noble Earl had given; for he himself had received a copy of M. Tassinari's letter, and he was quite sure his noble Friend would take the earliest opportunity of setting the matter right. It now appeared that M. Tassinari had never been tried at all, and that the only examination he underwent did not take place till eleven days after his arrest. That gentleman, without ever having been heard in his defence, was sentenced to six months' imprisonment on a false charge of giving ten dollars for creating a reactionary movement against the Government. That was the real fact of the case. He was happy to be able to add that, as one of the results of recent events in Tuscany, M. Tassinari had since then been set at liberty. He had felt sure that his noble Friend would take the earliest opportunity of correcting the error into which he had been led, as M. Tassinari was one of the most respectable men in Tuscany. It was too absurd to suppose that he, who was universally esteemed in Florence society, and who was now afflicted with almost total blindness, could really have been accused of any participation in a conspiracy for throwing bombs.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, he had not stated that he had been misled. What he said was, that misapprehension had arisen as to a previous statement which he had made, founded on the information he had received.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY wished to know whether or not his noble Friend adhered to the charge, not that M. Tassinari had been actually concerned in the throwing of the shells, but that he had had any connection whatever with the plot imputed to him.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, he had already read M. Tassinari's letter to the House, and also explained what it was that he had said.

BILLS FOR CONSOLIDATION OF THE STATUTE CRIMINAL LAW.

SELECT COMMITTEE NOMINATED.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that early in the Session Bills had been introduced for the Consolidation of the Statute Criminal Law and other purposes which, after they had been read the second time, it was determined should be referred to a Select Committee. Owing to the arrears of judicial business in that House, it had hitherto been impossible to proceed with the Committee on those Bills; but that obstacle had happily been removed by the assiduous labours of the law Lords. He had, therefore, now to move the appointment of the Select Committee, and would be glad to have the co-operation of any noble Lords who were willing to serve upon it.

Motion agreed to; and the Lords following were named of the Committee: the Committee to choose their own Chairman.

Lord Chancellor.	L. Cranworth.
E. Carnarvon.	L. St. Leonards.
V. Hutchinson.	L. Wensleydale.
V. Eversley.	L. Belper.
L. Lyndhurst.	L. Chelmsford.
L. Brougham and Vaux.	L. Kingston.
L. Overstone.	L. Egerton.

DIVORCE COURT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, it had been introduced on the recommendation of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Lyndhurst) who sat near him; and its object was to improve the procedure of a most important Court, with which the morality and domestic happiness of the community were intimately connected. For a great many years, practically speaking, any person who could prove that his wife had been unfaithful to him was considered entitled to a dissolution of the marriage tie; but that could only be obtained by an Act of the Legislature, preceded by an action for criminal conversation and by a suit in the Ecclesiastical Court. According to that practice those only who had a large sum of money to expend in these most costly proceedings could have the remedy they sought; but their Lordships most justly thought that this was not a legislative matter, but one for judicial consideration; that the remedy should be open to the poor as well as to the rich, and that a judicial tribunal should be established for that purpose. But a difficulty arose respecting those who should be the Judges of this new tribunal. It was experimental; it was desirable, first of all, to know what quantity of business was likely to be thrown into it, and not unnecessarily to increase the number of the Judges of the land. In the first instance, therefore, the Judges were the Lord Chancellor, the three Chiefs of the common law Courts, and the senior puisne Judges, with the Judge-Ordinary. It was enacted by the Bill establishing the Court that, as regards a very considerable portion of the business, the Judge-Ordinary, sitting by himself, should have power to do all that could be done by that tribunal; but there were several matters that were reserved for what was called the Full Court, consisting of three members—the Judge-Ordinary and two common law Judges to assist him. It had been found that there was great difficulty in obtaining this Full Court, the Judges being so much occupied with the increased business in their own Courts and at Chambers, going circuit, and attending that House; and to meet this difficulty it had been enacted that all the Judges of the common law Courts should be competent to act as Judges of this tribunal, the number being thus raised to seventeen. But still that was found an inadequate arrangement. All the business that could be done by the Judge-Ordinary sitting alone was speedily and satisfactorily disposed of; but that which required the attendance of three Judges had fallen most lamentably into arrear. Without the greatest inconvenience, and interfering with the administration of justice in other Courts, it was found impossible to obtain the attendance of two common law Judges to sit along with the Judge-Ordinary in full Court. It had therefore been suggested by his noble and learned Friend (Lord Lyndhurst) that the proper course would be to enable the Judge-Ordinary to do all that might be done subject to an appeal, with authority at all times to call in another Judge, or two other Judges, but to leave it to his discretion when that should be done. He entirely concurred with his noble and learned Friend in thinking that was the best course that could be adopted. He was fully persuaded that there was a great deal of the business now to be done exclusively by the Full Court that might be adequately performed by a single Judge, and to insist on three Judges was a mere waste of judicial power. There might be cases, no doubt, where a single Judge would hesitate to pronounce sentence; but he might then call in the assistance of his brother Judges in order to give such cases the fullest deliberation. He did not stand up for the doctrine maintained by some, that there should be only one Judge for every tribunal. There were cases in which it was desirable to have assistance before pronouncing sentence. He himself, after long experience, shrunk on many occasions from determining important questions of law without the assistance of his brother Judges; but there were many other cases in which justice was satisfactorily administered by a single Judge. Before this reform a single Judge sitting in the Ecclesiastical Court pronounced a sentence that was effective. The analogy here was not indeed complete, because that was only a sentence for separation a mensâ et thoro, and did not dissolve the marriage tie. But there was another analogy which he thought would remove all difficulty. By the immemorial custom of this country a single Judge presided at trials for life and death. At the assizes all over England capital cases were tried by a single Judge, and tried satisfactorily; for this reason, that if he had any doubts or scruples he consulted his brother Judge who was in the commission along with him, and he had this great additional resource that he could at all times reserve any question of law that arose for the solemn determination of all the Judges.

The Lord Chancellor

He thought they might safely place the same confidence in the Judge-Ordinary of the Divorce Court. The learned person who now filled that high office had steered his course in a manner to give great satisfaction, and confer high benefit on the community; and, under this Bill, whenever he had the smallest reason to believe he might derive assistance in any particular case he would be enabled to call in assistance, and do what was necessary for the satisfactory settlement of the matter. This was the principal enactment of the Bill, and he hoped their Lordships would read it a second time. He by no means said, however, that this should be the permanent constitution of the Court. The respondent sometimes did not appear at all in cases which came before the Court of Divorce; so that the arguments and the evidence in those instances were all on one side. In such cases the Bill gave authority to the Court to request the Queen's Proctor to instruct counsel to appear, so that both the parties to the suit might be represented. There was also another important point with which the Bill proposed to deal—the power of disposing of the property settled on the wife when a divorce took place on the ground of her adultery. That power did not under the existing law apply to executory settlements; but it seemed to him desirable that it should be so extended that the Court should have complete authority so to dispose of the property of the wife that the children of the marriage might suffer as little as possible by her misconduct. Any suggestions for the improvement of the Bill which their Lordships might offer should receive his most careful attention.

Moved, That the Bill be read 2^a.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, that when it was originally proposed to constitute this Divorce Court, he had expressed his opinion that the Assistant Judges would never be regular in their attendance to perform a duty additional to their already heavy labours. They now proposed to fall back upon a single Judge in deciding on a dissolution of marriage, and other important matters. But what would have been said if such a proposition had formed part of the Bill when it was originally introduced? He contended that ably as the present Judge Ordinary discharged the duties of his office, with the utmost zeal and ability, the power which this Bill proposed to confer upon him was one which the Legislature would never have consented to confide to a single Judge. The best plan would be to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. The Bill as it at present stood would create general dissatisfaction. Since the Judges of the Common Law Courts were unable to attend to make a full Court, it was necessary that some other tribunal should be constituted. The effect of the Bill was to set aside all previous settlement of the question. Notwithstanding, however, that there were strong objections to the Bill upon these grounds, as well as because of the mode in which it interfered with the subject of marriage settlements, he should not oppose the second reading.

LORD LYNTHURST said, he wished briefly to call the attention of the House to the mode in which his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack proposed to get rid of an admitted evil. Was his noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) prepared to leave the law as it now stood? Two years and a quarter had elapsed since the present Court of Divorce had been called into existence. During that period 509 cases of divorce à vinculo had been entered on its records. Of these it had disposed of 177, and 232 remained to be heard. Supposing, then, that the Court were to proceed with the same degree of activity it had hitherto displayed it would take four years to dispose of the arrear of business with which it had to deal, and before the expiration of that time new cases would have accumulated. Now, he should like to know how his noble and learned Friend, who objected to the present Bill, (Lord St. Leonards) proposed to redress an evil so intolerable. There were two courses open to him in order to effect that object. He might either provide an additional number of Judges or enable the Judge-Ordinary to discharge the functions of his office without been obliged to call in the common law Judges to his aid. The assistance of those Judges had, he might observe, been made available up to the present only sixty-five days, or about thirty days for each year since the establishment of the Court; so that if the Judge-Ordinary were not empowered to dispense with their services the arrears of his Court could not be worked off before the lapse of the time which he had just mentioned. What course, he would ask, was it under those circumstances desirable to take? It appeared to him that there was no alternative but to dispense with the attendance of those learned personages, or else to appoint additional Judges, and to the latter course considerable objection would be made by that and the other House of Parliament. Let it be considered what the nature of these cases was. A divorce à vinculo matrimonii depended upon the result of a trial for the offence of adultery, and such trials were, generally speaking, of a most simple character, and, for the most part, depended for their decision upon matters of fact. He might add that previous to the establishment of the Divorce Court trials for crim. con., which were of a similar character, took place before a single Judge. It was universally admitted that no man could more satisfactorily deal with such questions than the learned Judge by whom the business of the Court was at present with so much zeal and ability transacted—cases involving points of the utmost difficulty, such, for instance, as the nullity of marriage. Divorce à mensâ et thoro used also to be disposed of before a single Judge in the Ecclesiastical Courts; while in the Equity Courts the Master of the Rolls and the Vice Chancellors sitting separately decided upon questions—subject to appeal—by which the rights of individuals with respect to vast amounts of property were affected. His noble and learned Friend on the woolsack had referred to the assizes, where cases of great magnitude as regarded the property at stake, and of great intricacy in point of investigation, were continually decided by a single Judge. Questions of the utmost nicety in criminal law were decided by the same tribunal. Why, therefore, should they not trust the Judge of the Divorce Court to sit alone in deciding the cases which came before him? His noble and learned Friend had very properly referred to the power conferred in the Act of Parliament of calling in the assistance of one of the Judges of another Court in cases of great difficulty—a power similar to that which was exercised by the Judges of almost every Court. Another noble and learned Friend—who was not now present, and who was, he believed, at that moment in the neighbourhood of a very excited and disturbed population—had on a previous occasion called their Lordships attention to the question of collusion, against which he maintained that it was most important to guard. Undoubtedly collusion ought to be guarded against; but how were three Judges sitting in a Court more competent for this purpose than a single Judge? A clause had been very properly added to the present Bill by which the Queen's Proctor was authorised, at the desire of the Court, to appoint some person to investigate the case,—partly, he had no doubt, with a view to the detection of collusion. Whether this provision would be effectual for the purpose he would not pretend to say ; but, at any rate, that was not the question which was now before the House. He was satisfied their Lordships would feel the absolute necessity, both in order to uphold the power of the law and the credit of the constitution, that justice should neither be delayed nor refused. The present condition of business in the Divorce Court was, however, productive of the greatest possible delay, amounting to a refusal of justice. On every ground he hoped the Bill would therefore be read a second time, unless any other measure remedying the inconvenience to which he had adverted could be pointed out by any noble Lord.

LORD CRANWORTH said, he was inclined to concur in the proposition of his noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) to refer the Bill to a Select Committee ; not because he believed it would be materially altered or improved, but inasmuch as the subject was one of vital consequence, and which interested the public to a great degree. Having had the honour of proposing the Bill in its original form, he differed from his noble and learned Friend in thinking that there was in the Bill now before the House an entire departure from the spirit of the original measure. The original mode of obtaining divorce was not strictly judicial. After a proceeding in the Ecclesiastical Court, and an action for crim. con., an application was made to their Lordships' House, which really amounted to an application to the Lord Chancellor, with one or two of the law Lords, and sometimes to the Lord Chancellor alone. It was impossible originally to ascertain to what extent the change of system would increase the number of applicants ; and in the temper of the House at the time the Bill was passed a larger measure than that introduced would not have been accepted. Regard, therefore, being had to the feeling of the Legislature at that time, it was thought the best course to associate the Lord Chancellor or the Chief Justice with the Judge Ordinary in dealing with cases of divorce a vinculo matrimonii ; and the burden which was thus cast upon them did not seem at the time very heavy, inasmuch as the total number of days occupied in their Lordships' House in the hearing of cases of divorce was usually not above two or three in the whole year. It had been sometimes thrown in the face of those who introduced and supported the measure, that the number of applications had been greatly increased ; still, so far from shrinking from the responsibility of the measure, he was prepared to maintain that this circumstance afforded conclusive evidence for the necessity for such a change in the law, because by it relief was granted to persons who formerly could not have hoped to obtain it, it being under the old system unattainable, except at the cost of several thousands of pounds. By the Bill, as originally framed, the Lord Chancellor and one of the Chief Justices, with one of the senior puisne Judges, were appointed to assist the Judge Ordinary ; but it was soon found that neither the Lord Chancellor nor the Chief Justices were able to attend, and a Bill was then introduced allowing any of the Judges to sit and try cases. But it being now found impossible to get through the causes because of the arrears, which accumulated faster than they could be disposed of, the only remedy was either to allow the Judge Ordinary to dispose of cases alone, or to create some other legal functionaries to assist him. To the latter course there was, he thought, an insuperable objection, as these legal functionaries would have nothing to do but to dispose of cases a vinculo matrimonii, which never presented any features of difficulty, except from the single circumstance that collusion might exist between the parties seeking the divorce. To check collusion he did not believe three Judges were in the least better adapted than one ; and, though he did not mean to say that it would be entirely successful, he believed the interference of the Queen's Proctor, which it was proposed to sanction, afforded the only safeguard. He trusted that the measure, in its present form, or with but trifling alteration, would be passed into law, for he regarded it as the only practical solution of an admitted difficulty which had yet been proposed.

LORD REDESDALE said, the Bill had been attended with the effect which he had always predicted—namely, that the business was so overwhelming as to render it impossible that it could be conducted under the provisions contained in the first Act. In the Report issued by himself on account of his inability to agree in the recommendations of his brother Commissioners, the opinion had been expressed that the effect of making divorce a common law remedy, and of removing the discretionary power which had been exercised by their Lordships, would cause it to be granted in many cases in which it would have been refused by Parliament, and that thereby respect for the matrimonial tie would be greatly lessened. Everything which had occurred in the Divorce Court since it had been established had done much to lessen in the country the sanctity of the matrimonial tie; every year brought additional evidence that such was the course towards which things were tending in this country. Take the jokes that were now levelled at marriage and the Divorce Court, so common in the pantomimes and burlesques, and they must be admitted to afford strong proof that the marriage tie was no longer regarded by the people of this country with the sanctity that had hitherto attached to it. He had no objection to the alterations proposed by this Bill; but he thought some more stringent measures ought to be adopted to prevent abuse. When the question of divorce was first proposed to be taken within the domain of common law, it was argued that the proceedings of the Divorce Court should be regulated by the practice which was wont to prevail in their Lordships' House. But before the Bill passed through Parliament a departure from that rule was made; for a clause was introduced by which women were allowed to sue for divorce, which their Lordships had never permitted; and other departures had taken place under the practise of the Court from the discretion vested in the Judge being too much limited. For instance, a case occurred last year, where a man married a woman who had just before been notoriously living with another man as his mistress. After living a short time with the person who married her, she went back to the man with whom she formerly lived, and the husband sued for and obtained a divorce. He was sure their Lordships would never have granted a divorce in a case of that kind. He thought such cases ought to be prevented by authorising the Judge to exercise a discretion under such circumstances similar to that which had been exercised by Parliament. He had nothing further to say to the proposition itself, but he could not help fearing that if the cases of divorce were to be disposed of by a single Judge, they would not long be left to this high Court only. At present divorce was brought within the reach of men of moderate means. The cry would soon be raised to bring it within the reach of men of any means; and he believed that an attempt would be made to have divorces settled in other and cheaper courts than that in which it was decided at present. He concurred in all that had been said on the subject of collusion, and he would suggest that there were often cases where the friends of parties could throw important light on that question if they were admitted into the suit. For instance, it might happen that an unfortunate young man might be entrapped into a connection with a woman who was in collusion with her husband to procure a divorce; the relations of that young man might, if they were permitted, give such information as would prove the collusion. He thought, also, that compelling both parties to appear, would prove of great advantage.

Lord Lyndhurst

EARL GRANVILLE said, he thought it was not desirable that this Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, as it would only lead to delay. The Bill contained no new principle, and there was therefore no real reason for the proposition of the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord St. Leonards).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in reply, said he had anxiously watched the proceedings of the Divorce Court, and he earnestly desired to prevent any abuse of its powers by the suitors. He had proposed a Bill last year, by which the Judge of the Court was authorized to call in the assistance of the Attorney General in cases in which collusion between the parties to a suit was suspected. The clause was agreed to by their Lordships, but was rejected by the House of Commons. He had in the present measure done his best to prevent such collusion. It had been stated during the debate, that the Common Law Judges had time enough to preside in the Divorce Court; he contended that they had not; they were overwhelmed by the business of their own courts; and it was more advisable to give one Judge the power of deciding, than to create new Judges. He objected to refer the Bill to a Select Committee; it contained nothing that required investigation; it was limited to a single point—giving additional powers to the single Judge; and this point it was better to discuss and settle in the full House, which, he hoped, would agree to the second reading.

Motion agreed to ; Bill read 2^a accordingly ; and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY BILL.

SECOND READING.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON, moved the second reading of the Bill. By the Act for the better Government of the University of Oxford, the Commissioners then appointed were empowered, under certain circumstances, to frame such Ordinances and Regulations as they might deem expedient, which if not objected to by the authorities of the Colleges respectively were to take effect as statutes of such colleges. If, however, the governing body of any college should declare such ordinances and regulations to be prejudicial to their college as a place of learning and education, they were not to take effect, and the Commissioners were to prepare others ; but where no new ordinances were framed, the original ordinances were to be embodied in a report to be transmitted to one of the Secretaries of State and laid before the two Houses of Parliament. The Commissioners having framed ordinances and regulations for the better governing of the College of St. John's, in the University of Oxford, which had been objected to by the governing body of the College ; and not having framed any substitutive ordinances, had embodied their original ordinances in a report as directed. It had, however, been found that the powers of the Commissioners had expired, and that no further proceeding could be had in reference to that ordinance. The present Bill empowered Her Majesty, by Order in Council, to refer the matter to a Committee of Privy Council, who were to consider the ordinance and the objections, and report to Her Majesty. If their report confirmed the Ordinance, it was then to be laid before both Houses of Parliament, and unless within forty days either House should present an Address to Her Majesty praying her to withhold her assent, the ordinance, having been approved by Her Majesty was to become a statute of the College. By one clause a power was given to the governing body or any parties interested in the College to petition Her Majesty in relation to the ordinance and every such petition was to be referred to the Committee with the ordinance.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he had no objection to the second reading of the

The Lord Chancellor

Bill ; but he had received a request from the Master and Wardens of the Merchant Taylors' Company that he would procure the insertion of words into the Bill which would secure to them the right of petitioning the Committee of Privy Council against any ordinance which they might deem injurious to the interests of their School—a right which did not appear to be given to them by the clause as it now stood. He had a copy of the words which they desired to have inserted, and would hand them to the noble Lord who had charge of the Bill before the House went into Committee.

Bill read 2^a and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATION MORTGAGES, &c., BILL.

SECOND READING.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON moved the second reading of this Bill. He explained that at present the Treasury, retaining the powers vested in them by the Municipal Corporations Act of confirming certain mortgages made by corporate bodies, were to be empowered by this Act to carry out a system which had been adopted in Ireland, by which provision was made for paying off these mortgages by instalments without the intervention of trustees. The general scope and object of the Bill, therefore, was to enable the Treasury to sanction the adoption of one uniform and general rule with regard to these matters, only dispensing with the appointment of trustees and simplifying the arrangements generally.

LORD REDESDALE inquired whether the word " may " in the first clause of the Bill, empowering the Treasury to insist on the formation of a sinking fund, was to be considered as merely permissive, or as making it imperative upon the Treasury to do so ?

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, it appeared to him the exercise of the power was optional in this case.

LORD REDESDALE said, he thought it of very great importance that Municipal Corporations should not be allowed to mortgage their property without at the same time creating a sinking fund. He was aware that they were extremely anxious to have that power, not only with respect to their real property, but in respect also of the rates, which were sometimes heavily mortgaged without a sinking fund being created, This was very objectionable, as it was entailing a heavy burden on succeeding generations.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR was understood to say he was not prepared to cede, to the extent demanded, the necessity, or even the expediency, of the object proposed by the Bill, but if it were felt to be desirable, he certainly thought the provisions of the measure should be of a character which should give to the Treasury a right to exercise their judgment in each case submitted for their approval.

Bill read 2^a and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

House adjourned at a Quarter before Seven o'Clock, to Thursday next Half-past Ten o'Clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, April 17, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Malicious Injuries to Property Act Amendment; Fisheries (Ireland).

2^o Common Lodging Houses (Ireland).

3^o Adulteration of Food or Drink.

DESTITUTION IN THE WEST OF IRELAND.—QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland what steps the Government propose to take respecting the great destitution prevailing amongst the peasantry and labouring classes in the West of Ireland.

MR. CARDWELL replied, he was sorry to say that a considerable amount of destitution existed in the district to which the hon. Gentleman had referred, but he hoped that some of the statements made on the subject were overcharged. He had been informed that the union-house at Balmullet was capable of holding 600 persons, but that at present only 104 persons were in it, being an increase of about double of the number of inmates at the corresponding period of last year. In the other two unions of the district Castlebar and Westport, he believed there had been no very considerable increase in the number of inmates. He was in constant communication with those who superintended the administration of the poor law in Ireland, and he had every reason to hope that the ordinary administration of the poor law in those unions would suffice to meet the distress that existed. At present, at all events, he was not prepared to hold out any hope of special assistance from the Government.

THE INDIAN REVENUE.

QUESTION.

MR. VANSITTART said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for India which of the following Financial Estimates of the deficiency of Income as against the Expenditure of the current year ending on the 30th of April is correct, namely, £10,250,000, as per the statement made by the Secretary of State for India on the 1st day of August last; £6,449,981, as per Financial Balance Sheet drawn up in Calcutta in September last; £9,290,129, as per Estimate submitted by Mr. Wilson on the 18th February last to the Legislative Council of Calcutta; and whether he can state the cause of these discrepancies?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he had not the least doubt that the Estimate of Mr. Wilson, being the most recent, was the most correct of the three; but he could not state very satisfactorily the cause of the differences between the three statements. He (Sir C. Wood) estimated last summer that the revenue would be £35,850,000, the Government of India, in September, stated it at £37,567,000; and Mr. Wilson, in February, stated it at £37,707,000. There was very little difference, indeed, between the Estimate of the Government of India in September, and that of Mr. Wilson in February. There was a very satisfactory increase in the revenue upon the estimate which he (Sir C. Wood) stated to the House last summer. He spoke from information which left India in the spring. Mr. Wilson spoke, of course, from much later information, and he was happy to say that almost every source of revenue in India showed a very considerable increase in the course of the year. In the land revenue and the customs' revenue there had been an increase, and some portion of the new taxes which were not imposed when he spoke in August had been very productive. The result was, that the revenue exceeded his estimate by about £2,000,000. In August he stated the expenditure at £46,131,000. The Indian Government stated it in September at £44,067,000; and Mr. Wilson in February at £46,996,000. There was a difference of nearly £3,000 between the statement of the Indian Government in September and that of Mr. Wilson in February. That difference, to the extent of about £1,000,000, was accounted for by an additional military expenditure of £600,000 in Madras and of £300,000 in Bombay. The Indian Government also omitted all reference to the interest on Indian railways to the extent of between £800,000 and £900,000. They also understated the amount of home charges to the extent of £700,000, and the rest of the difference between the two estimates might, he believed, be attributed to an additional expenditure on public works; but even Mr. Wilson's lucid and satisfactory statement did not render the matter entirely clear.

THE PEDESTAL IN PALL MALL.

QUESTION.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he would beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether any person is about to place anything, and, if anything, what, upon the summit of a pedestal which has been standing for twelve months at the southern end of Waterloo Place, Pall Mall; and, if anything is to be placed there, when it may be expected to be done?

MR. COWPER said, he was happy to assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that the pedestal would not be permanently vacant, and that it would receive a group of statues to commemorate the heroic conduct of the Guards in the Crimea. The management of the statues and pedestal was in the hands of a committee of subscribers, so that he could not say when the work would be completed. Mr. Bell was the sculptor, and he had no doubt that a work of art would be placed on the pedestal before any very long period had elapsed.

EAST INDIA TRANSPORT SHIPS.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for War, or for India, if the statement in the public journals relative to the mortality which had occurred on board of various vessels, which had arrived at Madras and Bombay with the wives and children of soldiers, be correct; and, if so, what department or officer may be regarded as responsible for any neglect of due precautions, if such have been, in connection with this lamentable event?

SIR CHARLES WOOD stated that the transmission of the soldiers' wives and children to India took place under the direction and superintendence of the Emigration Commissioners, and he could not do better than read a report which they had drawn up on the subject. The facts were these:—

Sir Charles Wood

“Thirteen ships were originally taken up for the conveyance of 5,410 souls. We have received intelligence of the arrival in India of nine of these ships, which carried 3,747 souls. In these the mortality was 377, equal to 10 per cent. But this mortality was almost exclusively of children under five years old. Of adults (that is all above 12) there died 11 out of 1,820 = 60 per cent. Of children between 12 and 5 inclusive, 24 out of 866 = 2·77 per cent; making, out of all above four years of age, 35 out of 2,686 = 1·30 per cent. This is rather less than the whole mortality in Australian emigration (1·32 per cent.), and, considering the class of women, that the voyage occupied nearly four months, and passed twice through the tropics, it must be allowed to be very small. But among children under five the mortality amounted to 341 out of 1,061 = 32 per cent. With very few exceptions it was caused by measles and scarlet fever, which broke out in almost every ship shortly after sailing. These diseases were, no doubt, aggravated by the weakness of both children and mothers, caused by the unusually stormy weather which prevailed in October and November last, when the ships sailed. It is to be observed, moreover, that the children under five years of age in these nine ships amounted to nearly 29 per cent, the average in the population generally being 13·10. This disproportion necessarily assisted the spread of the disease and increased the mortality. That the sickness was not caused by any defect in the ships or the provisions is to be inferred from the absence of any disease of the character of scurvy or typhus as well as from the small mortality in children above four years of age. A more direct proof is afforded by the reports which we have received from Bombay and Madras. In each case an inquiry was, we believe, instituted, but only three reports have yet reached us—those on the Euxine, Statesman, and Lancashire Witch. They are annexed hereto, together with an extract of a private letter from Captain Wellesley, R.N., Commander-in-Chief of the Indian Navy. The mortality, as has been said, was attributable to the great number of very young children on board. In our emigration, this can be avoided, because our power of selection enables us to reject families containing many young children. But in sending out the soldiers' wives it was inevitable that their children should be sent with them, so that the number of young children became a necessary part of the arrangement. The question remains whether due care was taken to ascertain that there was no sickness among the children before they were put on board. In this respect the same plan was followed as has been followed for many years with complete success in regard to Australian ships. The surgeons of the ships were required to be at the depôts as soon as the first of the people came in, and to continue there till they embarked. This period varied from three to five days. It is the interest of these surgeons, no less than their duty, to see that no infectious disease is introduced into their ships, not only because the introduction of such diseases increases their labour and responsibility on the voyage, but because their remuneration at the close of it is reduced by every death that occurs. The surgeons had full authority and were bound to land any child whom they suspected to be suffering from infectious disease, and to delay the sailing of the ship, so long as they had any doubt as to their sanitary condition. But every one's experience must satisfy them that no medical skill is sufficient to detect measles or scarlet fever in a latent form; and to have delayed the ships until time had been given for any latent disease to develop itself would have postponed their departure from this country till the cold and wet of winter had set in, and their arrival in India till the season had passed during which they could have been sent up the country. Moreover, if they had been detained in depôts on shore, it would have been impossible to prevent their going into the towns and being exposed to whatever infection was there prevailing. If they had been detained on board ship the cold and damp of November, added to the weariness of inaction, would have produced such depression of mind as must of itself have caused disease."

This statement from the Emigration Commissioners had been put into his hands that afternoon. The India Office had nothing to do with the matter. Since they had entrusted that Board as being the most competent persons to undertake it, with the duty of providing transport for the wives and children of soldiers to India.

THE ARMY ESTIMATES.—QUESTION.

GENERAL PEEL said, he wished to inquire of the Secretary of State for War when the Army Estimates will be proceeded with, and also when the Return of the Effectives on the British and Indian Establishments will be ready.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that the Army Estimates could not be proceeded with until after the second reading of the Reform Bill; but he would lay on the table during the week, the Returns of the Effectives of the British and Indian Establishments which had been moved for.

FIGHT BETWEEN HEENAN AND SAYERS. QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished to ask the Secretary for the Home Department, Whether he had heard of the contest said to have taken place that morning, and which he would not attempt to characterize. He also desired to know whether it is true that the Police were present on the occasion, and offered no interference whatever? Whether any Report has been made to the Home Department, and whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take any measures for the punishment of the persons who have occasioned this breach of the peace?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS replied, he was afraid he could not satisfy the curiosity of his hon. Friend. He had certainly heard that day that the fight, to which the hon. Gentleman referred, did take place in the county of Hampshire; but he had received no intimation of it but what was founded on mere hearsay statement; and he was not able to inform the hon. Gentleman whether the county police were present on the occasion or not; the Metropolitan Police, of course, had no jurisdiction there. As to whether any measures were to be adopted, he could not answer that question till he had received information of the facts.

LAW OF LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN DAWSON said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland when the Landlord and Tenant Bill for Ireland will be proceeded with?

MR. CARDWELL said, he could not state the precise day, but he would take care that ample time should be given for the consideration of the measure.

COURSE OF PARLIAMENTARY PROCEEDINGS.—QUESTION.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he wished to ask the noble Viscount at the Head of the Government what is intended to be the course of the proceedings on Thursday? The Wine Licences Bill and the Church Rates Bill were down for that day. He wished to know whether the Wine Licences Bill will come on first. He desired, also, to know whether the Reform Bill, which stands for Monday next, will be proceeded with then?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he thought it would be necessary to proceed with the Naval Estimates on Thursday, as so little progress had been made in them on the previous evening. It was intended that the Reform Bill should come on next Monday.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY complained of the arrangement lately made, by which independent Members were deprived of the opportunity of bringing forward important questions on the Thursdays. The Government had left him to legislate on the subject of church rates; and yet, by an arrangement come to in his absence, they deprived him of the advantageous position he had held on the business paper for next Thursday. If the Government did not restore to him the advantage he had before possessed, he was not sure that he would not move that the Church-rates Abolition Bill be taken first on Thursday. To put himself in order, he would move the adjournment of the House.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that before the recess an order was made by the House that Government Orders of the Day should take precedence on Thursdays instead of Fridays; and in pursuance of that arrangement it was intended to take the Navy Estimates on Thursday next. Private Members would have the same opportunities on Friday that they used to have on Thursday.

MR. DISRAELI said, he had resisted the Motion of the Government which produced this change of business; but, as the House had agreed to it, the hon. Baronet would not be acting fairly in moving the third reading of the Church-rates Abolition Bill next Thursday. There had been a clear understanding that that Bill would not be proceeded with on Thursday, the leader of the House having announced that financial measures would be taken into consideration on that evening.

SIR GEORGE GREY remarked, that he did not understand that the hon. Baronet's Bill had ever stood first for consideration on Thursday. The hon. Baronet had had a chance of bringing it forward late at night, and he still had the same chance under the new arrangement.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would beg to remind the House and the Government of the great public interest felt in the subject of church rates. Two hundred thousand persons had petitioned in favour of the Bill of the hon. Baronet, and he did hope that the Government would endeavour to comply with the wishes of his hon. Friend.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, it was a mistake to suppose that the hon. Baronet had obtained any precedence for his Church-rate Bill on Thursday next. Being an Order of the Day it stood behind all the Notices, and it would not have had a chance of coming on before twelve o'clock at night. He could still bring it on at that hour. Or if the hon. Baronet placed the Motion for Friday, it would be in the same position as if no change of days had taken place. The hon. Baronet had in no respect been placed in a less favorable position by the Government.

Sir John Trelawny

MR. BRIGHT said, he did not understand that his hon. Friend blamed the Government for what had taken place; but as the Bill was a very important one, and was in the hands of a non-official Member; and as the House on both sides, it might be supposed, wished to send it on its journey to "another place"—the hon. Baronet appealed to the Government and to the House not to allow it to be placed in a worse position on Friday, than it would have been on Thursday, had the change in the order of business not been made. With respect to the change itself, he thought that if the House had determined to proceed on Fridays with the business of the day at six o'clock, and have left an hour and a half for other matters, it might not have been necessary. But being made, he presumed that the experiment must be tried. He hoped, however, that the Government would do all they could for the hon. Gentleman, who had a great responsibility on his hands with regard to this question.

MR. NEWDEGATE observed, that the hon. Baronet had just the same reason to complain as other hon. Members, of the change that had been made. He (Mr. Newdegate) had expressed his opinion upon the subject; and he held that, if the business of the House was to be conducted, such changes in the Standing Orders must not be made. He ventured to bring this subject under the consideration of the Government, because the arrangement under which the Government business would be taken on Thursdays, was only temporary in its character. He trusted, in the event of any extension of such arrangement beyond the time to which it was at present limited, or of any intention to make any other alteration in the order of business, that the House would insist upon receiving due notice of such a proposition, in order that hon. Members who had notices on the paper might be prepared for the contemplated change.

MR. HORSMAN said, he wished to remind the House that he had given notice of his intention, upon the bringing up of the Report of Committee of Supply, to ask some questions of the Government in connection with our foreign relations. But as the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs had made a communication to him upon the subject, and as it was intended to go into Committee of Supply on Thursday next, he would not press his questions upon the present occasion, but he would submit them upon the Motion for going into Supply on Thursday.

Question "That this House do now adjourn," put, and negatived.

LONDON CORPORATION BILL. QUESTION.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to put a question to the Secretary of State for the Home Department with reference to one of the Orders of the Day. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to have forgotten that before the Adjournment for the Easter holidays he was asked whether he intended to bring on the London Corporation Bill upon the re-assembling of Parliament, and he then stated that it was not his intention to do so until the first week after Parliament had assembled. A number of hon. Gentlemen were not only astonished to find it amongst the Orders of the Day, but that the Government entertained some intention of bringing on the Bill, contrary to the distinct assurance given by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Lewis). No doubt it was some mistake, which he hoped might be immediately rectified, and he (Mr. Ayrton) would be glad if the right hon. Gentleman would inform the House that it was not his intention to proceed with the second reading of this Bill upon the present occasion.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was under the impression that the question asked of him was, whether it was his intention to move the second reading of the London Corporation Bill on the first day of the meeting of the House after the Easter holidays, and that he answered that inquiry in the negative. He certainly was not aware that he had given any assurance that he should not bring on the question in the first week of the re-assembling of Parliament. If, however, the hon. Member was positive as to such an intimation having been conveyed by him, he (Sir George Lewis) would be unwilling to dispute the fact. He submitted, however, that the present time was most opportune for proceeding with the measure and for taking a discussion upon its provisions. He should, however, be sorry to take any course that might be represented as a breach of faith on his part, and should rather postpone the consideration of the measure to a future day.

CHURCH RATES BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished to ask the hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock what course he intended to take in regard to his important measure regarding church rates.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he should stand to his guns, and take his chance of bringing on the third reading of his Bill upon the day for which he had originally fixed it.

MALICIOUS INJURIES TO PROPERTY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

LEAVE.—FIRST READING.

MR. PAULL said, he rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend an Act relative to malicious injuries to property. Recently, in Cornwall, some malicious persons applied a weight to a particular part of a mining engine, the consequence of which was that the engine did not act, and the water rose sixty feet in the mine in six hours. The circumstance of the mine itself being shallow, however, prevented the mischievous consequences which would have otherwise ensued, and by the exertions of the men employed at the time the water in a few hours was pumped out. An indictment against the offending parties was preferred at the next sessions. It was framed under the statute of Geo. IV., relating to malicious injuries. The 5th section of that Act related simply to injuries to mines. The 6th section however enacted that if any person should cause water to be conveyed into a mine he shall be guilty of a felony, and the 7th section enacted that if any person shall damage an engine so as to stop its working he shall be guilty of a felony. In the case he had referred to, however, on the removal of the weight which had been attached to the engine it was found that the engine had not been injured. The Judge ruled that the prisoners had not committed any offence under the Act, and he directed an acquittal, but added some strong observations on the defective state of the law, expressing his opinion that it was desirable that an Act of Parliament should be passed as soon as possible to meet such offences as that which had been committed. With that view, he (Mr. Paull) had framed the measure which he asked leave to introduce.

Leave given.

Bill to amend an Act relative to Malicious Injuries to Property, ordered to be brought in by Mr. PAULL, and Mr. ROGERS.

Bill presented, and read 1^o.

House adjourned at Half-past Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, April 18, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—2^o Attorneys, Solicitors, Proctors, and Certificated Conveyancers; Jews Act Amendment.

CONVEYANCE OF VOTERS, &c. BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. COLLIER said, he rose to move the second reading of this Bill. Its principle had already been affirmed by the last House of Commons, and he trusted it would also be affirmed by the present House. He would say a word at the outset with respect to the present state of the law. They were all aware that for a long time a question perplexed lawyers, whether or not it was lawful to pay the travelling expenses of voters. In this uncertain state of the law, the celebrated case of Cooper v. Slade was decided in the House of Lords. The precise point in the case was that a promise to pay the expenses of a voter, in consideration of his vote, was evidence upon which a jury would be authorized in finding bribery, although the expenses paid were fair and reasonable, and were paid bonâ fide, and under no corrupt motive. After that decision, and probably in consequence of it, an Act was passed declaring that it should be lawful to pay travelling expenses under some circumstances, unlawful in others. It was rendered lawful to provide conveyances for voters, but unlawful to pay voters to provide their own conveyances. So that if they gave half a crown to a cabman to carry a voter to the poll, it was a lawful act; but if they gave the voter half a crown to pay the cabman, they would be guilty of a misdemeanour. The general opinion of the House was that that state of the law was not satisfactory. It was not only absurd but discreditable to the Legislature that the distinction between a lawful act and a crime should rest upon so nice a distinction as that between money and money's worth. In this case the House had not the usual three courses open to it. It must either allow or prohibit altogether the payment of travelling expenses. The object of his Bill was to prohibit such payment, and he hoped he might be forgiven if he recurred for a moment to first principles, because they had been frequently lost sight of in such discussions, and the only argument he had ever heard against his Bill was one founded upon a total misconception of them. If the object of an election were to confer an office of profit and honour upon a candidate, and every vote given became a personal favour or benefit to him, it would no doubt be quite right that the candidate should pay in some shape for the vote. But if a vote were a high constitutional privilege to be exercised on public grounds, and if the choice of the representative were for the benefit of the constituency, not the candidate, then the constituents ought to bear whatever expense it entailed. He could conceive no better proof of a man's fitness for the franchise than that he was prepared to take some trouble, or even to incur some expense, for the exercise of it. It was right that the Member elected should represent the earnestness and the intelligence, not the apathy and ignorance of the constituency. The only argument urged to the contrary effect was, that many voters lived so far away from the polling place, and were so poor that they could not incur the expense of exercising the franchise; and further that, in such circumstances, the candidate was the proper person to enable them to do so. He contended that that principle was altogether unconstitutional and pernicious. The poor voter might with, equal reason and justice, claim to be paid for his loss of time in going to the poll and the expenses of refreshment on the way, and might, indeed, with no less logical propriety, declare that as he was unable to pay his poor-rates and thus maintain his vote, it was the duty of the candidate to pay them for him. If such expenses were to be paid at all by any other than the constituents themselves, there was far more reason for suggesting that they should be paid out of the borough rate, or the county rate, or the Consolidated Fund than out of the purse of the candidate. He admitted that hitherto the State had only inadequately performed its duty of bringing the poll as near as possible to every voter; and therefore he had included in his Bill a provision for the multiplication of polling-places. Some Members might prefer the provisions upon that subject which was contained in the Reform Bill of the late Government. That was a point for consideration in Committee, and he should be willing to refer this Bill to a Select Committee if such a course was thought desirable. The most obviously pernicious effect of paying travelling expenses was that pointed out by the Earl of Derby, that it kept up the enormous cost of elections, and thus increased the influence which the purse had unfortunately obtained, and which it ought to be the object of legislation to diminish instead of increasing. It was said that the Act now in existence did not compel, but only permitted, the payment of travelling expenses. Practically, however, its operation was compulsory, because as the payment was permitted a notion had obtained in many boroughs that it was perfectly unconstitutional and un-English to walk to the poll. If a candidate did not hire all the omnibuses and cabs he could lay his hands on he was considered a mean-spirited individual, utterly unfit for a seat in the House of Commons. The House had repealed the old property qualification, which was merely nominal, but by legalizing the conveyance of voters they had re-enacted a property qualification, and one which was infinitely more onerous. His was no party measure, and he commended the Bill to the consideration of county Members, Conservative as well as Liberal. The Motion was to have been seconded by a county Member, now unfortunately no more, whose great abilities and amiable qualities were recognized by all, and whose untimely death they all deplored, Captain Leicester Vernon. The expenses of conveying voters in large counties unquestionably prevented many country gentlemen of moderate fortunes from seeking seats in that House, which they were perfectly well qualified to fill, and had brought the representation, in a great measure, into the hands of manufacturing millionnaires—a class whom nobody could welcome to that House more cordially than he did, but whom he desired to see placed there by virtue of the great abilities and merits which they possessed, rather than by the length of their purses. His observations so far applied only to the payment of expenses which were legitimate, but the Wakefield Commission had expressly shown how such a system had been, and would be, used, as a cloak for every species of bribery and corruption. He trusted that this measure would receive the support of every member of the Earl of Derby's Government, whose Reform Bill was so far superior to that now before the House, that it made the payment of travelling expenses illegal. For the reasons he had stated, he trusted the House would repeal an enactment, which for the first time legalized the payment of travelling expenses; an enactment which, in his opinion, was one of the most mischievous of modern times. He hoped they would affirm a principle which was approved by a Committee of that House more than twenty years ago, that Members should be elected, as far as possible, free of expense; and, above all, that the exercise of the franchise was the privilege of the voter, and not the business of the candidate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that in the absence of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire, Mr. Hunt, he begged leave to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. His firm conviction was, that the practical effect of the Bill would be to disfranchise a large class of voters. The Reform Bill introduced by the late Government was rejected mainly because it would have disfranchised the non-resident voters in counties. The present Bill assailed the rights of the very same class of men. He believed that the freeholders were the most important element in county constituencies, in which they were not only the representatives of property but in many cases of smaller freeholds, the sole representatives of the working classes; and for that reason he was desirous to preserve their franchises. He had no doubt that a remedy might be found for any abuse which the existing law might have occasioned in boroughs, but the case of counties was totally different. It was inevitable that many of the resident freeholders and other electors should traverse considerable distances in order to vote, while the non-resident freeholders had of course still further to travel. He might add, that in the constituency which he represented, a committee had been formed for the purpose of returning himself and his colleague in one district, where the landowners were opposed to them, totally independent of his hon. Colleague, of himself, and of their general committee, from whom this local committee would not accept a shilling towards the most legitimate expenses, and yet, because of travelling expenses paid by them, if a petition had been presented against the return, he and his colleague would have been unseated.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he thought the House must feel that there was considerable difficulty in coming at that time to a conclusion upon any one point of the law connected with the conduct of elections. He was disposed to concur with the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier) as to the operation of the existing law in boroughs, but he saw some difficulty in the way of an absolute legal prohibition of the conveyance of voters in counties. Nevertheless, he was prepared to give his vote for the second reading of the Bill; but before the debate proceeded further he wished to call attention to the fact that the question now under consideration was virtually before a Select Committee of that House. A Committee, of which he had the honour of being a member, had been appointed to inquire into corrupt practices at elections, and that Committee had already taken a good deal of evidence upon the conveyance of voters, together with other subjects connected with the expense of elections. It was impossible to discuss one of those questions apart from the rest. The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth thought he would accomplish his object by simply prohibiting the payment of the expense of conveying voters to the poll; but the Select Committee had taken evidence which showed that where prohibition was absolute it was evaded with the greatest facility. The friends or relations of a candidate, without his knowledge, might advance money for the conveyance of voters, so as to enable him to make with truth and sincerity any declaration which might be required of him, and then at the proper time, by throwing themselves upon his honour, they might place him in a position in which he would feel himself bound to repay the sums they had advanced. Unless means could be found for preventing arrangements of that sort, simple prohibition would prove practically ineffective. He observed, among the Orders of the Day, another Bill relating to the conduct of elections—the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act Amendment Bill. It appeared to him desirable either that the House should agree to read both measures the second time without further debate merely for the purpose of referring them to the Select Committee to which he had alluded. If the House, however, should not agree to adopt that course, at all events he trusted they would wait until the Committee had reported, and they were in possession of the evidence taken upon the general question, in which evidence they would find much light thrown upon the present subject. The Report of the Committee would be shortly laid upon the table, and he thought that to go on discussing these measures at the present moment would be a mere waste of valuable time.

MR. HENLEY said, he hoped the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth would assent to the reasonable suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, and postpone the second reading of his Bill until the Select Committee had reported. That Committee was considering the subject in all its branches, and it was evident the House could do nothing before the termination of the inquiry now in progress. He concurred with the Home Secretary in thinking that any law simply prohibiting the conveyance of voters might easily be evaded. People could not be prevented from carrying voters to the poll in their own private carriages. He believed, indeed, that any change such as that now proposed would merely have the effect of increasing the expense of elections. The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth had taken his stand upon the principle that candidates should not be put to any expense whatever. That might be right or it might be wrong, but why not begin with the expense of agency, which was much greater than the expense of carrying voters to the poll, and which possessed the additional disadvantage of being productive of undue influence? Why, upon the same principle, should candidates have to pay the expense of hustings and polling-booths? The question of the conduct of elections was much too large to be dealt with by such a Bill as the present, which touched only one small portion of it; and he trusted, therefore, that the debate would be adjourned. He begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to express his willingness to withdraw his Motion in favour of that suggested by the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he had understood the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to suggest, not that the debate should be adjourned, but that the Bill should be read the second time and then referred to the Select Committee. He thought that was the best course which the House could pursue. He agreed, however, with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) that if the House was sincere in wishing to reduce the expenses of elections and to give every candidate a fair chance, without reference to the length of his purse, the best thing would be to enact that, where agents were absolutely necessary, one alone should be employed. It usually happened that a rush was made for all the solicitors in a borough; retaining fees were given to them; and whoever was lucky enough to get the majority of solicitors had the chances of winning in his favour.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he thought by far the wisest course they could take would be to adopt that proposed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley), and to adjourn the consideration of the Bill before the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Collier) would lose nothing by that course, and the House would not tie its hands by affirming the principle of the Bill before the Select Committee had made its Report. The whole subject might very well be left in the hands of the Committee which was now considering the question of corrupt practices at elections, and it was not impossible that the Committee might already have taken evidence solving the question in a contrary sense to that of the Bill.

MR. MELLOR said, it was at the request of several Members of the Select Committee that he proposed to move the second reading of the Corrupt Practices Act Amendment Bill, with a view to its being afterwards referred to them. The same course ought to be adopted in the case of the present Bill. As it was very desirable that all the Bills on this subject should be treated similarly. There was a new mode of corruption used; where a man had a horse and cart, both were hired, and the voter too.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he believed the more regular course would be to adjourn this question altogether, and in the meantime to refer the Bill to a Select Committee; but he did not believe that any Resolution of the House was necessary to enable the Committee already sitting to take all the Bills into consideration.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was not aware that any Bill had been formally referred to the Committee.

MR. MELLOR.—Yes; the Election Petitions Bill, after being read the second time.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he knew nothing of that Bill, but the most important measures which the Committee had had under their consideration were those of the hon. and learned Member himself and of the hon. and learned Member for Suffolk, neither of which had been read a second time. Neither of those Bills, therefore, had been formally referred to the Select Committee, for it was the rule of the House that a Bill must be read a second time before it could be so referred. The Members of the Select Committee, however, were in possession of copies of them, and in conducting the investigation their inquiries had turned much upon their contents and provisions. The practice of reading a Bill pro forma was always thought an objectionable one, though under stress of business it was sometimes resorted to. If the House entertained any considerable objections to the principle of the Bill now before them, its second reading could hardly be pressed, and though not formally referred to the Select Committee, it would be practically in the hands of its Members. The best and most convenient course would be to agree to the adjournment of the debate.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, that having attended for a day or two before the Committee upstairs, he was informed that the Committee had no official knowledge whatever of the two Bills just now alluded to, and did not feel bound to take them especially into consideration. The subject had been so frequently completely discussed by the House and the public, that he believed a Committee of the whole House would be more competent to deal with it than any Select Committee. The compromise which had been made on the clause of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Continuance Act of 1858, which attempted to draw an impracticable distinction between travelling expenses and expenses of maintenance, had proved quite inoperative. The Huddersfield Committee had ignored that provision, as well as the judicial decision in "Cooper v. Slade," and they had held that although the payment of these expenses might be illegal, and constitute a misdemeanour for which the candidate could be prosecuted, it did not amount to bribery for which he could be turned out of his seat.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he had the strongest doubts of the expediency of the Bill now before the House. He agreed that there was danger in the practice of paying voters' expenses, but he was not yet convinced of the possibility of preventing it. Two or three years ago he himself had to pay a tremendous Bill, about £1,400, which he should have been glad to save; but if he had been tied down from paying these expenses he would have been placed at a great disadvantage against the powerful opposing interests, and he feared that a great number of poor voters, unless the expense of conveying them to the polling place was paid, would be unable to vote at all. He was not prepared, however, before he knew the result of the inquiry in progress, to affirm the principle of a measure of the expediency of which he entertained the gravest doubts. Nor did he think that the multiplication of polling places would have the effect of curtailing the expenses of an election; because he believed that every additional polling place would entail a great additional expense, so that the remedy would be as bad as the disease.

MR. MONTAGUE SMITH said, that a recent precedent might be found for the adjournment of the debate in the case of the Coroners Bills, both of which were referred to a Select Committee. But if they passed the second reading of the Bill before them they would affirm the principle recognized in the preamble of the Bill, which he believed, from the feeling displayed in the House, was looked upon with much disapprobation. The law as it stood simply put poor and distant voters upon the same footing as rich and near ones. Some change might be required in boroughs, but his objection to the present Bill was that it was applicable to both boroughs and counties. At present the law simply stood in this way, that if a man had no carriage of his own he might hire one to convey voters to the poll; but the present measure would go to the extent of making it bribery if a man put job horses to his own carriage with the view of carrying electors to the polling-booth. It was reasonable in every respect that the course suggested by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) should be adopted.

LORD HARRY VANE conceived that in the present state of circumstances it would be impossible, more especially in reference to counties, to do away altogether with the payment of the carriage of voters to the poll, but he thought the second reading of the present Bill might be assented to without further discussion, with the view of sending it to the Committee

Sir Edward Colebrooke

upstairs, and upon the distinct understanding that its principle was not affirmed. Though abuses might exist under the present law, he very much doubted whether such a Bill as the one under discussion would operate advantageously. At the same time it would be necessary for the House to consider what regulations would be necessary in consequence of the enormous increase, in certain districts, of voters under the new Reform Bill, whose conveyance would vastly add to the expense of elections. This evil might, however, be obviated by the use of voting papers, and, unless some such means were adopted, a great number of persons would undoubtedly be disfranchised if it were made illegal to convey them to the poll. He repeated the suggestion, that the Bill should be read a second time, merely for the purpose of referring it to the consideration of the Committee upstairs.

MR. BARROW said, that the more convenient way of dealing with the Bill was to adjourn the present debate, for to call upon those who objected to the Bill to read it a second time pro forma was simply to ask them to vote black to be white. If the debate were adjourned, the House would have an opportunity of learning from the Report of the Select Committee whether any other means than the payment of the conveyance of voters could be devised for preventing poor men from being deprived of the power of exercising their franchise. It was not very creditable to the House of Commons that a subject, which they had been discussing and deciding differently year after year, was not yet disposed of. He was quite surprised to hear it argued that the payment of the conveyance of voters gave an advantage to the longest purse, for it was evident, if that were prohibited, the advantage in an election would be given to the great landlord, who by means of his own carriages and those of his friends—which, of course, he might use for the purpose—would enjoy great facilities for conveying his voters to the poll; and the practical disfranchisement of the poorer class of voters on the other side would thus give an enormous influence to the longest purse. He spoke from some experience in contesting a county against a great landlord.

SIR CHARLES DOUGLAS said, he was in favour of the principle of the Bill, and thought it should be read a second time. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would withdraw his Motion for the Adjournment of the Question, and that the House would be allowed to take the issue raised by the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate). That was the only fair course to pursue, and the one that would better test the feeling of the House on the main question.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, it was perfectly disgraceful that the House had not long since passed such a measure as this to get rid of the monstrous nuisance of the conveyance of voters. The borough in which he lived was twenty miles long and ten miles wide, with only two polling places; and the inconvenience was that the Justices of the Peace were not empowered there, as they were in counties, to establish additional polling places.

MR. COLLIER said, he thought the most convenient course would be to read the Bill a second time, and then to refer it to the Select Committee. However, he was in the hands of the House, and he would not oppose the Motion for the Adjournment of the debate if it were the general feeling that that should be acceded to. He rather collected that the feeling of the House was in favour of the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 94; Noes 81: Majority 13.

Debate adjourned till Wednesday 16th May.

ATTORNEYS, SOLICITORS, PROCTORS, AND CERTIFICATED CONVEYANCERS BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MURRAY said, in the sudden but unavoidable absence of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Guilford, he rose to move the second reading of this Bill. Last Session a similar Bill passed the House of Lords, where it met with the approbation of all the law Lords, and came down to the House of Commons towards the close of the Session, but in consequence of the pressure of other business did not become law. At the commencement of the present Session the hon. and learned Member for Southwark introduced another Bill, containing ten of the clauses extracted from the former measure, the "educational clauses," and he (Mr. Murray) endeavoured upon the Bill of the hon. and learned Member going into Committee to introduce the remaining clauses of the Bill of last Session. That course was, however, not in accordance with the forms of the House, and the hon. and learned Member succeeded in passing his Bill, which had gone up to the House of Lords. In their Lordships' House it was thought desirable to bring in a new Bill comprehending the educational clauses and the omitted clauses, and this Bill having passed the House of Lords, he had now to move the second reading. The object of this Bill was to increase the respectability and education of attorneys and solicitors. Under its provisions, graduates and members of certain universities in the three kingdoms would be enabled, upon examination, to be admitted attorneys, solicitors, or proctors, after three years' service as articulated clerks instead of five, as at present. By another clause, gentlemen at the bar in like manner, after leaving the bar and undergoing an examination, would be admitted to practice as attorneys and solicitors at the end of the same term of service. Other clauses gave power to the Judges to make regulations for the examination of clerks during their clerkship, as well as after the expiration of their articles. There was also a clause giving bond fide managing clerks, who had served honestly and faithfully for ten years, an opportunity of being admitted after three years' further service. The Incorporated Law Society, who had originated the Bill, would be enabled, with the sanction of the Judges, to increase their registration fee from 2*s.* 9*d.* to 5*s.* That institution, consisting of a body of gentlemen belonging to the profession, were elected according to similar courses adopted at an ordinary club, and the Council of that Institution, at the expense of the Society, took measures for the purpose of preventing improper persons entering the profession, and of getting struck off the rolls, or otherwise punished, solicitors who had been guilty of malpractices. The Bill also repealed certain Acts of Parliament which disqualified attorneys, solicitors, and proctors from being appointed justices of the peace, but provided at the same time that no attorney should practise in the county over which his judicial functions extended. Under another clause the Court of Chancery had power to order that an attorney's bill, after taxation, should bear interest at 4 per cent if it remained unpaid after three months, which would render it unnecessary for him to bring an action against his client. There were similar provisions relating to lunacy, and by a further clause it was enacted that the decision of one of the superior courts to strike an attorney off the rolls for misconduct should operate in all the other courts, without a separate application being made to each.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "that the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. KNIGHT said, that he was loth to reject a Bill containing such valuable provisions as the "educational clauses," which would improve the character and status of the profession, and therefore if the Bill had been introduced in that House, he would have proposed to amend it; but as it had come from the other House, he had given notice of his intention to move that it should be read a second time that day six months. He would remind the House of the curious position in which the matter stood. The Bill of last Session was brought down from the House of Lords and rejected by this House, not, as the hon. Member (Mr. Murray) represented, from want of time to consider it, but really in consequence of the strong opposition offered to some of its provisions. The hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. John Locke) selected all the good parts of the Bill, and formed them into a separate measure which he introduced this Session, and which, having received the sanction of that House, was now before the House of Lords. He (Mr. Knight) believed that he was justified in saying that, if they rejected the Bill then before the House, the measure approved of by themselves would come back to them from the Upper House, and would pass into law, with the general approbation of the profession. He objected to the Bill on various grounds. In the first place the Incorporated Law Society was an ordinary club in Chancery Lane, composed of solicitors. Most of them were highly respectable persons, but they would be enabled by this Bill to tax the whole profession, for certain purposes of their own. They would be entitled to receive something like £4,000 or £5,000 a year, but what they were to do with that large income was not stated. It was stated that it was the duty of this body to weed out of the profession persons who were not fit to remain in it. It was unreasonable to entrust to any body the task of weeding out itself, and if that duty must be performed, a public prosecutor ought to be appointed by the Lord Chancellor for the purpose, and be paid the £4,000 or £5,000, arising from the fees. No doubt the Incorporated Society had been the means of getting many improper persons struck off the rolls, but they had left untouched great defaulters and culprits; and he feared that the great defaulters had been men belonging to that society, a fact which proved they were not proper persons to undertake the duty of proceeding against persons accused of ill-conduct. There were several clauses in the Bill which were very objectionable. One was, that which went to repeal the Act which prevented solicitors from becoming justices of the peace. It was manifestly improper that gentlemen constantly practising before courts should be constituted judges. It was impossible that they could do their duty towards their client without having a certain bias. Again, the clause relating to attorneys' bills after they were taxed was needless, as they had every means at present of recovering as against their clients. Attorneys themselves opposed it, for they said to him, "Whoever heard of one of our cloth being unable to recover the amount of his Bill?—and we don't want to be put upon a different footing from other persons." Upon these grounds, he contended that the Bill ought to be rejected.

Mr. Murray

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, that the Bill, like that of the previous Session, emanated from the Law Society, the members of which employed themselves in eating and drinking and reading the newspapers—amusements which they occasionally varied by hunting a brother attorney in the courts of law. By this Bill they sought to put themselves in funds by the taxation of the profession, for the purpose of enjoying themselves in that manner in future, as well as to obtain privileges which they had no right to possess, and which had been denied them by several Acts of Parliament. They had cunningly appropriated clauses from a measure which he (Mr. Locke) had attempted to pass through Parliament, designed to elevate the character and improve the position of attorneys; but they had so altered and mutilated those clauses as to destroy the fair and liberal effect he intended them to have, and, under the pretence of improving the educational status of the profession, they had sought to obtain for it monstrous and intolerable powers over a client's property by way of lien. He (Mr. Locke), for example, had proposed in his measure to enable clerks to attorneys or solicitors, who had served for ten years, to be admitted to practice on their own account after an additional service of three years under articles; but the Law Society, by introducing the word "managing" before "clerks" in one of the clauses which they had taken from his Bill, endeavoured to restrict, if not altogether to destroy, the operation he had intended it to have. Again, Clause 18 repealed the present law which prevented attorneys from becoming Justices of the Peace, but said that an attorney should not act as a magistrate in a county in which he practised; but the absurdity of such a restriction was evident, for there were a thousand modes in which it might be evaded. Then Clause 21 gave an attorney a lien for costs on whatever property he might have "recovered or preserved" for a client in a suit in any court of justice. He was at a loss to know what was meant by the term "preserved" in such a case; it was clearly a term not known to the law; but, whatever it meant, he contended that the existing law of lien went quite far enough already, and he did not think the country gentlemen in that House would sanction such a proposition emanating from so suspicious a body as the Law Society in Chancery Lane, who might naturally be supposed to have their own interests at heart, although they might not be very careful of those of anybody else. He could not see what use this Bill was meant to effect, for the educational clauses which it contained had been embodied by him (Mr. Locke) in the Bill which had passed that House, and was now waiting a Second Reading in the House of Lords. No doubt, if the objectionable clauses in this Bill were struck out, the Law Society, for very shame, could not send the set of educational clauses to the House of Lords, but they had endeavoured to make them a cloak for their own clauses, which had been so much lauded by the hon. Gentleman who moved the second reading of the Bill. It behoved the House to consider whence this Bill emanated, and to ask themselves whether they conceived that any advantage which might arise to the community at large by the passing of this Bill would not be counterbalanced by the very great danger they ran of placing an irresponsible power in a body of men who, up to the present time, had not shown that they had exercised the powers which they already possessed for the benefit of the profession.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he believed that if the Bill had only contained the educational tests, which would raise the character of attorneys and solicitors, the House would readily have given to it its assent; but while coming before them under the guise of a measure of that kind, it embraced some of the most extraordinary clauses which had ever been suggested. He was not inclined to indulge in satire upon the Incorporated Law Society, in which there were many members of the highest character, and which had done much to maintain the character and integrity of the profession; but he could not see on what ground they presumed to ask the House to empower them to tax the whole body of attorneys and solicitors. They absolutely sought power to tax every solicitor, who already paid twelve guineas a year for his certificate, an additional sum of 5s., which would yield them a revenue of about £5,000 a year, for the application of which they would be responsible to nobody. The society might occasionally be instrumental in bringing delinquent members of the profession to justice, but there was nothing in that or any other way which it was incumbent on them to do; and therefore it would be monstrous to give them such an irresponsible power of taxation. He contended also that the clause which precluded an attorney from acting as a magistrate for a county in which he practised might be easily evaded, and, that being so, it would be fatal to the administration of justice if attorneys were to be allowed to sit side by side on the bench with their clients, over whose property and interests they had often considerable power. Again, a more monstrous proposition was never made than that which gave attorneys a statutable lien for costs over any property which they might recover or "preserve" for a client in any suit before a judicial tribunal, seeing that an attorney had already a lien for costs on every deed and document in his possession belonging to a client. The tyranny implied in the proposition was further aggravated by the provision that all conveyances, assignments or other acts done to defeat, or which should operate to defeat that right, should be null and void. So that if a man recovered an estate worth £50,000 he could not execute a conveyance of it to his wife or brother, or any one else, unless the attorney was satisfied. The 19th clause provided that the amount of an attorney's bill certified on taxation was to carry interest if not paid within three months. The more respectable members of the profession did not desire such legislation in their interest, and they repudiated the attempt to obtain the exercise of a power over their clients' property for which they had never asked. With regard to managing clerks, there were many in London who were paid salaries of from £300 to £400 a year, and who had no idea of ever becoming solicitors themselves. The Bill generally was very objectionable, and he trusted the House would never sanction it.

MR. MONTAGUE SMITH said, that the Bill came before the House under very considerable authority—it had been prepared by the Incorporated Law Society, and had received the sanction of the Law Lords in the House of Lords. It was, no doubt, very easy to cast ridicule on any public body, and more especially one composed of lawyers; it had been said that the Law Society was a mere club; but he would remind the House that the Society had certain public duties to perform, as they were entrusted with the power of examining attorneys and solicitors before they were admitted to practise, and it was admitted that they had done their duties well. Whatever had been done of late years to remove improper persons from the rolls of the Court had been done by the Society, and at their own cost. The Bill was last year brought in by Lord Campbell, now Lord Chancellor; and this Session it was introduced by a noble and learned Lord who had sat on the woolsack, and it was again supported by the Lord Chancellor. He was surprised to hear the hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. John Locke) claim the paternity of the Bill, for he had copied the Bill introduced by the Law Society last year, and had only added the clause that admitted attorneys' clerks to practise. It was admitted on all hands that the educational clauses were good and worthy of support, as it was of importance that attorneys, who were intrusted with a knowledge of the secrets and private concerns of their clients, should have the education and feelings of gentlemen. An objection had been made to a clause in the Bill which allowed interest on unpaid bills after three months, but he did not see why that objection should be made, seeing that a tradesman might, on giving notice, charge interest on his bills. That, and the objection to the clause which gave a lien, were objections in detail which might be discussed in Committee. The clause which allowed attorneys to be justices of the peace involved a principle, and he thought it would be better to strike the clause out of the Bill. But admitting that there were clauses which could be amended, and some which had better be omitted altogether, there would still remain enough of good in it to induce the House to read it a second time.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, the support of the hon. and learned Member for Truro (Mr. M. Smith) gave to the Bill was a very modified support. He brought forward an argument why solicitors should be entitled to charge interest, if their bills remained unpaid for three months. Now, he thought that solicitors were well capable of taking care of themselves, and that they charged quite enough, without the House passing a Bill empowering them to charge interest after three months. But he rose principally to draw the attention of the hon. Member for Truro to the clause with reference to certified conveyancers. He believed there was not a more respectable class than the certified conveyancers. This Bill provided that these men might be struck off by the benchers without any appeal. He thought that was an injustice, and his vote would depend on whether he had an assurance that that clause should not be retrospective. There were other objectionable clauses, and unless they were assured that they would either be improved or withdrawn, the wisest thing the House could do would be to reject the Bill altogether.

MR. A. MILLS said, he trusted the House would allow the Bill to be read a second time. The objections to the Bill merely related to details, which might be discussed in Committee. If the Bill only contained the educational clauses, it ought to be read a second time. They heard constant complaints of the inefficiency of that branch of the profession. They were now anxious to improve themselves, and he thought they ought to give them the opportunity.

MR. LOWE said, the hon. Member for Truro said a tradesman might, by giving notice, charge interest on his unpaid bills; and he asked why a solicitor should not do the same thing. The truth was, that attorneys had already the power to do just what tradesmen did; but the present Bill would enable them to charge interest without the knowledge of their clients, and without giving notice. If an attorney were to tell a client that he meant to charge interest upon his bill, the latter would probably go to another attorney; but under the present measure a bill might stand over for years; and the client, when he came to discharge it, would have a large sum to pay of which he knew nothing. Attorneys, he thought, could take very good care of themselves without the aid of this provision. He thought the House was placed by the proceedings of the House of Lords in an unpleasant position with regard to this Bill. This House had sent up a Bill to the House of Lords containing all the enactments of the Bill, which everybody approved. The House of Lords neither rejected the Bill, nor carried it, but hung it up, and sent down a Bill containing word for word the clauses already agreed to by this House, after having tacked on other clauses, which had no relation whatever to the matter in hand, but which gave the attorneys large benefits at the expense of the public. Suppose they struck out of this Bill the objectionable clauses, they would send up a second Bill precisely the same as the first, and he did not think that was a position in which the House of Commons ought to place itself. For these reasons he should oppose the second reading.

Mr. Edwin James

MR. BOVILL said, he wished to remind the right hon. Gentleman that the House of Lords had last Session sent down a Bill containing a large proportion of the clauses in the Bill now before the House; but owing to the late period at which it came down, the House of Commons had not had time to consider the measure. The subject was then taken up by the hon. and learned Member for Southwark in the present Session, and the result was the Bill which was now in the other House. The present Bill, had, he thought, been too much treated as the measure of the Incorporated Law Society, which was a very inadequate representation either of the Bill or the motives which had led to its adoption. Before it was introduced the subject had been very carefully considered by the Judges, by the Benchers of the Inns of Court, and by every branch of the legal profession, and as a whole the Bill might be said to have received the sanction of the profession, and to have come down to the House with the stamp of approval of the law Lords. Objections had been taken to the clause relative to certificated conveyancers; but he was authorized to say that that there would be no objection to the modification of this clause, so that it might refer only to persons admitted as certificated conveyancers "after the passing of the Bill." The Bill introduced general regulations for the education, the examination, and the qualification of attorneys. No one could object to these provisions, for everything which tended to add to the respectability of the profession would promote the public interests. The clause with regard to managing clerks had been introduced in favour of those who had not had the advantage of a liberal education. Then came the question, should there be a registration of attorneys. The medical profession enjoyed the advantage of having a record of every man belonging to it. But if a person wished to know whether any one was an attorney he had to search at several places in order to ascertain the fact, and when the person was admitted. Then, objections were taken to the registration fee of 5s. The Incorporated Law Society were Registrars by law, but they had not the means of making the registration. The council of this society were gentlemen of eminence in their profession, who gave their time and services without pay or remuneration for the interests of the profession, while they at the same time conferred a great advantage on the public at large. For himself, he should be prepared to recommend that funds, if necessary, should be placed at the disposal of the Incorporated Law Society, for the purpose of enabling it to purge the profession of its unworthy members. At present the Society could not take the steps which the interests of the public required for want of funds. When it was remembered that the stamp duty amounted to £120, no attorney would grudge the payment of a registration fee of 5s. The Bill then dealt with the costs of solicitors, which ought also to form part of a Bill embracing the general interests of the legal profession. If objections existed to this or any other detail of the Bill they ought to be dealt with in Committee. Objections were made to the clause enabling solicitors to act as Justices of the peace. He could easily imagine that in some districts of the country it would be for the public advantage that a gentleman of high standing in the profession should be in the commission. Take, for example, a London solicitor who might have a country seat in a remote part of Wales. The Bill only authorized the Lord Chancellor to place a solicitor in the commission of the peace, and that high legal functionary might, he thought, be safely entrusted with this power. He hoped that the House would give the Bill a second reading.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he shared in the dissatisfaction which had been expressed at the circumstances under which this Bill came under consideration. There was, however, much in the Bill which was excellent, and though there were other things which he did not approve of, yet he would venture to suggest the adoption of a more temperate course than had been followed elsewhere, and he should therefore vote for the second reading, reserving to himself, of course, the fullest power of discussing and altering the Bill in Committee.

MR. HADFIELD said, one objection to the Bill was the clause relating to certified conveyancers. He also objected to the clause which would enable the Incorporated Law Society, an irresponsible body, to raise £5,000 a year. That society ought not to be entrusted with an expenditure of so large an amount. There was great jealousy of that society in the country, and great opposition to it, and very justly. In his opinion the £5,000 a year would be spent in the persecution and oppression of the weak members of the profession.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT complained of the extremely inconvenient and almost unconstitutional position in which the House of Commons had been placed in consequence of the conduct of the House of Lords in this matter. If they agreed to this measure, it would be the second Bill on the same subject passed by them in one Session. The House of Lords ought to add any new clauses they wished to introduce to the Bill already passed by the House of Commons, instead of framing a fresh one. He suggested that the present Bill should be got rid of in order that their Lordships might take that course.

MR. DENMAN remarked that the additional clauses referred to were not introduced into the former Bill in the House of Commons simply because they were held to be too remotely connected with the subject, and such as ought to be incorporated in a separate measure. He thought the present Bill contained a great many good points, and ought to be considered on its merits. It was inconsistent with the dignity of the House to enter too minutely into the history of the two measures.

Mr. Bovill

MR. HENLEY said, he agreed with the Solicitor General that it was unnecessary to stand on any ground of punctilio as to the procedure with reference to the House of Lords. There were, however, seven additional clauses in this Bill, which were not in the measure before the House of Lords; and they were money clauses. Being, as was technically termed, "red-letter clauses," he very much doubted whether they could have been added in the House of Lords; so that the Commons had not been treated with any want of respect by the other House. There were many provisions in the Bill to which he entertained strong objections; but as he approved of its general principle, he should feel it his duty to vote for the second reading.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question:"

The House divided:—Ayes 191; Noes 29: Majority 162.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for Tuesday 1st May.

THE JEWS ACT AMENDMENT BILL

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE moved the second reading of this Bill.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he rose to move that this Bill be read a second time on that day six months. He had done everything in his power to dissuade the hon. Member for Finsbury from pressing the Bill upon the consideration of the House; but he regretted to find that his efforts had proved ineffectual. The measure would invalidate the great settlement of the Jewish question to which both Houses of Parliament had come only two years ago. They all remembered the long and painful difference which had prevailed between the Lords and the Commons upon the subject before that settlement; and they must all feel that it was a state of things which no lover of constitutional Government could wish to see revived. The House of Lords had made a concession in the matter which was extremely painful to a majority of its Members, and if the question were reopened a controversy must be renewed which the whole country had lamented during its continuance. Was there anything in the present state of the law of which the hon. Member for Finsbury, or those whom he appeared to represent, had a right to complain? Members of the Jewish persuasion were readily admitted on their election to seats in that House. But the House of Lords had insisted that it should be open to either House, and open to the electoral body through their representatives, as far as regarded the House of Commons, to decide whether persons who did not profess "the true faith of a Christian" should sit and vote in either House of Parliament. The Act gave the largest possible freedom to each House and to the country upon that subject; and the fact was that the hon. Member for Finsbury proposed to impose a restriction upon the action of that House, which was entirely unfettered under the existing law. No complaint of any grievance was made in that case, and he had even reason to believe that some hon. Members of the Jewish persuasion did not wish to see that Bill introduced and the former controversy revived. He had never been animated by any feeling of animosity to Gentlemen professing the Jewish faith; but he had certainly been anxious to see the Christian character of the British legislature maintained. He believed that the power which we possessed of appealing in every case of dispute to Christian morality, as the basis of all our law, afforded the best security for the continuance of that freedom which England had so long enjoyed. The Act which it was now sought to repeal, though giving a discretionary power to either House of Parliament, preserved this principle. He was ready to admit that he had seen nothing in the conduct of Jewish Gentlemen in that House to disqualify them from taking part in its deliberations; but he claimed for the people of this country the right to decide at any time, by the election of their representatives, whether Jews should occupy seats in the House of Commons.

Amendment proposed to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months,"

MR. SPOONER seconded the Amendment.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he would beg to tell the hon. Gentleman the Member for Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) that so long as any test applied to the admission of Members to that House, there could be no settlement of the question.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, that it was true they admitted the Jews, but they did it in a manner unworthy of a Christian assembly. It was a most unconstitutional doctrine to contend that an Act of Parliament was an agreement between the two Houses, and that upon a question of civil and religious liberty a future Parliament could not discuss or alter it. When Lord Lucan introduced his Bill, one of the arguments in its favour was, that if the House of Lords did not allow the Jews to be admitted by Resolution the House of Commons would do it without them. It was also urged that, as a general election was pending, the Bill might be passed and the whole question submitted to the country, when, if the people objected to the arrangement, they might instruct their representatives at the hustings to alter it. The general election took place, and such an instruction was not given on any hustings, not even to the hon. Members for Warwickshire, but, on the contrary, three more members of the Jewish persuasion were elected by large constituencies. It was said that no inconvenience had occurred, but inconvenience might any day occur. The result of the Committee appointed on the Motion of the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire to consider the best mode of carrying into effect the Act for the relief of Her Majesty's subjects professing the Jewish religion was to make it impossible for a Jew to take his seat in a new Parliament until the fourth day of the days appointed for taking the oaths appointed by law. They could not take the oaths as a Christian Member; they must wait four days. It was all very well to have that rule for the first Parliament after the Bill passed, but the public having answered the appeal to them in favour of the Jews the House was bound to place them in the same position as other Members. He therefore asked the House nobly and generously to remove the great stain, not on the Jews, but on themselves, and to act on the Christian principle of doing unto others as they would that others should do unto them.

MR. KNIGHTLEY said, he should have been well content to let the question rest where it was, although he thought that it would have been much better if the House of Lords had adopted the noble Lord's (Lord John Russell's) proposition when they gave up the whole principle of their opposition to the admission of the Jews. He thought also that the present law was if I can show, as I feel no doubt I shall be able to show, that there is information calculated to assist us in forming a sound judgment on the subject which is not at present within our reach, but which we may hope to elicit by inquiry. My Lords, I need hardly remark that one of the most important questions which can be raised in the consideration of a new Reform Bill, is as to what is to be the future right of voting in counties and boroughs; and, in forming a judgment on this question, it is desirable that, with regard to any extension of the franchise that may be proposed, we should know, as clearly as we can, what is the extent of the addition that will be made to the electoral body, and what may be the character of that addition.

Now, my Lords, as far as regards the future number of the constituency in the Boroughs of England, there are returns on your Lordships' table intended to enable you to form some estimate of the increase of voters by the extension of the franchise to the occupiers of houses of the annual value of £6 instead of £10; but, to show how little those returns can be trusted without further inquiry, I need only state this notorious fact, that whereas Her Majesty's Government have estimated the probable increase of voters from such a change of the franchise at somewhere about 200,000 persons, a great many gentlemen, who have very good means of forming a judgment, including among them the representatives of some of our largest constituencies, have declared that they are prepared to show that this calculation is entirely fallacious; that it ought to have been at the very least doubled; and that 400,000, not 200,000, is the smallest number which ought to be reckoned upon as the probable addition to the borough voters. This opinion is also supported by many persons of good local information. Since I came into the House I have been told of the case of a borough in Cornwall, where the Government estimate of the increase to the constituency is at least one-half below what it ought to be. I do not know whether your Lordships have observed the fact, but in many of the local papers there are calculations of the same kind. I do not mean to trouble your Lordships with unnecessary details, and I will not, therefore, refer to many instances; but I may name one as a sample of many others. It appears that the number of voters now on the register for Ashton is 1,052. According to the returns laid before Parliament, the estimated probable addition to the constituency, by reducing the franchise to a £6 occupancy, is between 800 and 900. A gentleman well acquainted with that town, has, however, stated in the local papers, that the probable addition to the number of voters there under the operation of the Bill would be, instead of 800 or 900, at least 2,000. Now, this discrepancy between the calculations made upon the point seems to me to be a matter of so much importance, that it becomes clearly our duty to inform ourselves more thoroughly with respect to it. By calling before us those officers of the Poor Law Board who have made these returns, and some of the persons engaged in the local administration of the poor law, as well as other witnesses from some of the principal towns throughout the country, we may be enabled to clear up the doubts which at present exist as to the accuracy of the returns, as well as to learn something of the probable condition in life of those electors who will be admitted to the enjoyment of the franchise under the proposed change. It is, moreover, desirable not only that we should acquire some information with respect to their condition in life, but also with regard to the degree of intelligence and education which they may possess. And while the point is one of considerable importance, so far as the boroughs are concerned, in the case of which the information before us is deficient and not trustworthy, it becomes of still greater importance in the case of counties, in reference to the position of which under the Bill we absolutely have no information at all. As far as I am aware Her Majesty's Ministers have not even made a conjecture as to the probable increase of the electoral body in counties if the contemplated change in our representative system should take place. This I cannot look upon as right. What the amount is likely to be of the proposed addition to the electoral body in the United Kingdom is, I contend, a question which it is of great importance to take into account in the decision at which we ought to arrive upon the measure which we are asked to pass into a law. The probable increase of the number of voters, and the character of that increase, are not, however, the only questions which I deem worthy of consideration in dealing with this subject. Although there are doubts entertained as to the amount of the proposed addition to the electoral list, there can be no doubt but that addition will be very considerable, and the distribution of the franchise under the new Bill very unequal. In some towns its operation will create very little difference as contrasted with the present state of things; while in others, in which the rents of houses are lower, constituencies enormous in point of number will be created. That being so, it becomes expedient to consider whether to intrust the privilege of returning Members of Parliament to those overgrown constituencies is a course which it is dangerous to take, or the reverse. It seems to me, I confess, that we already know enough of the operation of such constituencies—especially in the case of the metropolitan boroughs—to render it desirable that we should know more upon the points to which I am adverting, in order that we might be enabled to judge how far the allegations which have been made as to the working of such constituencies are true or otherwise. We have ascertained from Returns which have been laid before Parliament that in constituent bodies so large as those of which I am speaking only a small proportion of the number of electors entitled to vote avail themselves of the privilege. According to the latest Returns, for instance, which I have seen on the subject, it appears that in the borough of Marylebone, out of a constituency of 21,000, little more than 10,000 voted at a recent election. In other metropolitan boroughs the proportion of those who actually vote to those who possess the franchise is, I believe, not very different. We also know that the contests for those boroughs have been of a very expensive character—that individual candidates have paid for a single election as large a sum as £5,000, that being the amount only which was returned by the election auditor; while I fear we should deceive ourselves if we were to imagine that this was the actual extent of the expenditure which has in every instance been incurred. Now, it being clear from the Returns that only a small number of the electors vote on these occasions, and that the elections are exceedingly costly, even if we exclude any reference to illegal and concealed expenses which may have been incurred, it becomes expedient to ascertain to what cause these facts are to be attributed. We have been told by persons acquainted with the subject that the evils to which I have adverted are due to the great size of the constituencies in question. Those persons say that in consequence of the very great number of voters which they contain, no individual voter takes

Earl Grey

any great interest in the exercise of the electoral privilege, and that as a result it becomes necessary to use various means in order to bring men to the poll. It is, moreover, asserted that, although bribes may not be offered to particular voters at those elections, a system which partakes to a great extent of the nature of corruption prevails; that paid canvassers are employed; the interest of the publicans purchased by allowing long bills to be run up for the entertainment of these canvassers and their committees; that machinery of this kind is largely employed, and that the result of resorting to it is to make individual voters still more unwilling to go to the poll, inasmuch as they feel that their vote is practically valueless in opposition to the organized measures which are taken by the professional traffickers in those elections. It is added that this unwillingness is manifested especially in the case of the more intelligent and educated inhabitants of the boroughs in question, who abstain from recording their votes; so that practically the control of the elections falls into the hands of a cabal, of a self-appointed committee, and a little knot of intriguers, the choice of a representative being thus practically restricted to a comparatively small number of persons. That the facts are such as I have mentioned is openly stated in pamphlets and newspapers, and I cannot help thinking that we ought, before we create any more of those large constituencies, to ascertain what amount of truth there is in such assertions. It is, of course, no easy matter to get at the truth of statements of this description; but still I am not without hope that, from the information which I am told different persons are ready to afford on the point, we shall be able to throw much light (should your Lordships think fit to grant the Committee for which I ask) upon the machinery by which the elections to which I am alluding are conducted. It may turn out on inquiry to be the case that facilities for personation and various other frauds are afforded in consequence of the number of electors being so large that it is difficult to recognize them individually. It may be ascertained, also, that the extreme multiplication of the number of voters diminishes, not only the value set on the franchise by the person who possesses it, but also the feeling of responsibility under which he exercises the privilege. It may, moreover, appear that one of the chief securities which we now enjoy for the fair and proper conduct of elections arises from the fact that the voters feel themselves to be a select body, exercising the right with which they are intrusted under the supervision of many of their countrymen who do not possess the same privilege, and that this feeling materially tends to make them discharge their duties as electors for the public advantage. It seems to me to be all the more important that we should have accurate knowledge on these points because of that which we know takes place in the United States. I was much struck by reading in one of the newspapers a letter from its "Correspondent," who stated himself to be a citizen of New York, describing the state of things in that city. He declared it would be a safe wager that out of 100 citizens, taken at random, not 10 could tell who were their representatives in Congress, and not five who were the members for the town in the State Legislature—unless it was said, you happened to stumble on a member of one of the committees by whom these things are really managed. These small knots of self-elected agitators are the real electors for the great city of New York; and the expression used by the writer was, I think, that the body of the inhabitants have as little real choice as the person who is asked by a conjuror to draw a card from a pack, who of necessity draws the card that the conjuror has determined beforehand. That is the account given by an American citizen of the effect produced in that country by the extreme multiplication of the number of electors. And, therefore, it seems to me a subject well worthy your Lordships' consideration, before we determine very largely to multiply the number of electors, that we shall endeavour, as far as we can, to obtain information as to the real practical working of elections carried on by very numerous bodies. We ought to know what approach we are likely to make to the state of things which I have just described; we ought to know whether an extension of the franchise is likely to conduce to the better discharge of the important trust of returning Members to Parliament. If we were to judge from popular harangues, and from the many speeches which are made in Parliament, we might suppose that the extension of the franchise is necessary in order to give to many of our fellow-countrymen some advantages of which they are at present unjustly deprived. I want to know what is the real advantage of having a vote in the election of Members of Parliament. What good does a man derive from being one of some hundreds or thousands, who in the borough in which he lives, when a new Parliament is to be chosen, vote in the election of the Members? He derives no direct advantage from the privilege—I am supposing always that he does not make any improper use of it—a vote is in itself of no consequence whatever; for no man will say that it is of advantage to him to possess this sort of fractional share of the power of choosing Members of Parliament. But what is of the deepest moment to every man is, that the election of Members shall be so regulated as to afford the best security that the country shall be well governed, and that the interests of every class shall be fairly dealt with and consulted. This it is which is of consequence to every man, from the highest to the lowest; and the mere possession of a vote, irrespective of the objects for which that vote is to be exercised, is not for one single moment to be taken into account. Looking at the subject in this light, and considering it to be a question whether the extension of the franchise is likely to lead to a more honest and a more judicious exercise of the privilege and to the choice of a House of Commons better fitted for the discharge of its high duties, it will be for your Lordships, whenever a measure on this subject is brought before you, to determine what evidence we have that such an extension is required. For my own part, I do not hesitate to say, so far as we have at present any means of forming an opinion, that I see no proof at all that such an extension is either necessary or expedient. It seems to me that this is the opinion of by far the majority of those who have written on this subject in a dispassionate tone, and of the best and soundest thinkers who have expressed their views upon it. I do not mean to trouble your Lordships by citing these authorities; but there is one to which, from various circumstances, I attach so much importance that I will take the liberty of bringing it under your Lordships' attention. I am sure there is none of your Lordships to whom the name of the late Mr. Hugh Millar is not familiar; you must know him by reputation and the delightful works which he has published. You are well aware that by his high moral no less than by his intellectual qualities he raised himself from the station of a working mason to a position of great influence and distinction. As the editor of a newspaper of wide circulation he was accustomed carefully to consider political questions, his opinions with regard to which were decidedly Liberal; and having been himself a working man, he knew by experience the opinions and feelings of that class, and the whole course of his life showed how earnest were his desires to promote their real interests. Mr. Millar, in one of his very interesting publications, under the name of The Cruise of the Betsy, refers incidentally to the subject of the franchise, as to which he thus expresses himself:—

“Let Chartism assert what it pleases on the one hand, and Toryism on the other, the property qualification of the Reform Bill is essentially a good one for such a country as Scotland. In our cities it no doubt extends the political franchise to a fluctuating class, ill fasted in society, who possess it one year and want it another; but in our villages and smaller towns it hits very nearly the right medium for forming a premium on steady industry and character, and for securing that at least the mass of those who possess it should be sober-minded men with a stake in the general welfare.”

That is the opinion of Mr. Hugh Millar with regard to Scotland; and I would remind you that the franchise in that country is much less widely diffused in proportion to population than in England.

I know it has been stated that it is unjust not to give the working classes a larger share in the representation, and that they ought not to be excluded from their fair share of political power. If that were true, and if any such exclusion were really practised towards them, no man would more heartily concur than myself in the opinion that this was an injustice and ought to be remedied. But is it true? In the first place I venture to submit to your Lordships that from among the £10 householders in our boroughs the working classes are by no means excluded. In the present days of prosperous trade in this country there is no resident in an English borough who may not hope by industry and intelligence to become the occupier of a £10 house. Practically, a very considerable number of £10 householders have risen from the class of working men, if they do not still belong to that class. They are, besides, closely connected with the whole body of the industrious classes, and have a strong feeling of sympathy with them. I might also remark that voting is not the only means by which political influence can be exercised. A man who has either never possessed or has never given a vote may, by his character and ability, exercise a most powerful influence on public opinion. For instance, do you think the amount of political influence exerted by such a gentleman as Mr. Bright much depends on the effect of his individual vote? Nor has it, I think, been established that an extension of the franchise is necessary in order to secure that Parliament shall deal justly towards the working class. As far as we can judge from experience, I submit to your Lordships that the electoral body in this country is by no means indifferent to the interests of the great bulk of the population. These matters must be estimated by their effects; and I ask whether the whole course of legislation for many years past does not prove that the Parliament which is returned under the existing rate of suffrage is sincerely desirous of doing what is just and fair by all classes of the community. It is said, I know, that there ought to be a more direct representation of the working classes—that it is not enough that a certain number of these classes already possess votes, and that Parliament, as now constituted, deals justly towards them; but that something more is required, and that there ought to be persons in the House of Commons who would more fully express their sentiments. I acknowledge that there ought to be in that assembly the organs and representatives of every class, and especially of the working classes; and that it is highly important, even where their opinions may be mistaken and their wishes unwise, that they should still be expressed, because it is by being publicly stated and as publicly answered that any delusions which may possess the popular mind can most effectually be dispelled. But is this to be effected by a general and sweeping reduction of the franchise? I think there is great force in the argument that shows this cannot be the case. The industrious classes are so numerous, compared with all other classes, so like each other in their modes of living and general circumstances that it is impossible, by a general reduction of the franchise in our cities and boroughs, to secure to these classes a more direct representation without giving them a complete political predominance. That point, my Lords, requires great and careful consideration. Many persons, whose opinions are entitled to great weight, think it is impossible to obtain a satisfactory result without adopting a different principle. They say that by a simple reduction of the franchise you would do either too much or too little, and that, to accomplish your object, you must proceed on some different principle. By the variety of franchises existing before the Reform Bill all classes, it is said, were represented. In some towns the right of election belonged to the corporations or other bodies representing the more wealthy classes; in others it was vested in the householders or freemen who acquired the franchise by serving a seven years' apprenticeship. They returned Members representing the industrious classes, not only of those particular towns for which they sat, but of the kingdom in general. By this diversity of the right of voting in different places, there were thus opportunities for all classes in society to obtain a share in the representation; and it is contended that, if we wish to secure the same object, we must return, in some degree, to this principle. My own opinion, I confess, leans to the soundness of these views; but I forbear from entering into this question, because it will form no part of the inquiry I ask your Lordships to institute. The Committee will have nothing to do with devising any plans of reform; by the terms of the Motion I am about to make it will be limited to the humbler task of endeavouring to collect information that may assist your Lordships to form a judgment on any measure of reform that may be brought before you.

Earl Grey

But I cannot ask your Lordships to enter on this limited inquiry, without expressing my opinion that one of a far more comprehensive character is urgently required. I believe that the principles on which a safe and effectual improvement of the representation can be accomplished have yet to be ascertained, and that the best mode of carrying these principles into effect yet remains to be discovered. I think that Parliament cannot safely deal with this question till it has been submitted to further inquiry; but I have no such claims on your confidence as to entitle me to ask your Lordships to entrust such a difficult investigation to a Committee moved for by me. I am not even prepared to say that any Committee of this House would be the best mode of conducting it; but I am not the less persuaded that it is necessary, and that if we would deal safely with this great subject, it must undergo a more searching and more dispassionate inquiry than it can receive in a discussion of a Reform Bill brought in by the present or any other Administration. The failure of the different attempts to pass Reform Bills within the last eight years, and the very small approval any of those Bills, framed by different Governments, have received or deserved, ought to convince us that it is impossible to arrive at any satisfactory settlement of this great question till the mind of the nation is more clearly made up as to what it wants, and till the leaders of the chief political parties can arrive at some agreement as to the measure that is to be passed. If Reform Bills are to continue to be brought forward and discussed in the manner they have been during the last and the present years, nothing but evil can arise to the country. The ultimate overthrow of the Constitution is what we must expect, unless this subject shall cease to be the battlefield of contending parties, and unless there is sufficient virtue and patriotism left among the leaders of all parties to enable them to agree, either to leave the question as it stands—and after all there is really very little practical objection to the working of our representation—or else to endeavour to concur in some measure framed according to principles which political wisdom and experience have suggested—and not with the mere purpose of catching a little fleeting popularity, or to patch up for a time a difficult and troublesome question. Unless they will do this there is danger of a great calamity befalling the nation, by the overthrow of the balance of political power. I believe that only a small fraction of the nation wishes to disturb the balance at present existing. The great mass of the people are well aware of the benefits they enjoy under our present Constitution; they are well aware that we enjoy a greater share of real liberty and of the blessings of good government than any other people on earth; and if the question were put to them distinctly whether they would abide by the main principles of the Constitution to which we owe so much, or whether they would depart from those principles to seek some new and untried system for the uncertain benefits it might confer, I am persuaded the answer of ninety-nine of every 100 in every rank of the community would be to abide by the constitution as it exists. But the danger is that in the strife of parties, and from weariness of a vain and barren struggle, the nation and Parliament may at length be prevailed upon to pass some measure of which the fatal working will not be understood till too late, and would only be known by experience; some measure founded on no principle, unsettling what exists, and settling nothing; some measure of which the apparent moderation would be only a snare and an additional danger, and which, if agreed to in the vain hope of obtaining a temporary respite from agitation, and a settlement of the question at least for a time, will be found on the contrary only to have increased all the existing difficulties, and to have opened the door to farther and indefinite changes which will be forced upon us in rapid succession till nothing is left to concede, and till our well-balanced Constitution is utterly overthrown, and an unchecked democracy is established on its ruins. That is what we have to fear, and what has happened in other nations, the example of the gradual corruption of free institutions in other countries, in ancient and modern times, ought to be to us a beacon pointing out the dangers on which we seem to be so blindly running. Above all, the example of the United States ought to be a warning to us that we cannot lay these things too deeply to heart. Let me remind your Lordships that the great men who brought the Revolutionary War with this country to a successful close established a Federal Constitution, by which they thought they had provided sufficient checks against the dangers of an unbalanced democracy. At that time the Constitutions of the several States were founded on similar principles. But almost every check then provided against abuse has been, one after the other, swept away, and the unchecked dominion of the mere numerical majority has been established, both in the Federal and the State Governments. My Lords, I believe if the contemporaries of Washington had been asked whether they would abandon the system then established for the one that has replaced it, they would have answered unanimously, "We will not try so dangerous an experiment." But the change has taken place, nevertheless, and how? By a succession of changes at first apparently inconsiderable in themselves, but all leading by a gradual, steady, and certain progression to that result which we now see. And how has that change worked for the happiness and well-being of the people of the United States?

In bringing this part of the subject under your attention, I wish to say nothing which can wound the feelings of a people for whom, individually, I entertain the highest respect and admiration—but it would be false delicacy in me to abstain from describing the evils which now afflict

Earl Grey

that kindred nation, and which the best and most enlightened of their own citizens are the first to admit and deplore. I will endeavour then, shortly to point out to your Lordships what is the state of things now existing in the United States, as described by witnesses of the highest authority, native and foreign. In the first place, it is admitted that the ablest and more enlightened citizens of the United States are absolutely excluded from all share in the Government. They not only exercise no public functions, but they have not even the smallest influence over the acts of the Government. They are perfectly helpless and powerless, and the whole power, both legislative and executive, has fallen exclusively into the hands of those men who do not scruple to flatter the lowest passions of the mob. The effects of this are seen both in the Executive Government and in the Legislature. I do not intend to dwell upon the topic, but we all know in what manner the relations of the United States with foreign nations are carried on. Everybody is aware of the unscrupulous, overbearing tone which marks their intercourse with foreign nations. If any one European nation were to act in the same manner, it could not escape war for a single year. We ourselves have repeatedly been on the verge of a quarrel with the United States. With no divergence of interests, but the strongest possible interest on both sides to maintain the closest friendship, we have more than once been on the eve of a quarrel, and that great calamity has only been avoided because the Government of this country has had the good sense more than once to treat the Government of the United States much as we should treat spoilt children, and though the right was clearly on our side, has yielded to the unreasonable pretensions of the United States. There is a danger that this may be pushed too far, and that a question may arise on which our honour and our interests will make concessions on our part impossible. If from the Executive Government we turn to look at the proceedings of Congress and of the State Legislature we find them marked by habitual coarseness and vulgarity, and sometimes even disgraced by scenes of actual violence. We find that their measures, instead of being directed by a desire to promote the welfare of the nation by enlightened legislation, seem to have no other object but to satisfy the cupidity or the passions of their members. Let me point out to your Lordships just one remarkable contrast between Congress and the British Parliament. In our Parliament, which has been condemned as so faulty, public opinion—that is, the opinion not of mere numbers, but of the enlightened and educated part of the nation—has been strong enough to enforce the application of sound political science in our financial and commercial legislation. It has swept away all protection, and has placed our revenue laws on a system which is admitted to be, on the whole, wise, sound, and beneficial. But while public opinion has been able to do this in England, contrary to the wishes and contrary to the supposed interests of that landed aristocracy which is said to possess undue power in Parliament, and to abuse it for the oppression of the nation, Congress, on the contrary, has maintained the very narrowest system of exploded protection; and at this moment the revenue laws of the United States are of such a character, that no man who has the slightest pretension to a knowledge of the subject, can doubt that they impose a great and needless burden on the mass of the community for the benefit of a few. But, worse than this, the system has led to the most hideous corruption, which pervades every department of the Government. This is universally admitted and deplored, not by one party or one set of men only, but by all. The fact has been set in the clearest light by one of the highest authorities to which I would venture to appeal, that of the President himself. In a letter dated February 23, 1859, Mr. Buchanan speaks of “the disastrous influence which excessive and lavish expenditure of the public money may exert on the character of our free institutions,” and he goes on to say:—

“A strong tendency towards extravagance is the great political evil of the present day. Money from the national treasury is constantly demanded to enrich contractors, speculators, and agents, and these projects are gilded with every allurement which can be imparted to them by ingenuity and talent. Claims which had been condemned by former decisions, and had become rusty with age, have been again revived, and have been paid, principal and interest. Indeed, there seems to be a general rush to obtain money from the treasury on any and every pretence.”

He adverts in this passage to one of the most extraordinary modes of corruption which can be imagined. Some old claim on the Government, which has been considered and rejected years ago on good and sufficient grounds, is brought forward again, and by an arrangement among the parties who are to share in the benefits of the decision, the old decision is reversed, and this fancied claim is satisfied by an extravagant grant from the public treasury. This system of corruption is shamelessly avowed in the maxim which is loudly proclaimed, “To the victors belong the spoils.” The meaning of this is, that each new President of the United States is to make a wholesale dismissal of public servants, and to fill their places without even the slightest pretension to any reference to the fitness of the new holders, but solely with reference to their claims on the party which has brought him into power. Still more remarkable is the fact that it is openly asserted that Acts of Congress and of the State Legislatures are often obtained by direct pecuniary corruption. One case of this kind—a railway case—attracted much attention two years ago, and was mentioned in the City article of The Times. It appears to be the practice of Congress to make grants of public lands to some of the Western States for the purpose of enabling them to encourage the formation of railways. These grants are in the first instance obtained from Congress in the corrupt manner I have described, and, when obtained, are used very much in the same manner by the Legislatures of individual States. A railway in Wisconsin obtained an act of the State Legislature making to the Company a grant of land by the wholesale purchase of the whole Government of the State. The case was so flagrant that it became impossible ultimately to refuse an investigation, and the following facts were reported to have been clearly proved:—Thirteen Members of the Senate received bonds to the amount of £35,000, in sums varying from £2,000 to £5,000 each; sixty Members of the House received sums varying from £1,000 to £2,000 each, and only four Members voted for the Bill without pay. The Governor of the State received for his share in passing the Bill £10,000—the Government is supposed to be carried on economically there, and the salaries are small, but with such irregular gains its public servants are certainly not less costly to the State than our own more highly paid ones—his Private Secretary got £1,000, the Lieutenant-Governor got £2,000, the Controller of the Bank £2,000, and the Clerks of the House from £1,000 to £2,000 each. Then there is a gross sum put down for “outsiders”—that is lobby agents and various undefined expenses of that kind—£50,000. This does not rest upon mere loose statement; it is the result of an official inquiry by a Committee of the Legislature—it is the history of the transaction as reported by a Committee of the succeeding House of Representatives. That is an example of the state of things which has arisen in that country. Before leaving the subject of America, there is another point which I really must mention. I stated to your Lordships that the President of the United States, with the most praiseworthy spirit, had written a letter to caution the country against the extreme extravagance which in modern times has prevailed; but I am sorry to say the President appears to be himself unable entirely to resist the effects of the system; because there has been an inquiry into the state of the navy in the United States, and the result of that inquiry has been the publication of a mass of documents which I am sure no man can read without the greatest astonishment. Contracts are proved to have been habitually and avowedly made to promote, not the interest of the public, but of the individual. A physician is shown to have been appointed to be agent for the purchase of coal, who knew nothing about coal, who never did anything in the purchase of coal but signing the certificates brought to him, and who received the appointment in order to share with others the profit of the contract. More than this. We have letters addressed to the highest officers of the Government calling on them to grant contracts to particular individuals for electioneering purposes. One letter is addressed to Mr. Buchanan himself, urging him in the strongest manner to have the contract for the machinery of a steam-sloop assigned to a particular house in Philadelphia with a view to obtaining their influence in the approaching election. There is no disguise. It is put openly that it is of importance, in the then state of the election, that the contract should be given to this particular house. I appeal to your Lordships whether, if a letter were addressed to the First Lord of the Admiralty, making a demand of that kind, and it were proved that he had listened to it for a moment, he would not by the universal indignation of all parties in Parliament, and out of it, be driven from the councils of the State. But how did the President of the United States treat the matter? The letter to which I have referred was simply sent to the Secretary of the Navy with this indorsement:—

“The enclosed letter, from Colonel Patterson, of Philadelphia, is submitted to the attention of the Secretary of the Navy.—J. B.”

Earl Grey

Such corruption produces its natural effects upon every interest and upon every class in the country, and above all, I am sorry to say, upon the administration of justice. Your Lordships are all aware that not many years ago the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States were regarded with the greatest respect, not only there, but in this country. The Judges were enlightened, honest, honourable men, and their dicta were often quoted in our own Courts as of high authority. How has this state of things been altered? Under the system which has arisen in America, appointments to the Supreme Court, like all other appointments, have been used for party purposes and as a natural consequence, that Court has lost the high character it formerly possessed. It no longer commands the respect which it did in better days, and some of the decisions which it has recently pronounced have excited the disgust of all high-minded men in America. But this is by no means the worst—in the Federal Courts the state of things is not good, but at least they have still Judges who hold office during good behaviour, and may therefore venture to act with independence. But in many of the States—I believe I may say in most of them—the Judges are now elected. They are not only originally appointed by election, but they are appointed only for short periods; consequently they are looking forward to re-election;—and in some States they are elected annually, and their salaries are voted annually by the Assembly. This has arisen, because when the undisputed dominion of a numerical majority of the nation had been established, they will not bear to have the desires and passions of the hour checked by a firm administration of the law. The effect has been to degrade the character both of the Bench and the Bar. It is stated in the American newspapers, and the evidence is confirmed by that of impartial observers, that the laws in that country are now become mere cobwebs to resist either the rich or the popular feeling of the moment. While the rich and the upper classes are excluded from any legitimate influence in the government of the country, the illegitimate influence of money is greater than ever, and it is stated that rich men have little to fear from the law in a majority of the States of the Union. How it acts when any popular feeling is involved will be best understood from a short statement which I beg leave to make to your Lordships. In the autumn of 1858 there existed a quarantine establishment which had been established by the authority of the Legislature and of the Government in the neighbourhood of New York. The situation was one where many villas had been built for the citizens of New York, to which the quarantine establishment was regarded as a nuisance, and its removal was desired. The inhabitants of the district attempted to get it removed, and, not succeeding in doing so by legal means, the course they took was to assemble and burn it down. No secret was made beforehand of what was intended, on the contrary, the time at which the outrage was to be committed was openly proclaimed, and at the time appointed the rioters accordingly assembled and deliberately set fire to and destroyed the building. They first removed the sick, but I believe the lives of some were lost by the exposure to the weather they endured. Not the slightest attempt was made by the authorities to resist the outrage which they knew to be intended, and only a nominal attempt to punish the perpetrators. Proceedings were taken against them, but I find in a local paper, those proceedings described as a protracted farce, and the result was a decision from the Bench that, as the quarantine establishment had been pronounced a nuisance by the grand jury, the rioters were justified in burning it down. This is a sample of the manner in which the law is now expounded in one of the States of the Union. I say nothing of those abuses, of which I am afraid there can be no doubt, in the police of New York that make life and property unsafe in many parts of that great commercial metropolis. I refer only to known facts, which stand on clear official statements, and which cannot be denied or doubted.

Perhaps I shall be told that there is no danger of our coming to such a state of things as this—that the reverence of Englishmen for law and justice, and their desire to see it fairly administered, are so great that they will never for a moment follow such an evil example. But I believe that seventy years ago these feelings were quite as strong in America as they now are in England, and I beg to remind your Lordships that when you once establish the irresponsible power of a mere numerical majority of a nation, they are led on insensibly from one step to another, until the consequence is the establishment of such a tyranny as I have now been describing. I believe that this experiment of Government by a numerical majority has been tried in America under circumstances of far less danger than it would be in this country; and I refer your Lordships to an admirable letter which records for our instruction the opinion formed on this subject by the great historian and statesman, in whom this House, this country, and the civilized world, have lately experienced so irreparable a loss. I refer to the letter of Lord Macaulay, in which he points out with his usual power of language and of argument that, in a country still so imperfectly settled as the United States, where the population have the opportunity of spreading over a wide territory, the experiment of government by a numerical majority has been tried under far greater advantages and with far less danger than it would be in a thickly-peopled country like our own. I have referred to these things because I think they ought to render us cautious how we take any steps which may lead to the establishment of such a system of government in this country. But we do not need the example of America in order to enable us to judge what must be the character of such a Government if established here. From the speeches which have been delivered during the last two years to various audiences throughout the country by a gentleman of great energy and talent—I mean Mr. Bright—we may form some conception of the degree of moderation, wisdom, and justice, with which power would be exercised if placed exclusively in the hands of that class to whom his speeches were addressed. I will not trouble your Lordships with quotations from those speeches; if your Lordships will but look at the points that were cheered, you will see some test of the degrees of wisdom, moderation, and justice, with which power would be used, if entrusted exclusively to a single class.

I feel I have already trespassed too long upon your Lordships' attention. I will therefore pursue this topic no further, and only express my hope that what I have said may be sufficient to satisfy you of the propriety of granting the Committee I ask for, in order to inquire whether by adopting the changes which are now proposed in the representative system, you would not virtually concentrate the real power solely in the hands of a particular class, and deprive all other classes of their proper share. Let it not be supposed I object to a well-considered measure of Reform. I never expressed the opinion that the Reform Bill of 1832 ought to be a final measure. I do not think that finality belongs to human legislation. But this I have always said, and this I still say, that when you have a Constitution which secures to the people the blessings of good government and the largest amount of liberty, and is practically found to work well, you ought not lightly to disturb that arrangement, and above all things you ought not to adopt any change of which you cannot see pretty clearly the probable effect and ultimate consequences. You are bound to remember that the Constitution of this country is, as it is well described by our greatest political writer, a well-balanced and complicated machine, and that if you venture to disturb its operations with a rash hand, you may throw it out of working order. Even in correcting admitted faults you may do harm, unless you take care at the same time to correct faults in the opposite direction. I believe that the circumstances of the times impose upon us a great and solemn duty; and when any Bill of Reform is brought before us it will be our duty to give it our deliberate attention, and to refuse steadfastly to pass any measure, unless we are satisfied it will promote the future interests of this great country. In order to enable us to discharge that duty, and to provide us with information on which we may form our judgment, I beg to move, in the terms of my notice—

“ That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire what would be the probable Increase of the Number of Electors in the Counties and Boroughs of England and Wales from a Reduction of the Franchise, and whether any or what Change is likely to be made in the Character of the Constituencies by such Increase: Also, what Difference there is between large and small Constituencies in respect of the Proportion of registered Electors who usually vote in contested Elections, and into the Causes of any such Difference which may be found to exist, likewise into the Means by which Elections in very large Constituencies are practically determined, and into the Expense incurred in conducting them.”

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, it is not the intention of the Government to oppose the Motion of my noble Friend. We are perfectly willing that the inquiry asked for—though the terms of the Motion are somewhat loosely worded—should be instituted as far as it is capable of having a proper and useful direction given to it. It must be, however, on the distinct understanding, which I believe my noble Friend admits, that it is a bonâ fide Motion for the purpose of obtaining information which will guide us in our deliberations on the measure of Reform when it comes up from the other House of Parliament, and that the appointment of the Select Committee is not to have the effect of shelving the question, or causing unnecessary delay in the consideration of the Bill, when it shall come up from the House of Commons. Upon that understanding the Government are prepared to enter into the inquiry with my noble Friend. If, indeed, the Select Committee now moved for were to inquire into all the matters my noble Friend has referred to—into the decay of nations in ancient and modern times, the alleged decline of the American constitution, and the state of the United States now as compared with what it might have been had the institutions devised for it by General Washington and his associates been maintained—I should indeed despair of any progress being made for a very considerable time, and should regard with unmitigated commiseration the unhappy lot of the Members chosen to serve upon the Committee. But I understand my noble Friend intends the inquiry to have a more definite direction. Some of his observations seemed to imply that he wished the inquiry to be directed to the verification or correction of certain Returns produced by the Government for the purpose of informing Parliament of the probable effects of the measure they have introduced; and the Government are perfectly willing that the accuracy of these Returns should be tested by the Committee. I do not, therefore, at present deem it necessary to enter into any defence of these Returns; but I must say I was surprised at the way in which my noble Friend treated that question. My noble Friend, in proof of the inaccuracy of the Returns, said he need only refer to the fact that several Members of Parliament representing important constituencies had, in their place in the House of Commons, stated that in reference to their own respective boroughs the Returns were most erroneous. I admit that several Members of Parliament have challenged the accuracy of these Returns as regarded their respective boroughs; but I am informed by the Department from which the Returns emanated, that, in consequence of these allegations, inquiries have been made in the specific cases referred to, and the Returns have been found perfectly accurate. The charges of inaccuracy are almost all couched in the vaguest terms, and are founded on letters of individual electors to their Members, who say that as the result of their private inquiries they have come to the conclusion that the Returns are inaccurate. I think that the statement of the public Department which has had access to the official records of the various boroughs is possessed of more authority than the unsupported assertions of any individual constituent. One alleged source of fallacy in these Returns has been pointed out more specifically. It has been said that in a very large number of boroughs the strict requirements of the law are not complied with, and that all the persons who are assessed for poor rates are not entered in the rate-books. That is perfectly true. There are, I believe, a large number of parishes and boroughs in which the system of compounding for tenancies is adopted, and in such cases the names of the tenants do not appear in the rate-book. But I can assure your Lordships, on the authority of the Poor-Law Department, that specific instructions were given to clerks of unions, who are officers of intelligence and education, that in all cases of compounded tenancies, though the names of occupants are not entered in the rate-book, the whole number of tenants of the required value should be included in the Returns. I believe that has been done in all cases, and although there may be some slight errors in the Returns, I shall be surprised if there are found to be any serious ones. In the instructions sent down to the boards of guardians great care was taken that those officers should understand the object of the Returns that were to be obtained—namely, to give Parliament as near an estimate as possible of the numbers of male occupiers of various classes of tenements. The noble Earl has referred to a noble Lord behind him (Lord Vivian) as having pointed out the incorrectness of the information procured. I can assure the noble Lord that, as far as regards the source of error that has been commonly dwelt upon, it has not been allowed to operate against the accuracy of these Returns. It is perfectly true that as elaborate Returns have not been obtained with respect to the county constituencies, as have been laid before Parliament with respect to the boroughs; but there are other means of getting access to an estimate of the county franchise. There are various Returns before Parliament from which that information can be gathered by any noble Lord who refers to them. Another reason which has prevented the Government from presenting to Parliament such full particulars with regard to the county constituencies was that a £10 franchise in counties was a prominent feature in the Reform Bill brought in by our predecessors in office. Such a franchise has been over and over again voted by the House of Commons; and, as compared with the proposed borough franchise, it is objected to by very few persons in either branch of the Legislature. Having said thus much in reference to the assent of the Government to the institution of this inquiry, and carefully guarded them from being supposed to admit it as a cause of delay in the consideration of important measures which may come up to us on the subject of reform, I should have been well content to say no more on the general question. But I am sure your Lordships will feel, after the speech of my noble Friend, that any Member of the Government who follows him would be guilty of a very grave dereliction of public duty if he allowed all that has fallen from the noble Earl to pass without some observation, or, I think I may say, without some protest. I have this difficulty in answering the remarks of my noble Friend on this question, that they appear to me so wholly wide of the mark. My noble Friend occupied the attention of the House for, nearly an hour with very interesting details of the degeneracy of the American democracy. Now, if any Bill had been introduced into Parliament by any Government proposing to lower the franchise in this country as it has been lowered in America, or proposing a system of universal suffrage and the ballot—which, by the way, is termed across the Atlantic “the sneaking ballot”—then I should willingly receive the lecture of my noble Friend as a grave argument against our measure. I have no hesitation, my Lords, in saying that I should view with the greatest possible alarm and dismay the institution of universal suffrage, especially if accompanied by the ballot. I believe they are two great instruments of modern despotism, most hostile to the liberties of mankind. I see them used all over Europe, sometimes to cajole, sometimes to terrify, the poorest and most uninstructed of men into a surrender not merely of their own liberties, but of the liberties of others who are more enlightened and more independent than themselves. But I repudiate altogether the lesson read us by my noble Friend as applicable to any measure proposed or likely to be proposed in this country by any Government. The noble Earl has intimated very clearly that he desires no change whatever in the existing constituencies of this kingdom. He is opposed, at least, to all reduction of the borough franchise. I ask my noble Friend, and I ask the House, whether that is an opinion which any Government is now in a position to act upon? His observations on this point were received, I thought, with very faint acquiescence by noble Lords opposite. I beg the House to consider what has been the history of this question, and what is the situation in regard to it in which the leading men of all parties have been placed by their course within the last ten years. It is now upwards of nine years since the First Minister of the Crown undertook to deal as a whole with the question of Parliamentary Reform. Since then we have had six successive Governments; every one of which, except the short-lived Government of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby), in 1852, has pledged itself to bring forward a measure at the earliest possible opportunity to settle, if it could, this great question. I must say I heard my noble Friend's language on this subject with astonishment. Recollecting as I do that he was himself a Member of the Liberal Government in 1852, which, on the united responsibility of the Cabinet, directed the attention of Parliament, through the Speech from the Throne, to the question of Parliamentary Reform, and which afterwards proposed a Bill to reduce the borough franchise to a £5 rating, or an amount, at the highest estimate, not differing more than 20s. from the borough franchise of the present Government—I say my noble Friend was responsible with his colleagues for that measure; and from that responsibility, let me tell him, he cannot escape. When, therefore, I hear him protesting that there is no necessity whatever for dealing with this question, or at least for dealing with it in the way of reduction, I can only ask him, "When did this conviction flash upon his mind?" He was no young and inexperienced statesman in 1852. He had had a long acquaintance with public affairs, and he knows how the decision of the Government was then brought about. [Earl GREY: Hear, hear!] I quite understand the meaning of that cheer. My noble Friend intends to intimate—what has over and over again been alleged by all the opponents of Reform—that this question has been raised through the personal indiscretion of a statesman

Earl Grey

The Duke of Argyll

who was then one of his colleagues. ["Hear, hear!"] I am astonished at that intimation from my noble Friend, for, although we may not all have been in the Cabinet of 1852, we all know, from our access to the public sources of information, what then took place. The determination of Lord John Russell's Government to deal with the question of Reform did not originate—as is sufficiently proved by the Parliamentary transactions of the period—from any personal desire of Lord John Russell to take the subject up. For what was the fact? Lord John Russell's Government was more than once defeated, if I recollect aright, on a Motion by an independent Member of Parliament—one of their own party, indeed, but unconnected with the Government—who was vigorously opposed by Lord John Russell—I mean Mr. Locke King—on this very question of a £10 franchise in counties. The Government in consequence of that vote resigned. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) was called upon to form a Ministry; and in a speech which he made in this House, stating the reasons which had induced him to relinquish the task committed to him by the Queen, he gave a long and very able analysis of the division that had occurred in the other House. He proved that Lord John Russell's Government had been placed in a minority, not by the votes of those with whom the noble Earl was politically connected, but by a majority composed of members of its own party voting against it on the question of reform. I contend this disproves the assertion of my noble Friend that this question of Reform was raised by any personal desire of Lord John Russell. It was raised by an independent Member of Parliament on the question of the £10 county franchise; and it was then felt by the independent Liberal party that the subject could not be dealt with merely incidentally or in detail; that if they touched it at all they must deal with the whole question; and the Bill of 1852 was accordingly introduced. I can only account for the change of opinion which has come over the noble Earl's mind by that long interval which separates the speculations of individuals acting in an isolated position from their convictions when Members of a Government acting together and responsible for the conduct of public affairs. What is the position in which the borough franchise stands? I have never thought that full justice was done to the Reform

Bill of the late Government ; but the greatest injustice that was done to it was inflicted by its own unnatural parent. It was most ably drawn, and conceived on distinct and definite principles. One of its most prominent features was that the Reform of Parliament should be dealt with exclusive of any lowering of the franchise. Let me quote the words of the right hon. Gentleman who introduced the measure of the late Government. Mr. Disraeli said, in introducing the Reform Bill :—

“ I am ready to admit that there are many persons quite capable of exercising the suffrage who do not live in £10 houses, and whom I should wish to see possessing the suffrage. But should we obtain that result by—I won't call it the vulgar expedient, because the epithet might be misinterpreted, though I should not use it in an offensive sense—but by the coarse and common expedient which is recommended, by what is called ‘lowering the franchise in towns?’” [3 Hansard, clii. p. 984.]

Here is another passage from the same speech :—

“ It certainly would be most injudicious, not to say intolerable, when we are guarding ourselves against the predominance of a territorial aristocracy and the predominance of a manufacturing and commercial oligarchy, that we should reform Parliament by securing the predominance of a household democracy.” [Ibid, p. 985.]

On the 31st of March, Mr. Disraeli again says :—

“ That being my opinion, I cannot look upon what is called reduction of franchise in boroughs but with alarm. I have never yet met any argument which fairly encounters the objections that are urged against it.” [3 Hansard, cliii. p. 1246.]

Now, I think that these passages of Mr. Disraeli's speech bear out the assertion I now venture to make, that one of the prominent features of that Bill—the essential feature which distinguished it from all other Bills previously introduced—was that it proposed to deal with the question of Reform somewhat in the same way as I suppose my noble Friend proposes to deal with it—without lowering the borough franchise. I do not, my Lords, in saying this, mean to throw ridicule on such a mode of procedure. The opinion may be maintained by many. I was well aware that it was maintained by Mr. Hugh Millar, whom my noble Friend has quoted to-night, and others, that the present borough franchise is low enough. We are not of that opinion. But what happened with the Bill of the late Government? I am not speaking of its treatment ab extra, but of its treatment at the hands of its own parent. During the discussions that arose in the other House of Parliament every subsequent speech of Mr. Disraeli was marked by a distinct step backward on this point. He declined to admit that it was one of the principles of his Bill. When pressed on the point he would give no definite answer. Everything was a matter of detail and to go before the Committee. That was not dealing fairly with the Bill of the late Government. Let me now direct the attention of the House to what was said by the same right hon. Gentleman when the new Parliament assembled. When the late Government was defeated on the Motion of my noble Friend Lord John Russell, the first thing they did, both in this and the other House of Parliament, was to say, “ Remember we do not go to the hustings with this Bill—we are quit of it altogether ”:—and one of the objects in being quit of it was to get rid of the mode in which it proposed to deal with the borough franchise. I can readily admit that there was a good deal of claptrap talked at the last general election ; but I may appeal to noble Lords on both sides whether, although there was no sort of democratic excitement, there was not a considerable and almost universal pressure put on all those who addressed the constituencies in regard to the question of the borough franchise, and whether Members of the Conservative party did not find it generally necessary to profess a reconsideration of their Bill in reference to the borough franchise. When the new Parliament met, a vote of want of confidence was moved, and what was the deliverance of Mr. Disraeli on this most significant of all heads? He was then combating the vote of want of confidence. He had been speaking of the £10 county franchise, and he says :—

“ The question of the borough franchise was not in that condition of maturity. Until the last great debate that question has never been thoroughly grappled with in this House. It has never been brought forward by persons of any eminence, nor has it at any time attracted or commanded much attention. Well, in that direction we proceeded very cautiously, as you must do with that part of a subject for which the public mind is not so ripe as for the other. . . . I am perfectly ready to admit, on the part of the Government, that that proposition was not favoured by this House, nor was it sufficiently favoured by the country to be one upon which we can insist. The question of the borough franchise, however, must be dealt with, and it must be dealt with, too, with reference to the introduction of the working classes. We admit that that has been the opinion of Parliament, and that it has been the opinion of the country as shown by the hon. Gentlemen who have been returned to this House. . . . We are perfectly prepared to deal with that question of the borough franchise and the introduction of the working classes by lowering the franchise in boroughs, and by acting in that direction with sincerity, because, as I ventured to observe in the debate upon our measure, if you intend to admit the working classes to the franchise by lowering the suffrage in boroughs, you must not keep the promise to the ear and break it to the hope. The lowering of the suffrage must be done in a manner which satisfactorily and completely effects your object, and is at the same time consistent with maintaining the institutions of the country.”—[3 Hansard, cliv. p. 139.]

Now, I ask my noble Friend, considering all that has taken place on this question; considering the measure for which he himself was responsible; considering the pledges which every Government have been obliged to take; considering the course taken by the Conservative party, and the manner in which they have struck their flag upon this question—does he think it possible that any Government could bring in a Reform Bill that does not deal with the borough franchise? And is there, after all, anything so very dreadful in this lowering of the borough franchise to a moderate degree? There seems to be a theory now prevailing in some quarters, which I apprehend is quite a new one—that society is stratified in horizontal lines, each layer wholly distinct and even opposite to the next; and as in nature different strata, though in close contact, are yet separated from each other by innumerable ages, so all classes that lie below the present constituency are wholly separated from them in feeling, thought, and aspiration; that they are arrayed against their fellow citizens above them, hostile to the institutions of the State, jealous of the rich, and would interfere with the rights of property and the other constitutional principles on which the liberties of England depend. I ask, is there any foundation whatever for this theory in the actual life of England? When you come to deal with the artisans and lower classes of the country, do you find that they are animated by this spirit of hostility to you and your institutions? I saw in the public papers not long ago, at a great Conservative dinner given to the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) at Liverpool, Lord Stanley was reported to have given distinct utterance to this sentiment, which I believe to be true, that the working classes of this country are mainly Conservative in their disposition. And, if that is really your belief, why such a horror of lowering the borough franchise? My noble Friend talked as if the proposition of the Government was to introduce into this country the mere despotism of numbers. Why, the whole question is the lowering the borough franchise by 80s. It is quite preposterous, I say, then, to address lectures to this House on democracy in America, as if we were going to introduce universal suffrage accompanied by the ballot—of which I, too, have a great horror, although I question if the effects of such a measure would be as terrible as my noble Friend appears to imagine. A very remarkable inquiry was moved for by my noble Friend (Earl Grey) during the last Session of Parliament on the subject of the municipal franchise, with a view to its effect on the discussions likely to take place in reference to the Parliamentary franchise. I shall beg your Lordships' attention to some of the facts which came out in the course of that investigation. It appears, by what I really believe was a mistake of the intention of Parliament, a system of very nearly universal suffrage, as regards the municipal franchise, was introduced into many boroughs; and my noble Friend represented that this had been productive of very serious inconvenience where it had come into operation. The Committee appointed at my noble Friend's instigation reported fully. The balance of evidence was, I think, in favour of my noble Friend's assertion, that serious inconvenience had arisen in several boroughs of England; that at Newcastle and other towns bribery and corruption had taken place at municipal elections: but I should explain that the class of voters in these towns is of the very lowest kind. But, after all, this inconvenience was trifling as compared with that we might have expected from the theory I am now venturing to combat, of the hostility of the various classes to each other. Some very remarkable evidence was given in this Report, to which I wish to call your Lordships' attention, with regard to the borough franchise. The Report most probably was drawn up by my noble Friend. I find in the Report to which I refer a passage to the effect that the higher order of artisan is to a man quite as intelligent and independent as the smaller shopkeepers, who, generally speaking, occupy dwellings of which the rates are paid by the landlord. The Report goes on to say that any measure which would disfranchise such men would deprive the electoral body of a valuable and respectable

The Duke of Argyll

ble element. The question was put by the noble Earl to several witnesses what line they would propose to draw with the view of securing in the respective constituencies the higher and better class of artisans, and for the purpose of excluding the very poor classes; and I find on looking through their evidence that almost every one of them fixed upon a £6 or a £7, and in some instances on a £5 rental as representing the points at which this line ought to be drawn, to admit the higher class of artisans and exclude the lower classes. Is this evidence which my noble Friend seeks to ignore in dealing with the question of the borough franchise? The line fixed upon by the Government is that which the Committee recommended. They have taken a £6 franchise; and in doing so they have, I believe, adopted a perfectly safe course, inasmuch as they will thereby be admitting to the exercise of the franchise that class of artisans who are by no means a lawless or reckless body of men, but who are, on the contrary, as intelligent and quite as well fitted to possess the suffrage as the smaller class of shopkeepers, and quite as independent in many towns. Now, my noble Friend also spoke this evening as if the constituencies which would be created by an uniform franchise would be in themselves necessarily of an uniform character. I must, however, contend that he could give expression to no greater fallacy. The statement of the noble Earl would not be correct even if it were confined to the case of a £6 franchise in any one town. A £6 householder in the Tower Hamlets, for instance, occupies a position entirely different from a £6 householder in Marylebone, and the same observation applies with equal justice to the east and west ends of Manchester. But if this be true of individual towns it may be still more fairly said with respect to the different boroughs which are scattered over the face of the country, some of which are of a purely agricultural character; that is to say, whose artisans and shopkeepers have relations rather with the neighbouring county gentlemen and farmers than with the manufacturing class, while the relations of others stand upon the contrary footing. When, therefore, my noble Friend seeks to secure variety by means of a varying franchise he seems to forget to take into account the different effects which will be produced on different parts of England by a franchise uniform in itself. Instead of uniformity I contend that the result would be that Members would be sent to the House of Commons representing every variety of interests. The House will, I hope, excuse me for having trespassed so long upon their attention, but I could not, as a Member of the Government, deem it to be consistent with my duty to sit down without entering my protest against the doctrines which the noble Earl has this evening laid down. I may, perhaps, before resuming my seat, be permitted to say a few words with regard to the question of delay. The noble Earl in the commencement of his speech intimated that the Reform Bill had hitherto made slow progress in the other House of Parliament, and implied that this delay was owing to the dislike of the measure which there prevailed. My noble Friend has, however, omitted, in dealing with that part of the subject, to lay before the House two most important facts, the first of which is that the discussion of the Bill has, perhaps unfortunately, but certainly unavoidably, been retarded in consequence of the fact that it was brought forward concurrently with a financial scheme of unusual importance. He forgot, in the second place, to mention that the Conservative party in the House of Commons announced it to be their intention not to oppose the second reading of a measure the principle of which might be regarded as having already received the sanction of the Legislature. Under these circumstances I do not think that my noble Friend is justified in supposing that it is not the desire of the leading men of all parties that the settlement of the question of Reform should be effected during the present Session, and by means of the present Bill. Nor can I too earnestly impress upon your Lordships the conviction that serious complications may arise from postponing that settlement. Such a course may prove dangerous to the constitution, and could not be otherwise than injurious to the character of our public men. Their sincerity in dealing with this important question is already becoming suspected, and a contrast is drawn by the journals of the day between the professions with regard to it which they make at general elections, and the language which they make use of in their places in Parliament. Do you desire, then, to defer all decisive action in the matter until the country becomes the scene of widespread agitation, or is it not rather your wish to set it at rest at a moment when you may do so without being influenced by undue external pressure? I entertain no doubt as to the answer which ought to be returned to such a question; and I trust now that we have before Parliament a measure of Reform which, in its main features, is not essentially distinct from that of the late Government, a sufficient degree of public spirit and a sufficient absence of acrimony will be manifested on the part of the majority in both branches of the Legislature to enable us, if not to pass the Bill in its present shape, at all events, to fix upon the amount of the franchise in boroughs and counties to which we shall be prepared to assent. I shall only add that it is the sincere wish of Her Majesty's Government that this question should be kept no longer—to use the phrase of the noble Earl—"dangling" before the House and the country, but that it should be settled in a manner consistent with the increased political liberty of the people, and at the same time, with the due maintenance of our political institutions.

LORD VIVIAN said, he did not rise to address their Lordships on this question; but reference having been made to a letter which he had received, he begged to say that the person who wrote that letter was a person on whose ability and accuracy he could rely. The writer of the letter was the clerk of a particular union in the county, and contained the following passage:—

"Since I had the conversation with your Lordship on the subject of my return to the Poor Law Board I have revised it, and find it to be strictly correct. On the face of the rates there would appear to be an addition of 55 electors, but, as the gross estimated rental in the Bodmin rate is 20 per cent below the actual rent, the addition would really be much greater. Mr. Bray, the town clerk, tells me that he has gone through the rates of Bodmin borough and parish with the overseers, and that eighty at least would be added to the constituency under the £6 rental franchise. This would be just double the number given in the printed Report. As I made all the necessary deductions before my Return was forwarded to the Poor Law Board, I am at a loss to conceive why 20 per cent has been since deducted from the number on the rates."

THE EARL OF DERBY: I cannot, my Lords, but apprehend, after what has fallen from the noble Duke who has just addressed you, and who deprecates the introduction of acrimony into this discussion so strongly, that he and the other Members of Her Majesty's Government are not even yet sufficiently impressed with the vast importance of this subject, and that the noble Duke himself, more especially in the speech which we have this evening heard from him, and by the reference which he has made to the conduct of former Ministers, is less desirous—or would, at all events appear to be less desirous—to arrive at an amicable and satisfactory settlement of this question than of keeping alive the spirit of party agitation, and seeking to throw upon the shoulders of his political opponents that which, according to him, is the invidious task which he and his colleagues have very reluctantly undertaken. The noble Duke has favoured us with his historical reminiscences; and though my recollection extends a good deal further back than that of the noble Duke, the noble Duke has one advantage over me, because, I cannot, of course, presume to enter into any discussion of those mysterious conversations, and those various inducements which were held forth at the time when the noble Duke was a Member of the Cabinet, and of which I know nothing, but which led to the original introduction of the Reform Bill.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I alluded to what took place in Lord John Russell's Cabinet in 1852, of which I certainly was not a member.

THE EARL OF DERBY: At what period in 1852?

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I think I am right in stating that the first Reform Bill of Lord John Russell was introduced in the month of February, 1852.

THE EARL OF DERBY: In extremis?

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: Possibly.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I merely wish to say, in answer to the noble Duke, that he need not have reminded us of the special inducements under which particular Members of the Cabinet were led to sanction the propositions which he has taunted the noble Earl with having assented to. I do not know anything of them; I do not pretend to know—I do not wish to know—anything in reference to them. But he has gone further, and he has certainly surprised the House by one fact—which, as it has been stated by the noble Duke, I must assume to be a fact—namely, that Lord John Russell, of all men in the world, was extremely unwilling to deal with the question of Parliamentary Reform, that he, to the best of his power, resisted the reduction of the county franchise to £10, and that he was opposed to the measures which afterwards he certainly proposed. Lord John Russell was dragged, a reluctant victim to circumstances, bound to the chariot wheels of a triumphant Parliament.

The Duke of Argyll

tary majority; and so, contrary to his own earnest desires, at variance with his own cherished opinions on the subject, Lord John Russell became a convert to the principles of further Parliamentary Reform. Perhaps some few years hence we may find the noble Duke himself assenting to the principle of universal suffrage and vote by ballot, which he says, much as he dislikes it, is not altogether so bad as it is represented. The noble Duke, I know not why, has thought fit to deal with the measure proposed by the late Government, and the terms and conditions on which that Bill was introduced; and, little as I desire, and still less as I expected, that any such discussion would have been forced on us, I am not unwilling to meet the noble Duke on that ground, and to state precisely the course Her Majesty's Government then took, and which they thought best adapted for the final settlement of the question. The noble Duke has stated, not quite correctly, that on the first entry of that Government into office, I pledged myself to the introduction of a measure of Parliamentary Reform. I carefully guarded myself against giving any such pledge. But I did pledge myself that during the recess Her Majesty's then Ministers would devote their best attention to the consideration of that very difficult question, with the hope that, if there was public feeling such as we trusted to find at both sides of the House, we should be able to submit a measure, which, if it failed to satisfy the extremes of either party, would receive the sanction and support of all moderate men. I stated at the time that I was induced to take this course, not by any conviction in my own mind that for practical purposes an alteration of the existing system of representation was positively called for, but by the fact that successive Ministries had pledged what might be considered the honour of the Crown—had pledged the Crown in person—to an attempt to settle the existing difficulties. Accepting the responsibility of that promise, and trusting we might be met in a spirit of fairness and generosity, I endeavoured—without a sense of its intrinsic necessity, but I hope I need not say I honestly endeavoured—to redeem the pledge which had been bequeathed to us by our predecessors. I was glad to hear from the noble Duke opposite that justice has not been done to the merits of that Bill. Its history is fresh in the recollection of your Lordships, and I need not remind you of the course which the discussion took. The noble Duke has taken the opportunity of referring to speeches made prior to the dissolution by my right hon. Friend who then filled the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Disraeli); and he has quoted passages in which he stated that it was necessary to deal with this question with a view to the representation, more or less, of a portion of the working classes of this country. That representation we endeavoured honestly to secure, without the injurious consequences which, as I believe, are involved in the measure of Her Majesty's present Government. We did not think it was desirable or expedient that the borough franchise should be reduced generally below £10, so as to create that flood of the lower class of voters which would be introduced if the present Bill should unhappily receive the sanction of your Lordships and of Parliament. I acknowledge that Parliament differed from us on that ground; but we thought it was a matter of no insignificant importance to secure it by the identification of the borough and country franchise. The material distinctions between these have been already so far done away with that they can hardly be said to subsist in practice; and therefore in reducing the county franchise to the same amount as that in boroughs, where we declined to lower it, we acted on the opinion, which I hold now, that identity of the franchise affords the best security against future agitations for the reduction either of one or of the other. I was very much struck with what took place in the course of the elections which followed the overthrow of the Government. To the circumstances under which that overthrow took place I will not now recur. We had been in hopes that our propositions would have met with fair and candid consideration; that if the Bill, to a great extent, had met the views of hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House they would have been willing to sanction the second reading, and to discuss with us in Committee what seemed to them most to require amendment. The noble Duke thinks this a fitting occasion to taunt us as if we had abandoned the views which we entertained, though all our efforts were directed to prevent the agitation of these questions before the time at which they would properly come on for consideration. And how was that measure met? Not even by moving Amendments, or by stating the objections which they might entertain; but, for the purpose of escaping from the necessity of moving Amendments, it was met by an abstract Resolution, such as we know noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen opposite are very well practised in laying down, but which on certain questions they subsequently find it absolutely impossible to adhere to. By that ungenerous device, aided by concert with other parties, and by an understanding, in which, if we are to believe what is passing at present, one of the parties seems to have been very much deceived as to the intentions of the Government, a narrow and small majority was given to the Opposition. An appeal to the country followed, the result of which undoubtedly was to return a House of Commons which did not approach the discussion of specific principles, but in a mere party fight between opposing bodies, gave on a vote of want of confidence a majority which was certainly not large, but was still sufficient to overthrow the Government and to change the hands in which power had been deposited. During the elections I was much struck by a speech made by the right hon. Gentleman who now fills the office of Secretary of State for the Home Department, (Sir G. C. Lewis) in which there was a great deal of very good sense, on which I hoped Her Majesty's present Government were about to act. In that speech the right hon. Gentleman declared his opinion that under the circumstances of the case it was matter of absolute necessity that any person or any Government who proposed to bring in a Reform Bill should distinctly point out to the House the points as to which, in the opinion of the Government, there existed a necessity of Reform, the specific defects in the former Reform Bill which required to be corrected, the points in which it had failed to answer the expectations of its promoters, and in what respects it had failed to satisfy the just expectations of the country; and having thus realized the difficulties of the case and perceived what were the defects of the former Bill, they should apply the provisions of the new Bill to remedy those defects, and should be able to point out what specific remedy they were prepared to prescribe for the objections which had been raised. When it was first announced that Her Majesty's present Government intended to introduce a measure of Parliamentary Reform to satisfy the just expectations of the country, and above all, to comply with the wise recommendations of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, I went down, I confess, with great anxiety and the deepest interest to the place into which, by the courtesy of the House of Commons, your Lordships are permitted when discussions are taking place. Of course, I am precluded from referring in the slightest degree to what I heard in that place. On going into the House, as I recollected the same great actor performing the same great part twenty-five years previously, I certainly was considerably struck with the very altered condition of the benches and the galleries as compared with what I recollected them on the occasion to which the noble Lord specifically called our attention by saying that he would bring forward this Reform Bill on a day that was not without its significance, namely, the 1st of March. If by significance be meant the significance of contrast, certainly no day could be better devised, if he proposed to compare the 1st of March, 1831, with the 1st of March, 1860. I said I would not refer to what I heard fall from the noble Lord in the discussion; but as by an habitual breach of privilege we are enabled to obtain some information as to what takes place in this and the other House of Parliament, I can entirely corroborate, by my own personal testimony, the accuracy of those statements by which we were enabled the next day to collect what were the views of Her Majesty's Government in introducing this measure, and by what principles they intended to be guided. I must confess—if I am not speaking disrespectfully of the House of Commons—that the tone of the debate appeared more to resemble the discussion on a Turnpike Bill than that on a measure of Parliamentary Reform; and I cannot say that the mode in which this great scheme was brought under the consideration of the House was such as to bespeak for it very grave consideration or to lead to the expectation that it would be soon and satisfactorily settled. As far as I could collect the opinions of the Government on the following day, it did not appear that any consideration pressed upon their minds beyond the number of persons that would have to be added to the constituencies to redeem the pledge which had been given. No effort was made to point out the specific defects of the present system; there were no attempts to show that under the existing system many persons properly qualified by intelligence, by position, and by capacity for exercising the franchise, were improperly excluded from it, while others, inferior to them in every respect, enjoyed, or rather possessed that privilege. And there is one point on which, I confess, I am not prepared to go with the noble Duke; it is the appreciation he appears to attach to the possession of the franchise. The main object of the franchise is to secure the representative body that may best conduct the government of the country; that object must be attained mainly by the quality of the constituencies and the votes of those who can wisely and judiciously, freely and independently, exercise their privilege. It was impossible for us not to see that there were large classes who, by the provisions of the last Reform Bill, confining the vote to £10 householders, were altogether excluded from the franchise, though perfectly qualified and fully entitled to possess it; and it was very important they should be added to the constituency, whatever their number. By a variety of franchises we thought we should add to the constituencies, not the whole body of the working classes, but a considerable number of them, applying sufficient tests to show that they were the most steady, intelligent, and industrious, as well as the least improvident of their class—the least migratory, and having the deepest interest in the locality, and in the general welfare of the country. To that class we were willing and anxious to extend the franchise; and now I hope the noble Duke will understand in what sense we were willing and anxious to admit the working classes to a fair share of the representation. We proposed to give the franchise to persons who for a certain time had occupied furnished or unfurnished lodgings, often at a considerable amount of rent. This lodger franchise would also have included many industrious mechanics and artisans, as well as many persons of education, property, and intelligence, very superior to several classes which now possess the franchise, and who, merely because they are not £10 householders, are now, to a great extent, excluded from the exercise of the privilege. We proposed also that the possession of a certain amount of personal property, of deposits to a certain amount in a savings bank, should constitute a claim to the franchise. In short, we were desirous to give a right to the elective franchise to every one who could show he had a permanent stake in the country, and from whose character and mode of life we had reason to believe he would exercise the privilege honestly, temperately, and judiciously, and to the best of his ability. These were the principles for which we contended; and when the present Bill was introduced I hoped to hear that where we had fallen short of expectation, or where our measure left any practical difficulty or grievance, to those difficulties and grievances a remedy had been applied. But all I heard with regard to the franchise was this—that the number of the constituencies must be increased. Now, except so far as the increase may have an undue influence on the present constituencies, the number of the electors is the least important point. It is the quality of the constituencies that is important. If you have a properly qualified constituency—whether it is 200,000 or 500,000, or even 1,000,000,—the mere question of numbers is the least important at all. You may add 1,000,000 to the constituencies so that the quality be irreproachable. But the only question that appears to have entered the minds of Her Majesty's Government is, by what reduction of the franchise could they obtain a given number of electors? In introducing the Bill the only argument of the Government was this,—looking at the boroughs, a £9 franchise will give so many votes; an £8 franchise so many more; a £7 so many more; and by a £6 franchise we shall obtain exactly 203,000 additional votes. That is literally all the argument of the Government; it took a £6 qualification because it would give 203,000 votes, neither more nor less. If that is the only argument on which the £6 qualification is to be adopted by the House of Commons, then the inquiry asked for by the noble Earl, and which I am gratified to hear will be acceded to by the Government, though under some pressure.—[The Duke of ARGYLL: No pressure.] No pressure! Very well; but I was about to say that if the main argument for the Bill is that these 203,000 voters will be no undue augmentation of the constituencies, then it is important to ascertain what may be the probable result of the extension. And I am afraid, when we come to examine, we shall find Her Majesty's Government has no very accurate foundation for the estimate it has submitted. The noble Duke says the Government consents to this Committee of Inquiry under no pressure, that it is voluntarily conceded, and that the subject deserves investigation. I think Her Majesty's Government must have some doubts on their own minds whether their data are as clear as they are supposed to be, and whether there is not room for further inquiry into the practical results of the measure they have proposed. Then the noble Duke says the Committee is conceded on the understanding that it is not proposed for the purpose of delay. I am quite prepared to say that the Committee will not be used for the mere purpose of delay; but if the noble Duke supposes that, whatever the degree of progress made in the inquiry, legislation on this subject is, nevertheless, to go on, then Her Majesty's Government is placed in a position I cannot comprehend. The investigation is either intended to satisfy the mind of Parliament or resolve the doubts of the Government as to the accuracy of its own data; the noble Duke himself thinks it likely to be useful. Useful for what? For the purpose of determining whether this measure ought to receive the sanction of this and the other House of Parliament. You are not asking for the inquiry merely for your own information and instruction; the investigation is intended to ascertain whether a certain measure can be wisely, safely, and judiciously adopted by Parliament. Then, I say, if Parliament passes the measure, and the Committee continues its inquiry, Parliament, after it has passed it, may receive a Report stating that the Bill has been sanctioned on erroneous data, and is a dangerous measure. The Report of the Committee may condemn a measure you have already passed. I earnestly hope the House of Commons will take full time to consider the data that may be laid before the Committee. The loss of one Session, or even of two Sessions, would be more than adequately compensated by the certainty of proceeding on sound data, and knowing the probable consequences of the measure. On a subject important enough in itself, but insignificant in comparison with this—the system of purchase in the army—I was glad to hear my right hon. Friend the Secretary for War declare that the Government did not intend to proceed one inch beyond the stage of which they could clearly see the effect and consequences. I only hope he has inculcated the same caution on his colleagues with regard to this far more important question. The inquiry of this Committee may tend to throw light upon a subject which is at present in great darkness, and enable us to judge how far we can adopt a proposition which has been very imperfectly and unsatisfactorily laid before us. I should deprecate it as a great misfortune if this House should be under the necessity of rejecting a measure sent up by the House of Commons, or, by important modifications of it, seek to force upon the House of Commons provisions which they did not approve. I do not mean to say that the question does not vitally affect your Lordships. It affects the whole country generally—it affects the whole constitution; but it is important that the main provisions of a measure which relates directly to the representation of the other House should be introduced with the sanction of that House. Still, whatever may be the objections to a modification or rejection, if this Bill were to come up to your Lordships in its present state, with its present simple provisions—simple they are called, and simple they are, undoubtedly, in one sense, but most dangerous they will be found—I should think its rejection for the purpose of further consideration infinitely preferable to the adoption of a measure, the most unstatesmanlike, the most unconstitutional, and the most inconclusive of any which has been submitted by any Government on this important subject. My Lords, without impugning the motives of the Government, or imputing to them or the persons employed by them any wish to deceive, we deny altogether the accuracy of the Returns which have been submitted to Parliament, and we are prepared to show that in regard to many boroughs they are notoriously erroneous. Every day almost I receive letters from persons offering evidence to show that such is the case in regard to this borough or that. That is a point which ought to be fairly and carefully inquired into, and the Committee might very advantageously make the inquiry. But, even admitting the Government Returns to be correct, what is the alteration which they are about to make? According to those Returns, the number of borough voters is now 440,000; to this it is proposed to make a gross addition of 240,000. Allowing a deduction of 20 per cent, there is a net addition of 203,000. That may seem to be an unimportant addition, but you will recollect that there is a very small addition to the metropolitan constituencies. Deducting the metropolitan and University constituencies from the whole body, the number of the present constituency is 288,540, and to this you are about to add 203,000. Therefore, according to the Government Returns, you are about to make an addition of 5.7ths to the existing constituencies; and the whole of this addition is not to be taken, as was proposed in our measure, from a number of classes, some higher and some lower, but all from the very lowest class, from the very lowest scale of voters. Of this gross addition of 254,000 not more than one-third are between £8 and £10 householders; the other two-thirds are between £6 and £8. If we are to assume, as I am afraid we must, that the lower we go in the scale of voters, the greater is the risk of a want of judgment, a want of due appreciation of the vote—of a liability to undue influence and corruption—then I say that, on the Government's own showing, the change which they propose is sufficiently important to make us pause and consider before we admit so large an infusion of what I must call, without offence, the democratic element into the House of Commons. But, if the information which reaches me is anything like correct, the numbers mentioned by the Government afford no just view of the real state of the case. The increase of 203,000 of which they speak, according to some, must be more than double; and no statement which I have heard places the addition which ought to be made to it at less than 50 per cent. And recollect that this addition is not made equally over the whole constituencies of the country. There are more than thirty towns in which, even assuming the correctness of the Government figures, the addition to the existing constituencies would range from 100 to 380 per cent. How is it possible to argue that these boroughs will not be in the possession and under the control of the very lowest class of voters; and that that which has happened by the reduction of the municipal franchise will happen also in regard to the Parliamentary franchise—that parties who have no concern whatever in the expenditure will be those who will virtually regulate taxation? Consequently, even if you have no corruption, if you have none of those scenes which the noble Earl opposite has so forcibly described as the result of a low franchise in the United States, you will, at any rate, set an irresistible temptation before the lowest class of voters to tax for their own benefit, with an ignorant prodigality of which no judgment can be formed, those higher classes whom they erroneously suppose to be the authors of the great expenditure. The noble Duke reminded us—and I can assure him there was no danger of our forgetting it—that this Reform Bill which is to give this great power to the lower classes is introduced simultaneously with an important Budget, I must say that the very fact of the simultaneous introduction of the two measures requires double caution from Parliament before taking the irrevocable step which is proposed to us. The noble Duke thinks that the noble Earl who introduced this Motion—in my opinion with much moderation, judgment, and power—went out of his way to point out the dangers which have resulted in the United States from the preponderance of the lower order of voters. But is that warning wholly to be thrown away in considering a Reform Bill for this country? Have we not those among us, exercising great influence over this very low class of voters, whose boast is that they desire to Americanize our institutions? Have we not too much sanction given by high authority, as connected with the Budget and prospective finance, to the notion that the present taxation presses too heavily upon the lower classes and too lightly upon the higher? Have we not heard rejoicing at the anticipated success of the Budget, on the ground that if we need to make any effort at any future time, either for defence or to carry on a war, the expense must fall upon the rich few and not on the many poor? and was not the impossibility of raising sufficient sums by direct taxation for military operations referred to with exultation, as being an important result of this valuable Budget? And now you are asked to give to a class of voters most likely to be under such influences a preponderating control over the finances of the country, at the very moment when such a Budget is introduced, and when the deficiency, too, promises to be even more serious next year than it has proved this present year. Nay, more; it was stated by the Government that we ought to leave financial questions to the unbiassed decision of the new Parliament. Is not that a reason why we should not constitute the new Parliament in such a manner that it will be open to those influences and temptations which are most likely to surround it? And is it an imaginary danger, when we are told by those who boast of their influence over the large body of non-electors, that their power will so far preponderate as to render any increase of revenue, except by direct taxation, wholly impossible, that this measure will cramp the resources, fetter the energies, and do away with the military power of the country? That alone is reason enough for a severe examination into the accuracy of the data and the amount of power which the Government are about to throw into the hands of a portion of the community whose loyalty and good feeling I do not doubt, but whose proneness to be acted upon by interested agitators, and whose inability to form a just view of political subjects, I venture, with all respect to their many virtues, greatly to fear and regret. I will only revert to one point with regard to the accuracy or inaccuracy of these Returns. It seems to be supposed that the discrepancy between the number of electors and the number of houses affording a qualification is because the persons for whom a composition is made do not appear. That is not the fallacy in the Return to which I wish to refer. But there are two fallacies which the noble Duke will see at once go to the very root of the basis which the Government have taken for their measure. Your Lordships will recollect that the argument of the Government is that only a certain number will be added to the present amount of electors. Two questions then arise:—What is the present amount? and, What is the number about to be added? For the purpose of ascertaining the present number of electors the Government have taken the parochial registers. Now, these registers do not give the number of electors, but they do give the number of names. Consequently, if one name is repeated half-a-dozen times, it represents five more electors than is really the fact. I apprehend that no means have been taken by which that fallacy has been avoided. The Return certainly gives the names, and not the present number of electors. That is the less important fallacy of the two. The more important is this:—the Government have taken as their data the gross estimated rental, and have obtained Returns of the houses the gross estimated rental of which is £10 and upwards, £9, £8, £7, £6, and so on. By-the-by, the Government have a Return of the Houses the gross estimated rental of which is £5, and I should very much like to see it, for the reason which I am about to state. The gross estimated rental is taken as the basis on which the Government proceed, making a deduction of 20 per cent for tenements occupied by women and unoccupied. But though the gross estimated rental is taken for the purpose of rating, it is not the rental value, and it is notoriously, upon an average, 20 per cent below the rent actually paid. The qualification is not upon the gross estimated value, but on the actual rent which each individual can prove to the Revising Barrister that he pays. It has been found that in many cases persons rated at a gross estimated value of less than £10 are electors, because they can prove they are paying above £10, and that is the only mode in which to account for the fact that the registered electors are greater in number in some boroughs than the total number of £10 qualifying houses—because a few free-men or a few freeholders will not account for the discrepancy. If that is so, it is very likely a £5 or a £4 gross estimated rental will make a voter under a £6 qualification, and I should like, therefore, to see what is the Return which the Government have in their possession of the gross estimated rentals of £5. I know they have it. I know at least that they sent for it, and I can only suppose that they do not produce it because they are relying on the accuracy of their calculations, and, as they do not propose less than a £6 qualification they do not think it necessary to give the Return lower. But if an estimated value of £4 or £5 should give, as is very likely, votes under a £6 qualification, the Return may, perhaps, astonish Her Majesty's Government, and supply facts of which they are not at present aware. I am sorry that the observations of the noble Duke should have led me into so detailed a discussion of the operation of a measure which is not actually before us. But I do think it is of great importance that Parliament should not legislate upon this subject without full and accurate data, more especially seeing that there is no great public impatience; that, provided Parliament is seen to be dealing honestly with the question, there is no danger of any great or serious agitation, and that there is no deep anxiety among large classes of the community for any great alteration of the existing system; and, moreover, seeing that there is the utmost apprehension of the consequences among the more respectable even of the lower class of existing voters, I do think it is a matter of the deepest importance that there should be a full, searching, and impartial inquiry before the Committee moved for by the noble Earl. I hope that whatever time may be occupied by the Committee in bond fide inquiries, the Government will not attempt to force through, in ignorance of facts which are necessary for our proper judgment, a measure, whether for weal or woe, the most important which has ever been submitted to Parliament, and which, in its present state, I am painfully convinced is likely to endanger the whole balance of the constitution, to return a House of Commons irreconcilably at variance with this House, and to lead to perpetual collisions between the two Houses, which it is the bounden duty of every Minister to keep in harmonious action. If, unhappily, the Bill, unguarded by other provisions, should pass, and a preponderance of power be given to one class, I fear that the result will be not only to unsettle the constitution of the country, but either to make your Lordships' House a permanent obstruction to the legislation of the Lower House, or to sweep it away altogether, and with it to sweep away the Monarchy and our most cherished institutions. I do not say this to prevent its adoption after full discussion, if it be wise and practicable, but because it is of vital consequence that no step, which must be irrevocable, should be unadvisedly taken in a matter of such deep importance.

The Earl of Derby

The Earl of Derby

The Earl of Derby

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I have carefully listened to the three speeches which have been made this evening. The speech of the noble Earl who opened the discussion was moderate and philosophical, but it was certainly equally applicable against the Bill which became law in 1832. There was one argument which the noble Earl addressed to the opposite side of the House, which I can hardly think likely to have much effect. One of the disastrous consequences which we are told will follow if we lower the franchise too much, is that we shall have a Legislature that will have recourse to protective duties. I do not believe that if we went much lower than is proposed, such would be the result; but it is a singular argument to address to a party who have only very recently been converted from the doctrines of protection. I regret, also, the very strong attack made by the noble Earl upon the institutions of America, and am afraid that, coming from so distinguished a Member of the Upper House of this country, it will produce much irritation in the minds of the people of the United States. I agree in some of the remarks which he made, although generally they were much exaggerated; but the adoption of such a constitution as that of the United States is very different from the moderate extension of the franchise which has been proposed in this country. The noble Earl, as an instance of the injurious effects of democratic institutions, referred to the corruption by which Railway

Bills had been promoted in one of the States; but I am afraid our own early legislation in such matters was not so entirely pure and free from reproach, as to justify us in attributing the bribery in America solely to the democratic character of the Government. I was surprised to hear the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) accuse my noble Friend (the Duke of Argyll) of having indulged in acrimonious language. In the whole of that able and closely-reasoned speech, I did not, for my own part, hear a single phrase fall from him to which that epithet could be justly applied. My noble Friend, it is true, quoted Hansard; and it is sometimes very disagreeable to remind noble Lords of what they and members of their party have formerly said; but he did so only in a historical way, for the purpose of showing how public men on both sides of the House have gradually arrived at the conclusion which Her Majesty's Government have now adopted. The noble Earl opposite has given us an account of his own conduct in connection with the Reform Bill of the late Government. He has made the very singular acknowledgment that when he, as the Prime Minister of this country, introduced his Reform Bill into Parliament, he entertained at the same time the deliberate and clear conviction, that such a measure was unnecessary. It is also not a little remarkable that the very strong declaration made by Mr. Disraeli, as leader of the House of Commons, on the part of the late Government, that it was necessary to deal with the lowering of the franchise in boroughs, should have remained uncontradicted and unqualified, so as to have its full effect on the vote of the House, and that the noble Earl should now tell us it was then, and is still, his firm conviction, that the only sound principle to be adopted is the maintenance of the two franchises on an equality. The noble Earl then made an attack on the principle of the Bill which has been introduced by the present Government. It is, however, quite irregular to discuss a Bill not before us, and I do not think it desirable to do so; but, as the noble Earl asserted that the Government, determined to get a large quantity of new voters, had gone down as low as they could to catch hold of them, I feel bound to state the principle upon which we have proceeded. Considering the great spread of intelligence of late years among the population of this country, the Government are of opinion that it is desirable to extend the franchise to a number of persons who may usefully exercise it. Entirely disagreeing with the view that as long as a man is well governed he has no interest in having his humble share in the Government of the country, and holding that an element of strength is added to the Constitution when all those who are capable of exercising the franchise properly are allowed to do so, we have thought it desirable to see how far down we can go, without producing that enormous increase of numbers which would swamp the other interests of the country. Both the noble Earl, who moved for the Committee, and the noble Earl opposite, say that we have gone too far. The noble Earl opposite, however, should recollect that, according to the admission of Mr. Disraeli, his own Bill would have increased the constituency of the country by something like half a million. The noble Earl said that, arguing from the returns of the Government, we proposed too large an increase of the constituency, but that he had reason to believe the Returns were altogether inaccurate. I can only repeat what has been already said, that the Government believe that they are as accurate as it is possible for Returns of that description to be. I will not go into details, which had better be left to the Committee to inquire into; but I may say, in answer to the noble Earl, that very generally the gross estimated rental is the actual rental paid. The noble Earl regards the willingness of the Government to agree to this Committee as an acknowledgment of our guilt; but our object is simply to satisfy those who question the accuracy of our Returns that their suspicions are groundless, and that we have framed our measure neither on erroneous nor insufficient data. I would ask the noble Earl whether, when he was eloquently advocating the Reform Bill of 1832, he had in any degree as distinct a notion of what would be the result of the extension of the franchise as we have in regard to the present measure? The Government consent to the appointment of this Committee with the most sincere desire to meet the wishes of those who are anxious to procure full and accurate information on this important subject; and any Returns which are in our possession, or which we can obtain, shall be unreservedly at the use of the Committee. I am not clear, however, that any great political advantage will be derived from this Committee; and I wish the noble Earl had explained more fully the manner in which the evidence required is to be procured. Much of it will, of course, consist merely of copies of rate-books and other official records; but a portion of it will take the shape of estimates, and the mode in which such estimates are to be formed seems a difficult point. I am not sorry that the Committee has been moved for, but there is much in the general tone of the speeches on the subject which I certainly do regret. The noble Earl, in deprecating the language employed in treating of the question of Reform, alluded, I understood, to what had been said by one speaker who has expressed his views of the effect of Parliamentary Reform on the financial arrangements of the country. Now, I believe that speaker to be a very earnest and sincere man, although I disagree with many of the views which he holds, and among others his representation of the aristocracy as selfish, illiberal, and opposed to the popular feeling. I believe that representation has made no impression on the public—it has fallen flat on the public ear, because hitherto they have seen reason to believe the contrary. But I must say I can hardly understand any course more likely to strengthen the hands of anybody who wishes to create a prejudice against the aristocracy than for the noble Earl to seize this early opportunity of attacking a measure which his own party in the other House do not venture to oppose on the second reading, of proclaiming the hostile feeling with which it will be received when it comes into your Lordships' House, and of expressing his opinion that it should be postponed for a Session or two. I do not think the noble Earl is justified in using such language to represent the feeling of the House of Lords. I believe that, while your Lordships are averse to any dangerous innovations, you are convinced of the desirability of disposing of this question at a moment when the working classes are moderate in their claims and hopeful of receiving justice at your hands without the exercise of any extraordinary pressure. I cannot believe that, either directly or indirectly, the adoption of this measure will produce the fearful consequences predicted by the noble Earl opposite—the destruction of all our institutions, the Monarchy not excepted. On the contrary, I hold the firm conviction that it will tend greatly to strengthen those institutions and promote the happiness and prosperity of the nation. As I have said, the Government do not oppose this Committee; but I wish to protest against the idea that its appointment is in any way to tie our hands in promoting our measure of reform, or that we are to be restricted in advancing it through Parliament by the length of time the Committee may think fit to bestow on any point of the inquiry.

Earl Granville

EARL GREY: My Lords, I must in the first place apologise to a noble Earl on the other side (the Earl of Eglintoun) for having from inadvertence omitted to notice the suggestion he offered to me immediately before I rose to address your Lordships, that I should alter the terms of my Motion so as to extend the inquiry to Ireland and Scotland. I do not doubt that a similar inquiry to that which I have proposed for England is also wanted for the other parts of the United Kingdom; but I think in inquiring into the representation of England, one Committee will have quite as much work as it can well get through. My Lords, I turn now to a matter which affects myself personally—I mean the share which I had in the responsibility of proposing to Parliament the measure of Reform brought forward in 1852. The allusion which has been made to-night to that subject imposes on me the necessity—I assure your Lordships it is to me an unpleasant necessity—of explaining the circumstances which induced me to join in that course. Having had some anticipation that some remark might be made on that subject, I have obtained the permission of Her Majesty to refer to what took place in the Cabinet at that period. My explanation is a very simple one. I cheered the observation of the noble Duke when he said, I implied that the Reform Bill of 1852 originated from the indiscretion of my noble Friend then at the head of the Government. I am bound to say that such is my opinion; I think the original difficulty on this subject arose from the fact which is, I believe, well known to all your Lordships, although it may never perhaps have been publicly stated—namely, that three or four years before that Bill was introduced Lord John Russell, as the head of the Cabinet, without any previous concert or communication with his colleagues, committed himself by expressing in the House of Commons the opinion that the time was come when a change ought to be made in the measure of 1832. That opinion was expressed without the intention to express it having been intimated, as far as I know, to any one of his colleagues, and certainly not to the Cabinet. I believe when that announcement was made it was not approved by any, or at least not by more than one or two, members of the Cabinet. For myself, I can say it had my most entire disapproval—a feeling which I did not attempt to conceal, as Lord John Russell can testify. It is perfectly true, as the noble noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) has remarked, that subsequently circumstances occurred in 1851, which rendered it exceedingly difficult for Lord John Russell's Government to avoid dealing with the question of reform. In that year, as the noble Duke has stated, the Government of Lord John Russell was defeated in the House of Commons on Mr. Locke King's Motion for extending the right of voting in counties to £10 householders, and in consequence of that defeat the members of the Administration unanimously agreed that they ought to tender their resignation to Her Majesty. But the task of forming a new Government having been abandoned or declined by the noble Earl opposite and by Lord Aberdeen, Lord John Russell and his colleagues found themselves almost compelled to resume their offices. For myself I must say that nothing but an apparently overruling necessity compelled me to concur in this determination, on account of the inconvenience that I foresaw would ensue from the pledge which Lord John Russell had previously given on the question of reform, and which he had renewed still more explicitly in the debate that preceded the defeat of the Government. With the opinion I entertained and avowed on this question, it was with extreme reluctance that I consented, after this occurrence, to continue a Member of that Administration. But, looking at all the circumstances of that time, I felt it to be my duty to remain in the Government; and I did so, distinctly reserving to myself the right not to be regarded as standing pledged to any measure of reform until I saw what might be proposed, and not disguising my conviction that to disturb the question at all was inexpedient if it could be avoided. Such was the situation of affairs when Parliament was about to meet in 1852. The Reform Bill, which was afterwards laid upon the table of the House of Commons, was submitted to the Cabinet. For my own part I never approved it. I thought it open to the gravest objection. But, my Lords, I was induced to consent to its being introduced into Parliament by this one consideration—I felt sure that the Government was on the eve of falling, and it so happened that at that time the principal attacks made upon it were directed against the particular department with which I was intrusted. I did not think that it would be honourable towards my colleagues, or right towards myself, that at such a moment I should appear to run away from the post which I held; and being persuaded that the Bill had not the remotest chance of passing—having stated that to the Cabinet before it was brought in—I undoubtedly acquiesced in its introduction. My Lords, I freely acknowledge that in doing so I made a grievous mistake. Although my anticipations, both as to the fall of the Government and the utter failure of that Bill—which I will say unreservedly deserved to fail—were fulfilled, I confess I had not sufficiently weighed the importance of having a measure of Reform recommended by the Crown to the attention of Parliament, or of having such a measure, even though it could not pass, introduced on the responsibility of a Government. I frankly admit that I was greatly to blame for allowing any consideration of any other kind to induce me to waive my objections to that measure and become a party to it. My Lords, I am afraid that, in the present state of public affairs, there is no public man on either side of this or the other House who can honestly acquit himself of having ever committed mistakes with regard to this important subject. I believe we have all been more or less to blame; but I think the time has come when, without reference to any feeling of reluctance to acknowledge past errors, or, indeed, any personal feeling whatever, we ought to deal with this grave question as the public interests demand. We were all, I think excusably, a little insensible to the extreme importance of this subject a few years ago. The discussions, however, of the last few years, I must own, have opened my eyes far more than before to the extreme danger of mooted this question. I believe that many of your Lordships, many Members of the other House, and the great majority of the nation, are now, in consequence of past discussions, far better aware than they were a few years ago of the real difficulties of this subject; and it follows that if we are convinced of these difficulties, and that there is no practicable mode of safely settling the subject, then I will say that prudence commends us not to deal with it. It has been said that the arguments I have used equally apply against all reform, and might have been urged against the Bill of 1832. Let me remind your Lordships how utterly different are the circumstances of the present time and those of the year 1831 when the first Reform Act was proposed. I believed then, and I am convinced now, that at that period it was a question between Reform and Revolution. A state of things then existed in which it was absolutely necessary that there should be a great displacement and transfer of political power from one class to another. For some time previous, and chiefly in the reigns of George III. and George IV., great abuses had arisen; owing to which the House of Commons had ceased to be any longer the organ of the enlightened opinion of the country. Its measures had come to be habitually directed not to the benefit of the community at large, but rather to the benefit of the few. So deep a sense of these abuses existed in the mind of the nation that a state of things prevailed which could by no possibility have been continued; and, unless a change had been accomplished by peaceful means, it would have been brought about by violence. Fortunately a measure of Reform was proposed, and, in spite of difficulties of which the public can now form no adequate estimate, was passed safely into law. The experience we have since had of its working is an ample justification of those who brought it in. The measure, no doubt, had its defects; but considering the excitement of the times in which it was carried, and the difficulties against which its advocates had to struggle, it is to me still matter of surprise that it should be marked by so few faults as are to be found in it. The fact of its having been passed as it was does great honour, if I may be permitted to say so, to the Government by whom it was introduced, and especially to the chiefs of that Government in both Houses of Parliament. The patience, the perseverance, and the ability with which the then Lord Althorp, as leader of the House of Commons, almost unassisted, sustained the whole burden of carrying that measure through Committee were beyond all praise. Is the situation now by any means to be compared to what then existed? Far from it. There is no urgent and pressing necessity for any violent displacement of political power from one class to another. Even the authors of the Bill do not contend that there is, but rest their arguments in its favour on other grounds, admitting that the House of Commons, as it is now constituted, discharges its high duties with success; that in the last twenty-eight years it has accomplished more useful and practical reforms than have been effected in any equal period of our history; and that it has shown an earnest desire to promote the good of the nation at large. The noble Duke stated that he was surprised at my speech as altogether wide of the mark, seeing the Government had not introduced a measure of universal suffrage and vote by ballot. I did not go into any discussion of the details of a Bill which is not before us, and which, if it does come before us, will, I trust and firmly believe, do so in a very altered shape. But I spoke of the general principle of the measure, the danger of greatly increasing the power of mere numbers, compared to the higher classes of society. I argued against making changes in that direction, leaving the extent to which they are to be carried to be determined by no new principle, but by mere arbitrary limits, while all the reasons assigned for the measure proposed are applicable to a larger one. I contended that by doing this we should be left without any ground to rest upon. It was against such a course that I cautioned your Lordships, and I have yet to learn that in moving for this Committee such an argument was misapplied or inappropriate. I believe, on the contrary, that it deserves your Lordships' best consideration. My noble Friend who spoke last (Earl Granville) deprecated the tone of my observations with reference to the United States of America. I trust I said nothing against the character of the American people. No one admires the character of the American people more than I do; there can be stronger proof of their great qualities than the fact that a Government so faulty in its construction and so imperfect in its arrangements should work even so well as it does. But while we feel at liberty to criticise the conduct and character of the potentates of Europe, I can see no reason why we should not express our views as to the institutions of America with equal freedom. My noble Friend expressed his fears that the effect of instituting these inquiries will be to lower this House in the opinion of the country. I, for one, do not feel the least afraid of such a result. Your Lordships' conduct will be judged rightly by the people. I firmly believe that at this moment there is among the most intelligent and educated classes of this country an earnest hope that your Lordships will perform your duty fearlessly and wisely; that upon that rest their main hopes; that they feel that while in the other House of Parliament a large proportion of the Members are, from various circumstances, afraid to act on their real opinions, and while we are told if that House were to be polled on this Bill by ballot it would be rejected by a large majority, and yet, that by an open vote it would pass by as large a one,—they feel while that language is held almost openly, that it does become this House to consider these matters with boldness, with fairness, and with determination. As to the sort of understanding of which the noble Duke has spoken on which this inquiry is to be conducted, I must profess my entire agreement with the noble Earl opposite. Most undoubtedly I do not move for this Committee with any intention of delaying the Bill. I believe we shall have time to obtain the information we require before we are called upon to consider the details of the Bill now before the other House of Parliament; but if the Bill comes before us earlier than I at present suppose, or if the inquiry should prove wider and lead us further—and I see important information bearing on the Bill, likely to be elicited—I utterly repudiate the idea that we ought to force the Bill forward without waiting for information.

Earl Grey

Motion agreed to.

The Committee to be named To-morrow.

On the Morrow the following Lords were named of the Committee:—

Ld. President	V. Eversley
Ld. Privy Seal	L. Ashburton
M. Salisbury	L. Stanley of Alderley
Ld. Steward	L. Overstone
E. Derby	L. Belper
E. Spencer	L. Egerton
E. Grey	L. Liveden
E. Lonsdale	L. Llanover
E. Cathcart	L. Taunton
E. Stradbroke	L. Stratheden
V. Stratford de Redcliffe

House adjourned at half-past Nine o'clock till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, April 19, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS. — 1^o Ecclesiastical Courts Jurisdiction.

EDUCATION IN IRELAND.—QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, What reply has been given by the Government to the Letter from the Roman Catholic Bishops, dated 18th March, 1860, with reference to National Education in Ireland?

MR. CARDWELL stated that no reply had been sent except an acknowledgment of the receipt of the letter.

SUPPLY.

On Motion for the House to go into Committee of Supply,

OUR FOREIGN RELATIONS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. HORSMAN, in calling the attention of the House to the state of our relations with foreign Powers and to ask some explanations on the subject from the Government, said:—Sir, I believe it is generally acknowledged that at the present moment the Government and nations of central Europe are more disturbed and alarmed than they have been since the beginning of the century. Every Continental country exposed to incursions from France is trembling with fear. England also has her interests to protect, her responsibilities to discharge, and her solemn engagements under stringent treaties are thickening and pressing upon her. Many anxious eyes are turned to England from the menaced States, inquiring their fate, which they feel to hang upon the fidelity of England to her engagements. Such are the feelings which pervade Europe at this moment. The nations are trembling, time is progressing, events are marching; and the very Power which is attempting to alter the face of Europe is making all speed to anticipate and shut out every possible combination for a successful resistance. In these circumstances I feel anxious, as far as I can do so without discussing the past policy of the Cabinet, or embarrassing pending negotiations, to ask for some explanations, which I hope and believe will tend to show that the Parliament and the Government of this country are of one mind as to our present position and duties; and that they may cordially and heartily unite in a direct, clear, and unmistakeable announcement of that which the world has a right to know—the policy which England, from a regard to her own interests and honour, is now determined to pursue in the face of these grave and threatening events. Just before the adjournment for the Easter recess there was laid on the table the reply of M. Thouvenel to a Despatch written by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs on the 22nd of March. In that document the French Minister states that the Despatch of the English Cabinet to which he replies makes no change in the relations subsisting between the two Governments, and particularly that it conveys no protest against the annexation of Savoy. We have reason to believe that this interpretation of the Despatch of the 22nd of March is not acquiesced in by the British Cabinet; and the first question, therefore, which I wish to ask is whether the Despatch of M. Thouvenel has been replied to, and, if so, whether consistently with the public interest, a copy of the reply can be laid on the table? I would ask, further, what is the exact state now of the question of the annexation of Savoy? Is that question still in any way pending as a discussion between the two Governments, or do we leave it where M. Thouvenel in his last Despatch has placed it, and are we content to consider it a settled question, as to which nothing further can be said? My third and last question is one of still greater importance—one upon which not only have we to come to an understanding with our own Government, but upon which our Government should also come to an understanding with foreign Powers. It is this—what is the principle upon which our policy is to be conducted with reference to those treaty obligations which we have incurred in the general interest and for the common safety of Europe? Are we to set out by assuming that the aggressions of France in Savoy and Switzerland are mere accidental and exceptional occurrences, the adjustment of which will be followed by the re-establishment of peace, security, and confidence; or are we to take them, as we know they have been taken by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, as indications and portions of a deliberate policy on the part of France, of which the logical consequences are to be looked for in the harassing and unsettling of other parts of Europe? This last question is important, because there has been an impression, produced by some of the earlier despatches and speeches of our Government, that the policy of England has alternated between these two views. When the Savoy difficulty first arose the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs addressed a Despatch, which was much approved and highly commended, to our Ambassador at Paris, in which he warned the Emperor of the French that the Savoy question was one interesting to the whole of Europe and calculated to create general alarm and apprehension. But from causes to which I need not now refer that question appears—perhaps only appears—to have subsided into a settlement in which Sardinia and France are the only Powers that are held to have an interest. The Swiss difficulty succeeded; and when it arose we felt there could be no doubt as to the consequences that would follow. The graver character of that aggression was announced authoritatively in this House. The noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, with a fervour which could not be mistaken, reminded us that the independence of Switzerland was a matter of European guarantee, and, describing in firm and forcible language the restless and encroaching policy of France, he gave us to understand, amid the acclamations of the House, that our close and special alliance with that aggressive Power had come to an end. But in a short time rumours were set afloat by those to whom this change of policy was unpalatable, and who desired to do what was agreeable to France, perhaps to promote what had been designed by France, that the question of the independence of Switzerland had also subsided into a mere local quarrel; that the parties to that quarrel had settled it out of court, and that a compromise had been effected, by which France was to take only a portion of what she had determined to seize, and Switzerland was to be allowed to retain the remainder. We have happily had since a complete refutation of these sinister rumours. But it was natural to suppose that a small State, threatened by an overpowering neighbour, and abandoned by those on whose support she had a right to rely, should very gladly make a compromise by surrendering part of her dominions to retain the rest. In those who look at these things from a mere mercantile point of view, this was a pardonable supposition; but those who so judged the Swiss very much mistook the character of that people. They are a brave and patriotic, although they may appear rather a primitive race, because they are so uncivilized that love of country, love of liberty, with them is still a passion; and so benighted that they have not yet learnt to put freedom into one scale and bales of merchandise into another, and to sell the soul of their nation for improved trade returns. As they are not reigned over by a Prince who is ready to abandon them, or governed by an unscrupulous Minister willing to barter them away like sheep, they may still escape the degradation which was designed for them, and the Government of England may not be a party to a second crime. But I have said that M. Thouvenel states that the despatch of the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs did not amount to a protest. No one who reads the despatch can fail to see that the French Minister anxiously labours to establish that fact. He attaches great importance to it; but not more than it deserves, for it would be difficult to exaggerate the immense advantage which is given to the present policy and the future designs of France by the absence of a protest; and more difficult still to overrate the additional danger entailed upon Europe by the impunity allowed to the first open act of French territorial aggression. In passing I would make only one remark upon the despatch of the noble Lord—that I saw with regret that, when he stated so clearly, so forcibly, and so convincingly, the case against the Emperor of the French, he stopped short of the conclusion to which his own arguments so inevitably led. M. Thouvenel quickly declared that there was no protest. But why was there no protest? A protest was not only the natural conclusion to the noble Lord's own reasoning, but was the natural proceeding in the face of such an outrage on the public law and opinion of Europe? I have heard some persons say, "What is the use of a protest? If you do not mean to follow it up by action, it is only a confession of your anger and your weakness, meaning nothing and effecting nothing; and what an idle matter it is to protest at this time of day against the violation of the Treaties of 1815, after the violation of them has been so commonly permitted!" I demur to both of those conclusions as being entirely false. In the first place, with respect to a protest, I have always understood that, instead of a protest being a thing to be followed up by action, a protest was a substitute for action; and that it was when you are not prepared to follow up your objections by war that you made a protest, in order that your inaction might not be taken for acquiescence. The value of a protest is the value attached to it by the usages of Europe. A protest once entered against an Act is a precaution against the Act being established as a precedent, and a protest not entered is to be interpreted into acquiescence. Thus a protest becomes a matter of great importance, and not a mere idle ceremony. The public proclamation of a principle by means of a protest against the violation of treaties, and the deliberate warning of the consequences which would follow from further Acts of a similar kind, become of importance in the eyes of Europe, and is a deliberate warning that the protest may be followed up by more effective measures which the public safety might require against the public enemy. When I am told that the Treaties of 1815 have been before violated, I would again ask, has the principle of those treaties ever been violated before? What was that principle? It was protection to Europe against French aggression. Those treaties bound together the allied Powers against the public enemy, who had overrun the Continent, pillaged every capital, shaken every throne, and inflicted countless miseries on every population; and the trampled nations of the Continent, led by England, combining and overthrowing their oppressor, framed the treaties for their own future safety against the traditional policy of France; and it was the deliberate judgment of Europe that fixed the boundaries and formed the frontiers of that country with the one sole aim and object of confining France within her own limits, and of providing effectual security to Europe against the perpetually recurring danger from the insatiable restlessness of French ambition. That was the principle of the Treaties of 1815, and when has that principle ever been violated before? It is because that principle never has been violated that France has always chafed under those treaties as humiliations imposed on her, and the present Emperor of the French always encouraged the idea that it was his work to efface those marks of French dishonour; and these are the first steps in that direction; and it is this principle of limiting France within a frontier defined by the unanimous judgment of Europe that is now for the first time assailed and overridden by the Emperor of the French. What France gains by the annexation of Savoy is emancipation from her own limits, and a precedent for the future enlargement of them; and it is of the utmost consequence to Europe not to allow that right, and not to permit France to plead that it has been granted. This M. Thouvenel knows, and hence his desire to show that no protest is made, and his ill-concealed exultation that the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary has not distinctly affirmed that the British Cabinet would not admit the principle. The noble Lord ably showed that the French arguments were untenable, but there the noble Lord stopped short, and has not guarded against the repetition of the act, though no one has stated more forcibly than he that a repetition was to be apprehended. It was on these grounds that he thought a protest on the part of England would be a valuable declaration of the public law of Europe against the principle of small States having the right to make cessions of territory to an aggressive and absorbing neighbour, without bringing the arrangements thereon distinctly under the notice of the Powers who were parties to previous treaties; and it would be also valuable as a declaration that acquisitions of territory, under such circumstances between Powers so unequal would be looked upon as similar to acquisitions by conquest, and as such requiring European sanction. But it may be said that this view with regard to the importance of a protest is a mere abstract view, without practical consequence; but I beg the House to consider of what an immediate and immense practical importance a protest is as bearing on passing events. At this time it is impossible for the House to shut its eyes to the marvellous and rapid fulfilment of that almost incredible scheme of policy attributed to the Emperor of the French from the day he mounted the throne of France. It was then authoritatively announced that his mission was to humble, one by one, the several Powers who contributed to the former defeat of France; to efface the Treaties of 1815, and, having avenged France on the Powers of the Continent, that then his last great crowning act would be to lower the pride and break down the power of England. It was with a view to the fulfilment of this policy that France beheld, not only with complacency, but with exultation, those immense warlike preparations which have been going on there for the last few years, both by sea and by land. Mark with what reason France may exult in the fulfilment of this policy. Russia has been defeated and weakened; Austria has been dismembered, the Treaties of 1815 have been trampled under foot in the cases of Savoy and Switzerland, and Prussia is now threatened. Indeed, there are rumours that Prussia is something more than threatened. Within the last few days there are rumours that overtures have been made to Prussia for the rectification of the Rhenish frontier, an equivalent being offered in the acquisition of some of the small States of Germany. These rumours may be premature; but the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary has himself shown that they may be only premature, and that this is the direction in which the policy of France may be expected to be developed. This shows how the policy of France is being accomplished in one direction; and let me show how parties in France at this moment are exulting at its apparent accomplishment in another. Two years ago a good deal of interest was excited by the appearance in this country of a map, published under the authority of the French Government, and sent to the principal map-sellers in London. It was entitled "Europe in 1860." This has passed out of the memory, probably, of most of those who saw the map at the time, but subsequent events have given, and not the least in the eyes of France, a significance and importance to the matter. This map was published in the middle of 1858, and no one then anticipated that within one year large territorial changes would be made in Europe, or that there was likely to be war in Italy; and the diplomatic Mentor of the Government who is never misled or outwitted by the Emperor of the French—our Ambassador in France—told the British Government, months after that map had appeared, that there was no danger of war in Italy, and that France was not arming; but the author of the map saw what was approaching, because Lombardy was taken from Austria in that map and placed as a territory of Sardinia. We are now only at the commencement of 1860, and the predicted change of territory has actually been accomplished. No one foresaw in 1858 that there was likely to be war between Spain and Morocco; but the author of that map foresaw that war and some of its results, because in the map to which I have adverted the territory of Morocco was transferred to the dominions of the Queen of Spain. War between Spain and Morocco has since the publication of the map broken out, and a cession of territory has been made, though not to the extent predicted by the map; but it is impossible to separate that war from the policy of the man who predicted it. But the most important changes of all were to take place in Germany. This remains to be realized; but I want the House to observe what would be the effect of a protest on the part of England against the annexation of Savoy on the policy of France in Germany, and with what good reason M. Thouvenel may congratulate his Imperial master that England has not the courage or foresight to make that protest. Prussia is at this moment threatened by France; and the danger of Prussia was first announced to the House by the Foreign Secretary, who has always frankly and manfully expressed himself on this matter. I want the House to observe how critical is the state of Germany, and particularly from its close analogy to the recent position of Italy. The minor Princes are the bane of Germany, whose constant and perpetual dread has been that they were going to be absorbed by Prussia—not by conquest, but by the movement of their own people, just as the Italian Duchies were afraid of being absorbed by Piedmont. Hence it is—and I beg the House to remark this well—that many of the Powers of Germany feel the necessity, which the Italian Sovereigns also felt, of having an external support to lean upon. They have not that support in their own people, because the people would willingly join Prussia. They are compelled, therefore, to look for support abroad, seeing that they must have a protector if they are to remain Sovereign Princes at all. Formerly, before the Crimean war, they had that protector in Russia, and partly in Austria; and this accounts for the great ascendancy of Russia over the affairs of Germany in times past. But all that is now altered. Russia is beaten, and is fully occupied at home. Austria is in the same position. Germany is alarmed; her people are drawing more towards Prussia; but the fears and the jealousies of their own rulers are excited precisely in the same degree. Anything to them is preferable to being merged in that dreaded Prussia; and hence there is an anxious desire to look in other quarters for a protector. And now comes the particular danger springing from the annexation of Savoy. The precedent of Savoy will be cited in the case of Germany. The population drawing more and more closely to Prussia, more and more urgent will be the cries for help addressed to France by the petty German Princes. One after another every petty Sovereign and Court may be driven to follow the example of Sardinia, and connect itself in some form or other with France; and, if England has not protested, they will all plead that their right to dispose of themselves to another Power is an established principle of European law. But then the position of Prussia is most embarrassing.

Mr. Hennessy

Mr. Horsman

Without Germany she is weak; without Germany she is very vulnerable. She dreads France, and she dreads the ascendancy of France over the petty German Courts. She remembers the terrible outrages and sufferings that were inflicted by France during six years of tyranny. She would willingly fight if strong enough to do so, but she has no friend to rely on if England does not stand by her. Well, now, what assurance can any Prussian Minister feel that he will have the support of England? If he braves France, and if Prussia is suddenly attacked, what assurance has he that England will at once, and before Prussia is lost, throw her power into the scale and make common cause against a common danger? What guarantee of that can he have but the declaration of the British Parliament or the declaration of the British Ministry given publicly in Parliament? But if, on the other hand, Prussia feels that she cannot rely on England, may she not, against her own feelings and inclination, be driven to make her own terms with France, and, knowing that she has no hope of support elsewhere, may she not barter away the provinces coveted by France for an equivalent somewhere else? If she does so, what happens? Then comes the turn of the petty German Courts. A new Confederation of the Rhine springs up, German in name, but French in substance. Antwerp is not far off. The North Sea is lost. The maritime supremacy of France is doubled; and then what becomes of your trade, O ye worshippers of material interests and of the divine principle of commercial treaties at any price? Sir, I have often expressed in this House an opinion, which circumstances and reflection have more and more confirmed, that that special and exclusive alliance with France, estranging us from the other Powers of Europe, was a false, and unnatural, and a mistaken alliance. I am speaking of the special alliance which exists. In my opinion, there are no two great Powers of Europe which have so little in common, which have, in fact, so much that is directly and irreconcilably antagonistic, as France and England. My hon. Friend who interrupts me, the Member for Liskeard, has lately shown so much accurate knowledge as to Cracow and the Treaties of Vienna, that I am not at all surprised at his knowing so little about the analogy between the interests of different countries. I will explain what, perhaps, my hon. Friend has not considered—the difference which exists between the position of the two nations. The Government of England is a constitutional Government; that of France is a despotism. The Government of England is a peaceful; that of France is a military Government. We are a commercial nation; France is an aggressive State. The Government of England is a settled and legitimate Government; that of France is a Government of revolution. Above all, let me say the Government of England prides itself on being a highly moral Government, and the present Government of France I believe to be the most immoral Government in Europe. Under these circumstances, I feel that a special alliance between the two countries is a forced and precarious alliance. It is the alliance of peace with war, of constitutionalism with despotism, of the love of commerce with the lust for conquest, of legitimacy with revolution. And I believe that that special alliance will not last one day longer than it subserves the policy of aggrandizement in France, of which England has begun by being the tool, and of which she will end, I believe, by finding herself the victim. And even as regards the relations of commerce, I believe there can be no permanent commercial spirit in France as long as you have that law of perpetual subdivision of property, which prevents the formation of a permanent middle class, which discourages the acquisition of wealth and property, and which places the whole social system in France in a state of perpetual revolution. On the other hand, Prussia, which is now needing our assistance, is a kindred State, a constitutional, intelligent, progressive, and peaceful State. Compare her with France—France trampling down all the noblest interests of the nation, and diverting men's minds by the intoxication of war and military glory. Allied with Prussia, we form and we pursue a policy of our own. We stand forward as inculcating certain great principles, and upholding sound English influences. Allied with France, we incur the ridicule of every State of Europe, as duped, subordinate, led about—involved in what we hate and are ashamed of, struggling against our chains, which we are unable or afraid to break, and too feeble to give effect to our guarantees; forgetting that we are a European Power, much more, that we once were a Power of the first order, and the leading State of Europe. I ask again, what reliance can Germany place on us? What respect can she feel for us when she sees that we are the humble servants of France? I say that if the English Government are not prepared to rouse themselves to the declaration of a manly and a definite English policy, we must expect to see every Ally in turn abandon us, and to see Europe make her own terms with him who will then be the conqueror of the world. If we are not prepared to advocate a positive, a prompt, and a bold policy, we must be prepared at the same time to see every generous hope in Germany crushed. Nothing but the declaration of such a policy can save Prussia from the arms of France, and then many Savoy will rise up in succession, and we shall be benten and humiliated on them all. It is for these reasons that I am anxious to see the Government of this country still enter their protest against the annexation of Savoy, as the first open act of French aggression—that they should make the meaning of that protest clearly understood in Europe—that they should make it the inauguration of a new alliance with Prussia, thus infusing new blood into Germany. It appears to me that the despatches of the French Minister have invited, have challenged us to some Parliamentary action on the subject. In one of these despatches he says that England has not protested, and he is rejoiced to find that she has not protested. That of itself is proof to us that a protest ought to be made; and, if necessary, Parliament should address the Queen, beseeching Her Majesty to instruct Her Ministers to make such a protest, and to follow it up, in concert with her Allies, by maintaining inviolable the neutrality of Switzerland, to the guarantee of which we were parties. I adhere to an opinion which I expressed in this House on a former occasion, that when Savoy was ceded to France, and the other great Powers of Europe refused to interfere, it would have been culpable and criminal folly on the part of England to have engaged single-handed in war with France to prevent that annexation. But the case of Switzerland is quite different, as we were told by the noble Lord himself. It is one in which the honour of England is involved. England has given a guarantee; her word has been solemnly passed; the danger is positive and real; the independence of Switzerland is an European question of the first order; and the Swiss have shown themselves true to themselves and to Europe, and have made known to the world that the loss of their freedom shall not be their own act. They have, indeed, appealed to Europe, but they have also startled Europe by a declaration, that if Europe abandons them in what is its own cause they are determined singlehanded to brave the colossal power of France rather than suffer extinction without a struggle. They had the spirit of their own poet, who said—

Mr. Horsman

“The land we from our Fathers had in trust,
We to our children will transmit, or die :
This is our maxim, this our piety ;
And God and nature say that it is just,
That which we would perform in arms we must ;
We read the dictate in the infant's eye ;
In the wife's smile ; and in the placid sky ;
And at our feet, amid the silent dust
Of them that were before us.”

And, when Switzerland appeals to those who should guard the little citadel of freedom which has for so long shared with us the honour of affording a refuge to the persecuted and proscribed of other nations—when she is ready to send forth her little bands of patriots and heroes, with a devotion not surpassed in history, to fight for what the wise and good and great of all times have held to be the first possession of a people—is England to stand aloof, to forget her pledged word, to forfeit her honour, and to allow those territories which she has sworn to defend to become the scene of a tragedy which must leave a stain upon the honour of England in all after times? I know it is said that we can do nothing for Switzerland without a combination with all the other Powers. I say that in this case, which is for the prevention of war, such a general combination is not needed. I do not know what answer the Government may have received to the communications that were addressed to the different Powers of Europe; but we know this, that if we are true to ourselves we are sure of Prussia as well of Switzerland, and, in such a case, even those Allies alone are sufficient, with the help of England, not to make but to prevent war. The Emperor of France dares not make war in such a case as that of Chablais; the public opinion of Europe would overwhelm him; he could not rely upon the permanent support of his own people. We know that in the Italian war against Austria the French people, although at first reluctantly, did extend their support to the Emperor; but Austria was a wrong-doer and the public judgment of France condemned her; but in the case of Switzerland it would be different. Here France is entirely in the wrong. Chablais is not Sardinia's to give, it is not pretended to be necessary for the security of France, but it would be an act of pure aggression. I am confident that France would not endure that her men, money, and commerce should be sacrificed in such a cause. But then it is said, "If you interfere you incur the risk of war, which is a dreadful thing, expensive, and injurious to trade;" that "Chablais is a long way off, and it is no concern of ours." Those who say that this is no concern of England would say the same of the Rhine, or of Belgium; and if Kent and Sussex were invaded they would say that Kent and Sussex were no concern of the manufacturing districts of England. I say those are not the advisers to whom we should listen in a case of this kind. There is a maxim that those who are indifferent to the liberties of others will never defend their own; but it must be borne in mind that the trade and commerce of England are beyond anything affected by the development of the aggressive policy of France. We are not now deceived—we know what that policy means. We may hesitate to act, but that will not avail us, for we know that France will support the Emperor as long as our hesitating conduct makes his policy uninterruptedly successful; but we have reason to believe she would abandon it if we resolutely opposed it. The question then is this—shall we oppose the Emperor's policy in Switzerland, or shall we wait until he has subjected Switzerland, divided Germany, overrun Belgium, and has only England to deal with? Shall we confront him now with the voice of all Europe against him, or wait until Europe, humiliated and disgusted, turns with him against us? When I am told—as I dare say I shall be told—that what I am saying tends to provoke war, I answer that no Gentlemen in this House have a right to monopolize a hatred of war and a love of peace; and those who have the least right to do so are the advocates and supporters of the Emperor of the French, who I believe to be the greatest enemy of peace in the world. There is a state of peace which is even worse than war—when it is a mere adjournment of war to a more convenient season, when the enemy who is determined to attack you may strike with more deadly effect. I grant you that the Minister who pronounces the word "War" incurs a fearful responsibility; but he incurs a responsibility still more fearful who, conscious of an impending danger, shrinks from his duty of meeting it like a man, but in a degenerate and craven spirit, tides over the difficulty of the day, bequeathing to his successors and his country the increasing difficulties of an unsettled question of which the dangers have been aggravated by his timidity and the disasters multiplied a thousandfold by delay. I do not believe the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs is such a man. He has been called upon to conduct the foreign policy of this country at one of the most critical moments of our history; for it is my solemn conviction that the next few years, perhaps months, may be among the most memorable in the history of England, and may leave their mark for good or for evil on after generations. I have heard speeches lately from the noble Lord which indicate that he is not insensible to the danger. In that case he will not shrink from his duty. He bears a name which is associated with the past greatness of England, and I trust he will never allow it to go down to posterity linked with the darkest hour of England's dishonour and decline.

Mr. Horsman

MR. DUFF said, he wished to ascertain the opinion of the House upon a question connected with the important subject which had been raised by the right hon. Gentleman. At this critical moment, when Paris was the centre of all the intrigues of the Continent, was England efficiently represented in that capital? If they referred to the many despatches in which week after week Lord Cowley misled Lord Derby's Government, or looked to his journey to Vienna, which was a failure in itself and embarrassing to the Government, or considered the fact that a private Member of the House was in possession of important information which ought to have been known to our Ambassador in Paris, it would appear that the noble Earl was not sufficient for the post. He had been too long in Paris; a residence of eight years in that atmosphere was too long for one man;—for he (Mr. Duff) agreed with the right hon. Gentleman who spoke last, that politically the French Court was the most immoral Court of Europe.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I do not well understand what the right hon. Gentleman proposes by the speech which he has just addressed to the House. It is, no doubt, his privilege to address us upon any part of our foreign or domestic policy; but, at the same time, it must be recollected that that privilege is accompanied by a deep responsibility; and I must say I think the right hon. Gentleman had not sufficiently weighed the importance of that responsibility, when he made that speech to which we have just listened. In the first place I must say, before I advert to the questions put by the right hon. Gentleman, that while he appeared to be preparing the House for war, while he seemed to be endeavouring to rouse the feelings of this House in favour of a contest with the Government of France, he never laid down what were to be the objects of that contest. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to suppose that Chablais and Fancigny were part of the Swiss territory, and that the French Government were about to invade and take possession of that territory, contrary to the rights of Switzerland. Whatever dangers we may have to encounter, whatever may be in future the position of affairs, that is not their present situation. The right hon. Gentleman asks me what is the present state of the Savoy question. I may explain to him, at least, a portion of that question—my duty forbidding me to go into details as to what has recently happened and is now happening—but in going into that subject, I must state that the question of Sardinia and its cession of Savoy, and the question of the neutralized portions of Savoy and their relations, first to Switzerland, and next to the great Powers of Europe, are two totally distinct questions. The right hon. Gentleman says we did not protest against the cession of Savoy by the King of Sardinia. There may be, and I think there are, cases in which it is right to enter a protest—where, for instance, a treaty is manifestly broken. There was the case of Cracow; but there we did not think our interests were so endangered, or our honour so much concerned, as to render it necessary for us to take up arms. Such an occasion is one for protest. But there are other cases. Undoubtedly the late Grand Duke of Tuscany, and the late Duke of Modena, found their territories violently taken possession of, and another Sovereign claiming the right to rule over them. Not certainly having any inferior interest in the matter, but not having at the same time the power to resume that sovereignty, they very properly protest; meaning thereby that they do not acknowledge the right to do what has been done: and that if it shall ever be in their power to resume their sovereignty, they are fully entitled to resume it. The subject in that case was a very proper one for a protest. But what is our position with regard to the cession of Savoy?

When we first heard of the matter—when we were told that it was not at that time intended to be carried into effect, but that it might be carried into effect, we stated we thought such a transfer would have injurious consequences, both to France and to the general peace and tranquillity of Europe; but we were not entitled to say to the King of Sardinia that he should not cede his territory to France, nor were we entitled to say to the Emperor of the French that he should not accept the territory which the King of Sardinia intended to yield to him. So much is this the view of some of the Courts of Europe, that the Emperor of Russia, through his Minister, has said this is a matter which entirely concerns the two Sovereigns, and that the Emperor of France had a right to ask for that cession; and that the King of Sardinia had a right to make it; and that with regard to the pure cession, there was no room for question. I do not understand that any of the Powers of Europe have said even so much as we have said upon the subject. Some of them have considered that the Emperor of the French might take this territory, if it were yielded to him; some of them have considered it in the light in which we have done—as a most injurious example, and pregnant with future consequences of evil; but they have not said that they were entitled to protest on the subject. So far, therefore, I think we have not only acted in conformity with the law of nations, but in conformity with what has been the general sense of the other Powers of Europe. There is a question, however, intimately connected with this question, and it is a question of some complication, which has been partly discussed, and must be further discussed, and which at this time occupies the attention of the Cabinets of Europe. It was agreed in 1815 that certain portions of Savoy—Chablais, Fancigny, and part of the Genevois—should have all the benefits, in case of war between neighbouring Powers, which belonged to Switzerland; that the King of Sardinia should have the power to withdraw his troops through the neutral territory of Savoy and through the Valais; and that thereupon the only military authority which should have power in that district should be the troops of the Swiss Confederation. Well, there has been a discussion, and some of the diplomatic despatches on this subject have appeared in the newspaper. There has been, in the first place, a discussion as to what was the origin of this particular provision, which is contained in the 92nd Article of the General Treaty of Vienna, dated the 20th of November, 1815. The French Government have contended in more than one very able despatch that this very provision was made for the benefit of the King of Sardinia, and for the protection of his troops in case of war. It has been contended, on the other side, that it was intended for the security of Geneva, and for the general benefit of Switzerland. But, whatever may be the result of that discussion, the view which Her Majesty's Government take is, that it was a provision which was conducive to the general security of Switzerland, and of that neutrality which was declared to be part of the general policy of Europe. That being the case, a new question arises with regard to the change which has lately taken place. The Emperor of the French and the King of Sardinia have concluded a Treaty at Turin, by an Article of which the neutralized parts of Savoy are transferred with the rest of Savoy to the Emperor of the French; but it is declared that that territory is transferred with the same conditions on which it was held formerly by the King of Sardinia. That provision naturally gave occasion to a demand for explanation. And it has been said, and most frankly as I think, both by the French Government and by the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the King of Sardinia, that the meaning of that Article is not merely that the Emperor of the French takes that territory with the engagements as to neutrality to which I have alluded, and to which the King of Sardinia was subject; but he takes it, to use the phrase of Count Cavour, with the obligation of an efficacious neutrality for Switzerland. It being by general consent a great change that the neutrality which was formerly provided with regard to territory belonging to the King of Sardinia should be the condition of territory belonging to France, a most interesting and important question arises how that neutrality is to be efficiently maintained in the sense in which the Powers of Europe wished to establish it. But this is a question, let me remind the right hon. Gentleman, which is not at all like that which he seems to suppose of the French Government seizing upon the territories of an independent State. It is a question on which you may argue that this change of condition is such that the neutrality of Switzerland cannot be placed in so secure a position as it was, whatever may be the precautions which you may provide. But, at all events, that is a question which may be maturely examined and considered; and, so far from being a question of war, it is a question which deserves to be considered by the coolest heads, by men of the greatest experience and of the most mature judgment, having regard, as it does, to the provisions of Treaties which hold the nations of Europe together. Well, Sir, there has been no objection by the French Government to the examination of this question. It is in general terms stated in the Treaty of Turin that the Emperor of the French will come to an understanding with the Powers of Europe on this subject. The Swiss Confederation, through their Federal Council, have asked that there shall be a Conference on this question. The French Government, through their Minister here—their Chargé d'Affaires—have more than once said to me that they have no objection to make to that Conference. The Powers which may be called to it, the manner in which they should be called, the place where they should meet, and the time at which they should assemble, may be matters of friendly consideration and discussion; but as to the Conference itself and the principle on which it should meet—namely, the reconciling the Treaty of Vienna, by which that guarantee was provided, with the present state of things, and the Treaty lately concluded between the Emperor of the French and the King of Sardinia—to that principle they make not the slightest objection, and they declare themselves perfectly ready to enter into it. Well, then, I say it depends not merely upon England, nor upon what I must call somewhat of a boasting declaration that we are at any time ready to go to war. It requires, I must say, that the Powers of Europe should be in a certain manner agreed as to the guarantees they should take, as to the precautions which they should establish, in order to give Switzerland an effective guarantee for her neutrality. Of this the right hon. Gentleman may be assured, that, without speaking of other Powers, or of the regard which they may have for the interests of Switzerland, the Government of Great Britain feels the utmost desire to see Switzerland—that free and independent nation—that refuge of the politically proscribed—that old and classical land of liberty—possessed of every guarantee that can secure to her the maintenance of that independence and that freedom which she has so long enjoyed. The right hon. Gentleman asks what course the Government of England means to pursue in regard to our treaty engagements in respect to other parts of Europe. That is a very wide and important question, and I should be greatly embarrassed, if I were to go over our treaties with the different countries of Europe, and attempt to say what course should be taken with regard to each of them. It is enough for the present to say that we have now a critical question before us—that we are about to enter into negotiations on that subject—and that the eight Powers of Europe who were parties to the Treaty of Vienna will probably meet and take part in the consideration of it. I should therefore not only think it unwise, but a dereliction of my duty to go into details. The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that our position is such as to reflect disgrace upon us; he considers that this country is the slave of France, and that we are too cowardly to stand by our guarantees. If that opinion of the right hon. Gentleman be a correct one, then the present Government must be unworthy of the confidence of this House or the country, and it would be the duty of the right hon. Gentleman to call for a declaration by this House of another and more decided line of policy, and to take the management of public affairs out of the hands of those who have made the country a byword in Europe. But the right hon. Gentleman makes no proposition of that kind. He has made a speech, but so far as I could see there was no practical end in it. To be sure, the right hon. Gentleman did at one time somewhat inconsistently represent this country, and especially all concerned in commerce and manufactures, as being bribed by the advantages to be obtained by the late Treaty of Commerce with France. Now, it is not six weeks ago since I heard the right hon. Gentleman, along with many others, declare that we had been completely duped in that Treaty, and that, so far from gaining advantages by it, we had made ourselves the dupes of France. Then all the advantages were on the side of France, and all the loss on the part of England; and now it is represented as a bribe so manifest as to make us forget the independence of all other nations and the honour of our own. That is not a very consistent representation on the part of the right hon. Gentleman. But with respect to the right hon. Gentleman's reference to that Treaty I consider that, while those matters which concern one of the nations of Europe in whose independence we take a deep interest require our attention, and while other questions that may arise affecting the independence and safety of other nations may, no doubt, also require our immediate attention, yet an extension of commercial relations and the mutual advantages derived by the people of France and England from an exchange of manufactures and the conveniences and comforts of life—France obtaining from us our manufactures, and we obtaining from them the productions of their more fertile soil and of the fine climate with which they have been blessed—will tend to bring the two nations nearer and nearer to each other—that they will make men think when any questions arise between them, not, shall we sacrifice our honour? not, shall we forfeit our good faith? not, shall we sacrifice the independence of other nations, and rush into war in order that the world may admire the brilliant and showy deeds of hostility?—but that they will rather induce them to consider whether the subject-matters in dispute cannot obtain a solution by peaceful means. These, I believe, will be the effects of this Treaty; and I am glad to think that when those in power in this country and in France have passed away, and when these particular questions may have lost their interest, the effect will be to induce the people of the two countries to draw closer together, and to form that alliance of nations which, after all, is more secure than any mere alliance of Cabinets or Kings. The right hon. Gentleman asks whether any despatch has been sent in answer to the last despatch of M. Thouvenel? The despatch of Her Majesty's Government was a despatch stating our reasons for not agreeing to the statement made by the Government of France in favour of the annexation of Savoy. M. Thouvenel did not answer that despatch. He took notice that it was not a protest, and contented himself with doing so; consequently, there was no further answer. We have stated our case, and have gone fully into it, and there was no reason for prolonging the discussion. Our opinions naturally differed from those of the French people. The French people thought with their Government that the annexation of Savoy would be an advantage to the defences of France; they were glad to see their Government put forward a claim to Savoy, and to see it assented to by Sardinia. The Government and the people of England took a different view of the question. We could not conceive that there was any practical necessity for the annexation of Savoy, and we gave our reasons for not assenting to such a policy. With regard to the future, this is not the time to enter into it. If the House leaves us to conduct these negotiations, I trust we shall not be unmindful of the honour of England, or of the interests of Europe, and that the right hon. Gentleman will find when the papers are laid before the House that we have done that which became us as British statesmen, and as the representatives of an important part of the community of European nations.

Lord John Russell

MR. CLIFFORD defended Lord Cowley from the attack made on him by the hon. Member for Elgin (Mr. Duff). He had known Lord Cowley for many years as one of the most able and intelligent public servants the country ever possessed.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, It is unnecessary to add anything to what has been so fully, so ably, and I trust, so satisfactorily said by my noble Friend; but I must advert to the remarks which were made by the hon. Member behind me (Mr. Duff) in regard to the character and conduct of Lord Cowley, our Ambassador at Paris. I take leave to say that, having known that noble Lord for many years, having followed his course of duty in the various foreign States to which he has been accredited, and having had the honour to be his superior in office during periods of great difficulty, and when the duties he had to perform required all the qualities which an Ambassador ought to possess—I am bound to say that the attack made on him by the hon. Member behind me was founded on a complete mistake, on a great error as to the character and conduct of the person to whom his observations applied, and conveyed as unjust a censure as ever was passed on one who has ever shown himself to be a meritorious and deserving public servant. Lord Cowley has upon all occasions in which he has had to act as the Ambassador of England combined in a most remarkable degree that spirit of personal conciliation which is so essential to a proper performance of diplomatic duties with the strictest regard to the interests, the dignity, and the honour of this country. I am sure that those hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House who had an opportunity during the period they had the conduct of affairs of marking the conduct of Lord Cowley—of examining the manner in which he performed his duties—will concur in the opinion I have expressed, and in bearing that testimony which he so fully deserves to his transcendent merits as the representative of England to a most important foreign State.

MR. A. W. KINGLAKE said, that the cause in which he felt such a deep interest had been so ably advocated by his right hon. Friend the Member for Stroud, that it was not without pain that he found himself differing from him in even a minute point. But it was his opinion that a protest was an indication rather of weakness than of strength, and he was not one of those who thought that the House would do well to press upon Her Majesty's Ministers the adoption of that particular course. His right hon. Friend had spoken of a protest as being the natural conclusion of such an affair. It was precisely because it would be the conclusion of this affair, that he (Mr. Kinglake) objected to a protest. He did not by any means acquiesce in that which had been done; but it was precisely because a protest would be the termination of this business that M. Thouvenel was anxious to incite Her Majesty's Government to a course which would enable him to treat the affair as having been brought to its end. He (Mr. Kinglake) could not help thinking that the noble Lord, the Foreign Secretary, was under great misapprehension as to what fell from his right hon. Friend, the Member for Stroud. The noble Lord seemed to impute to his right hon. Friend that he was ignorant of the position of Chablais and Faucigny, and that he imagined that these provinces were part of the Swiss territory. But with the knowledge that was possessed by his right hon. Friend, it was impossible that he should have fallen into such an error. What his right hon. Friend probably meant was something equivalent to what he (Mr. Kinglake) had the honour to say when he first introduced this subject to the House, namely, that Chablais and Faucigny, and the neutralized part of the Genevese territory, though they were, for domestic purposes, under the sovereignty of Sardinia, yet for European purposes they belonged to Switzerland; because the Treaty of Vienna expressly provided that, when war broke out between France and Austria, then the Sardinian troops should march out of these provinces, and that Swiss troops should enter. Well, M. Thouvenel had contended that this particular provision, with regard to the neutralized districts, was one inserted for the benefit of Sardinia, and that therefore Sardinia had a right to cede these provinces to France. But he (Mr. Kinglake) thought that M. Thouvenel, or any one who put forward or accepted that view must be unacquainted with the documents upon which this question rested. By the Treaty of Cession, dated, he believed, in March 1815, it was expressly declared that this cession was in favour of the Canton of Geneva—expressly showing that it was an arrangement intended for the benefit of Switzerland, and not of Sardinia. It was not therefore, possible, for Sardinia, with any colour of right or justice, to surrender these provinces to the Emperor of the French. Now, the noble Lord, the Foreign Secretary, had said that the provisions of this Treaty were such that he felt that he had no right to go to the King of Sardinia, on the one hand, and say, “You must not cede this territory;” or to go to the Emperor of the French on the other, and say, “You have no right to accept this cession.” Well, he (Mr. Kinglake) could not understand how, with the knowledge the noble Lord must have of the Treaty of Vienna, he could possibly come to such a conclusion. By the treaty of peace, to which France herself was a party, it was stated in the most direct terms that the frontiers of France should be what they were then described to be—namely, such as they were before the recent annexation. It was also solemnly provided by united Europe that each Power that was a party to that treaty should be a guarantee for its maintenance. Then how was it possible for the noble Lord and the representatives of the rights of England in this quarrel to say that she is without the right—without the privilege of questioning this transaction? He could not but think, also, that the noble Lord was wrong in endeavouring to attribute to his right hon. Friend inconsistency, because he said that the Treaty of Commerce had been a bad bargain. It was very possible, as he imagined, that a portion of the community should be very much conciliated by the Treaty, whilst the general interests of the country were very little benefited by its provisions. Many of those who were interested in the trade of the country no doubt were conciliated by this Commercial Treaty; and his right hon. Friend might say that in perfect consistency with what he before stated —namely, that the whole was not beneficial to the country at large. He wished, now, to say a few words with regard to what had been done in the progress of our relations with the French Emperor since the House last met. The Emperor of the French had entered into three very strict engagements with England and the other Powers of Europe. He engaged in the first place that he would consult the great Powers of Europe. Well, the House knew that an attempt to fulfil that pledge was made by the despatch which was addressed by M. Thouvenel to the French Ambassador in London. The grounds upon which M. Thouvenel relied were combated by the noble Lord, who showed that they were altogether untenable. What was the reply to that despatch on the part of M. Thouvenel? Why he simply said that the prolongation of this discussion could produce no practical effect. He treated the noble Lord as one who was engaged in a mere barren discussion that could produce no practical result. If the noble Lord was the Secretary for Foreign Affairs—if he was one of the representatives of England in this quarrel, and England was still a great Power, he (Mr. Kinglake) thought the noble Lord had a right to expect a reply something different from this. Was this consulting England, to state certain reasons why the annexation should take place, and then, when those reasons were combated, to say that it was a mere barren discussion and a polemic that had better cease? He (Mr. Kinglake) denied that the French Emperor had fulfilled his promise or had consulted the Great Powers of Europe if this was the way in which the consultation was to be made. Then another engagement entered into by the Emperor of the French was that he would take the opinion of the populations of the countries proposed to be annexed. Now he (Mr. Kinglake) believed that throughout all Europe, before this question of annexation was raised, there were no more contented populations than those of Savoy and Nice. Well, when these questions were first raised they gave, he thought, every indication they could well be expected to give of the feeling they entertained on the subject. The population of North Savoy was animated not only by attachment to the throne of Sardinia, but by a strong dislike of being annexed to France; at any rate there was no question as to the authenticity of the 12,000 signatures to the petition against annexation to France, and to the prayer that if any change took place they might be annexed to Switzerland. But in the county of Nice the feeling was still more strong—it amounted indeed almost to unanimity. He was well informed that the proportion of those who objected to annexation to France was not less than five-eighths of the population. Was the conduct of the people of Nice inconsistent with this? The Municipal Juntas came to a resolution contrary to the annexation. The Colonel of the National Guard, who is chosen by the men, was opposed to it; a deputation was sent to Turin to entreat the King not to abandon them; and lastly, they elected Garibaldi and another, both of them men who were strongly attached to Sardinia. M. Laity was sent to Savoy, and M. Pietri to Nice. M. Laity was one of the fellow-labourers and associates of the Emperor in his Strasburg enterprise. That gentleman was sent to Savoy with instructions to promote there the principle of annexation to France, and M. Pietri, who was chef de police, and also a senator, went to Nice for the same purpose. He arrived there on the 30th of March, the French troops, who affected to be passing through on their return from Italy, being to reach the city on the 1st of April. The arrangements which were made for their reception were these: the gates were opened, no passports were required, the Provençals were admitted into the town with tri-coloured flags, the sailors were landed from the French vessels of war which were in the port, and an attempt was made to get up a demonstration in favour of annexation to France. That attempt was a failure. If he (Mr. Kinglake) could inform the House of the source from which he obtained his information they would be satisfied of the truth of the report—it was from one who was present—that amongst the assembled people not a hand was raised, not a single voice was heard in favour of the scheme. Even a bust of the French Emperor drawn in procession by six grey horses failed to obtain a single cheer. On the 2nd of April a Provisional Government was formed; and the formation of that Provisional Government was, he asserted, one of the basest contrivances for shifting the allegiance of a loyal people ever resorted to by a Sovereign. The Sardinian authorities were displaced, and were succeeded not by French ones, but by men who were still to be called Sardinian employés, but who were to be nominated by France, and who were informed that if the annexation took place they would retain the places which had been conferred upon them. Nor was this all. Count Cavour addressed letters to the civil authorities urging them to do all they could to bring about the annexation; and also wrote to the Bishop of the county a nominee of his own, requesting him to obtain from the parochial clergy the use of their influence to induce the people of the villages to agree to it as an act of loyalty to their King. Was there ever a more cruel abandonment of a loyal people, or could anything be imagined more intolerable than that a Sovereign, not content with transferring his subjects to a foreign Power, should appeal to their loyalty to wards himself as an engine which was to induce them to renounce their allegiance? And this, as an hon. Friend reminded him, was done by Count Cavour, who declared in the most solemn and precise manner, and who succeeded in persuading many people of his fidelity, that he would never sell, concede, or exchange these dominions of the Sardinian King. On the 3rd of April, M. Pietri had the entire control of the Government of Nice. He had the direction of the police, and was really the governor of the place. On the 5th of April there was issued a proclamation, to a passage from which he must call the attention of the House. In all countries there were to be found persons of varying degrees of honour and of baseness. In the county of Nice, Count Cavour found a person named Luboni to act as Provisional Governor of the country, and this person addressed to the people a proclamation, in which, after saying, he continued,

Lord John Russell

Mr. A. W. Kinglake

“At the august voice of the King all uncertainty with regard to our future must cease; at those august words must disappear all dissensions and rivalries:”

“Public demonstrations from this moment have no reason in them. Let us hasten to affirm by our suffrages the annexation of our county to France. In rendering ourselves to echo the intentions of the King let us press round the flag of that noble and generous nation which has always excited our lively sympathies. Let us rally round the throne of the glorious Emperor Napoleon III. Let us surround him with that fidelity peculiar to our country, which we have hitherto reserved for King Victor Emmanuel;”

and the proclamation ended with the words, “Vive la France! Vive l'Empereur Napoleon III!” Under such circumstances as these, the candidate upon whom the people had set their hearts having declared himself disqualified, and entreated his supporters to have nothing to do with the election, it was not surprising that the National Committee of Nice determined to abstain from voting, and he believed that no further precaution on the part of M. Pietri was necessary. That gentleman, however, seemed to have been determined to make assurance doubly sure, and therefore the urns in which the votes were to be deposited were committed to the superintendence of four persons who were known to be favourable to the plan of annexation to France. All hope of a fair election was at once extinguished. And this was how the Emperor had kept his second promise, this was how he had annexed these provinces by what he called universal suffrage. It was a great evil to mankind when brute force was used to overcome a free people; but that was not the utmost wrong which the Emperor of the French had perpetrated; because to that wrong he had added a semblance of consulting the population, but had adopted such means to mislead and overawe them as to render anything like a free choice or election absolutely impossible. This being the way in which the Emperor of the French had kept his two promises to consult the Powers of Europe, and to be bound by the free expression of the wishes of the peoples also were to be annexed, there was a third promise, the result of which was still open—namely, that in case of the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France Chablais and Faucigny should be joined to Switzerland. That promise was made to Lord Cowley, not only by M. Thouvenel, but also personally by the Emperor himself, as was shown in the despatch of the 5th of February, and therefore the House would see that the personal honour of the Emperor of the French was pledged to the performance of a promise thus deliberately made to the British Ambassador. Upon this subject, however, he forbore from saying another word, because he collected from the statement of the noble Lord that it was now the subject of negotiation; but he must, before sitting down, express his hope that that negotiation would be conducted with a due sense of the importance of the question. The annexation of Faucigny, Chablais, and the Genevoise to France would absolutely destroy the neutrality of Switzerland by making it, as every military man knew, perfectly impossible to defend the western portion of that country. He was not, therefore, exaggerating when he said that in this question there was involved the neutrality and integrity of Switzerland; and that with the neutrality and integrity of Switzerland, there was at stake the safety of Germany, and the peace and tranquillity of Europe for many years to come.

Afterwards,

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he was unwilling that it should be taken for granted that he acquiesced in the observation that the explanation given by the noble Foreign Secretary was satisfactory, as that depended on the answer that might be given to the question he desired to put. The Swiss Confederation had appealed to the Powers of Europe, requiring that there might be a Conference to consider the condition of the neutralized provinces, and demanding at the same time that until the Conference met and a decision was come to, that the neutralized provinces should not be occupied in a military sense by France. What he wished then to know was, whether the noble Foreign Secretary, when he said that the Government of France was willing to submit this question to a Conference of the great Powers of Europe, and that in the opinion of the Government that Conference would conduce to the settlement of the question in a manner to secure the independence and neutrality of Switzerland, means to imply that matters would in the meantime remain in statu quo, and that the neutralized provinces would not be militarily occupied by France. On this the whole question turned, for it was obvious, as pointed out in one of Lord Cowley's despatches, that if this neutralized territory should be put in the hands of France, any stipulation with regard to the matter would not be worth the paper on which it was written. Lord Cowley had pointed out to the Government that it would be in the power of France in a moment to pour her legions, without the smallest resistance, into Switzerland, and it was perfectly obvious that if France entered into possession that anything like a retirement from it at a suggestion from a Conference was what the noble Lord, in the most sanguine moment of his existence, could not possibly anticipate.

THE CURRENCY.

QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he had given notice of the following Question, which he wished to put to Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer—"Whether his attention has been directed to the Bank of England Return, published in The Gazette of Friday last, in so far as regards a diminution of notes in the hands of the Bank, and an addition to those in circulation; and whether he could give any information as to the report that this has not been produced by the ordinary requirements of trade, but by some concerted action on the Bank's Reserve, to produce a disturbance in the Currency of the Country." The proper use of the currency was a matter which not only interested the metropolis, and banks and bankers here, but it affected every part of the country, and all engaged in the operations of commerce. At the beginning of this year the rate of discount was $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; on the 19th January it was advanced to 3 per cent; on the 31st January to 4 per cent, and at the end of March to $4\frac{1}{2}$. The reserve of the Bank of England then stood at £8,083,000. On the 4th April, although there had been no alteration in the rate of discount, the reserve had diminished to £6,842,000. Last Thursday the rate of discount was raised to 5 per cent, and the figures in The Gazette of Saturday showed that the Bank reserve had fallen from near £7,000,000 to under £5,000,000. This astonishing diminution in the reserve naturally attracted considerable attention and caused much inquiry as to its cause. Last Saturday the well-informed and intelligent writer of the "City Article" of The Times announced that the diminution had not arisen from any extraordinary demand upon the Bank in the ordinary operations of trade; but from some concerted action on the part of the discount houses, by which a large amount of notes had been taken from the Bank and withdrawn from circulation; and that statement was confirmed in The Times of Monday last. It appeared to him that a charge of that kind—an amount which, from the analogy of previous years, would require the rate of discount to be 6 per cent and upwards. A charge of that kind was so disparaging to the character of London, and so injurious to the monetary interests, that he had thought it his duty, as connected with a large banking establishment, to ask this question, with a view to ascertain, on behalf of the public at large, whether there was any truth in the rumour that, by concert, a quantity of bank notes had been withdrawn from circulation and locked up in a box, where they were of no use to anybody. The public were now told that two days since the very same notes—£1,000 notes—had been returned to the Bank. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be able to throw some light on the transaction.

Mr. Alderman Salomons

INCOME-TAX COLLECTORS.

QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE wished to put the following Question to Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer:—"Whether persons who may have become sureties for Income Tax Collectors at a time when the rate of the Income Tax was 5d. or 7d. in the pound, are liable for any default made by the Collector when the rate of the Income Tax is 9d. or 10d. in the pound; and if they are not, whether in the event of a Collector making default, the tax-payer will be held liable to make a further payment to cover the deficiency." He understood that a case of the kind had occurred some years ago, where the Collector became a defaulter, and his sureties contended that they were not bound under the higher rate of tax to make good the deficiency; and the revenue officers had come to the conclusion that they could not call upon the sureties. He would also ask what was to be the first business of the evening after Supply, and whether any of the Bills on the paper would be proceeded with?

INLAND BONDING WAREHOUSES.

QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects to be able to bring in his intended Bill to authorize Inland Bonding Warehouses.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would answer the last question first. The course to be taken on the subject of inland bonding depended a good deal on what the House had voted or might vote in connection with the Customs' Duties Bill. As soon as that Bill had passed the House, which he hoped would be very soon, he would state what he proposed with respect to inland bonding.

In reply to the Question as to the liabilities of income-tax collectors and their sureties, the House was aware that the appointment of collectors, and the arrangements in general, were not under the direct control of the Executive Government, but under the superintendence of local authorities. But there was some misapprehension in the hon. Baronet's Question. The appointments of collectors were not permanent appointments, but were made from year to year; the bonds were taken from year to year; and consequently the liabilities of the sureties of the bonds could not be carried forward from year to year. A great deal of attention was therefore requisite on the part of the local authorities to see that the bonds were kept up, and that the sureties were renewed with the appointments. But this was a part of the system somewhat difficult to work under the superintendence of the local authorities, and he thought that the attention of the House might be advantageously called to it—he hoped during the present Session; for the liability of tax-payers to be called on for second payments was a most serious matter, and the state of the law was not satisfactory.

As to the order of business, he proposed to take the Committee on the Customs Bill if he could do so by eleven o'clock. If not, he would not that night proceed with any of the measures under his care, except the Bill for repealing Sir John Barnard's Act. The Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences Bill could not come on; he would place it for Monday, and then state when it would be brought forward.

The next Question was that of the hon. Member for Greenwich (Alderman Salomons), who asked if his attention had been directed to the Bank Return in The Gazette of Friday last? It had; for as the hon. Member correctly stated, that Return was regarded by the whole mercantile community as an index to the state of the country, and undoubtedly it was the duty of a person in his position to keep it in view. The principal facts relating to that Return were well shown in the Parliamentary paper moved for by the hon. Member himself, and published that morning, by which any one would at once see the most material facts. The first page of that paper showed that the diminution in the Bank reserve was almost entirely caused by the withdrawal of notes of £1,000 each. The notes of that description held by the Bank at the last Return amounted to £1,927,000 only; while on the 11th April, the date of the previous Return, they were £3,585,000. So large a difference as that having occurred in a single denomination of notes was of itself a demonstration which supplied the answer to the latter part of the hon. Gentleman's Question—namely, that the diminution of the reserve was not produced by the ordinary requirements of trade, but by some special operation. The latter part of the Question seemed, however, to imply that that result had been produced by some concerted action on the Bank's reserve, and with the view to produce a disturbance in the currency. He was not prepared to give any decided answer upon that point, further than to say that he did not think it was a "concerted action" in the natural interpretation of the words—namely, an action determined on by a combination among a variety of parties. There was no variety of parties; for it was entirely owing to a proceeding of a single house of great eminence and enormous transactions, which had thought fit, in the exercise of its own discretion, to adopt measures that had had that effect. There certainly was intention, though, perhaps, it did not amount to concert. The hon. Gentleman asked if this had been done in order to produce a disturbance of the currency of the country. He should go beyond his duty if he gave an opinion on that subject. Nothing would be more inexpedient than for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to presume, by opinions given in that House, to interfere with the freedom of mercantile houses carrying on their ordinary business, who might do what was not prudent or imprudent, and who might take measures which they were perfectly free to take, but which, if they were of great extent, might injuriously affect the public interests. Every customer of a Bank was free to do what he liked with his balance, whether that balance was at a private bank or the Bank of England. On this, and on more general grounds, it was not fitting in him to pronounce an opinion on the matter. He had, however, seen the Governor and Deputy-Governor of the Bank of England, and one of the partners in the house of Overend and Co.—the house concerned—who, he must say, had invited communication, and had stated all the facts, and their view of the case, with the most perfect frankness. The Bank of England being a public institution, if there was anything to blame in its conduct, it might be a very proper subject of complaint in that House. But all persons were agreed that there was nothing that could be made the subject of censure in the proceedings of the Bank for the last fortnight. On that he believed there was unanimity of opinion,

On the other hand, if the proceedings of a private house had been imprudent or injurious to the public interests it would be a very bad way of curing that evil if the Chancellor of the Exchequer should presume to pass sentence on their proceedings. It was within the knowledge of all that whatever had been done in this case had been done, not so much as a private transaction, but rather in the exercise of the power which every mercantile house might think itself entitled to exercise in order to expose what it might think wrong in the existing state of the law, so as to bring into view what it might consider a public evil, and thereby to produce and promote a disposition to apply a remedy to that evil. He gave no opinion on the existence of any such public evil. The state of the case he apprehended to be this. After the crisis of 1857, the Directors of the Bank of England were gravely impressed, as all must be, with the extreme inconvenience and mischief that resulted from repeated suspensions of the law at the discretion of the Government: yet the Bank of England and the Government had jointly found that that suspension was unavoidable, under the circumstances of the crisis when they occurred. The Bank of England had subsequently a rule for what he might term, not invidiously, the exclusion of a particular class of traders from discount; because the Directors of the Bank thought that such a rule was necessary to enable that establishment, under critical circumstances, to maintain their position, and to preclude the necessity of the interference of the Executive Government for the suspension of the law. The parties affected by that rule, on the contrary, thought that it was a very bad and injurious rule—that it tended very greatly, not only to their inconvenience, but to that of the public—and that it tended to throw what they considered their legitimate business into the hands of the Bank of England. These were very grave matters on both sides. They might well deserve careful investigation, but they were matters lying far above the region of the mere selfish or personal interests of any mercantile establishment whatever: they, in fact, cut deeply into the whole question of the policy of the present law; and nothing should be said tending to prejudge such a question. But this ought to be said in justice to the Bank—that everybody admitted that they had acted with the most perfect propriety and prudence under the circumstances of the case; and in justice, on the other hand, to the house of Overend, Gurney, and Co., that they had not the smallest objection to giving publicity to all the circumstances, because they consider that they have acted within their own right and discretion, and likewise in conformity with what they believe to be the public interests. Under these circumstances he did not think it necessary to go further into the matter.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

THE NAVAL RESERVE.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, there was such a wide difference of opinion on the subject of the Coastguard between the Secretary to the Admiralty and himself, that he must again refer to the matter. The number of the Coastguard was stated in the Estimates at 9,500. Seven years ago, Sir Charles Wood informed the House that they had a reserve of 8,500 men. The exact strength of the Coastguard at the present moment he found from Returns was 576 officers, 5,631 seamen, and 655 boys, who, together with the 800 Naval Volunteers, constituted the whole Reserve force which the country possessed. And out of those 5,631 seamen, only 3,200 would be ready for the defence of the country in the event of anything unpleasant taking place on the Continent; yet the Manning Commission reported that for the safety of the country a Reserve force of not less than 70,000 men was necessary. If he were wrong in these figures, he hoped he should be corrected; but he had obtained them from head-quarters. In the present posture of affairs, the House would surely not be satisfied with so small a reserve as he had mentioned to fall back upon in any emergency.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET did not suppose that anything he could say as representing the Admiralty would lead the gallant Admiral to believe that he was honestly endeavouring to give a true statement of the number of men available for sea service. Once for all, however, he would inform the gallant Admiral that, by a return just published by the Controller General of the Coastguard, the number of men and boys available for immediate sea service was 6,862. [Sir CHARLES NAPIER: Then my figures are quite correct.] He presumed, then, that the gallant Admiral had no complaint to make on that score. With regard to the Royal Naval Volunteers, it was true that only 800 of these had yet been enrolled; but there was, in his opinion, a very unnecessary alarm, both in Parliament and out of doors, upon the supposed failure of the scheme. From the first he never felt that seamen would join the new force all on a sudden, but, so far was he from regarding the progress of the Reserve force as unsatisfactory, that he was beginning to think it promised well. There was now a progressive increase weekly in the entry of men. In point of fact, they had only been ready to enrol the men since the 1st of the present month. The training ships had not before been in a state of preparation, and, as the men knew perfectly well that they could not begin exercising until the beginning of April, that fact, it might naturally be supposed, operated to prevent them from coming forward before. At the outset 30 or 40 a week were enrolled. The number was now increased to 100 per week, and if this rate could only be maintained there would soon be a very respectable force of Volunteers. It appeared to him that the gallant Admiral, by continually bringing before the House these statements as to the deficiency of our forces, acted very unreasonably, and did not tend either to advance his own credit or to promote the good of the country. The Government had this year taken money Votes for 11,000 men more than were demanded for the service of the last year. They had no difficulty in getting men, who were entering—he would not say freely—but in a satisfactory way. So far were the Admiralty from finding any difficulty in obtaining men that they were declining to enter any but able seamen, unless they were men who had before been in the service. With respect to the Channel fleet, he was constantly visited by officers of high and low rank, who said, “Cannot you persuade the Member for Southwark to cease from offering continual encouragement to discontent among the crews?” He was bound to tell the gallant Admiral that his brother officers felt poignantly the continual complaints which he made about the men not having sufficient leave, when he could assure the House the fact was that they had more leave than had ever been conceded in former days. The cause of almost all the late disasters had been the prevalent practice of breaking leave; but, irrespective of that, the fleet was in a healthy and satisfactory state considering how lately it had been created. There had been individual cases of insubordination, arising out of this question of leave, but the men were making good progress, and general contentment existed throughout the fleet. The gallant Admiral complained of the want of petty officers. No doubt there was. Could anybody expect, when a fleet had been created in so marvellously short a time, that it would have its full complement of experienced petty officers? At present, whenever a ship came home from foreign service, men who had behaved well were allowed to enter the Coastguard. This system accounted for the want of petty officers, for otherwise the men in question would now be petty officers on board the Channel fleet. The gallant Admiral's complaint on this score, therefore, was unfounded. He had made another more unreasonable than any. He stated that he had found the men were very overworked, were made to undergo excessive drill, and that great discontent existed in consequence. These complaints of course had gone down to the lower decks. [Sir CHARLES NAPIER: I complained of the system, not of the quantity.] He could not see the force of this distinction. He had that day received a visit from Admiral Elliott, who was Captain of the Channel fleet, who was much distressed at the statements that had been made, and he produced a statement showing that the utmost amount of drill on board his ships did not exceed two hours a day, and upon an average of a week only one hour a day. That certainly was not an excessive amount of drill. He fully admitted that the gallant Admiral honestly desired to improve the service, but a strong feeling prevailed at the Admiralty and on board the ships, that his speeches in that House were doing incalculable mischief to a young fleet, which was now well-disposed, because they led the sailors to imagine grievances which really had no existence. He would not enter then upon the question of ship-building, because a notice had been given by an hon. Member on the subject. He hoped that when it came on the whole matter would be thoroughly sifted.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR wished to know whether any school-ships were to be established, according to the recommendation of the Manning Commission, who said that they were the best source of supply for our naval force. The important subject of our Naval Reserve had been most ably treated in an article in that day's Times, and the question of school-ships was intimately connected with it. The Commission suggested that twelve school-ships should be placed in the principal ports of the kingdom. He hoped a supplemental Estimate would be introduced to provide for that want, and if no one else moved he would move such an Estimate. The great steamship companies of Southampton were willing to give liberal assistance in the formation of a Naval Reserve, and he hoped that at least Government would meet half way those ports which were inclined to contribute towards the establishment of school-ships.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE warmly supported the establishment of school-ships, which, he said, the Manning Commission looked upon as the foundation of their scheme. If that plan was not carried on simultaneously with, or in advance of, the Naval Reserve, it would take away from it half its efficacy. He was perfectly satisfied that the great shipping ports would gladly defray part of the expense of the school-ships. The late troubles in the fleet had arisen not from drilling or working too much, but entirely from the breaking of leave, which showed a great laxity of morals among the men. One cause of this was the desperately bad places the seaman got into when he went ashore—places where he was fleeced of all his money, and utterly prostrated both in body and mind. He had seen, in the streets of Portsmouth, sailors of the Royal Navy lying about disgracefully drunk, with nobody to look after them. It was not so in the army, for if soldiers kept out beyond a certain hour the pickets were sent to bring them in. He would therefore press upon the Government the necessity of establishing a police at the different dockyards and naval ports who would know where every man who landed would be found. As to the drill, the men suffered from a want of work rather than from an excess of it.

MR. WHITBREAD, in reply to what had been said about establishing more training ships, explained that as yet they were rather a novelty, and there were many questions of detail to be considered before the Government could form an exact estimate of the annual expense of maintaining them. One vessel had been appropriated for the training of the boys, and as soon as the Admiralty had some little experience in the matter, they would shape their future course accordingly. The proposition to go halves with Southampton was one which the Admiralty were not yet prepared to deal with. It was perfectly correct that an offer had been made to the Admiralty by the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Packet Company to allow the sailors of their magnificent vessels to be trained in the Royal Naval Reserve, while continuing to receive their wages from the Peninsular and Oriental Company.

Mr. Digby Seymour

MR. JACKSON said, he would postpone until the next Supply night the Motion of which he had given notice for a Commission of Inquiry into the control and management of the dockyards.

Motion agreed to.

House in Committee.

SUPPLY.—NAVY ESTIMATES.

MR. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,—

“That a sum not exceeding £174,378, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Salaries of the Officers and the Contingent Expenses of Her Majesty's Naval Establishment at Home, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1861.”

MR. W. WILLIAMS, going into the Estimates in detail, called attention to the great increase of several items over the Estimates of last year, especially for the appointment of additional clerks in dockyards at Chatham and Sheerness. He also remarked that, at Portsmouth and at Devonport, a new officer, called an assistant-superintendent, had been created, each with a salary of £800 a year. At Devonport, moreover, there was another new officer, called an acting accountant, with £500 a year, and at the Haslar Hospital an Inspector-general. The increase of this Vote altogether for the salaries of different officers in the dockyards, victualling, and medical establishments was not less than £24,700. The waste and extravagance in this Department could never be justified.

MR. CORRY asked what were the special duties of the assistant superintendents of the dockyards whom it was now proposed to appoint? If they were to be naval officers he did not think they were the best persons to overlook the work of the shipwrights.

SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR also wished to know the distinct grounds on which these new appointments were to be made, and whether it was in consequence of any representations from the superior officers who had the control of our dockyards.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, it was true that the officers in charge of Portsmouth and Devonport had not made any strong representations asking for this additional assistance, but we had now nearly double the number of men working in the dockyards that we had some time ago; and there was a corresponding increase of clerks and officers in almost every department, and it was not reasonable to expect that the chief superintendents, whose correspondence was so enormously increased, could now look over the whole of the work and business of the dockyards, as they did before. He was sorry to say also that several very serious cases of embezzlement had lately occurred; but he was persuaded that if the superintendents, and the officers under them, were not so excessively pressed with an increase of work, they would be better able to ascertain what was going on. It was, therefore, the opinion of the Admiralty, that it would be a piece of good economy to appoint these additional superintendents. But they were about to have a regular inquiry into the dockyards, on the Motion of the hon. Member for Newcastle; an inquiry, which as he trusted, would be conducted by persons of high position, and would embrace the whole consideration of these important matters. It was, therefore, intended not to appoint these officers, until the inquiry should have taken place to see whether it was absolutely necessary or not. He proposed that the amount allotted for their salaries should stand on the Estimates in the meantime. As for the number of additional clerks employed it arose from the extraordinary amount of shipbuilding and other work that had been going on, and if that were to be continued the establishments must be enormously increased; but he trusted it would not always be necessary to make such great exertions in our dockyards, and that the present state of things would prove to be merely exceptional. The Admiralty had, therefore, preferred to provide for it by the employment of temporary clerks.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT expressed his opinion that amongst the half-pay Naval officers who were on shore unemployed the Admiralty could select very competent persons for assistant superintendents of dockyards.

MR. BRISTOW urged that the sum of £1,600 for the salaries of those two officers should be withdrawn from the Vote, if it were not intended to appoint them now.

MR. JACKSON also supported the recommendation to reduce the Vote by that amount.

MR. W. WILLIAMS also appealed to the noble Lord to strike out this item. He did not see why there should be such an extraordinary amount of work just now in our dockyards, for we were told that we had ships enough, and only wanted men.

MR. BENTINCK should be glad to know the number of men discharged from Portsmouth since the commencement of the financial year.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the total number of persons employed in the dockyards on the 1st of March was 20,032; but in the Estimates of 1860-61, the number was only 16,071. The number of shipwrights on the establishment on the 1st of March was 4,057; but the number proposed in the Estimates was 4,000. Of hired shipwrights the number on the 1st of March was 3,632; but in the present Estimates the number was only 1,950.

MR. W. WILLIAMS asked how it was, seeing that a number of men had been discharged in the dockyards, that the charges for clerks was £1,872 more than last year?

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY wished to know the number of the new officers appointed under this Estimate, and the amount of the salaries they were entitled to receive? Would they be entitled to superannuation? Because if they were, and if, after two or three years, the office was found not to answer, the country might be saddled with the officer for life.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the only new offices created were those of two assistant-superintendents, and as they would be naval officers, there would be no superannuation allowance attached to the appointment. The other additions were made under Vote 11, by which a sum was taken for the whole staff of the Director of the Works, each dockyard having its own. There were a number of additional temporary clerks.

SIR HENRY LEEKE said, that hon. Members seemed to forget that the work in the dockyards and in every department of the service had more than trebled within the last two or three years, and he thought it was an excellent plan to appoint assistants to the superintendents.

MR. LYGON said, the business of the dockyards generally had considerably increased, and it was necessary to place Deptford and Pembroke dockyards on the same footing as those of Sheerness and Chatham.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS asked, whether there was any intelligible principle in the appointment or dismissal of the shipwrights? A great many extra men had been engaged, but some of them were dismissed. He wished to know whether the principle of seniority prevailed in respect to this. It was rumoured that private interests were brought to bear in regard to those officers. He hoped that such a rumour was unfounded.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the persons responsible for the discharge of shipwrights were the superintendents of the yard, who invariably retained the best workmen, provided they were not near the age of thirty-five, after which they were not allowed to be placed upon the establishment.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, there was a general impression abroad that there was a great advantage in obtaining the influence of a Member of Parliament in procuring appointments in those dockyards; and that an application by a Member to the Board of Admiralty was frequently successful in obtaining a situation in those places. It was alleged that private influence was often successful in obtaining those appointments without due consideration of the merits of the individuals selected. He thought that no persons should be appointed over those dockyards who were not shown to be fully competent for the office, and who did not understand the building of ships. He wished for some explanation as to the repeated changes that had taken place lately amongst the superintendents of dockyards.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the hon. Baronet did not quite understand the various duties which a superintendent had to perform. If the works of the dockyards were confined to the building of ships it was evident that the individual appointed as superintendent should be thoroughly acquainted with the mode of constructing ships. But ships were not only to be built in those places but also to be rigged and turned out fit for sea. He admitted that in consequence of a chapter of accidents there had been many changes made amongst the superintendents of the dockyards, but those changes were wholly unavoidable. He could assure the hon. Baronet that political influence had not now, nor had it under the late Board of Admiralty, anything to do with dockyard appointments. He believed that those appointments of late years, at all events, depended substantially upon the merits of the individuals themselves.

Mr. Lygon

MR. CORRY wished to know what the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Trelawny) meant by saying that political influence was used in respect of appointments.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, that the right hon. Gentleman would find it stated in a Report of a Committee of the House that "corrupt expedients" had been used in the obtainment of contracts.

MR. CORRY would remind the hon. Baronet that the "corrupt expedients" were not charged by the Committee against the Admiralty or to the late Government, but against a gentleman who had obtained a contract. The Committee to which the hon. Baronet referred was that on steam-packet and telegraph contracts; but neither it nor the Committee which had during the present Session inquired into the petition against the return for Dover accused the late Government of corrupt expedients.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER thought it would be advisable when a Rear-Admiral who was superintendent of the dockyard was promoted, to allow him to continue his five years in office.

MR. FREELAND said, he had had an application made to him with regard to a situation in one of the yards, and he was glad to say that on making inquiries he found that any interference on his part would be rather injurious than otherwise to the person on whose behalf he had been requested to exert himself. He hoped the House would assist the Admiralty in putting a stop to political interference with the dockyards.

MR. JACKSON agreed that it was absurd to remove a superintendent as soon as he had learnt his business.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE found in the Votes, items of £120 per year for Roman Catholic Chaplains in some ports, while in two others he believed the amount was somewhat more. There was also a place fitted up for Roman Catholic worship in some of those ports. The Presbyterians in the navy were ten to one to the Roman Catholics, yet the only item he saw down for a clergyman for the Presbyterians was a sum of £20 paid at Woolwich.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the question of making any increase to the stipends allowed to clergymen was a very serious one. If the Presbyterians in any port made an application to the Admiralty it should receive due consideration.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(1.) £172,778, Salaries and Expenses, Naval Establishments at Home.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £30,953, Salaries and Expenses, Naval Establishments Abroad.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, there was an increase of £2,870 on the Vote; though he could not see that any additional work was done.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the increase was not so large as was supposed by his hon. Friend. An increase had been made in the salaries of the medical officers; and the salary of the Director of Works had been transferred from Vote No. 11 to this Vote.

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,—

“That a sum, not exceeding £1,440,681, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of Wages to Artificers, Labourers, and others employed in Her Majesty's Naval Establishments at Home, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1861.”

MR. LINDSAY said, that unless a satisfactory explanation was given of a statement contained in the Report of the Dockyard Committee which sat last year, he should feel it necessary to move a considerable reduction of this important Vote. In the first place the Committee pointed out the remarkable variation in the charge for wages in different yards, it was stated that the cost of labour for building certain ships at Chatham had been £5 8s. per ton, whereas at Woolwich the cost had been £8 16s. It was moreover stated by four of the members of the Dockyard Committee that the sum expended by private builders in labour would not have been more than £2 12s. per ton—that was, not more than a third that was paid by the Royal Navy.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he would endeavour to show the Committee the reason why the discrepancy existed in the cost of building ships in different dockyards. There was great difference in the price of a vessel built at Chatham and the cost of two others which had been built at Woolwich. It should be observed, however, that these vessels were built in the midst and, he might add, during the confusion of the Russian war. He would state the reason why the vessel built at Chatham (the Cadmus) cost so much less per ton than the vessels built at Woolwich (the Pearl and the Scout). At Chatham there happened to be plenty of timber lying in the yard, which at a very small expense could be converted into the frame of a corvette. At Woolwich, where two similar vessels (corvettes) were built, there was no timber proper for the particular purpose, and old timber, which had originally been prepared for other vessels, had to be altered at considerable expense into the frames of the two vessels. Another circumstance should be taken into consideration, and that was that Chatham was not a fitting yard, whereas Woolwich was; consequently, the vessel at Chatham could be built without interruption, while at Woolwich, where there was a great amount of shipfitting done, the artificers on the two corvettes were continually withdrawn from their work to do something else which it was necessary to do in a hurry. These interruptions necessarily entailed expense. Another cause of the difference of expenso was that at the different yards there was a different system of calculating when a ship was properly prepared; and consequently less money would, of course, have been spent on the less forward vessels, though equally styled “prepared.” It appeared, also, that at the time the vessels were built there was such an excess of duty in the dockyard at Woolwich that certain clerks were appointed to value the expenditure on timber and stores, and, to make a long story short, the account referred to by the hon. Gentleman was not a correct one. The Controller had sent down an experienced officer, and a strict investigation was going on respecting some other vessels mentioned by the Committee which had been alluded to, and the Admiralty were most anxious to improve the system of taking the accounts of vessels.

MR. LINDSAY said, that the statement was satisfactory as far as it went; but though the noble Lord had answered his question with regard to the difference in the price of shipbuilding in Woolwich and Chatham dockyards, but not as to the discrepancy in price between the Government and private yards. But besides that difference of 173s. to 52s. there must be added to the former all the interest in the capital which was sunk in the public yards, inasmuch as every private builder took into his estimate the interest upon the capital engaged in his business. So that the comparison would really stand, not as 52s. against 173s., but as 52s. against 173s.

plus another figure, which would perhaps bring it up to 200s. He repeated that he had received no answer to this important question.

MR. JACKSON said, that even this did not represent the whole case, because the private shipbuilder had rent to pay for his yard, and local taxes, from which the Government were exempt, so that the comparison was extremely favourable to the Government. He had had considerable correspondence with individuals employed in dockyards upon this subject, and was told by one holding a high official position, that every Commission and Committee yet appointed on this subject had been thoroughly humbugged by the dockyard authorities; and, looking at the small results which had accrued from these inquiries, he was inclined to think so too. As a man of business, he felt confident that if the same system were pursued by a manufacturer or a private builder as was maintained in the Royal yards, bankruptcy must very speedily ensue, and not one penny in the pound would be left to pay the creditors. It was a system rotten to the core, and ought to be at once put a stop to.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET read a letter from Mr. Pitcher, the builder of the vessels which were said to have been constructed so extremely cheap. It was dated Northfleet, July 1, 1859, and the writer contradicted a statement which he had seen in The Times, declaring that the expense for building a vessel of war in the merchant yards did not exceed the sum of £2 8s. per ton for shipwrights' labour. Mr. Pitcher said,— "It should be understood that the ships alluded to were mere shells when sent to Her Majesty's yard at Chatham to be fitted as might be required, as the cost of such fittings would depend very much upon the service they were intended for. I am of opinion that the vessels built for the Government in private yards, when compared with those built in the Royal dockyards, according to the evidence published, amounts to very near the same sum for the total completion of the hull; for instance, in the labour for building about 13,500 tons of the gun-vessels at Northfleet, they cost on an average, complete, about £6 per ton."

MR. LINDSAY said, it was no answer to him to read a letter written a month before the Committee made their Report.

LORD LOVAINE said, that the work in a private yard differed entirely from that executed in a Royal dockyard, and you got in the former a much worse article for the money you expended. As far as his experience went, contract vessels were notoriously bad in every instance. He knew nothing more difficult than to keep contractors to the fair terms of their contract. We had seen ships handed over to the Government from private yards which were in a most disgraceful state from incomplete workmanship, which was concealed by several coats of paint. In his opinion, it was far better to pay £8 per ton for a good article than £4 for a bad one.

Mr. Lindsay

MR. LINDSAY observed, that he had advanced no charges against the Royal yards, but had merely quoted a statement made by the Committee appointed by the Government themselves, four out of five of the members being officers in those very yards. It was said that ships built under contract were badly built; but did Her Majesty's ships never stand in need of repairs? Were they not, when at sea, constantly putting into port to be refitted? Did we hear of one of the Cunard or the Peninsular and Oriental Company's boats putting back in every press of wind and requiring large repairs? There were, of course, failings in all establishments, but he questioned very much whether there were so many defects in ships of the first class built in private yards as there were in vessels constructed in the Royal yards at a much higher cost to the country.

LORD LOVAINE referred to some instances of defective workmanship in vessels built by contract.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, that what the noble Lord had stated as to the defects in ships from private yards was perfectly true. It was only the other day that he saw a basket of copper bolts intended for Her Majesty's ship Caroline, which ought to have been eleven inches long, and were only five. Some of the ships built by contract during the last war had since come in for repairs, and it was then found that the planks which ought to have been bent round the bows by the aid of steam had been sawn half way through to facilitate warping. He left the Committee to consider what would be the fate of these vessels in a gale of wind.

MR. JACKSON would like to know what kind of superintendence there could be for such things to be permitted? Three-fourths of the business of this country was done by contract; and he believed there were as honest men in the contracting world as there were noble Lords in the kingdom.

LORD LOVAINE would only say this, that his experience in the navy had not been very long, but his impression decidedly was that there was a great disposition on the part of contractors to give very short measure indeed. Their work required the constant supervision of a most careful eye; and he appealed to any hon. Member acquainted with the subject to confirm his statement. The question of the damages sustained by the navy was an evasion of the original question, which related simply to the imperfection of the original work.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, the noble Lord had not answered the question as to who attended to see whether the work was properly executed or not. If the pay—£400 or £500 a year—of the present superintendents was not sufficient, they ought to give more to get honest men—men who were above being bribed.

LORD LOVAINÉ said, that the gallant Admiral's remarks had confirmed his statement in every respect.

MR. BENTINCK said, that the gallant Admiral had intimated that it was impossible to get an honest man for £500 a year. But the fact was, he had never heard of a man who ever trusted a contractor. This was not a question of impugning the honesty of the contractor; it was their way of transacting business; and the real defect was the want of proper superintendence at the Admiralty. He believed that the work was better done in the dockyards than anywhere else, and that the country got more for their money. He was, however, very much struck with the comparison instituted by the hon. Member for Sunderland between the wear and tear of ships in the navy and those on the lines of packet service. There could be no comparison between the two services in this respect.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY referred to the different cost of vessels in different yards, and said that there was great anxiety to get new ships laid down at certain yards; it was even made a matter of political influence. Looking at the money wasted in times past, the Government ought now to practise economy.

MR. HENLEY wished to know whether it was true that a vessel going out with Admiral Keppel was obliged to put in at Portsmouth, and to be docked for repairs: was that vessel an old or a new vessel; and was it built by contract or otherwise?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET replied,

she was a vessel built at one of Her Majesty's dockyards. She was going a very long distance, and it was desirable that she should be made as perfect as possible; therefore, when a slight leak was discovered in her stern, which would otherwise have scarcely been important enough for such treatment, the vessel was immediately taken into Portsmouth and examined.

MR. HENLEY asked again, was she a new or an old vessel?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, she was quite new. It had been said by various hon. Members that sufficient superintendence was not applied by the Admiralty. There were sometimes as many as a hundred vessels under repair or building at the same time, and if the Admiralty had to supply a superintendent for every boat it would be found an impossibility to comply with such a requisition.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY pointed attention to a discrepancy in the cost of shipbuilding at Woolwich as compared with Sheerness, adding that there was a growing impression abroad that great waste prevailed in the Government dockyards, and that though Parliament voted the money it had nothing like an effective control over the economical expenditure of it.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, an inquiry was now pending as to the difference in cost.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE believed the discrepancies in question were partly due to the different mode of measuring the work done in the various yards, and would be found not so great as they appeared to be. He adverted to the manifest superiority of the workmanship in Her Majesty's as compared with that in private dockyards, citing in proof of that the case of the Agamemnon, which on her return to Plymouth from her memorable voyage on laying the Atlantic telegraph cable, in which she was exposed to a terrific storm under circumstances altogether peculiar, and which would have resulted in the certain destruction of any ordinary ship, was found to require only a few trivial repairs.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS wished for further information as to the ships said to be of equal size but of unequal cost. Inquiry would probably show that there was much more work in some than in others. He thought an improved method of keeping the accounts desirable.

MR. LINDSAY said, that the Admiralty had had eight months to consider the charges in the report of the Committee to which such frequent reference had been made. Under these circumstances he should move that this Vote be reduced by £100,000; he ought to move that it be reduced by two-thirds.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT said, vessels should be able to keep company if they were to be of any service to each other in a fleet, and therefore it was most important they should be made both to sail and steam, and capable of bearing rough or fair weather with equal results.

LORD LOVAINE referred to the gunboats built by contract, and quoted the opinion of a private builder to the effect that the cost was much the same in Government dockyards and in private yards. So far from the cost in private yards being only 48s per ton, it was nearly £6 per ton, including all the fittings.

MR. LYGON also spoke of the economy of the Government yards.

MR. W. WILLIAMS complained that no answer had yet been given by any Member of the Government to the discrepancy which had been pointed out between expenditure relatively in Government and private dockyards.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) were pressed to a division, he should be unable to support it, as he was unwilling, in the present state of public affairs, to withhold from the Government any sum of money which they declared to be necessary in order to carry out the proposed alterations and additions in the navy. At the same time he could not refrain from expressing regret that the Government were not disposed to pay more attention to the Report of the Dockyard Committee appointed by the late Board of Admiralty, which had deservedly attracted considerable notice. In his opinion, the Gentlemen composing that Committee were entitled to the gratitude of the country for the ability and public spirit with which they had conducted their inquiries, and he was sorry that their proceedings should have been ignored in so unaccountable a manner, and that they themselves had been treated with such disregard by the present Board of Admiralty. The only official notice taken of their labours that he had seen consisted of a memorandum written by the present First Lord of the Admiralty, and from its tone of discourtesy and sarcasm towards the Members of that Committee he was induced to think the noble Duke must rather have had in his mind the fact that the Committee had been appointed by his predecessors than any regard to the contents of their Report. He could account in no other way for the course pursued by the Board of Admiralty, who had entered into no explanations, but had continued to act just as if the Committee had never sat, or as if those startling statements which the House had heard that night had never been put forward. Entire disregard of such a document came with peculiarly bad grace from the noble Lord who now held the office of Secretary to the Admiralty, because no one had made such sweeping charges against extravagance in the dockyards as fell from him in the course of last year. He it was who was then loud in his complaints, and who told the House that in the course of the last eleven years £5,000,000 had been wasted by successive Boards of Admiralty. At the time he stated that the noble Lord was bound to sustain the charges which he had made, and he had given notice of his intention to move for the appointment of a Committee, before which the noble Lord could have come face to face with the parties against whom he brought the charges, and would have been compelled either to prove or to withdraw them. But just at that moment the change of Government took place, and the accusation in consequence was merely dealt with by an answer from the Surveyor of the Navy, Sir Baldwin Walker; though, in the absence of closer disproof, he must, in justice to the Committee, say that Sir Baldwin Walker's report entirely negatived the wild and loose assertions of the noble Lord. From the general and well-deserved character for fairness and plain dealing enjoyed by the noble Lord (Lord Clarence Paget), he expected that he would have had the generosity to state that on reflection he found those charges could not be substantiated; but instead of this, he had merely declared in general terms that he adhered to his former statement. He must say he thought the able and zealous labours of the Committee, which tended to throw great light on the important question of dockyard expenditure, had been but ill-requited.

Mr. Lindsay

MR. BRISCOE said, he was desirous of doing all that was possible to reduce the expenditure, but he could not support the Amendment, and he hoped it would not be pressed to a division.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he could not allow the remarks of the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington) to pass unnoticed. So far from the Report of the Committee having been wholly ignored, it had received the careful attention of the Board of Admiralty, and many of their recommendations either had been, or were about to be, carried out. The right hon. Baronet had deprecated the tone of the Memorandum of the noble Duke now at the head of the Admiralty; but he was bound to say that the tone of the Report itself was somewhat offensive to the officers of the dockyards, against whom a very grave accusation was preferred. The Commissioners attributed many of the evils which they stated in detail "to the want of zeal and activity on the part of the officers of the yards." On going over the evidence he had been unable to discover upon what evidence they based this decision, and they themselves admitted that many of their recommendations were unsupported by evidence. The weight attaching to their Report was further shaken by the fact that one of the Commissioners refused to sign it. Then, with regard to the proposal for the appointment of a Committee and his meeting Sir Baldwin Walker face to face, everybody who knew him was aware that, though he would not shrink from it if it was thought proper, he had no desire to enter into any such encounter. This was a very adroit method of turning certain representations which he had made condemnatory of the system into an attack on one individual. It was a very old dodge, but fortunately it would not go down with the House of Commons. He distinctly denied that he had ever attacked Sir Baldwin Walker, and he was surprised that any Member should have imputed such a thing to him. He stated so last year when he was called upon to make the amende honorable to Sir Baldwin Walker. He declined to do so, simply because he had never made any attack or imputation against him. He had last year called the attention of the House to the great cost of shipbuilding, and to the total absence of anything like a detailed account of the expenditure under the Votes 8, 9, and 10. To ascertain the real cost was the great object of his Motion last year, and the present Board of Admiralty, as might be seen by a Return on the table, had done all in their power to promote that end.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, Sir Baldwin Walker had not only been attacked by the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty, but he had written an answer to those attacks. He (Sir Charles Napier) read to the House the attacks of the noble Lord, and he also read Sir Baldwin Walker's answers to them, from which it appeared that not one of the vessels referred to by the noble Lord had been altered by Sir Baldwin. He stated that only two vessels had been altered—the reasons for which he gave—and showed that the cost was not more than £500. The noble Lord spoke of £6,000,000 as unaccounted for; but Sir Baldwin Walker, in his reply, accounted for the whole of that sum, with the exception of £6,000. The noble Lord now thought proper to say that he had made no charges against Sir Baldwin Walker. Whom, then, did he attack? Sir Baldwin Walker, as Surveyor of the Navy, was the person responsible, and the charges could apply to no other. That gallant officer had done more for the navy, and the improvement of ships than any other person. The noble Lord ought to make an apology to Sir Baldwin Walker, and it would have been an honourable thing on the part of the noble Lord had he done so.

MR. JACKSON, in justice to the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty, explained that he had done everything in his power to give him facilities for bringing forward his Motion for a Commission to inquire into the expenditure of the dockyards, though as yet he had not been able to bring the Motion before the House.

MR. MONSELL wished to ask how it was that there was a large amount for wages to be spent in every harbour except that of Haulbowline, which was admirably adapted to make a good harbour, and which would, no doubt, have been much improved if it had been in England, instead of Ireland.

MR. BENTINCK thought that the gallant Admiral (Sir C. Napier) had unnecessarily attacked the Secretary to the Admiralty, who, he recollected perfectly well, had stated in the speech in question that he had no intention to attack Sir Baldwin Walker.

COLONEL DICKSON remarked that this naval expenditure was growing frightful to contemplate, although he believed shipbuilding was carried on better in the Royal dockyards than in private yards. By way of coming to some practical conclusion on the matter, he should vote for the reduction of the Vote as proposed by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay). He also concurred in the complaint of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Monsell) respecting the small amount of money expended on Haulbowline, which he thought was utterly disproportioned to the large amount of taxation contributed by Ireland, and the unrivalled natural capabilities of some of her harbours.

Motion made, and Question,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,340,681 be granted to Her Majesty to defray the Charge of Wages to Artificers, Labourers, and others employed in Her Majesty's Naval Establishments at Home, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1861."

put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(4.) £63,686, Wages in Naval Establishments Abroad.

MR. W. WILLIAMS objected to an increase of £3,010 for the establishment at Hong Kong.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, it was obvious that the additional outlay was rendered necessary by the continuance of the Chinese war.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, an additional outlay upon the dockyard at Hong Kong necessitated the increased Vote.

Vote agreed to.

(5) £3,204,434 Naval Stores.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he wished to say a few words in answer to a very interesting statement of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley), made on a former evening, with respect to the supply of timber in the dockyards. The allegation of the right hon. Gentleman amounted, he thought, to this—that, whereas it was usual in former days to keep a three years' stock of shipbuilding timber on hand for seasoning, successive Boards of Admiralty had neglected their duty in not keeping up that stock, and had reduced their three years' stock to a two years' stock, and that within the last year or two it had been reduced to even less than that. He might say, in the first place, that this was rather an attack upon the right hon. Gentleman's own colleague (Sir J. Pakington), because it would, he believed, be found that in the Estimates of the late Administration no more money was taken for timber than was necessary to keep up a two years' stock at the ordinary consumption. He was, however, prepared to contend that a two years' stock was ample. The right hon. Gentleman had quoted the evidence taken before the Committee on Dockyard Econo-

Colonel Dickson

my, in which certain dockyard authorities had complained that green timber was employed, and that certain ships were built of timber that had not been properly seasoned. The right hon. Gentleman had drawn the inference therefrom that the dockyard authorities themselves were of opinion that the Government did not keep up a proper stock of timber. If the right hon. Gentleman accused the Board of Admiralty of not keeping up an establishment of timber commensurate with the wants of the year, the answer must be that if the Admiralty went on building ships at the same rate as at present it would be manifestly necessary to increase the present establishment of timber. The expenditure of timber expected to take place during the present year was 60,000 loads, and the amount of stock at the commencement of this year was about the same amount—namely, 59,000 loads. In expectation that the consumption this year would be 60,000 loads, the Government had taken a sum of £500,000; so that at the end of this year there would still be two years' stock in hand for ordinary consumption, namely, about 30,000 loads. It might be necessary to explain that circumstances had very much changed since the days when three years' stock was required. The hard foreign woods now used were then comparatively unknown. The English oak was then principally used, and it required greater seasoning than foreign wood. It was cut and purchased upon the spot, and was brought to the dockyards without loss of time; while Italian oak, for example, was cut in a hot climate, the voyage took a certain time, and it was partly seasoned on its way. Two-thirds of the shipbuilding wood now used in the dockyards did not require seasoning; it was foreign timber, like African oak, teak, and mahogany, and therefore no comparison could be made between the stocks formerly in hand and the stocks kept at present. The right hon. Gentleman said that the officers of the dockyard declared that timber ought to be kept three years in stock. [Mr. HENLEY: Some say four.] Well, there was a difference of opinion on that subject. A gentleman, who was an eminent shipbuilder and owner, Mr. Green, who had 30,000 tons of shipping of his own, said, that two years were quite sufficient to season English oak timber, and that it deteriorated after that period. If this were so it was a strong argument for not keeping a stock for more than two years' consumption in hand. The right hon. Gentleman talked as if the Government had only to ask the House for an additional £100,000 and to buy so many thousand more loads of timber. But if they asked Parliament for a larger sum they would not get the timber. The stock of timber was restricted, and the Government could not get above a certain quantity. No doubt, if circumstances were pressing and the Government were obliged to purchase without regard to price, they might obtain an addition to the present supply; but it was no easy matter to increase the quantity of such timber as they required. He admitted that it would be a very great thing if the Government had the means of keeping up a larger supply of timber. It would be unwise for him to state exactly what the Admiralty were doing in this respect, but they were using every possible endeavour to get a more regular and better supply of timber from abroad. In justice to the dockyards, he ought to state that when hon. Members heard of the green wood employed, it was generally confined to one particular timber in a ship which it was very difficult to find at all of a sufficient size, much less of seasoned timber—he referred to rudder pieces. Take a first-rate for example, of which the Admiralty were building a good many. The rudder-piece of a first-rate must be a piece of English oak. It must be 26 feet long and 28 inches square. It had happened lately that as many as six of these rudder pieces were cut up and found defective, for the trees being necessarily of great age were found rotten at the heart. Of teak there was a very large supply, which required no seasoning. One reason why it was not desirable to increase the stock of timber was that we were now building four iron-cased ships; and though he was not prepared to say whether they would fulfil all that was anticipated from them, yet, if they were successful, probably not so many line-of-battle ships would be required, and it was the line-of-battle ships which required the large establishments of timber, for there never was any difficulty in finding timber for frigates, corvettes, and vessels of a smaller class. If these iron-cased ships succeeded, it would be unwise to do what the right hon. Gentleman wished—to increase our establishments of timber merely because we had consumed more than our ordinary quantity within the last two years. He had often heard it stated that the Admiralty did not go to work properly to get their timber cheaply; that they confined themselves to one or two contractors, who charged their own prices. No doubt from the necessity of the case, the contracts did come into the hands of two or three great contractors, who might meet and arrange about the price; but if any landed proprietor or other person of respectability, having a large quantity of proper timber on his estate, or for sale, were to come and make an offer to the Admiralty, they would be very glad to enter into a bargain with him.

MR. HENLEY said, he had given no opinion as to the time timber took to season; he only quoted that of certain officers of Her Majesty's dockyards, and he was quite willing to leave it to be settled between them and the private authorities the noble Lord had quoted, whether it took two years or four years to season oak timber of the largest dimensions. He had not blamed any Board of Admiralty, but had expressly guarded himself from doing so, for he had read the statement of the Storekeeper General as to the enormous difficulty of getting timber, and he could not put it stronger than he had done. What he complained of, however, was that the First Lord should have put it on record that 60,000 loads was a sufficient quantity to keep in stock. The noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty stated most distinctly that we ought to keep two years' consumption in stock; but 60,000 loads would not suffice for that. Sir Baldwin Walker had stated that the proper yearly addition to the navy was three ships of the line, three frigates, and four small vessels, the construction of which would take 32,000 loads of timber; adding to that 10,000 loads for necessary repairs, they would have the total yearly consumption of timber at 42,000 loads; and, as according to the statement of the noble Lord, it would require two years' consumption in stock, it was plain that 60,000 loads was not sufficient. The noble Lord would not find any indication in his speech that three or four years' seasoning was necessary for all kind of timber. African oak, teak, and mahogany, perhaps, he knew could be used almost as soon as imported, and the Italian and Sardinian oak required less seasoning than the English oak; but every master shipwright would tell them that English oak required three or four years' seasoning, nor would any of them venture to say that large 15-inch square timber would be ready to use in two years. The noble Lord admitted that it would be very desirable to obtain as large a stock of timber as possible for the navy, which was all that he (Mr. Henley) contended for, and he was glad to find that their views did not differ on the real point, though they might as to the actual supply.

MR. BENTINCK had already stated that in his opinion the work done in the dockyards was better than that which was done elsewhere, and that we got our money's worth out of those establishments; but he wished to call attention to an item that related to work done out of dockyard by contract—he meant the anchors and chain cables. If he was rightly informed the Admiralty paid a very much larger sum for those articles than they ought to pay. Although there had been a great diminution in the price of iron, there had been no deduction in that paid by the Admiralty to the contractor. He quite admitted that the articles supplied were of the best quality, but that was no reason for paying a much larger sum than they were called on to pay. Great improvements had been made in the machinery used in the construction; but, inasmuch as the Admiralty had obtained no advantage whatever from that circumstance an unnecessary and therefore an objectionable expenditure of money had prevailed in this department. He wished to refer to a Return he had moved for, not with a view of advocating Mr. Trotman's anchors, but to show the price at which the best anchors could be manufactured in the best yards by the best firms. He found that the cost of seventeen anchors of various sizes, made of the best material, was £1,428; while the contract price for the same weight of anchors supplied to the Admiralty, and which were in no way superior, was £3,434, or nearly treble the amount. Amongst other things there was a tender advertised to supply to Her Majesty's navy iron chain-cables and anchors thereto. It was stated that parties intending to make a tender were requested to take notice that the whole supply would not be given to any one firm, but the contract would be equally divided amongst three firms. Now, he was given to understand that so far from that arrangement being carried out, the whole of the contracts had been given to the one and the same firm since 1841 up to the present time, in direct contradiction to the wording of the tenders asked for from the public, and inviting persons to come forward. He believed a discrepancy also existed as to the prices of anchors and chains, between those furnished to the Admiralty and to private yards. He wanted to know whether his information was correct as to those facts.

Mr. Henley

MR. RIDLEY thought it would be a fault on the part of the Government to incur the expense of providing too large a stock of timber for building line-of-battle ships, when the more powerful means of destruction which modern science provided might soon render ships built of timber no longer available for war. They should consider the advantage of building iron ships to meet the improved gunnery of the present day. He wished to know whether the item of £722,000 for timber was for the sole purpose of building line-of-battle ships of timber?

SIR CHARLES NAPIER, referring to the sum of £798,500 for steam machinery, suggested that the ships' bunkers should be furnished with some apparatus for taking in water, when the stock of coal was consumed, in order that the ship might not become so extremely light as to be unable to remain in the proper position. It would not be difficult to provide some apparatus for doing this, and he had experienced the disadvantage of not doing so when he came home in the Duke of Wellington, from the Baltic.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE called attention to another item of considerable magnitude for the building of iron-cased ships, steam vessels, and gun-boats by contract. The noble Lord had said that four iron-cased ships were now building. Did they include all under that head? The Vote taken for that item last year, including the Supplementary Estimate, was £500,000. In the present year it was £640,000, making no less in the two years than £1,140,000. Now, those iron-cased ships had never been tried in actual war: the sum was, therefore, a large one to expend for a mere experiment. He viewed those experiments with no feeling of satisfaction. He thought that they were very apt to make great mistakes in those experiments upon ships as well as upon fortifications. He looked upon the national defences of the country as being best supplied by highly-trained seamen and soldiers. We could not have too many of them. Now the noble Lord ought to consider in what way those experiments of iron-cased ships were to be tested. He knew that France was building ships of that description; but that was not a reason why we should embark in any blind system merely for the purpose of coping with France. He wanted to know the number of those iron-cased ships that had been or were to be built, how many steam vessels, and whether there were to be any gun-boats in addition?

SIR MORTON PETO said, it was the opinion of scientific men that the new inventions in gunnery would alter the whole system of ship-building. He wished to impress on the Government the importance of keeping in view those improvements, in order to guard against not only a useless expenditure of the public money, but also the sacrifice of their seamen's lives by the sinking of a vessel in consequence of a shot through her timbers.

MR. FREELAND inquired, whether at those ports at which the fleet might be expected to rendezvous, such as Milford, Plymouth, Portsmouth, and Sheerness, arrangements had been made for improving our coal depôts, and for getting the coal on board, in case of an emergency, with the least possible delay? He understood that at Portland great efforts had been made to effect these objects. He had, however, been informed that what had been done at Portland must still be regarded as an experiment—that it was still a question whether it was best and most economical that the great ships should go to the coal, or that the coal should be brought to the great ships. He wished to know whether the subject was engaging the attention of the Government? No doubt the question of expense was a serious matter; but it was rumoured that large sums were about to be spent on fortifications, some of which were said to be of questionable value. In the event of war our wooden walls would have to bear the brunt of battle before our stone walls could be required for defence, and he would respectfully submit it to the consideration of the Government whether a portion of the sum to be expended on fortifications might not be advantageously applied to the improvement of our means of getting coals shipped, in case of emergency, with the least possible delay.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET, in reply to the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Admiral (Sir C. Napier) with regard to the putting coals on board men-of-war, said that they had not made any great progress with regard to the mechanical contrivances for the hoisting of coal on board our ships. Our men of war, however, had naturally a large crew on board, and it was marvellous the amount of coals they were capable of conveying into the ship within a very short space of time. They had at Woolwich a very clever machine, which lifted the coal by steam power, and dropped it into the ship. There was one also on board a coal depôt at Portland. With respect to the anchors and chains, it was quite true that the Admiralty had but one manufacturer, the firm of Brown and Lennox; but the reason was that the prices which that firm charged for anchors were lower than those of other manufacturers who had offered their anchors for sale to the Admiralty. The others he would refer to were Mr. Rogers, Mr. Porter, and Mr. Trotman. The price charged by Brown and Lennox for an anchor suitable for a 90-gun ship was £2 16s. 6d. per cwt., whereas Mr. Rogers charged £2 18s., and Mr. Porter £3 5s. Anchors of a smaller class were sold by Messrs. Brown and Lennox at £2 3s., and by Mr. Rogers at £2 4s., while Mr. Porter charged £2 8s., and Mr. Trotman £2 10s. This showed that the anchors which were purchased of Brown and Lennox were of the cheapest quality. He did not mean to say, however, that it would be unadvisable to consider the propriety of opening this contract. The hon. Member for Sunderland, however, when he said the other night that, taking the average of four different classes of anchors, the Admiralty were paying 180s. per cwt., made a great mistake. He added the prices of the four different classes together, in order to take the average, but he forgot to divide the amount again by four, so that he made the result four times as great as it really was. The real average, instead of being 180s., was 45s., which made rather an important difference. With regard to the question that was put by his hon. Friend opposite (Sir W. Jolliffe), who asked what was the cost of these enormous ships that were being built, there were four iron-cased ships that would cost £734,325, and their engines would cost £210,075; making a total of £944,400, merely for the hull and machinery of the four vessels. Then there were 6 sloops of 200 horse power, which would cost £88,574, and their engines £60,000. There were 12 gun-vessels of 80 horse power, which would cost £119,255 for the hulls, and £48,960 for the machinery; and there were 10 gun-boats of 60 horse power each, costing £62,383, and their engines £32,235; making a total of 6 ships, 12 gun-vessels, and 10 gun-boats, costing £271,000, and £141,000 for their engines and machinery; and the grand total of the vessels building by contract, including their engines, but exclusive of fitments, was a cost of £1,355,875. His hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Ridley) asked what wooden vessels they were building? There were 11 line-of-battle ships, 5 corvettes, 15 sloops, and 23 gun-vessels and gun-boats.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, the evidence produced before the Select Committee over which he had lately presided showed that as far as anchors and cables were concerned, the Royal Navy was admirably served. He wished to know whether it was proposed that the navy should be supplied with apparatus for the consumption of smoke. He believed that machinery for the perfect attainment of that object could now be obtained.

MR. LINDSAY said, he had the same objection to this Vote that he had to some of the others, namely, that they did not get full value for their money. They paid for their anchors 94s. per cwt., and he believed that was 100 per cent more than they could get anchors and cables of equal quality for. Until he called the attention of the House two years ago to the subject, he believed the Admiralty were under the impression that there were only two firms in England who could construct steam-engines for ships; but now there were a dozen firms tendering, and he believed that the same result would follow if they wanted the leading firms to tender for the supply of anchors and cables.

LORD LOVAINE asked, whether it was intended to introduce into the navy the use of super-heated steam?

MR. H. A. BRUCE asked what course was taken with regard to the tenders for coals. It was well known that from the same pit, coals of various qualities were obtained, and the great steam-packet companies had agents to see that they got the coal from the vein they wanted it from. Government ought to adopt the same course. He did not think, however, that public tender was the best mode of obtaining coal. It was perfectly notorious that the best coal was not supplied to Her Majesty's navy.

MR. CORRY agreed with his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) that 60,000 loads of timber were not a sufficient establishment for the dock-yards. Although it was true, as stated by the Secretary to the Admiralty, that foreign timber did not require seasoning to the same degree as English timber, yet, as our supply from abroad might be interrupted at any time, care ought to be taken to have a large stock always on hand.

MR. BENTINCK said, that a great discrepancy existed between the statement he had made on a former occasion with regard to the price of anchors and the answer of the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty. He understood the noble Lord to say that the prices under the Admiralty contract were lower than those offered by other parties. In 1841 the prices of anchors offered to be supplied to the Admiralty appeared from a list he had in his hand to be 20s. per cwt., while the price of the Admiralty contract was 44s. per cwt., or rather more than double.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the case was so in 1841, but since then the contract prices had been greatly reduced. Three frigates were now being fitted with engines with an apparatus for superheating steam. An engineer had recently been appointed to inspect every cargo of coal put on board a ship, and ascertain that the coal was of the denomination specified in the contract, was properly screened, and was free from dust. He made a weekly report, and since his appointment there had been no complaints of the coal supplied to the fleet. The Admiralty were willing to adopt any economical plan for consuming smoke, and at the present moment several vessels were fitted with various descriptions of smoke-consuming apparatus.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT observed that about £400,000 was to be expended on coal in the ensuing year. He thought that stringent orders should be given that ships should not use steam except when compelled to do so; for, besides the economy, it would be of great advantage both to officers and men to have a little more practice under canvass.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON wished for some further information with respect to the four iron steam-vessels ordered by the Admiralty. The first of these vessels was ordered by the late Government, and he understood the second was to be of the same class, size, and character. He had been informed, however, that the two others were to be different in size and character, and he wished to know what would be their tonnage and the strength of their iron coating. He should also be glad to hear when these vessels would be finished.

Lord Clarence Paget

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said that he should be glad to see at the Admiralty any firms prepared to make proposals with respect to anchors and chains. With respect to the iron-cased ships the one ordered by the right hon. Baronet ought to have been launched by this time; but some delay had occurred in consequence of the novel construction of the stern-post, the one which was first put in not proving strong enough. He believed that she would be launched in the beginning of July. With regard to the others, he was not prepared to say when they would be ready, but all of them were contracted for. The tonnage of the Warrior and the Black Prince was 6,035 tons each; and of the Resistance and the Defence 3,668 tons each. The Warrior and the Black Prince would carry thirty-six guns, and the two smaller ones, the Resistance and the Defence, would carry sixteen guns. Their scantling was the same, and there was the same thickness in the iron plates.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE complained that the engineers in the navy set their faces against smoke-consuming apparatus, and hence inventors did not get fair play.

Vote agreed to.

The House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

SIR JOHN BARNARD'S ACT, &c., REPEAL BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved the second reading of this Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed—"That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. BENTINCK objected to proceeding with the measure at so late an hour (twenty-five minutes past twelve o'clock), and moved that the debate be adjourned.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought that if they were to make any progress at all in business there was no reason why they should not now proceed with Sir John Barnard's Act Repeal Bill. The question involved had been debated twice before, and he must persist in going on with the measure.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided :—Ayes 67 ; Noes 156 : Majority 89.

Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. BOVILL said, that three totally different explanations of the object of that measure had been given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Secretary to the Treasury, and the Solicitor General respectively. The principle of the Bill was an important one—namely, whether gambling of the worst description should be sanctioned by the Legislature, and as it was impossible that it could be duly discussed at that late hour he should move that the House do now adjourn.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would not persevere in his Motion, after the unmistakeable proof they had just had of the sense of the House on the subject. The importance of this Bill had been greatly exaggerated. The Act was only suggestive of qui-tam actions and bills in Chancery. It had been stated, and the statement remained uncontradicted, that the Gambling and Wagering Act provided an efficient guard against gambling and wagering, so far as by law the prevention could be effected. Therefore, in repealing this Act, they would only place the British funds on the same footing as every other kind of property. It was absurd to enact that it should not be lawful to contract for the sale of property not in the possession of the person contracting to sell it. Was a merchant not to contract on the 1st of January to deliver to another on the 1st of February, cotton, or indigo, or wool, or sugar, unless it was in his possession at the time of the contract? It was lawful to do so at present with regard to all property excepting the British funds. Lord Tenterden once laid it down that such a contract was void in law to whatever kind of property it related. That decision was speedily reversed, and the observation was made from the Bench that if such a rule were adopted it would be fatal to half the commerce of London. Why did not the learned Gentleman propose to extend the Act to every other kind of executory bargain? Either the Act ought to be repealed or it ought to be extended. He trusted that the House would proceed to business, and pass its judgment on the matter instead of interposing these delays.

Motion made and Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."

The House divided:—Ayes 60 ; Noes 153 : Majority, 93.

Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

An Hon. MEMBER moved that the debate be adjourned.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY remarked, that whatever the House might think, the public would say the object of these Motions was to get rid of the third reading of the Church Rate Bill which stood lower on the paper. The House had passed judgment on the measure, and the sooner the Bill was in the other House the better.

MR. ADDERLEY rose to order. The hon. Baronet was not entitled upon the Motion for Adjournment to speak upon a Bill which was not the subject of the Motion.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Baronet was not out of order.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY : The debate on Sir John Barnard's Act was made the means of attacking the Church Rate Bill. There must be other divisions ; but let it be clearly understood that they were church rate divisions.

MR. COLLINS protested against the assertion that the divisions were on the church-rate question. He had voted twice, and both times on Sir John Barnard's Act. It was too late to go on with the discussion at one o'clock in the morning.

MR. BOVILL said, that in making the Motion for adjournment the subject of church rates had never entered into his mind, but he moved it in order that the principle of the Bill of Sir John Barnard might be fully and fairly discussed. The Solicitor General had expounded a principle totally different from that of the Secretary of the Treasury, who told them it was intended by the Bill to legalize transactions in time bargains, which were really gambling transactions, which was a statement entirely different from that made by the Solicitor General.

MR. JOHN LOCKE thought the hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer might make his speech in a few minutes, and the House might dispose of the Bill that evening.

MR. MALINS said, he should be sorry to be misunderstood to be in favour of Sir John Barnard's Act because he had voted in the minority upon the last division. He so voted because he thought that those who objected to it were entitled to express their opinions upon it, and it had been an understood rule that no opposed business should be taken after twelve o'clock.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. and learned Gentleman was wrong as to the rule he supposed to prevail, for if no opposed business were taken after twelve o'clock the Government would not be able to proceed with their measures. The hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock was perfectly willing to go on with the Church Rate Bill at this hour. He denied that the clear and lucid statement of the Solicitor General was at all in contradiction with that given by the Secretary to the Treasury. A zealous minority might induce a prudent majority to think that the best course was to give way and go home, but the public took its own notice of such proceedings. After the determination that had been exhibited, however, he should, for the comfort of the House, give way, and would not now proceed with the Bill, but he must deny that it was at all a measure for the encouragement of gambling. It was one simply to legalize transactions on the Stock Exchange, which had long been virtually legal.

SIR FITZROY KELLY considered that those who had a conscientious objection to the Bill had not been fairly dealt with. The effect of the Bill would be to legalize a system of gambling against law and morality, and the matter ought to be fully considered before Sir John Barnard's Act was repealed. The assimilation to an executory contract for goods was quite inconsistent, and wanting in analogy.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

CHURCH RATES ABOLITION BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY moved the third reading of the Church Rates Abolition Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he could not believe that the hon. Baronet was serious in proposing to take that stage of the Bill at so late an hour. There was no wish to offer anything like a factious opposition to it, but it could not be expected that so important a Bill could be read a third time without discussion at half-past 1 o'clock. He moved that the debate be adjourned.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he could not consent to postponing the Question to that day three months, which would practically be the case. He resisted the adjournment unless the Government would give him a morning sitting.

MR. BENTINCK could not conceive how the right hon. Gentleman connected Sir J. Barnard's Act with any opposition to the Church Rates Bill. He took the course he had adopted because he thought the proposal an immoral one.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON suggested whether there would be any objection to taking the debate on Tuesday morning.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 76 ; Noes 131 : Majority 55.

Question again proposed "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. LYGON then moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."

The House divided:—Ayes 73 ; Noes 124 : Majority 51.

Question again proposed, "That the Bill be now read a third time."

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT suggested that the third reading of the Bill should be adjourned to Friday week, which was the first open day.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY announced that he would follow his original intention of proceeding with the Bill on the first available opportunity, and he would therefore put down the third reading for to-morrow evening.

Motion made, and Question proposed,—
"That the Debate be adjourned till Friday next, at Twelve of the Clock."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

House adjourned at Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, April 20, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—3^a Marriages (Extra-Parochial Places.)

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY WITH FRANCE.

OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

MOTION POSTPONED.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, that in reference to his Motion which stood for that evening on the subject of the recent Correspondence between Earl Cowley and the Foreign Secretary respecting the annexation of Savoy, and the subject of Official and Private Correspondence, he had been placed in a situation of embarrassment by a communication which had been made to him by his noble Friend (Earl Granville). It was impossible that he could resist the appeal which had been made to him to postpone his Motion, but he must at the same time throw himself on the kind disposition of his noble Friend, and also on the indulgence of the House, in fixing another day on which he might be enabled to bring forward the Motion of which he had given notice. The appeal made to him was founded on the fact that Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris, intending to come over to assist at the discussion, was detained at Calais, owing to the state of the weather, which prevented the mail packet putting to sea. It appeared that Lord Cowley regarded the notice as an intended censure ; he (the Marquess of Normanby) had therefore announced to him that such was very far from his intention and from the scope of his Motion, and, unless it were perfectly convenient for him, he need not be present. However, the noble Earl was now at Calais. Monday, which had been named by his noble Friend, would be very satisfactory to him, if that could be fixed for the discussion, but he found so many Motions fixed for that day that he should be glad to know what disposition there was in the House to facilitate that arrangement.

EARL GRANVILLE observed that the following telegram had just been received from his noble Friend Earl Cowley, dated Dover 4.30 :—

"Does Lord Normanby persist in his Motion for to-night? I am only this moment arrived, and as I have not yet taken my seat it is impossible for me to be in the House to-night. If Lord Normanby persists, pray say to the House that I wished to be present and have come over on purpose."

As his noble Friend had not yet taken his seat it would be more convenient to postpone the matter till Monday.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY inquired if his noble Friend the Marquess of Clanricarde, who had a notice on the paper for Monday, would give way.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that the Motion of which he had given notice for Monday, appeared to him to be of far more importance than that of his noble Friend. It was on the subject of India; and the people of India complained of too little notice being taken of their affairs in Parliament, and the question to which he was to call attention was very important. If the object of the noble Marquess was to pass a vote of censure and charge the Government of course he would give way; but the abstract Resolution of which the noble Marquess had given notice was one which might as well be discussed that day month: He asked if it could not be brought on after his Motion had been disposed of?

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, that his Motion, though not intended as a vote of censure either upon the Government or upon Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris, was most important, as affecting the conduct of our diplomatic relations, and he thought he should be able to show that if the recognized principles which should regulate such relations had been observed on the occasion referred to, matters would not have been in the present predicament. He had no objection to proceed with the discussion that evening, if their Lordships were of opinion that that was the best course to pursue; but he was not prepared to consent to the proposition of the noble Marquess opposite that his Motion should come on at the close of a long debate upon India.

EARL GRANVILLE said, it would be extremely inconvenient to Lord Cowley, and in some measure injurious to the public service, that the Motion should be postponed beyond Monday next; and under those circumstances he hoped that the noble Marquess near him (the Marquess of Clanricarde) would postpone the Motion which stood in his name for that day.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he should not object to act upon the suggestion of his noble Friend, inasmuch as it was based upon the ground of convenience to the public service.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, that another difficulty had arisen in reference to the debate to take place on Monday next. He had found from his noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) that the Divorce Bill was fixed for Committee on Monday evening, and that it was his intention that it should be brought on. The subject of the Divorce Court would therefore take precedence unless his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack would consent to its postponement.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that
The Marquess of Clanricarde

so far as he was concerned, he should be most willing to postpone the Committee on the Divorce Bill till a later hour of the evening in order that the noble Marquess might have precedence; but he must for the credit of the House protest against its being supposed that they could not entertain more than one subject on any evening. He must refuse to enter into any arrangement of that sort.

LORD ST. LEONARDS then said the Divorce Bill must keep its place in the paper.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he must again appeal to his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack to postpone the Divorce Bill to another evening. It would be very inconvenient to many noble Lords if a discussion on another subject should precede the one of which he had given notice.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he would repeat that, so far as he was concerned, he was willing to postpone the Bill to a later hour of the evening, and he could do no more than that.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY then fixed his Motion for Monday.

GENERAL DECAVERO.

EXPLANATION.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he wished for a moment to call the attention of the House to a personal explanation which he had to make in reference to a letter which he had only yesterday received from General Decavero, who lately held the office of Minister for War in Tuscany, in answer to a communication which he had addressed to the gallant General six weeks ago. In that communication he had stated to General Decavero that great complaints had been made with respect to his conduct as War Minister, in several letters which had reached him (the Marquess of Normanby) from correspondents in Florence in whose statements he placed the utmost reliance; remarking at the same time that, if the General would send him every authentic information showing that he had no knowledge of the irregularities of which complaint was made, and which were said to have taken place during the last autumn, he would take the earliest opportunity of offering an explanation on the subject in public. Now, in the letter which he had received from General Decavero a most distinct disclaimer of the charges which had been advanced against him was contained; while a further statement, it appeared, was made, on the authority of the present Minister for War, to the effect that the contracts for the Commissariat did not come under the direct control of the person who occupied the position which he filled. He, under these circumstances, felt bound, while declining in the present agitated circumstances of their country to give up the names of his correspondents, to express the regret which he felt at having stated anything which could have caused pain to General Decavero, and to say that he most frankly accepted his distinct disclaimer of the truth of the reports to which he alluded. In justification of his correspondents, however, he must add that their statement as to the dilapidated condition into which the finances of Tuscany had fallen was based not upon their own authority, but rested on the official report of the Minister of Finance. It could be shown by the Acts of the Finance Department to what an awful extent the Tuscan finances had been burdened by unprofitable expenditure. The expenditure of the War department alone had been 17,000,000 Tuscan lire—more than half of the entire revenue under the Grand Duke.

House adjourned at Six o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, April 20, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1. Newspapers, Conveyance, &c.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

QUESTION.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty when it is likely the Report of the Royal Commissioners on the management of Greenwich Hospital will be laid upon the Table?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he was informed by his hon. Friend, the Vice-President of the Board of Trade, that the Report would be ready to be laid before the Admiralty in about a week, and he hoped that within a day or two after it would be laid upon the Table.

Moved, That the House at its rising do adjourn till Monday next.

CHURCH RATES BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he wished to ask the hon. Baronet the Member for Tavistock whether he intended to proceed with the Church Rates Bill that evening; and if not—as he could hardly suppose that he would—whether he would fix a day which the House generally might recognise as a proper one on which to take the discussion upon the third reading of that Measure?

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY replied that, as at present advised he was disposed to take his chance that evening; but that if there was a general wish that he should postpone the third reading of the Church Rates Bill, and if he could arrange with the Government that it should come on upon a particular day, he should not object to take that course.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I was not in the House when this question was brought forward last night; but I can assure the hon. Baronet that, so far as I am concerned—and I know I speak the opinions of many hon. Gentlemen on this side—there is not the slightest wish on their part to offer any impediment to the fair discussion of the important question in which he is interested. But a full and fair discussion we certainly have a right to ask. And, while I should be very happy myself to assist in any way to bring about a fair discussion, I protest against any hon. Member, entrusted with the conduct of so important a Measure, attempting to force it upon the consideration of the House at an hour when it is utterly impossible that anything like such a discussion could take place. If the hon. Baronet, who has always been a very fair opponent, will take into consideration the circumstances under which this question is now brought before the House, he will see that they are very different from those under which it formerly engaged its attention. No one on either side of the House will deny, all hon. Members will agree, that there has been a great exhibition of public feeling on both sides of the question. We have had before us nearly 10,000 petitions, with nearly a million of signatures; and I am sure that there is no one on either side of the House who would not speak with due and proper respect of such a demonstration of public feeling. Is it unreasonable, therefore, that under such circumstances we, who are opposed to the policy recommended by the hon. Baronet, should require that the third reading of such a Measure should be submitted to the House at a time when a full and fair discussion of its principles and objects could take place, and when the feeling which is exhibited out of doors could be adequately represented in the House? I therefore trust that the hon. Baronet will not resume a course which would be looked upon as very vexatious, by attempting at too late a hour of the night to introduce such a question. At the same time I distinctly say that if any arrangement can be made by which the question may be brought forward on Friday, by an understanding with hon. Gentlemen who have notices of Motion for that evening, I shall be in favour of it. There is another consideration which we have a right to look for, namely, that a fair, not an unreasonable, notice shall be given to the House generally of the day on which the third reading will take place. If by any understanding we can arrive at some satisfactory conclusion on that head, I shall myself be very glad. The more the question is discussed, the more public attention is fixed upon it, so much the better for the cause I wish to uphold. We have a right, therefore, to assume that the third reading will not be moved at too late an hour of the night, and that it will not be brought forward without reasonable notice.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he also would appeal to the hon. Baronet not to bring forward the question at a late hour of the night.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, that on the previous night he had taken the liberty of suggesting to the hon. Baronet that he would do well to take next Friday, but the hon. Baronet objected, on the ground that there would be so many notices of Motion that the question might again be put off until a late hour. There was, however, a mode by which that difficulty could be overcome—namely, that the House should resolve, that the third reading, being an order of the day, should have precedence of the notices of Motion on Friday next. He thought, under the circumstances, the hon. Baronet had a right to expect that the House would concede so much.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he was willing to adopt the suggestion, and gave notice accordingly that he would move that the third reading be taken before the notices of Motion on Friday next.

Mr. Disraeli

IMPRISONMENT OF CHILDREN.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. T. J. MILLER said, he rose to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the operation of the Police Act, in reference to the imprisonment of young children for playing at games in the streets. By the provisions of the Act to which he alluded, it was enacted that all persons found playing in the streets should be sent to prison for not exceeding one month, unless they could pay a fine of not exceeding 40s. The House would be surprised to hear that under that Act, no fewer than forty-four children were sent to prison in the metropolis last year, and since the commencement of this year twenty-five had been sent to prison. He would mention particularly two or three of these cases. George Dunn, aged twelve years, was sent to gaol for five days for playing at a game called "rounders" in which the boys stood in a ring and knocked a ball from one to another. When the policeman saw them, he was bound by the Act to take them into custody. It generally happened that the smallest child of the number was the person taken and made prisoner, because the others were old enough and their legs were long enough to run away; but the little one, with the shortest legs, was captured. Another case was that of John Evans, aged twelve. He was sent to prison for seven days for playing at "tipcat." That was a game in which a short piece of stick was knocked with another stick, to throw it as far as possible. Cases of imprisonment for these offences occurred very frequently, and the prisons were really crowded with them. In almost every one of these cases the children had been guilty of no other offence than that of playing at these games; and although they might be good and honest children when they were sent to prison, they were almost sure to come out more or less contaminated by the society with which they had mixed. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary might ask him to point out a remedy for this, but it would be presumptuous in him (Mr. Miller) to point out the remedy when the right hon. Gentleman himself, with all the appliances of his office, was so well able to provide against the evil. He would rather rely on the well-known humanity and intelligence of the right hon. Gentleman himself. He believed that the necessity for imprisoning children for playing games in the street was not found to exist in any other county except Middlesex, and even in Middlesex children were never imprisoned from certain quarters of the metropolis, while multitudes of the children of other quarters were sent to prison. He had ascertained from the mayor of Manchester that to the honour of that populous city, that although since 1844 it had possessed an Act giving the police magistrates of that city the same powers as were given to those of London and Middlesex, they had never found it necessary in any one case to carry these powers into effect. Nevertheless the city had a population of 400,000 or 500,000 persons, and a vast number of poor, whose children played in the streets; but if any annoyance existed, a remedy was found for it without converting honest children into thieves. He believed the games for which these children were sent to prison had been invented since the Police Act was passed; at any rate, the Act never contemplated sending children to prison for playing those games. He would impress on the right hon. Gentleman and on the House the ruinous effects, both on society and on the children themselves, of sending them to prison for such a trivial cause. It created criminals, and inverted the intention of punishment. Instead of deterring from crime, it broke the heart of the child and stamped him as a criminal for life. He was locked up and became the associate of felons, and never got rid of the stain which was thus cast upon him. In this way the prospects of the child and of the man were ruined, and society was yearly supplied with a large number of criminals. The facts which he had stated were such as he could verify, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would receive them in a fair spirit, and find some remedy for this disgrace to our criminal code.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to say a few words in support of the remonstrances of his hon. Friend behind (Mr. Miller). He really thought there must have been some mistake as to the meaning of those provisions of the Metropolitan Police Act. There was no question upon which public opinion had been more completely agreed for the last few years than upon the impropriety of exposing children to the contaminations of a prison. This was held to be upon every ground most undesirable, and it was absolutely shocking that young children should be sent to prison and exposed to all this danger because they had carried on their little sports in the street, they having unhappily, no other place, in all probability, to resort to for the purpose. Some mode might surely be devised of checking any improper indulgence of this kind, without sending the children to prison, and he wished the right hon. Gentleman would consider the subject.

MR. SLANEY suggested that it would be a great public benefit if places were provided in large towns in which children could amuse themselves. It would conduce equally to their health, their comfort, and their morals. If the Government would set such a movement on foot he was sure that private benevolence would assist in carrying it out. He thought an impartial Committee should be appointed to consider the subject.

SMITHFIELD MARKET.

QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the consent of the Government is likely to be given to any proposition of the Corporation of the City of London to build over the site of Smithfield Market, whether for a Dead-Meat Market or for any other purpose? In 1856 a Committee was appointed to ascertain what would be the best appropriation for the general advantage of the metropolis of so much of the site as reverted to the Crown, and the opinion of that Committee was that the existing site of Smithfield should be kept free from buildings.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHARITIES.

QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was anxious to put a question to the Home Secretary respecting Roman Catholic charities. There was a Bill before the House having reference to them, and at the conclusion of the last Session the House decided that the present Act, which limited them to the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners should cease on the 1st of July. As time was running on perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would then, or at some other time convenient to him, inform the House what course the Government intended to recommend with respect to the subject.

PRIZE FIGHTING.—QUESTION.

MR. W. EWART said, that he felt he owed the right hon. Gentleman an apology for troubling him with a legal question, but he would beg leave to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether the Government could not adopt some means by legislation, if the existing law did not suffice, for preventing the recurrence of such scenes as the one which had lately taken place for determining the "Championship of England"? He wished to know from the Home Secretary how far the parties promoting such contests were amenable to the law as abettors and accessories before the fact. He believed that there was a lingering notion in the minds of many persons that the continuation of these "prize-fights" was favourable to the manliness of the English character. That there was any truth in such a notion he distinctly denied. In 1800, Mr. Windham opposed a Bill to abolish bull-baiting, stating that the abolition of such sports would be "destructive to the English character," and went so far as to affirm that sports like those were "favourable to the continuance of the connection between Church and State." There was no fear of such an argument in favour of such cruelty being brought forward in the present time; but he should like to know, now that many barbarous sports had been abolished, whether the manliness of the English character had suffered deterioration, or whether, on the contrary, the British soldiers had not shown more bravery than ever in their recent campaigns in the Crimea or in India. He acknowledged that the public took a deep interest in these matters, and he was ready to admit that no person could attend the prize fighting meetings or read the account of them without feeling a certain amount of interest in them. So they might even in a Spanish bull-fight. If by any magic power we could revive the scenes of ancient Rome, and be transported into the Coliseum to witness the encounters of the gladiators, it would be impossible, however much persons might be opposed to them, not to feel a deep interest in them. But this was no evidence that our judgment or our conscience approved of them. He objected to the late contest being regarded as an international contest. Such encounters could do no good to either country. If we were to have an importation of pugilists, he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would put the highest duty possible upon the imported article. He was grateful to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, and to the police, who seemed to have exerted themselves to the utmost to prevent the recent encounter, and he hoped that in future they would be more successful. He would also express his regret at hearing that one of the railway companies had given great facilities to the parties engaged in the violation of the public peace. He thought their conduct deserving of grave censure, the more so as on a previous occasion they had done the same in defiance of the orders of the Home Office, and the solicitations of the magistrates.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, the various topics which had been already introduced into this evening's discussion, in which they had gone from boys' games in the streets up to prize-fighting—"from pitch-and-toss to manslaughter"—was an apt illustration of the variety of subjects that might be discussed in that Assembly, upon the Friday's Motion for an adjournment until Monday. He thought it was disgraceful that two human beings should be allowed, in open day, for two hours and a half, to pommel each other in one of the most civilized counties in England, without the interference of any magistrate. It could not be said by the Home Secretary that it was impossible to prevent so gross a public outrage, and the absence of a magistrate afforded no excuse. Now, if such a fight had occurred in his own country [Laughter], he repeated if such a brutal business had occurred in Ireland, there would have been an outcry against the Irish as a nation of savages. Much milder offences against public propriety in Ireland had given rise to much more severe language. If unpaid magistrates would not interfere to put down these disgraceful scenes, why not imitate the Irish law, by the appointment in every county of resident stipendiary magistrates, whose duty it should be to do so? It was idle to say that the scene of the fight could not be ascertained beforehand. Was there a single Member of this House who, at 2 o'clock on Tuesday morning, could not have gone there if he had chosen? He was not in the way of such things at all; but he was sure that he could have gone, and he might have figured there with impunity, because if the newspapers had even inserted his name as being present not one of his constituents would have believed them. [Laughter.] There was a time when a speech against duelling would have been received in that House with shouts of even greater derision than had greeted his present remarks ; but the time would assuredly come when prize-fighting would sink into equal disfavour with duelling. He did not wish to attack the English character in making these observations. Indeed, he had heard that both these gentlemen—what were their names ? [Cries of "Sayers," "the Benicia Boy"]—that Sayers and the Benicia Boy were both Irishmen, and that Morrissey, who beat the Benicia Boy in America, was also an Irishman. All he could say was that these persons were a disgrace to their country. He thought that such exhibitions were as bad as the gladiatorial displays in old Rome, and it was due to the civilization of England that they should be put a stop to. He trusted that the Home Secretary would endeavour to have this subject treated in a more serious mood.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS : I will first answer the question put respecting the commitment of boys for playing in the streets of London. I understood the hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. Miller) to exclude from his remarks all games of chance; but the number of commitments under the Vagrant Act for playing in the streets at games of that description is considerable, and among the persons so committed there are many boys and young persons. To that class of offenders the hon. Gentleman does not address his remarks. As to the other class convicted under the Police Act, there seems to be no complaint of the commission of any illegality by the authorities. It is not imputed to the police that they have exceeded their powers, or to the magistrates that they have committed boys for acts which do not come within the scope of the statute. Nor does the question seem to point to any alteration in the law ; it is merely one affecting the discretion of the persons who administer the law. Now, I have communicated with the Chief Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police on the subject, and he states that there has been no increase in the strictness with which the law on this subject has been of late years administered. On the contrary, his instructions have been to administer it with great lenity. But in the crowded streets of London great inconvenience often arises from these games, which may be the means of inflicting serious injury on persons passing along the streets, and often frighten horses, with very serious consequences both to life and property. For the convenience and safety of passengers, therefore, it is absolutely necessary that the law should not be allowed to lie perfectly dormant. There must be some exercise of power on the part of the police, and some punishment must in such cases be inflicted by the magistrates, when the boys are brought before them. It is impossible to send children for a long period to a reformatory, and the only punishment possible, therefore, is a short period of imprisonment. My own feeling is, that the best mode of dealing with those cases would be by the infliction of a slight corporal punishment upon the boys who are charged with this offence ; but I do not know whether the law would warrant that punishment. I will make inquiry into the number of cases; but the information which I have received, makes me believe that there has been no undue severity in the application of the law.

The hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. W. Ewart) has made a speech condemning the practice of prize-fighting, and travelling over a wide range of topics, but he ends by simply asking me what is the law upon the subject. An hon. Gentleman (Mr. V. Scully), following him, has expatiated still more widely on the subject, and has expressed his opinion that it is utterly impossible that any event of this sort could have occurred in that part of the kingdom with which he is more immediately connected. He certainly adverted, in passing, to the slight accident that both the combatants on this occasion were Irishmen. However, without narrowing the question in that manner, I would take leave to call his attention to the fact that those who deliberately defend the practice of prize-fighting, do so, I apprehend, on this ground:—They say that it affords a model of fair fighting between two persons who engage in a pugilistic encounter ; that it lays down certain rules which may be observed by all who fight in a less regular manner; that in the fights arising out of quarrels, which must be frequent in every community, the rules laid down by the professional members of the ring are looked to for guidance; that in that way you avoid the casualties which are inflicted where similar rules are not observed; and that an inducement is thus afforded for the adoption of a mode of fighting much better than the bowie knife, the stiletto, or, even, let me add, the shillelagh, the use of which, I understand, is not very uncommon in Ireland. There certainly did occur in former years, and perhaps do now sometimes occur, encounters at Irish fairs, which the hon. Gentleman must admit are somewhat more dangerous to the public peace than encounters such as we are now considering. Having merely adverted to what fell from the hon. Gentleman, I will now answer the question of my hon. Friend behind me as to what is the state of the law. I do not find there is the slightest doubt that a fight of this nature is an illegal act. It is clearly a breach of the peace. An assemblage of persons to aid and abet such a breach of the peace is an unlawful assemblage, and any person present and taking part in it may undoubtedly be indicted for a misdemeanour. It has not been the habit of the Government of this country to institute prosecutions in cases of this sort, even at a time when they were much more common than they are now, and therefore more likely to cause inconvenience and confusion. But it is open to the local authorities, when any fight takes place, to institute a prosecution in the ordinary way, and bring the matter before the proper tribunals.

Now, as to the question of the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Hanbury) respecting the site of Smithfield Market, I must say that the matter is not so simple as he seems to think. It is true there was a grant from Charles I. to the City of the site of Smithfield for a market, but it is held by the Government that when the site of Smithfield ceases to be used as a market the ground, according to the terms of the grant, reverts to the Crown. The City does not admit that construction, and questions the right of the Crown to re-enter. The Crown, under those circumstances, could only re-enter after litigation, and the course of which the Government is prepared provisionally to approve is this:—The site of the old market in Smithfield consisted, for the most part, of land that had been granted by the Crown, but also land which had been purchased, and of which they are owners. The plan proposed by the Government is that a portion of the ground owned, together with that which the City is the undoubted owner of, is to be hereafter dedicated to the use of the meat market; the chief site of Smithfield is to remain open for the general purposes of the public, the other part to be covered with buildings of a moderate height. In order to carry this plan into effect it will be necessary for the City to introduce a private Bill into Parliament, and there will be ample opportunities before the Select Committees of either House for individuals or public or private bodies to raise any question which they may desire to raise.

The hon. Member for Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) asks me about a Bill relating to Roman Catholic Charities. A Bill was introduced by the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Bowyer), which was not proceeded with; but I understand that hon. Gentleman is prepared to take a course in which the Government will acquiesce, and will shortly move that the Order be restored, that he may proceed with the Bill in an altered shape.

VISITORS TO THE ARMSTRONG GUN FACTORY.—QUESTION.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for War on what principle it is, that English Officers of high rank have been refused permission to examine the Armstrong Gun Foundry at Woolwich, and at whose instance, or by whom, the Special Order of Admission has been given to certain Foreigners of high rank and distinction? General Officers had been refused admission, while some foreign Princes, with a military suite, had been admitted by virtue of a special order from the Secretary of State.

THE FRAUDULENT SALE OF ARMY EXAMINATION PAPERS.

QUESTION.

MR. GREGORY said, he rose to put a question to the Secretary for War upon a subject of great importance to many persons. On Saturday last the ordinary examinations for commissions in the army were concluded, and many of the candidates, as he was informed, left town on Saturday evening. On the Monday morning, at 10 o'clock, when the candidates for supplementary examination entered the room, a letter was delivered to the examiner, who upon perusing it said he was informed that the examination paper had been previously placed in the hands of many of the candidates, and therefore he could not proceed further until he took the directions of the Commander-in-Chief. After communicating with his Royal Highness the examiner announced that all previous examinations would be cancelled. Many of the candidates, however, lived at great distance, and would be put to great expense by being compelled to return, on account of no fault of their own, but of an irregularity in a public department. He understood that this was not the first time the examination papers had got into the hands of candidates before the examination. It was notorious that upon the last occasion those papers were on sale at a house not far from that where the examinations took place, at prices varying from £2 to £5. He knew the names of the persons who were instrumental in selling these papers, and thought the term "irregularity" was too mild a term to apply to such a transaction. If it were true that the papers had been obtained, as he had heard, for some time past in that way, a great injustice had been done to some young men, and great injury to the public service, by creating a false standard of efficiency. He wished to know whether the Secretary for War would make a full investigation into the circumstances, and publish the names of the guilty parties, if they could be dealt with in no other way. He therefore wished to ask the Secretary of State for War whether due notice has been given to the Candidates for Military Commissions that the late Examinations are null and void; and, as many of the candidates have left London, and will be compelled to return from distant parts of the country at considerable expense, whether such expenses will be made good to them?

MR. C. WYNNE said, he would also beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether he is aware that during the recent "examination for direct Commissions for the Army," it was discovered that the Examination Papers had been stolen or surreptitiously obtained from the Office of the Council of Military Education, for the purpose of being sold to Candidates for the said Examination; and whether any steps have been or will be taken for the detection and prosecution of the person or persons by whom they were so stolen or obtained?

BARRACK MASTERS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War, are Barrack Masters Military or Civil Servants; if Civil, are they included in the 4th Section of the Superannuation Act of last year?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: Sir, in answer to the questions put to me I will first of all say, with regard to the admission to the Armstrong gun factory at Woolwich, when I came into office there was no admission except by special order. But I ought to premise by saying there was no secrecy necessary to be observed, and the object of limiting the admission of strangers was not to conceal from the public that which the public already perfectly well knew—namely, how those welded guns were made, but to prevent the incursion of great numbers of persons anxious to see those guns from interrupting the work going on. At one time, when the strictness of these admissions was relaxed, there came complaints from the foundry that the number of persons visiting the works was so great that the works and the workmen were interfered with materially. With respect to the particular instance alluded to by the gallant Gentleman (Sir De Lacy Evans), I will shortly state the circumstances. At that time no man could be admitted without special order. I gave a special order to a person, who, though described as a foreign Prince, was in fact the son-in-law of the Queen of England—I mean Prince Frederick William of Prussia—who had seen all the other works in the public dockyards, and wished to see the Armstrong factory. Accordingly the Prince was admitted, but General Sir Richard Dacres, not having a special order, was not admitted. When I heard of that, I thought it was very improper that an officer holding the position of Sir Richard Dacres, as Commandant of the garrison at Woolwich, should not have the right of admission to the Armstrong factory. The rule that now obtains is this, that Sir Richard Dacres, as Commandant of the garrison, Colonel Bingham, as Deputy-Adjutant General of Artillery at the Horse Guards, and Colonel St. George, Chairman of the Ordnance Commission, should have the power to give orders of admission to inspect the factory to naval and military officers. It is scarcely necessary for me to add that professors of fortifications engaged in giving instruction to officers at Woolwich have always had free access to the factory.

Now, with respect to the question put by my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Gregory), I confess I could have satisfied him at once if he had put the question to me privately, because certainly I cannot conceive that any hesitation could have existed as to the right of those young gentlemen who had passed their examination and had returned to their homes to have their expenses repaid them if recalled for a second examination. I may as well state the facts of the case as they have come to my knowledge. They are somewhat different from those given by my hon. Friend. General Romilly, the head of the Council of Education, was present when a communication was made by one of the candidates that some of the papers had been surreptitiously obtained by the payment of money or some other means, in order to enable the candidates to get up their answers to the questions that were to be put to them on the following day. The moment that communication was made to General Romilly, he took what I think was a proper and wise course. He instantly, and without waiting for explanations from any one, proclaimed in the hall that all the examinations that had taken place in the hall up to that time were null and void; that the examination papers should be cancelled; and that a new examination should commence on the following morning. On the following day all the candidates were present, with four exceptions. There were only four absent, and one of these sent a medical certificate, so that the inconvenience was not very great. It is not right to say that this irregularity has been general; nor does it appear that it arose in the department conducting the examinations. I believe, so far as I have been able to ascertain, the paper was stolen from the printing-office of Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode. The moment the circumstance came to my knowledge I sent to Sir Richard Mayne, authorizing him to offer a reward, and left the matter in his hands. All I can say is that I trust we shall have the means of instituting a prosecution. Whether or not this practice has obtained on previous examinations I cannot say. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gregory) says he is aware that it has, and that he is acquainted with the names of persons reported to have been concerned in these transactions. If he will have the goodness to communicate that information to Sir Richard Mayne he will do a great service to the public. Nothing can be more destructive of the confidence which the public have in these examinations than that such practices should prevail; and I can assure the hon. Gentleman that the Government will spare no exertion or expense in order, if possible, to bring the guilty parties to conviction, and to put a stop to this very discreditable and mischievous practice.

Mr. Sidney Herbert

With respect to the question of my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Roscommon (Colonel French), I have to say that barrackmasters are almost invariably military men, or men who have sold out. The situation, however, is not a military one, because civilians can be appointed to it. Barrack-masters, therefore, come under the Superannuation Act, but under the 7th, and not the 4th clause.

SPANISH NAVIGATION LAWS.

QUESTION.

MR. LYALL said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in consequence of the great advantages granted to Spain by the recent alterations of our Tariff, he does not think it right to take this opportunity of representing to the Spanish Government the injustice with which British Shipping is treated by the continued refusal of that State to reciprocate with this Country in its Navigation Laws?

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in the event of the Reform Bill being read a second time during the present Session, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government at once to proceed with the Bill, or to agree to any Motion to refer such Bill to a Select Committee? As there would shortly be an abundant opportunity for discussing the measure, he would not abuse the indulgence of the House by making many prefatory remarks, or explaining at any length his reasons for putting this question. He trusted, however, that the noble Lord would not think for one instant that he questioned his sincerity on the Reform question, or doubted that it was his most anxious desire to proceed with the Bill. Nevertheless, it was rumoured that on the part of Her Majesty's Government there was a little apathy on the subject; and from all the external indicia, there certainly seemed to have been a struggle for precedence between the measures of the Government for political and for financial reform, in which the latter appeared to have triumphed. The House were probably aware that there had been a sort of preparation made for the Bill in "another place;" and his belief that that preparation was quite unnecessary was one of the reasons he had for putting this question. But that was not all. The hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Massey), a Gentleman whose name had necessarily great weight in this House, and than whom no one had more claims to be considered a statesman from his great historical knowledge and his experience in all questions relating to the constitution of the country—that hon. Gentleman had given notice of a Motion in the event of the Bill being read a second time to refer it to a Select Committee. It was, therefore, only just to the hon. Gentleman and to Her Majesty's Government that the House should know whether there had been any arrangement come to, or any intention formed by Her Majesty's Government to support that Motion, or whether it had originated in the independent action on the part of the hon. Member for Salford.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: In answer to the question put to me by the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Lyall), I have to state that we have already represented to the Spanish Government the great advantages which they would derive from the commercial legislation of this House in the present year, without any benefit being required in return by this country from Spain. The position of the navigation laws is what the hon. Gentleman has described it to be. The repeal of the navigation laws of this country has not led to any corresponding relaxation on the part of Spain. I quite admit that that is a proper question to bring before the Spanish Government, and every endeavour will be made to induce them to adopt a more liberal policy. I shall accordingly pursue further that negotiation.

With regard to the question put by the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. Edwin James) I must express to him my thanks for having put that question, and for giving me an opportunity of stating the course which the Government means to take with respect to the Reform Bill. The postponement of that Bill has taken place partly in consequence of there having been very long debates on other subjects, and partly in consequence of an apprehension lest those debates should not end before the Easter holidays, and from the inutility of attempting to force on the discussion on the second reading when a great portion of the House were determined, with the holidays before them, to oppose the course. It is not in any way the apathy of the Government that has led to the postponement of the adjourned debate on the second reading, and I have now to state that that adjourned debate will come on on Monday next, when, I trust, there will not be much prolonged discussion. After the second reading, it is my intention, after a short interval—the ordinary interval between the second reading and the Committee, to ask the House to go into a Committee of the whole House on the Bill.

The hon. Gentleman further asks what the Government propose to do with regard to the Motion of which notice has been given by the hon. Member for Salford, the Chairman of the Committees of Ways and Means. It appears to me that that Motion, though not so direct and straightforward as a proposition to read the Bill a second time that day six months, is, nevertheless, a Motion intended to destroy the Bill. That Motion, therefore, will be treated by the Government as if it was a Motion to postpone for six months the second reading of the Bill, and to destroy it altogether. Our reasons for opposing that Motion, then, are obvious. It is obvious besides that the proposal of such a course as the hon. Member for Salford has given notice of would be most unusual. I do not believe that there ever has been an instance in which the principal measure of a Session has been referred to a Select Committee, it being obvious that that Select Committee would be intrusted with the alteration, and thereby the framing of the measure. In fact, that Committee would take upon itself the most important functions connected with the Executive Government. I can conceive that any Gentleman, even after the second reading of the Bill, might think it desirable to propose that the House shall enter into Committee upon it six months afterwards; but I cannot conceive that any great portion of the House will think that a Bill of this importance, which will affect the constitution of the country, and the right of voting of a great many persons, ought to be sent to a Select Committee. It is the intention of the Government, therefore, to proceed with the measure, and, after the regular interval, to move that the Bill be considered by a Committee of the whole House. In that Committee of the whole House every question of an alteration of the franchise and of the number of boroughs to be partially disfranchised can be discussed. There is yet time enough for the Bill to be carefully considered, and I hope there will be sufficient time before the close of the Session for its being fully discussed in "another place."

THE NEW STAMP ACT.

QUESTION.

MR. MITCHELL said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the intention of the Government to persevere in exacting, under the new Stamp Act, a Stamp Duty on every successive endorsement of Delivery Orders? The Dock Companies, and the principal wharfingers insisted upon a new stamp for every fresh indorsement; so that in the case of some articles in which there was much speculation the tax might amount to as much as 10*d.* or 20*d.* In the commonest cases it would be at least 3*d.*, whereas the understanding of Parliament when it agreed to the measure was that it should be only a 1*d.* It seemed doubtful whether the Dock Companies and wharfingers were acting under positive instructions received from the Department of Inland Revenue, and he was therefore anxious to have the point cleared up?

MR. HUBBARD said, he also wished to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in the event of Dock Warrants or Delivery Orders being impressed with the required Stamp, it can become necessary to affix other Stamps upon their transfer from hand to hand, with or without endorsement, prior to their being acted upon?

MR. T. BARING said, he understood the Board of Inland Revenue had intimated that there was to be not only a charge of 3*d.* on the dock warrants, but a charge of 3*d.* on weigh notes also. Now, as these two documents represented the same property that would be a charge of 6*d.* instead of 3*d.* He wished therefore to know how the matter really stood.

SAVINGS BANKS AND FRIENDLY SOCIETIES INVESTMENT BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would state at the same time what course he intends pursuing that evening with respect to the Government business; and more especially whether he intends to proceed with the Committee on the Savings Banks and Friendly Societies Investment Bill, which stands on the Paper?

Lord John Russell

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the course which the Government would take with their business generally, for that evening, must depend on the progress of the other business. He did not, however, intend to proceed that evening with the Savings Banks Bill; and in consequence of having received from the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Kelly) a representation that it would be exceedingly inconvenient to him to have the Resolution with respect to the malt duties discussed that night he would not proceed with that Resolution — the Government would not proceed with it, even if it was reached on the paper.

With regard to the question which had been put to him by the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring), he might say that he had not heard anything on the subject of an intention to charge a threepenny stamp on the documents called weigh notes. He would, if the hon. Member permitted him, ask for particular information as to the circumstances and statistics, before he assumed that the hon. Member was correctly informed. But there were two observations which, perhaps, he might venture to make on the subject. One was, that the Government had no authority to construe the law; and any opinion they might give as to the effect of an Act of Parliament might possibly tend to mislead the public, inasmuch as it could not be an authoritative opinion, and could have no influence in a court of justice. If the intentions of the Government were asked it might be their duty to give an opinion. But with respect to the interpretation of the law, that was neither a common, nor, in point of fact, a necessary practice. In any case he would submit that this question of interpretation of necessity fell into the hands of the Revenue Department; and he thought it was the most convenient course in all cases that the interpretation should in the first instance be sought from them.

With respect to the question of the stamp upon dock warrants, there clearly could be no necessity for such a stamp upon their transfer from hand to hand, either with or without an endorsement. In any case that he was aware of — he spoke generally on the subject, because he was not acquainted with the particulars of any circumstance that had arisen, but undoubtedly the intention with which the House of Commons assented to a stamp upon dock warrants was that a dock warrant should be sufficient for all purposes upon having a single stamp affixed. With respect to delivery orders the case was not precisely analogous to that of dock warrants; but he would endeavour to give an explanation at once clear and sufficient. In order to make a document liable to a stamp as a delivery order three conditions were required. The first was that the goods must be in a warehouse or other place, if on shore, where they were kept for order—he meant that if the goods were in a warehouse, or were not kept for hire, there was no question of a delivery order. The second was that the stamp only accrued upon the delivery order under the double condition of there being both a transfer and a delivery. Whenever there was a transfer of property, accompanied with what in law constituted a delivery, then there was a liability to a stamp. He apprehended that it was a possible case that the same delivery order should be so used as to require both transfer and delivery by endorsement. In that case undoubtedly it would become liable, as he believed, under the terms of and in conformity with the Act to a second stamp. But that was not the case, he thought, to which the hon. Gentleman referred; and he confessed that he was misled by the question of the hon. Gentleman, because he seemed to imply that in ordinary cases it had been the intention of the Government to exact a stamp duty upon every successive endorsement of a delivery order. Now there was no such intention; and he was not aware that the Government had taken any step whatever in that direction. If the goods represented by delivery order were transferred by endorsement without what constituted delivery in law first taking place there would be no necessity for a second stamp.

As to the case of endorsement to which the hon. Gentleman had referred, and a charge of another stamp, he could only say it had no sanction from any officer of the Government, and if it had occurred it could only have been through gross error. In short, the essence of the delivery orders depended on the transfer of the property in the goods, and even then not without delivery.

Motion agreed to.

House at rising to adjourn to Monday next.

CHARITY TRUSTEES.—LEAVE.

MR. MELLOR said, he rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to remove doubts as to the eligibility of certain persons to be trustees of certain charities. The single object of the proposed measure was, that for the future, in the event of a vacancy occurring in the trusteeship of a charity, no person should be deemed ineligible by reason of his belonging to any particular religious denomination, unless it were expressly provided by the deed or charter under which the charity was constituted, that members of that particular class should be excluded, or that members of only one class should be admitted. This appeared so reasonable a provision that he anticipated no objection to it, particularly as it had received the approval of the right hon. Gentleman.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he had no intention to oppose the introduction of the Bill, but it must not be supposed that the acquiescence of hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House implied any assent to its principles.

Leave given.

“Bill to remove doubts as to the eligibility of certain persons to be Trustees of certain Charities, ordered to be brought in by Mr. MELLOR, Mr. EVANS, and Mr. BAINES.”

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY AND NICE WITH FRANCE.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. HENNESSY said, he had given notice of a Motion—

“That it appears to this House from the papers which have been placed before Parliament by command of Her Majesty, that the French Government was ready to submit the question of the annexation of Savoy and the arrondissement of Nice to France to a Congress of all the Great Powers of Europe, provided that Her Majesty's Government would agree to have the question of the annexation of the States of Central Italy, namely, Tuscany, Parma, Modena, and the Roman Legations also submitted to a Congress of all the Great Powers; and that this House regrets that those territorial additions to France and Sardinia have been arranged without the convocation of such a Congress.”

After the explanation on the part of the Government on the previous night he would not bring forward his Motion that evening; but he wished to give notice of his intention on an early Supply night of addressing the House on the subject.

ROYAL PROCLAMATION (PIETY AND VIRTUE, &c.)—ADDRESS MOVED.

MR. LOCKE KING said, he wished to move

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that She will be graciously pleased to cause the Royal Proclamation for the encouragement of Piety and Virtue, and for the preventing and punishing of Vice, Profaneness, and Immorality, issued at the commencement of Her Majesty's reign, to be revised, or to authorize the discontinuance of reading the same at Assizes and Quarter Sessions, and in Churches and Chapels.”

Everybody who had attended assizes and quarter sessions must have been struck with the demeanour of the Court during the reading of the proclamation, which was extremely ill-worded. The commencement of the reading was a signal for every one in Court, from the Judge to the humblest person present, to commence talking with his neighbour, and the proceeding, he was sure, did not promote piety and virtue in any way. The proclamation was directed to be read in these Courts immediately before the charge was given to the grand jury, a most important moment for all persons having business there. The grand and petty juries, witnesses, and others were thus kept waiting to their extreme inconvenience. But although magistrates and Judges obeyed the order, there was a class of persons who did not obey it—he meant the clergy. It had never been his good fortune or his bad fortune to be in a church when this proclamation was read. And yet the proclamation issued by the Head of the Church ran thus:—

“We do hereby further charge and command every minister in his respective church or chapel to read, or cause to be read, this our proclamation, at least four times in every year, after Divine service, and to incite and stir up their congregations to the practice of piety and virtue.”

He thought the clergy were wise in their generation in withholding their obedience, when they had other more effectual means of inciting to piety and virtue than by reading a long and tedious proclamation. What he suggested was, that the document should be either revised or discontinued. If it should be revised, a few solemn sentences, well put together, and read by the Judge or Chairman of Sessions, would have an infinitely greater effect than the present mode of handing the proclamation over to the crier, whose great merit was to gabble it over as quickly as possible.

MR. HADFIELD seconded the Motion.

Mr. Locke King

Motion made, and Question proposed,—

“That an Humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to cause the Royal Proclamation for the encouragement of Piety and Virtue, and for the preventing and punishing of Vice, Profaneness, and Immorality, issued at the commencement of Her Majesty's reign, to be revised, or to authorise the discontinuance of reading the same at Assizes and Quarter Sessions, and in Churches and Chapels.”

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, the hon. Member proposed that the proclamation should be either revised or discontinued. But revision and discontinuance were two very different things. To a revision he was himself favourable; to a discontinuance he was entirely opposed. No person who had heard the proclamation read at assizes or quarter sessions—often read, too, by an officer not educated for the purpose—could have failed to wish that the words were more in accordance with what were the intentions of the Sovereign, and more likely to excite the attention of those to whom it was addressed. It doubtless contained sentences of great perplexity, the actual purport of which it was difficult to comprehend. As he had said, then, he was favourable to a revision of the proclamation; but to a discontinuance he strenuously objected. Indeed, he could not but think that the hon. Gentleman would have done better with his Motion if it had ended with the word “revised.” If revised, the proclamation ought not to be much more than a third of its present length. A few plain sentences, declaring the determination of the Sovereign to maintain religion, piety, and morality, would be infinitely more likely to produce a beneficial result than the present lengthy document, which was seldom much attended to.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he felt somewhat embarrassed as to the vote which he ought to give from not having had the advantage of a more general expression of the opinions which Members of the House entertained upon the subject. The proclamation which was issued at the beginning of each reign had undergone alterations during the reigns of the later Sovereigns, in order to adopt it to more recent Acts of Parliament, but he apprehended that the proclamation, in a form not very different from what it now was, was of very considerable antiquity. The proclamation directed that it should be publicly read in open court at assizes and charge was given either by the Judge or the Chairman of the magistrates. That direction was scrupulously observed, he believed, on all occasions. There was a further direction, however, that it should be read by every minister in his church or chapel at least four times a year-immediately after Divine service. That direction was entirely disregarded. It was proposed that the proclamation should be either revised or discontinued. His right hon. Friend opposite said he was not prepared to assent to its discontinuance, but he wished to see it revised. Looking at it as one of those ancient formulas which derived their importance and impressiveness rather from their antiquity than from any other quality, it was difficult to take it in hand and revise it, so as to give it a form suited to modern notions. The recommendation of the right hon. Gentleman himself seemed to point rather to a homily or an expression of determination on the part of the Sovereign to maintain virtue and religion than to a recommendation of the enforcement of certain laws and Acts of Parliament. He could only say that he saw considerable difficulty in the way of a revision of this proclamation. He was afraid that anybody who undertook to revise it, and who brought a very critical eye to the task, would perhaps not find much in it which he would wish to retain; and he hardly thought that a few common-place sentences strung together on the subject of religion and morality, would be of very great effect, or that it would be worth while to introduce a proclamation for the first time, in order that anything in the nature of a homily should be read before the Judge delivered his charge at the assizes. He was sorry, therefore, to say that his conclusion was, that if that remnant of antiquity was not to be maintained in its extant form, the best course would be to discontinue it altogether; and if the general feeling of the House should be in favour of that course, he was quite ready to acquiesce in it. On the other hand he could not think it was a matter of very great importance, or one in which the House was imperatively called upon to interfere. To the best of his recollection the reading of the proclamation did not occupy more than five or ten minutes, and although it might be thought by some persons to be unnecessary to introduce such a proclamation for the first time, it was equally possible that others might imagine more was meant by its withdrawal than a mere saving of time. He could only say that for his own part he attached little or no importance to it, and would readily accede to its discontinuance, if such was the general wish of the House; but as he should himself be responsible for its revision, and as he anticipated that considerable difficulty would be experienced in fixing upon the principle upon which that revision should be conducted, he was not prepared to recommend such a course.

MR. LOCKE KING said, he understood from conversations he had had with hon. Members, that the general feeling was in favour of a revision of the proclamation, and therefore he wished to express his willingness to omit all the words in the Motion after "revised."

MR. HENLEY said, the proclamation occupied very little time in reading. It said many wholesome things in very plain language; and he thought its withdrawal might have a prejudicial effect on some of their humble fellow-countrymen who were in the habit of attending the courts. It was acknowledged that the revision would not be an easy task; and he thought it would be better to leave it alone. The lower classes might think from a change in the wording of the proclamation that those above them had changed their opinions.

MR. SPEAKER said, that it was optional with the hon. Member to withdraw the original Motion and move another substantive Resolution, comprehending so much of the other as was included down to the word "revised."

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, it was rather singular to talk of revising the proclamation, when those hon. Gentlemen who had spoken concurred in saying that such revision was difficult, if not impossible.

MR. SLANEY remarked, that he thought revision quite possible.

MR. LOCKE KING then asked leave of the House to withdraw his original Motion, and to move it in its amended form, the words after "revised" being omitted.

Motion by leave withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question put—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to cause the Royal Proclamation for the encouragement of Piety and Virtue, and for the preventing and punishing of Vice, Profaneness, and Immorality, issued at the commencement of Her Majesty's reign, to be revised."

The House divided:—Ayes 112; Noes 75: Majority 37.

NEWSPAPER CONVEYANCE, &c. BILL.
LEAVE.—FIRST READING.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law relating to the postage, or, it would be more correct to say, to the conveyance of newspapers. The purpose of the Bill was to give effect to the objects which he had stated in the financial statement at an early period of the Session. He would have the Bill printed, and would take care that a convenient time elapsed before the second reading. He would also endeavour to make the House acquainted with any subsidiary regulations that might be necessary, to make due provision for the transmission of newspapers under all circumstances. He would therefore, merely place the Motion in the hands of the Speaker.

Leave given.

Bill to amend the Laws relating to the Conveyance and Postage of Newspapers, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Mr. LAING.

Bill presented and read 1^o.

DUCHY OF CORNWALL (LIMITATION OF ACTIONS) BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, this Bill contained matter, not only affecting the Duchy of Cornwall, but important public interests. He had refrained from opposing its former stages, knowing that he should have the opportunity of doing so at that time. The Bill came before the House in a mild and inviting form—that of the limitation of suits—but hon. Members would find very important clauses in the latter part of it, which went beyond the mere limitation of actions, inasmuch as they gave powers of leasing and selling certain properties which, by the Submarine Mining Bill, had been decided to be part and parcel of the soil and territorial possessions of the Duchy. This Bill was in fact the sequel to that Act. The Submarine Mining Bill had, like the present measure, been introduced at a late hour, and it was passed in a hurry. Instead of the disputed rights relating to the shore being settled by a court of law, they were settled by collusion between the Woods and Forests and the Duchy. They were referred to Sir J. Patteson, and the object of the Submarine Mining Act was to confirm his adjudication. By Amendments made in that Bill in “another place,” rights which originally referred to mines under the shore were made applicable to the surface; and the present Bill was to enable the Duchy of Cornwall to deal with those surface rights. There was no intervening body that would act fairly between individuals and the Duchy, and if the Bill should pass in its present form, it would give the Duchy the power of enforcing claims that would interfere with valuable rights of property, both of individuals as of public bodies. Such measures as the present ought to be introduced as private Bills, in order that they might be sifted by a Select Committee. Very heavy charges had already been imposed on the public through the agency of the Bill referred to. Thus the Corporation of Truro were required to pay £1,600 for about 80 acres of mud-land and bed of the tidal estuary running up to that town, to enable certain harbour improvements being completed. These would cost about £17,000, so that for every £1,000 expended, the Duchy claimed £100 for property which brought them no return, and which in reality did not belong to them. In like manner a sum of £3,500 had been charged for seventy acres of the Hamoaze tidal waters to form Keyham Docks at Devonport. These claims were quite unjustifiable, especially when it is remembered how liberally the public and Parliament had behaved to the Duchy in giving £16,000 a year in compensation for the tin-tolls; as also grants of £17,000 for the erection of the Duchy Office, and £20,000 towards fitting up Marlborough House for the Prince of Wales, though the clear income he derived from his Duchy was not less than £40,000 a year, besides which there was more than half a million of accumulated income during his minority now invested in His Royal Highness’s trustees, as shown by the accounts annually laid before Parliament. Common justice requires that this Bill should be made one of bona fide limitations.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee).

Clause 1, agreed to.

Clause 2.

MR. KENDALL said, that before proposing the Amendment, of which he had given notice, he felt it necessary to explain to the House the circumstances under which the present Bill was introduced. It was right that the Committee should know that for some years a dispute existed between the Duchy and the Crown, as to certain rights in the foreshores and estuaries of Cornwall. The subject was referred to Sir John Patteson, who gave his award in favour of the Duchy; and in 1858 the Duchy sought to confirm that award by an Act of Parliament. Many parties in Cornwall became much alarmed—inasmuch as an adverse possession of sixty years was good as against the Crown; but it was held by some that something like 500 years of adverse possession would be necessary as against the Duchy. Both the Attorney General of the Duchy and the late Solicitor General insisted that there was no cause for alarm; but the Members for the County of Cornwall felt it necessary to persist in their opposition; and upon this a promise was made by the Duchy to bring in a Bill to place the Duchy on the same footing as the Crown. With that promise the Members were satisfied and the Bill passed. The Bill now before the House was the one introduced to redeem that pledge. With the principle of the Bill he (Mr. Kendall) found no fault. But the question was “does the Bill virtually carry out the promise made?” Certainly, as it stood, it did not carry out that promise fully, and a sixty years’ adverse possession would be valueless, if any property so held had been “in charge” to the Duchy; in fact a property might descend from generation to generation, improved in its transit by large outlays, till it became a fortune to its possessor; but he might awake one morning, find that his property was “in charge,” and that he was a beggar. Perhaps the House was much at a loss to understand what the words “in charge” mean. As he (Mr. Kendall) understood, it was a simple entry on the Duchy rolls, as against the property, say of 2*d.* per annum only; but, perhaps, never demanded from—nay, never made known to the possessor; and still that charge silently remaining on the rolls, would be good as against any adverse possession for 500 years. This blot was hit in the Assessionable Manors Act in 1844, was admitted by Sir Robert Peel and Lord Lincoln then, and to heal it, the clause now proposed to be added was introduced into that Act. The House would, he thought, agree that he might stop there; but he would go further, and say, that as regards the estuary shores of Cornwall they were included in the Bill of 1844, and this very clause passed through the Commons; but in the Lords, those who represented the interests of Cornwall urged the introduction of a clause which should give a power of appeal. Those who watched the Duchy interests refused, but added that the estuaries might be left out of the Bill; and they were excepted. The question as to the estuaries being now again before the House in this Bill to settle titles, there ought not to be the slightest hesitation as to the introduction of the clause. He was aware it would be said that the Bill would put the Duchy on the same footing as the Crown, according to promise, and that what was good with respect to being “in charge,” as regards the Duchy, would obtain as regards the Crown. His answer was first, that we are not aware of any property being “silently” in charge as regards the Crown; but that if there were, it was the fault of parties themselves for not ascertaining the fact, as the records are open to the public. Not so the Duchy records; all was private and secret there; no man knew how he held any property in the estuaries of Cornwall. But the main point of all was this—what was the understanding apart from all technicalities? Was it not that an adverse possession of sixty years as against the Duchy should be made a valid possession? He called on the promoters of this Bill to make good that understanding and pledge, and therefore proposed to insert, after Clause 1, the following proviso:—

“Provided always that Section 72 of the said Act of the 7th and 8th year of Her Majesty shall be, and the same is hereby incorporated with this Act, and shall be read as part thereof.”

If this Motion were agreed to, he should propose to add a clause to the effect that no land should be duly in “charge” to the Duke of Cornwall as long as any person should be in possession thereof adversely to the said Duke. He maintained that this was in accordance with the clear understanding come to when the Cornwall Submarine Mines Act was passed.

Amendment proposed,—

“At the end of the Clause, to add the words ‘Provided always, That Section seventy-two of the said Act of the seventh and eighth year of Her Majesty shall be, and the same is hereby, incorporated with this Act, and shall be read as part thereof.’”

MR. ROBARTES said, he had no doubt that this Bill technically enacted what had been promised, and that, in fact, the promise had been kept to the letter as it was given. But every one who took part in the previous discussion considered that sixty years' possession was to be bond fide a bar against all claims on the part of the Duchy, without any quibble or technicality. He hoped that even if the proposed clause were not agreed to that the Council for the Duchy would, upon consideration, insert some clause which would be tantamount to it, so as to give the assurance that sixty years quiet possession should be a bar to all suits on the part of the Duchy. It would relieve the minds of many and would really not injure the Duchy.

MR. ST. AUBYN said, he concurred in the strongest manner in what the hon. Gentleman had stated to the House, and he would beg to ask what, in the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, would be the probable effect of this Bill, if passed, as to the limitation of title to 60 years as respects property now in charge, or that may at any time hereafter be put in charge to the Duke of Cornwall.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he could not accede to the proposal made by the hon. Gentleman opposite to add the proviso to the clause. The facts were so plain that there was no need for any argument. Reference had been made to the Act passed in 1858, called "The Cornwall Submarine Mines Act," and it was perfectly true that an understanding had been come to during the passage of that Bill through the House, between those who acted on behalf of His Royal Highness the Duke of Cornwall and hon. Gentlemen connected with the county. He did not himself know personally what that arrangement was precisely, but looking at the probabilities it was clear that there must be some misapprehension in supposing that there was any other arrangement than that which the Bill before the Committee proposed to carry out. Previous to the passing of the Cornwall Submarine Mines Act, questions had arisen between the Crown, on the one hand, and the Duchy of Cornwall on the other, as to the property in certain mines and minerals lying between high and low-water mark, and under estuaries and tidal rivers, and the bed of the sea on the coast of Cornwall. The decision of these questions was referred, by a binding instrument on the part of the Crown and of His Royal Highness the Duke of Cornwall properly represented, to Sir John Patteson, who decided that all mines and minerals lying between high and low-water mark, and under estuaries and tidal rivers even below low-water mark in Cornwall, were vested in His Royal Highness as part of the soil of the Duchy. But all mines and minerals below low-water mark under the open sea adjacent to that county, being no part of the soil of the Duchy, were vested in Her Majesty the Queen, in right of her Crown, even although such mines might be won by workings commenced above low-water mark, and extending below it. It was, therefore, as clear as the sun in the firmament that that award did not, in any way, affect the rights of third parties; and the Cornwall Submarine Mines Act itself, which was the result of it, distinctly specified that all other rights, titles, claims, and demands whatever, except those between the Crown and His Royal Highness, were to remain the same as previous to the passing of the Act. He was informed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day, upon a representation that private individuals might be prejudiced in respect of limitation and adverse claims, yielded to the representation so far as to say that there was a case for consideration, and that if the further discussion of the matter were given up during the passing of the Cornwall Submarine Mines Bill, care would be taken at an early period of the next, namely the present, Session, that a Bill should be introduced to obviate the difficulty, by putting the position of the Duchy, in respect of the limitation of time, and the possibility of gaining an adverse title, on the same footing precisely as that of the Crown. That, he contended, was done in the present Act. The Duchy was placed by it under precisely the same conditions, as regarded adverse possession, as the Crown had been put by the 9th of Geo. III., commonly known as the Nullum Tempus Act. But if the proviso now brought forward were added, it would place the proprietors, in whose interest it was suggested, in a better position than that in which they stood previous to the passing of the Cornwall Submarine Mines Act, and give them an advantage to which they had no fair claim. Having given this history of the transaction, he hoped the House would be of opinion that it would not be right to grant that which was asked. The old saying, "You should not look a gift horse in the mouth," was applicable to this matter. The Duchy made concessions to individual proprietors, and asked of them nothing in return. It might be said that this property differed from private property, but it did not differ in a legal sense; and it would not be fair to seek to attach to it a detriment to which no other property of the Crown was subjected. For these reasons, he could not advise the Committee to accede to the Amendment. With regard to property "in charge," opportunities would be given to ascertain what this was, by reference to the archives of the Duchy, which would be considered, for this purpose, as public records.

Mr. Robartes

MR. ROGERS, apologizing for occupying the attention of the House for the first time, commenced by reading an extract from a letter of the Secretary to the Duchy Council, in answer to an application made to the Council by the Committee of Landowners, for leave to inspect those very records, which showed most distinctly that they could only be allowed to inspect the records, on the condition that it "should not interfere with the progress of the Bill in its present shape." Though the Crown records therefore were public, those of the Duchy were not, and the Bill would not place the Duchy on the same footing as the Crown, without the proviso which was now sought to be inserted. To show that the question was not an unimportant one to Cornish people, he stated that whilst the sea shore was 200 miles in extent, that of the estuaries was 300 miles at the least; and it would be a strange anomaly if, whilst the former was subject to the limitation given in the Assessionable Manors Act, the latter should be allowed to remain subject to the present Bill, which did not contain the same limitation. Where was the line to be drawn between the two cases of sea-shore, and estuary shore? The Committee would see that this difference must prove to be an endless source of vexatious litigation, which he (Mr. Rogers) was quite sure that the Duchy Council could not desire. Again, it was contrary to the spirit and principle of all modern legislation that the Duchy should have the power to harass owners by the retention of a right to put lands "in charge" secretly, and without notice. The Crown had been bound by an Act of limitation 200 years ago, namely, by an Act of James I., and there was no reason why the Duchy should claim to be free in any respect from limitation of action. As to the Nullum Tempus Act to which the Solicitor General referred, he would remind the Committee that at the time of passing of the Assessionable Manors Act, the Duchy Council had conceded that the provisions of the Nullum Tempus Act were not sufficient without the clause now sought for, because the law had been altered since the 9th Geo. III., by the decision in the case of Attorney General v. Lord Eardley, on this very question of the right to put in charge. If then the Duchy conceded the clause then, why should they refuse it now? Again, with reference to the probability argued on by the Solicitor General, he could say that from the very first meeting of the Cornish Committee on the subject till now such a proviso had always been regarded by them as an essential part of a Limitation Act, and he thought that the Amendment now proposed was a most reasonable one, and one which the Council of the Duchy might well allow.

MR. MONTAGUE SMITH observed, that if it were designed to concede a boon to the gentlemen of Cornwall it would be as well to grant one which would be gratefully accepted by the county. If this was intended as a boon it was not one which the gentlemen of Cornwall would have much to be thankful for. It had been agreed between the officers of the Duchy and the landowners of Cornwall that there should be a limitation of the rights of the Duchy to sixty years according to the provisions of the Nullum Tempus Act. When that came to be carried out, however, it was found to be worthless, as, according to the words of the Nullum Tempus Act, the limitation did not apply in cases where the manor in which the land was situate had been kept "in charge," that is, where a return was made of the proceeds of the manor, even if the return were nil. Still, even if they failed to obtain any further concession at present, he should recommend his hon. Friends to take what was offered, and look to a future Session to wipe away what he thought was a disgraceful anomaly in the Nullum Tempus Act. He trusted their clause might be conceded; but if not, he hoped the Bill would be carried through the House because it was a step in advance, though as a concession there was utterly wanting the grace which would render the gift palatable to the recipients.

VISCOUNT VALLETORT would add nothing to the statements made by other honourable Members, but would merely join with them in expressing the regret which he felt, and which he believed would be felt from one end of Cornwall to the other, at the disappointment of the hopes which the Cornish proprietors in question had certainly entertained, and which he thought that they were justified in entertaining, that this Bill would be really one for quieting titles, instead of being full of the seeds of future litigation, and would give them the bona fide power of acquiring, by sixty years' undisturbed possession, a substantial right of ownership over property which they had inherited from their ancestors; which hopes appeared now likely to be disappointed by a technicality of law, easily misunderstood, but the probable effect of which appeared but too manifest.

MR. DISRAELI said, he could not agree with the views of the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Montague Smith), though he had stated them with very great ability. So far as he was able to form an opinion, and without entering upon the new points that had been raised, he felt bound to say that the Bill faithfully carried out the engagements entered into between the Government of the day and the gentlemen of Cornwall. It was promised that the proprietors under the Duchy should be placed in the same position as those who held under the Crown, and that was faithfully carried out in this Bill.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the hardships pointed out as arising from the words of the Nullum Tempus Act were precisely the hardships that applied to persons holding under the Crown, and that the understanding arrived at was fairly carried out in the Bill.

MR. ROGERS observed that the landowners always understood that the Duchy would offer them a fair bona fide limitation without reserve, but the present limitation was expressly coupled with a reserve which destroyed their title in many cases.

COLONEL FRENCH complained of the conduct of "somebody" towards parties who had expended large sums of money on property, which they were now told was not their own. If that were justice, he must confess himself ignorant of its first principles. He denied that the Bill fairly carried out the agreement which had been entered into.

MR. KENDALL said, that though he did not think the Bill worth a fraction without the clause, yet as he was aware that the Government had resolved to withdraw the Bill if the clause be carried, and that there were certain parties in the county who thought that the Bill as it stood was of some small value, he could not take on himself the responsibility of risking the

Viscount Valletort

Bill by a division, and therefore withdrew his clause.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he felt it his duty to persist in taking the sense of the Committee upon the subject.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The House divided:—Ayes 17; Noes 69: Majority 52.

Clause agreed to; as were the remaining clauses.

House resumed.

Bill reported, as amended.

PAPER DUTY REPEAL BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. BOVILL said, that pursuant to notice, he rose to move the following Resolution:—

"That in the opinion of this House, it is just and expedient that a drawback should be allowed to printers and publishers of the duty paid upon their stock of paper purchased and printed after the passing of the Bill, and remaining in sheets unbound at the time the duty is to cease, namely, on the 15th August next, subject to such rules and regulations as the Commissioners of Inland Revenue may make in that behalf."

His object was to prevent any stagnation taking place in the printing and publishing trade, the effect of which would be to throw thousands of industrious men out of employment. The Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to repeal the duty upon paper, and to give up a large revenue therefrom, and the repeal was to take effect on the 15th day of August next. The effect necessarily would be that persons engaged in trades requiring a large consumption of paper would defer their operations as far as possible, in order to obtain the advantage of the repeal of the duty. There was a large portion of the publishing trade that might be easily postponed for a few months without any serious damage to the interests of the proprietors, but with the most disastrous consequences to the large body of working printers by their being thrown out of employment during the suspension of operations. All he asked was that a drawback should be allowed to printers and publishers in order to prevent this result. The principle of a drawback had been recognized by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in regard to the wine duties, in connection with which a large and influential body of gentlemen had placed a pressure upon the right hon. Gentleman which he could not resist. The Chancellor of the Exchequer appeared to dissent from that proposition. Well, whether that concession arose from a sense of justice, or from pressure, the right hon. Gentleman was induced to admit the principle of a drawback in the case of wines; the same principle would equally apply to those industrious men on whose behalf he (Mr. Bovill) made his present proposition. But he would carry that principle even further. In the Bill under consideration there was a drawback allowed, to stationers, paper-makers, and paste-board makers, for the very purpose of preventing, as the right hon. Gentleman alleged, the stagnation of those trades between this time and the 15th of August, when the measure really was to come into full operation. Upon what grounds, then, could the application of the same principle be withheld in respect to that portion of the trade on behalf of which he now appeared? But it might be said that with respect to the stationer, the drawback was only allowed on entire reams, half-reams remaining in stock, or on parcels that were unopened at the time of the Act coming into operation. But it could make no difference whether the paper was in reams, half reams and parcels, or in open sheets, except for identifying the paper. The cases were, except in that one point of identifying the paper, perfectly analogous. The drawback in regard to wine extended to stocks two years on hand, and that in regard to stationery might extend to stocks ten years on hand. The printing trade, it was said, was of a different character; but he maintained that the same principle applied to it in regard to the question of drawback as to the other trades to which he referred. He could not understand how the Chancellor of the Exchequer could consistently with the principle he had already adopted, refuse the moderate drawback for which he now applied. He believed that there were not less than 8,000 working printers in the metropolis alone, engaged in the printing of standard works. To give the House an illustration of the mode in which the repeal of the duty would operate in the trade, he would take the case of Mr. Bohn, one of the largest publishers of standard works in the metropolis, who employed a great number of men in printing a series of valuable standard works, which he brought out at an extremely moderate price. The printing went on month by month, and, not being new works, they might come out either one month or another, as was thought advisable, without detriment to the publisher. If the paper duty, instead of being taken off immediately, were not to be taken off for four months, it was manifest that Mr. Bohn or any other publisher would not print his books, and would not continue the publication of them during those four months; he would defer the purchase of paper for printing till the time when the duty was repealed. It might be said the publishers would have great advantages from the repeal of the paper duty, and that these would compensate them for present loss; but it was not of the publishers he spoke. They would sustain almost no loss, for they would have the same sale for their books in four months, time as now; but the inevitable consequence would be that thousands of meritorious workmen would be thrown out of employment and deprived of the means of earning their bread. A gentleman, who knew the particulars well, had stated that not less than 10,000 persons would be thrown out of employment, and that nearly all the pressmen of London engaged in book printing would be in that situation. He was not asking for a drawback on paper that was periodically printed and circulated in the ordinary course of publication; his Motion applied to paper used in the heavy book printing. But it might, perhaps, be said that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in addition to the loss of £1,000,000 by the abolition of this duty, could not afford to lose a further amount in the shape of the drawback he now asked for. But what was the amount which the Chancellor of the Exchequer would lose by this concession? It was manifest that the publishers would abstain from printing during the next four months if the drawback were refused. Consequently there would be no duty paid into the revenue on account of paper to be so used. The right hon. Gentleman could not possibly suffer any injury in a financial way by granting this drawback, inasmuch as by refusing it the revenue would not be a gainer, and the only effect would be the temporary stoppage of the publishing trade, and the throwing out of employment a vast number of honest and industrious men. But even by the Bill as it at present stood the publisher, if he pleased, might obtain the drawback if he only sent his works as far as Jersey. But that was a proceeding which would involve a little expense and trouble, and it was doubtful whether the publishers would avail themselves of it. They would rather abstain from printing these standard works altogether, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be deprived of all duty whatever from that source. As a matter of policy, then, this drawback should be allowed, for the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be giving up next to nothing. When he was dealing with more than a million of money, was it worth while, for a few hundreds only, to throw thousands of men in the metropolis and hundreds in the country out of employment? It might be said that there was some difficulty in ascertaining fairly the amount of paper upon which the drawback ought to be allowed; but what he proposed was, that a drawback should be allowed only upon printed sheets purchased after the passing of the Act and remaining unbound at the time it came into operation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer permitted the stationers to have the drawback provided the paper was in sheets and parcels unopened. What difference in principle was there between having a drawback on parcels of paper of that description and unbound sheets of printed paper? The only difference which could exist was that which had reference to securing the identity of the paper, and he proposed to meet that difficulty by enacting that it should be subject to such rules and regulations as the Board of Inland Revenue should adopt. The Commissioners might make it incumbent on the printers and publishers to give notice of the books they intended to print, and to make a declaration, equivalent to an oath, that the printed paper on which the drawback was claimed had been printed since the passing of the Act, and was in unbound sheets. Did the right hon. Gentleman consider that such a declaration would not be a sufficient guarantee? Then he would remind him that he had no other guarantee with regard to the drawback on wine; he only had the declaration of the wine merchant that it had been purchased within two years. All he (Mr. Bovill) wished was to prevent the stagnation of trade which must necessarily arise if the drawback were not allowed, and he had shown the right hon. Gentleman that, as far as the revenue was concerned, the loss would be exceedingly small, because if the drawback were not conceded the paper would not be printed upon, and he would not get the duty, while any difficulty attending the ascertainment of the identity of the paper might be met by the resolutions of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. He presented the case to the Government as one of simple justice, and he would appeal to many hon. Gentlemen in the House, and especially to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, to say whether the greatest distress would not arise to the printing trade if the drawback were not allowed. It would be a miserable policy to remit a million and a quarter, and to refuse to allow the claims of the printers to the remission of a few hundred pounds to save them from being thrown out of employment.

Mr. Bovill

Amendment proposed,—

“ To leave out from the word ‘ That ’ to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, “ in the opinion of this House, it is just and expedient that a drawback should be allowed to printers and publishers of the Duty paid upon their stock of paper purchased and printed after the passing of the Bill, and remaining in sheets unbound at the time the Duty is to cease,—namely, on the 15th day of August next, subject to such rules and regulations as the Commissioners of Inland Revenue may make in that behalf.”—instead thereof.

MR. BLACK seconded the Motion, and said he could quite confirm the hon. and learned Member in his statement of the effect of refusing this drawback to the printers, who, as a class, would suffer severely. As a publisher, he (Mr. Black) should have felt great delicacy in seconding the Motion, as it might be supposed he was personally interested in it; but it was chiefly the publishers of periodicals who would be affected, because the publication of periodicals could not be stopped, yet if he were about to bring out a new edition of a standard work—say Shakspeare, for instance—he should undoubtedly wait a few weeks till the paper duty came off. Thus, in the months of June, July, and August, the greatest stagnation in the printing trade would take place. It was, therefore, a question which almost entirely affected the operative printers. There would be little or no difficulty in establishing the identity of the paper so printed on, because a specific return might be called for of the quantity which would be required for each work, and the Excise officers could ascertain easily enough that it was devoted to the purpose for which it was intended. If they could avoid by any possibility throwing a large number of persons out of work, they most undoubtedly ought to do so.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the hon. Member (Mr. Black) had very distinctly and ingenuously stated that of all classes affected by the change, none were so exempt from the apprehension of loss as publishers. They published at a fixed price, and it lay in the very nature of their trade that they could hardly lose by the change. Would a work like Colenso's Arithmetic, on which the duty, according to the statement given the other day by Mr. Bohn, made a difference of one halfpenny in the price, that sold for 2s. on the 14th of August, be sold for 1s. 11½d. on the 16th? In point of fact, the hon. and learned Gentleman had selected the interest that, of all others, would be least affected. Any change in a Customs' duty caused some stagnation of trade; and the change of an excise duty necessarily caused it to a greater degree. The effect of an immediate repeal of a duty, and the payment of heavy sums as drawback, caused a double loss. There must always be some inconvenience, but if the advantage of a repeal of duty overbalanced the evil, the only question was, how could the Government best proceed? The principle was to give no drawback when the identity could not be ascertained. The hon. and learned Gentleman was quite mistaken in supposing that in the case of wine the drawback was conceded either to powerful interests or to an abstract sense of justice. It resulted from a positive compact, and the only question was as to the interpretation of that compact. The wine duties had been paid freely for many years, and the revenue had been exempted from loss in consequence of these duties. There was this great difference, too, between the wine duties and the present case, that when the reduction of the duty took effect, the holders of the stocks of wines were immediately subjected to the competing action of the cheaper article, and he believed the price of wine had fallen to the full amount of the reduction of duty. But in the price of books there was no fall. The public in this particular instance did not get the benefit of the reduction, and there was no exposure to competition as in the case of wine. The hon. and learned Gentleman called upon the House to agree to his Motion for the sake of the operative printers, but he was not prepared to say that Parliament was to give the employers a large sum of money to enable them to go on employing their workmen. The hon. and learned Gentleman was in error if he supposed that the drawback in the case of wine depended simply on the declaration of the wine merchant. There was a minute and detailed series of regulations which wine merchants were obliged to observe. Stock books were obliged to be kept all along, and every possible security was taken for the protection of the revenue. The hon. and learned Gentleman said there was a precedent in the case of the stationers. But the difference was that after the 16th of August the stationers would be subjected to competition from abroad, while it was not pretended that foreign editions would be published abroad of all the books printed here. In the case of the stationers, also, there was no possibility of fraud, because the Excise label afforded an absolute security, and thus the drawback could be safely allowed. The hon. and learned Gentleman said there was no fear of fraud if his Motion were agreed to. The hon. and learned Gentleman was not responsible for the collection of the revenue, but those who were responsible were of a different opinion. The hon. and learned Gentleman admitted that if the attempt were made to guard against fraud, it would be necessary to establish virtually an Excise survey. The excisemen must follow the printing operations, and swarm in the offices of the printers and warehouses of the publishers. The hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to insert a condition that the allowance of drawback should be "subject to such rules and regulations as the Commissioners of Inland revenue may make." These words were so large, that he might accept the principle of the Motion and defeat it in practice, by the rules and regulations in question. That, however, would not be a straightforward course of proceeding, and it was much more fair to say that, in consequence of the total absence of any case of suffering or hardship and the liability to fraud, which could only be prevented by minute Excise superintendence, the Government could not possibly accept the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman. There were many other trades employing paper as the raw material of their manufacture that had a better case than the publishers. The paper hangers and paper-stainers employed their operatives too, and they had a greater claim, because they would be, after the 16th of August, exposed to a severe competition. The Excise survey would be so intolerable that, if the drawback were allowed, it must be paid wholesale upon all the paper presented.

The publishers had the smallest claim upon drawback of all the persons using paper, as they were effectually shielded against competition and even temporary loss. The hon. and learned Gentleman thought the loss to the revenue would not exceed £100. Would he guarantee that? It was hardly fair to challenge him upon this point, for he should be sorry to involve him in embarrassment, but he believed the sum the hon. and learned Gentleman in such a case would have to pay if the Government acted in the spirit of his Motion, and if they avoided the restraints and superintendence he had mentioned, would be a very heavy one. For these reasons he could not possibly agree to the Motion.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

House in Committee.

Clause 1,

MR. BLACKBURN said, he should move that the date at which the Bill was to come into operation be altered by the omission of the words, "15th day of August, 1860," and the insertion in their stead of "the 31st day of March, 1861." By continuing the excise duty on paper a little longer the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be enabled to clear off the £1,000,000 of Exchequer bonds, which must otherwise be postponed. The course he proposed would be consistent with the right hon. Gentleman's statements as to the propriety of discharging those bonds when they fell due. The House had been led away by the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, who always spoke of the paper duty as £1,000,000, whereas he found that the revenue derived last year from that source was £1,430,000, an amount which must this year have been exceeded, remembering that for the last twenty years the duty had steadily advanced at the rate of 6 per cent. July was the date originally assigned for the abolition of the tax; but with a view to the convenience of the trade the time had been extended to August. The same arguments, fortified by the necessity for making some arrangements with reference to the import of foreign rags, held good in support of the further extension which he proposed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he felt very much indebted to the hon. Gentleman, who had just spoken, for wishing to save his (Mr. Gladstone's) personal consistency, but he did not think that consistency was so much in danger as the hon. Gentleman seemed to imagine. He (Mr. Gladstone) had never laid down the principle that Exchequer bonds should be paid as they became due. What he did say in 1854, when the Exchequer bonds were issued, was that they should be paid off with the proceeds of half a year's income tax, whenever it could be applied to that purpose. The hon. Gentleman seemed to think that such bonds should be paid off, whenever it was possible, and that now was the time to do so; but he would venture to remind the hon. Gentleman that he (Mr. Blackburn) was a Member of a Government in 1858 at a time when the military and naval expenditure of the country was £10,000,000 less than it now was, which nevertheless found it impossible to pay off the Exchequer bonds. Yet, with Military Estimates which now stood at £30,000,000, he called on him to clear off all those liabilities. With regard to the amount of the paper duty the hon. Gentleman was in error. He had undoubtedly estimated the loss on that duty in the present year at £1,000,000; but he likewise stated that there would be a residue, which would only appear in the accounts for next year, and the hon. Gentleman was equally wrong in supposing that this residue would be half a million. The fact was that the hon. Member had mistaken the gross figures for the net produce of the paper duty, and had omitted from the calculation the amount of drawback, the cost of collection, and other items by which the amount would be considerably reduced. £100,000 a month would probably be the natural produce of the paper duty. But did the House suppose that by continuing the charge from the 15th of August till the 1st of March, a million would be raised? No, nor the half of it. If the duty had remained undisturbed, operations naturally would have gone on as usual, but the only result, in a financial point of view, which could attend the adoption by a decisive majority of a determination to repeal the tax, and the subsequent postponement of that repeal for nearly twelve months would be, that probably one-half of the proceeds of that duty would be lost. The collateral consequences of such a Motion were such as he should shrink from contemplating, and therefore, if money must be had, it would be far better to raise it by some distinct proposal, than for the House to attempt partially to retrace its steps by postponing the question for six or seven months. The hon. Member estimated that his Motion would produce a million to the Exchequer; but according to the Estimates of the Board of Inland Revenue, the net produce which they anticipated from the paper duty during the present year was only £250,000. The House had listened to a description by one hon. and learned Gentleman of the effects which even the slightest delay in the abolition of the duty must produce in paralysis, stagnation, doubtful employment, want, and general crippling of trade. How enormously must these injurious effects be increased if they trebled the time during which this paralysis was to extend. He (Mr. Gladstone) had no doubt the hon. Member was influenced by highly laudable motives, but, financially speaking, the plan he recommended would, he believed, entirely fail.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. BLACKBURN said, that after what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman, he would not press his Motion.

Motion by leave withdrawn.

MR. AYRTON observed that the first clause of the Bill did not follow the course usual in the repeal of excised duties, of including the duty on licences to manufacture the excisable commodity. If it were the intention of the right hon. Gentleman to keep up these licences it would be desirable to discuss the policy of such a measure. When the manufacture of paper was freed from the supervision of the Excise, a tax of this nature became quite unjustifiable. He found that whenever a duty such as that on paper had been repealed, the Excise licence had been repealed also. The only exception, as far as he could ascertain, to that rule was the case of the soapboilers, who were still bound to take out a licence, although the tax on soap had been repealed. The duty on paper had been abolished, it was said, with the view of encouraging and developing trade; but this monstrous imposition would have quite a contrary effect. It might be very right to establish a check of this kind in the case of a dangerous or noxious trade, but the manufacture of paper was one which ought to be encouraged. The fact of having to pay four guineas for a licence, however, would prevent many persons from entering the trade.

Amendment proposed, —

“ In line 7, after ‘ in respect of,’ to insert the words ‘ any maker of paper, pasteboard, or scale-board’ or any printer, painter, or stainer of paper, or any seller of paper-hangings or :”

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was unable to say that the

hon. Member's statement of precedent was literally incorrect, but he could mention an instance to show that it was certainly not established as a principle of recent legislation that when an Excise duty was repealed the persons who paid it should also be relieved from the burden of annual licences. The soap trade, to which the hon. Gentleman had himself referred, was one case where the repeal of the licence did not follow the repeal of the duty, although the question was carefully considered by Parliament, and there was as much anxiety to promote the soap as the paper trade. But the case of the auctioneers afforded a still stronger instance of the same kind. When the Excise duty on auctions was repealed, so far was Sir Robert Peel and the Parliament of the day from thinking that the licences ought necessarily to be discontinued as well, that the repeal of the duty was seized as an excellent opportunity for raising a small sum in an unexceptional manner, either—for he forgot the exact course pursued—by imposing a licence duty on the trade, or greatly augmenting that which already existed. That measure was carried without opposition either in the House or from the auctioneers. Then as to the principle, he could not regard the payment of £4 4s. for a licence as a serious obstacle to the development of the paper manufacture, which must be prosecuted on a scale certainly far larger than could be by persons who would feel as a burden so trifling a charge. It was urged that the amount derived from this licence was very small—only some £1,500 or £1,600 a year at present, and not likely to rise above £3,000 or £4,000 for many years to come; but the question was, not how much this duty would yield, but whether it could be raised in an unexceptional manner. If there were no serious complaint against it, and it involved no breach of principle, the mere smallness of the amount was no reason for abandoning it, especially in the case of a class on whom the Legislature were about to confer a great boon at a heavy cost to the Exchequer. The principle of these licences on trades was a good one; and he would be ready enough to answer the hon. Member's question whether he was willing to extend the practice if it depended on his own will alone. The question of licences on trades might at any time become entitled to the serious consideration of Parliament, either on account of peculiar financial pressure, or as a commutation for other taxes ; and he was not prepared to surrender those taxes of the kind which now existed. It might be true that all taxes which existed should be in perfect harmony with each other; but, although it might be proper to keep that in mind, he did not think it of itself a good reason for surrendering a duty which was raised without difficulty, complaint, or cost to the Exchequer, and which was paid by a class who, as he had said, were about to receive so considerable boon from the Government.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE remarked that when Sir Robert Peel increased the licence duty charged on auctioneers, those already in the trade were delighted, because it tended to keep others out of it. There could be no reason why paper manufacturers should be subject to licence duty more than cotton-spinners or carpet manufacturers. If one species of manufacture was to be licensed, there was a strong reason why all the rest should be treated in the same way; and he thought that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had been making great changes in the financial system of the country and was so much in favour of direct taxation, ought to extend the system of licensing to all trades. By what the right hon. Gentleman was now doing he would create a practical monopoly in the paper trade. The paper manufacture was already in comparatively few hands, and would become the possession of still fewer in time.

MR. BRIGHT said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman was not quite so conclusive in his arguments on this occasion as he had been on many other questions connected with his Budget. He agreed with the hon. Member opposite (Sir J. Trollope) that there was no reason whatever why the men who made paper should have to pay for a licence more than those who made calico. He believed it was better for the paper-makers that the licence should be retained and the duty abolished than that both should be retained; but there was really no reason why they should pay licence duty while those who manufactured other things were exempt. His principal objection to the duty was that it was unjust to the various classes of paper manufacturers. Those who carried on an extensive trade—the Wrigleys, Dickensons, and Cowans—paid no more than the £4 4s. which had to be paid also by those who carried on business only on a small scale, and derived from it but a scanty living. If their incomes did not exceed £250 a year, the licence would be equal to a tax of 4d. in the pound. It was not worth while, perhaps, to say much about it on one side or the other; but he thought the exceptions to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had referred did not afford sufficient grounds to continue the system, unless it were extended generally among traders, and that, he suspected, no Chancellor of the Exchequer would attempt until other sources of revenue had failed. He hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not said what he had said to-night for the purpose of extending licences. He had no objection to traders paying their full share of taxation, but he thought this mode of licences very unpalatable, and very unsatisfactory. He thought the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) was right in the view which he took of this question. It did not seem to be a matter of much consequence. No paper manufacturer objected to the licence. At the same time it was not just in principle, and it was unfair to the small paper manufacturers.

MR. WYLD said, that he did not think it would be fair to paper manufacturers to subject them to that charge, and at the same time to expose them to an unlimited competition with foreigners. The auctioneers to whom the Chancellor of the Exchequer had referred had no foreign competition to encounter.* With respect to the manufacturers of glass, the duty on which was repealed a few years ago, they paid no licences. If free trade were to be accompanied with the imposition of licences generally, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would rouse a feeling of opposition which he did not expect.

MR. BASS observed, that the paper-makers ought to be satisfied that they had now one tax less, while the one in question was only retained on account of revenue. The system, if adopted at all, ought to be extended to all trades; and he asked the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Trollope) how the farmers would like being subject to a licence to carry on their business. The licences of the trade to which he belonged were enormous. He paid, himself, no less than thirteen different taxes. He paid them as a maltster, as a brewer, as a dealer; the article was sold to a person who paid the tax; the publican paid another tax. In every principal town in which he had an agent he was also obliged to take out a licence, and the general effect in his case was that he paid the tax eleven or twelve times over. Thus there were thirteen different taxes in the shape of licence duties. Altogether he paid about £130,000 per annum. Let him, however, be relieved from half only of the other taxes, and he would not quarrel about the licences.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he must call attention to the important considerations involved in this extremely small question of £1,500 a year, which the paper-makers paid for licences. If they voted away this sum, and laid down the principle to remit all licences, they would abolish a considerable revenue. Although the system of licences might be anomalous and exceptional, they ought not to take away the money in one instance, unless they were prepared to lay down a clear principle, and carry it to a consistent end. He was much obliged to the hon. Member who had just spoken, for he had convicted the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets of a great inaccuracy. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets said that uniformly, when Excise Duties were removed, licences were removed also; but there was an Excise duty on beer; and, though it was removed, the manufacturers of beer still paid a large sum for licences. Knowing that the Committee was in danger of being betrayed unawares into the remission of a small sum which might afterwards involve inconvenient consequences, he entreated them to interpose, unless they were in a condition to part with a revenue of some hundreds of thousands of pounds.

MR. AYRTON said, he had mentioned that there were certain exceptions in which the system of licences was retained, although the duty on the commodity was remitted; but those exceptions depended on clear and intelligible principles. It was quite unnecessary for the Committee to be drawn into a discussion of licences to auctioneers, for the maintenance of which good reasons might be given. His simple proposition was, that when the excise upon articles having no noxious tendency was repealed, with one exception, the licence duty was removed with it. He knew that it was the interest of the paper-makers to maintain the licensing system, and he was quite astonished to hear such a financier as the Chancellor of the Exchequer talk of the revision of the paper duty as a boon to the paper-makers. It was not ranked as a boon to them, but as a boon to the public; and he was asking them to repeal the licences precisely on the same ground—namely, for the benefit of the public. Men largely engaged in the manufacture of paper, would, no doubt, like to have the licences increased to £30 or £40, because the practical effect was to exclude others from setting up in the trade. Of all systems of finance that of a heavy licensing system was the most iniquitous and the most injurious to the public; because the tendency was to keep down the small men, and leave the large manufacturers in possession of the business undisturbed. The right hon. Gentleman had endeavoured to draw the Committee away from the true question. He only asked for the remission of the Excise licence when they removed the Excise duty. The Committee would be betrayed into nothing by assenting to it. It was a proposition which had been assented to over and over again, in the case of glass, bricks, and other commodities; and he protested against the Chancellor of the Exchequer creeping into a system which he could not avow before the country, however agreeable it might be to large manufacturers, who traded to the extent of hundreds of thousands of pounds.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted:"

The Committee divided: Ayes 39; Noes 147: Majority 108.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER explained that the limitation of quantity with respect to drawback, was fixed by this clause. The amount fixed as a minimum appeared to be reasonable, and was stated in all the communications with the trade.

MR. NORRIS said, the clause did not include "millboard," as stated in the preamble of the Act.

"Millboard" was accordingly inserted, and the clause was agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

House resumed. Bill reported.

PETITIONS OF RIGHT BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee).

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2,

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman who had charge of this Bill (Mr. Bovill) had earned the gratitude of the House for the introduction of a measure which would have the effect of simplifying the procedure, removing the technicalities, and reducing the expense in this class of actions—but there was one point to which he wished to take exception. He thought there was no reason why a preliminary application should be made to a Judge. He therefore proposed that the second clause should be omitted altogether; and then, with some verbal Amendments in the third clause, the effect would be that the first application would be made to the Crown.

MR. BOVILL said, he was willing to assent to the suggestion.

Clause struck out. Remaining clauses agreed to.

House resumed. Bill reported.

CUSTOMS BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee).

Clauses 1 to 11 inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 12 (Duties on Timber and Wood),

MR. FENWICK said, the effect of the proposed measure would be to impose a duty of 1s. per load on a species of wood extensively imported into the north. It was called spars, was of an inferior description, and was principally used for mining purposes. No doubt 1s. per load was a reduction of the present duty, but in consequence of the mode in which spars were measured by the Customs the new duty would in reality amount to something like 3s. per load. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would give the House an assurance that the duty would be charged in such a way that the importers would have to pay 1s. per load only.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had no difficulty in giving his hon. Friend the assurance which he asked, for it never was his intention to maintain under the new law those measurements of woods of this description which might be perfectly intelligible, but which were not equitable, and which existed under the old system of the timber duties. It was not intended, in short, to abandon the mode of measurement hitherto practised by the Customs, and the new duty would be put as nearly at 1s. for the quantity mentioned as it would be possible to do.

MR. FENWICK: And as to bark, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would state his intentions.

Sir George Lewis

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The duty would follow in the same manner, and be made more equitable.

MR. BUCHANAN said, that staves used by coopers for herring barrels had been excepted from duty under the old law, and he regretted to see that the right hon. Gentleman still proposed to make them no longer an exception. He thought all staves ought to be treated alike. He wished further to observe, in reference to the tea and sugar duties, which had been fixed for a year only, that the system was most inconvenient to the trade generally. If they had been taken for five years or more, it would have been far more agreeable to the trades. He hoped the House and country would long have the benefit of the services of the right hon. Gentleman in the office which he so much adorned, and then perhaps he would consider this question and bring it to a settlement.

MR. HENLEY said, he was glad the right hon. Gentleman seemed willing to do justice to the dealers in staves, but his morality appeared to be this, that so long as the duty was high, it was right to charge them three times too much, but now it would be low he did not intend to charge more than the proper amount. This evidently was the reasoning of the right hon. Gentleman.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed, that the criticism of the right hon. Gentleman applied to an abstract Chancellor of the Exchequer. The present did not hold himself responsible for schemes of duty devised before he was born. The exemption of staves for herring barrels was an old exemption, which probably it was thought invidious to destroy. The exemption of staves in general was introduced under the Government of Sir Robert Peel about 1842, when the cooperage trade of this country was labouring under severe competition; but, the principle of a nominal duty being now established, it was the opinion of a large portion of the trade that a uniform duty should be fixed, and so this low duty on staves was proposed and adopted by the House. He thought that there was great force in what the hon. Gentleman said with regard to the duties on tea and sugar, and he trusted that whoever might in future occupy the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer would be enabled to adopt a system which would give the commercial community a larger outlook with respect to these duties than they could have under a provisional arrangement.

MR. HALIBURTON said, he had a matter of great importance, affecting the colony with which he was connected, to bring under the notice of the House; but at that late hour (twenty-five minutes to twelve o'clock) he thought it would not be advisable to attempt to make the long statement he should be obliged to offer to the Committee. He therefore moved that the Chairman report progress.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was quite certain that though the hour might be considered late in some countries, it was according to the usages of that House an early hour. At present there was a most favourable and satisfactory state of things for the discussion of the question, the House being in a calm and temperate mood, and having nothing to sway its judgment, and if the hon. Gentleman would proceed with the statement he had to make on the present occasion he would find it so agreeable a duty that the House would doubtless frequently in future have the pleasure of listening to him at a similar hour in the evening.

MR. HALIBURTON observed, that he felt he had no alternative but to go on; but he assured the Committee that he never rose under circumstances of such embarrassment. He proposed to move that in page 16, line 31 of the Bill, after "sawn or split, planed or dressed," should be inserted, "except deals, battens, and boards, which shall remain at the present duty." No person reading the short line in the paragraph to which his Amendment would apply could suppose that underneath those ordinary words lay a measure of as great importance as ever was brought before the House. When he considered that the persons he represented belonged to a colony unrepresented in that House, and without any official organ in this country to make their wants known to the Government, and that he, who now rose to advocate their interests, was a stranger in this country, without any sort of interest beyond that which consisted in the feeling of all Englishmen to do right, he felt such discouragement come over him as he believed no other man had ever felt before. It was needless for him to say that British America was a forest country, and its only or main export was timber. Therefore the interests of the whole people were more or less involved in the trade; but in this country, where there were so many vast interests, if one was ruined the whole country was not thereby affected. All other interests were ably and efficiently represented in that House—the cork-cutters, paper-makers, and others, who were all for free trade for the rest of the world, but Protectionists for themselves—these were represented by men so able, that they could draw from the ranks of Free-traders some of its oldest advocates to say that they approved of the doctrine, except where their constituents were concerned. But who was there to speak for the absent men, out of sight, yet intelligent, able, enterprising, and loyal, who formed the foundation of a large empire? If he felt discouragement under these circumstances he could not derive much consolation when he considered that the present was the measure of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, one of the most eloquent, able, ingenious, and persuasive of men, but who, according to his own expression the other night was impervious to any argument. When he saw the majority on the opposite benches in favour of free trade and the abolition of all duties, he felt that the tide was running against him, and that it was hopeless for him to make an application to that House for assistance. Still, he would appeal from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the good honest feeling of Englishmen, who proverbially loved fair play, and who, if they could not assist, at least sympathised with the weaker party. In former days it was the policy of this country to nurture its colonies. That was the period when the Gentlemen on his side of the House were known by the well-defined and time-honoured name of Tories, and before the new sliding-scale sort of nomenclature of Conservatives—Liberal Conservatives—progressive Conservatives—came into fashion, together with a variety of other names of very little meaning and much less sense. In those good old times it was the habit of the country to rely on its Colonies, and he recollected that in his younger days the toast drank on all occasions was "Ships, colonies, and commerce." Those good old days were passed, and now it was "cotton twist and cotton yarn" instead of "colonies and commerce." In these good old days it was thought necessary to cultivate the Colonies, and, on this principle, that those who begot children were bound to protect and support them. On the same principle, a nation which planted colonies ought to support and protect them until they were able to support and protect themselves. Therefore every encouragement was given to that forest country to furnish supplies of timber to England at a period when the North of Europe, the only other place that England could get timber from, was, by the machinations of the uncle of the present Emperor of the French, closed to this country. In 1842, Sir R. Peel reduced the scale of these duties, with the view of giving the people of England the benefit of competition between North America and the North of Europe. Now, he found no fault with the principle of that proposal, but with the mode then, as now adopted, without notice and by surprise, of throwing the colonists on their backs in an instant. What was the consequence? One of the ablest men in Canada, whom he had seen within the last few days, computed the loss to that colony caused by a little clause of four or five words, just like that of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, at £3,000,000 sterling. The loss to New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, his own knowledge of which was more extensive, he estimated at £2,000,000 more; making altogether £5,000,000. Other reductions took place, and now the competition had reached this point, that the trade in America, which was rather on the decrease, while the foreign tonnage and foreign importations had of late years largely increased. It had also become a sort of gambling trade. If the supply from the Baltic was not very great, there was a chance of our own colonists coming in and reaping some little profit. At other periods they barely realized the cost of production: and it was at such a time, with things in that position, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had chosen for introducing, without notice, his scheme for equalizing these duties. The matter was one of great importance, not with respect to the few shillings a ton, but on the tenure of our colonies. He entreated the House to consider whether it was their intention to put it out of the power of those colonies to belong to them or not. He wished to warn the Government against the course they were pursuing. He could tell them, from his knowledge of the people of North America, that this measure was cutting the first strand of the cable which connected these provinces with this country. When the first step was being taken to equalize the duties on Baltic and American timber the colonists were engaged in arranging their spring exportations to Liverpool. Among the rest was a person named M'Avity, the Mayor of the city of St. John's, the capital of New Brunswick. That gentleman was in this country on his private affairs, as was often the case with almost every other timber merchant in St. John's, New Brunswick; and to his astonishment he learnt from the papers that the Government proposed to abolish the differential duties on timber. Mr. M'Avity was a very respectable man, filling an office to which he had been elected by a very different class from the £6 householders who were about to receive the franchise in England, although he certainly desired to cast no disparagement on the gentlemen who composed the "Strikes" of this country. Mr. M'Avity addressed a letter to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in which there was really nothing impertinent. Private affairs, said the writer, required him to return in a few days to his native land; but he was confident the right hon. Gentleman could not be aware of the extreme injury which the new scale of duties would inflict on Her Majesty's subjects in New Brunswick, more especially on those engaged in the manufacture and exportation of deals. He also expressed his belief that he and his fellow colonists who had invested large sums of money in saw-mills and other requirements of the trade, upon the faith of the continuance of the present duties, had on that and other grounds a just claim to be heard before any change was made. In this country they could not hint a change of duties without it being instantly conveyed by post or telegraph to John O'Groat's house. And immediately up got the hon. Gentleman having the honour to represent the very fertile regions where that House stood, to make known the wants of the gentlemen of groats. But Mr. M'Avity also respectfully avowed his conviction that should the proposed change be carried out without reasonable opportunity being afforded to the interests affected to express their opinions upon it, "such a hasty proceeding would undoubtedly cause serious discontent among a people who had always been conspicuous for their attachment to the institutions of this country." Well, if there was anything improper in the tone of that letter perhaps some hon. Member would be good enough to point it out to him, for he confessed, as a poor simple-minded colonist, that he had wholly failed to discover it. Now came the right hon. Gentleman's answer, an answer he must say not exactly such as he thought it becoming in a Chancellor of the Exchequer to make. It was very haughty and very supercilious. What! a man from New Brunswick, who could not in any way influence a vote in that House—what sort of a fellow was that to approach a dignitary like a British Chancellor of the Exchequer! The man must have been dumb-founded before he got home, if he did not actually die from fright. "In your letter," said the right hon. Gentleman, "you protest as well as remonstrate." Dreadful words! One would have fancied the man must have used some terrible oaths, or discharged some extraordinary Yankee expletives, at the least. But, after all, he only "protested"—a thing which our noble Foreign Secretary has been so much blamed of late for not doing on the Savoy question. But the right hon. Gentleman appeared to have got excited by the hardihood of this gentleman in venturing to "protest and remonstrate"—horrid words!—against any change in the timber duties until the people of New Brunswick had had "an opportunity of stating their views on the subject." "Were I to examine your language critically," he proceeded, "I could not admit your title, even individually, to protest against any legislation which Parliament may think it right to adopt for the equalization of the duties on foreign and colonial wood. [Cries of "Hear, hear," from the Ministerial side.] Yes, they would "hear" something more yet. "And when you desire to remonstrate 'on behalf of the inhabitants of a colony,' I must observe that such remonstrance ought to be addressed to the Secretary of State for the Colonies"—here spake the Circumlocution Office! "who would exercise his discretion as to bringing them before the Minister of Finance." That was a way of conciliating the Colonies, certainly! A mere colonist had no right, to use the words "protest and remonstrate;" they were highly indecent to English ears, especially if addressed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Emperors only were at liberty to utter them. That was the mode in which a Minister of the Crown addressed the people of British North America—men very different from their £6 voters, who did not know what they were talking about. A colonist was told that he must not presume to approach a personage like the Chancellor of the Exchequer of all England. He, the mayor of a pettifogging place, St. John's, New Brunswick, must go back to his own country and then address his Governor, who would forward his protest to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, who would exercise his discretion whether he should bring it before the Finance Minister. Probably it would never be laid before that Minister at all, because, long before this colonist reached his home and got through the Circumlocution Office, the Bill would have been framed by Parliament, and that would be the answer which his protest would receive. There were, however, other duties besides paper duties, and there were responsibilities besides those of responsible advisers. The Chancellor of the Exchequer went on to say that as his correspondent was about to quit England he would waive all regard to the considerations which he had alluded to, but he begged leave to say that there were no circumstances or arguments that could have led any persons interested in colonial timber and exercising ordinary prudence to reckon on the permanence of a law for retaining the differential duties on timber. But surely plain principles of justice suggested that if their export trade was to be cut off it should not be without some little notice. If prudent men would not have had any such reliance, he could only say that the people of all British North America were very imprudent people. When the principle was announced that it was intended to give the English public the benefit of competition with the foreigner, was the differential duty not reduced to the lowest minimum? And when the trade could hardly support itself, why were the colonists to consider that the differential duty would not be continued? The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that no expectation could be formed of this, for the legislation for a long series of years was founded on the principle of first abating and then destroying these duties, and the only wonder was that they should have lasted so long. Then the right hon. Gentleman said:—"You describe this change as destructive of the trade and of the property of the colonists. If so, it can only be because the differential duty exacts from the people of England, who provide for the military and naval defence of New Brunswick at their own charge, an artificial price for its produce." Now, this would be an ungenerous expression, if even it were true; but, in point of fact, there was not a word of truth in it. England protect New Brunswick, of all countries in the world! Did the English Government protect it when they sent Lord Ashburton with a dash of his pen to strike off one-third of the colony, surrendering its best timber land, compelling a colonist to pass through a portion of the United States in order to reach his own capital, and cutting off his postal connection with Canada. If this was protection the people of New Brunswick might be able to defend themselves against their enemies, but it would be hard to save themselves from their friends. Again, did the English Government protect Nova Scotia when they abandoned its fisheries to the Americans? In such haste was this done that when the delegates who, to put on a plausible appearance, had been sent for from Nova Scotia arrived at Quebec, they found the treaty signed. This treaty surrendered the best fishery in the whole world, and contained a most ignorantly conceived clause, which enabled the Americans to spread their nets and cure their fish upon the uninhabited parts of the coast, the fact being that there was not an acre of unoccupied land on the whole shore of New Brunswick, so that the Americans had actually the right to spread their nets upon any field which was not ploughed and under-cropped. Was that protection? In much the same way Canada was protected, when so badly drawn up was the last treaty, that the colonists found themselves debarred from a trade which they had anticipated, because it was a coasting trade, and never got the navigation of the American canals in return for equivalent concessions which they were called upon to make. Was it protection to the North-West when, by a blunder which upon a competitive examination would have disqualified a man for a marching ensign's commission, the half of the beautiful territory of Oregon was given up, and the settlements of the North-West were handed over to the Americans, the line of demarcation being run into a place which had since led to a dispute about the island of San Juan. He was going to say that the colonists would be better without such protection, but he would leave them to say that for themselves when the time came. This protection, however, was plainly all a mistake, although the Chancellor of the Exchequer said they were protected, and assumed to know more about Canada than these gentlemen did; but that was not true. He would ask them whether they wished to spread general bankruptcy throughout the colony? The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the prediction of "ruin" was not well founded; but "ruin" was not the word used—the terms were "great dissatisfaction." There was certainly a class of politicians in this country, who used words so ambiguously that there was no meeting their arguments. But Mr. M'Avity, as the right hon. Gentleman had observed, was about to quit England; and how did he get back to New Brunswick? First he had to go to New York, from there to Canada, from Canada back to Portland, and from Portland he would take the steamer to New Brunswick, because the colonists had not a road which they could make use of to reach their capital. They were told that this repeal of the differential duties was free trade, and a colonist was expected to return home crammed with this wonderful specific, which cured all diseases. "Look at the opulence of this country," it would be said to him; "see how rich we have become since we adopted the policy of free trade!" But then he would go to the United States, where he would hear it said, "See how rich we have grown under protection!" The conclusion he would come to would probably be that neither the Americans nor the English were right, and that a midway system of reciprocity was the true policy. That such was the true line to take this country would find out one day. Perhaps, however, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would tell them the longest way round was the nearest way home. But there was another gentleman who was at all events known—he alluded to Mr. Rankin. If there was a man associated with British North America who was acquainted with the timber trade it was Mr. Rankin; but, like a true Scotchman, he was now about to retire from a trade that would not pay him. He would not read that gentleman's letter at that hour, but he would only refer to one passage in which he stated that, in 1840, the balance of the timber trade in favour of the colonies was 1,511,000 tons, whereas in 1859 the balance in favour of the foreign trade was 2,614,626 tons. When these men from the colonies had exhausted themselves they got the most experienced men in Liverpool, with whom they thought to make a great combined effort and send a petition to that House. When they began to explain matters in that petition they were stopped. It was irregular. Like bad game they were told it ought to be bagged. After they had very briefly and ably stated their case, they looked round to see if there was a man in that House who cared for British North America. There was no one in Downing Street. There was no use in going to the Colonial Office—there they carried out the wishes, not of the colonists, but governed the Colonies according to the wish of the Government. But they found in him, their countryman, a very unworthy representative. They sent their petition to him to present. He could not state their case with that effect he could have wished; and, feeling the difficulty of the case, he proposed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that these 3,000,000 people should be heard at the bar of the House. [A laugh.] Yes, those who considered the unrepresented rabble of England worthy of being heard night after night thought nothing of 3,000,000 of vastly more intelligent and able people than one-half of the constituency above the ten-pounders in this country. He should be more or less than a man if he did not stand up for his countrymen on the other side of the Atlantic, where his family had been for 100 years consecutively under the flag of the old country; and if they did not listen to their sole advocate, and if they did not regard their appeal with that deference it deserved, it would be echoed back with throats louder and stronger than his. What was the answer he received; "Such a thing was unheard of;" but he said their claim was not without precedent. There were precedents to which he could refer. He would refer to one, not exactly upon all fours with this, as lawyers would say, because the tax was to be paid there, not here. Dr. Franklin was heard at the bar of the House, and told them, as he now told them—but Dr. Franklin did it in triumph, while he did it in sorrow—that their legislation would lose them their colonies. Dr. Franklin's prophecy had been fulfilled. He prayed to God his might not be. A pretty reception Franklin met with. What was the language of Wedderburn? He pointed to him and called him a thief and murderer, and a man that had forfeited the good opinion of mankind. It was not a very encouraging thing to be heard at the bar of that House. But Franklin wrote a little treatise which he might recommend some hon. Gentlemen to read—for they were travelling on the same road,—in which he showed "how a great nation may be made into a very small one." The people had certainly acted with very great fairness and very great moderation. They had instructed him to ask for no remission of duty where it might affect the ship-builder, but there was a particular description of timber that was manufactured in their sawmills on which millions had been spent, and which must be taken into consideration. The supply for the timber trade was all prepared the year before, no notice was given, and if the trade were cut short ruin would follow, not as regards the supply of Liverpool—that must come; but the labour would not be paid, the contractor with the labourers would not be paid, the merchants that supplied them with manufactured goods would not be paid, and then would come the question among the colonists, "We have all the disadvantages of belonging to Great Britain, and not one of the advantages; shall we set up for ourselves? We are as numerous as the Americans were when they conquered their independence—3,000,000 of more sterling stuff than any they had; shall we part good friends—shall we make our own treaties, or annex ourselves to our neighbours with whom our commercial interests are so nearly allied?" The Chancellor of the Exchequer had already spared some; he had granted a drawback to the paper manufacturers and also a drawback on wine. Were their children and friends in British North America, the props and supports of this country, not to be regarded with equal consideration as the manufacturers of a bit of paper? The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, he had heard these complaints before, but an appeal to figures showed that since the passing of Sir R. Peel's Act reducing the duty on timber in 1842 the number of vessels that entered the St. Lawrence had been either diminishing or stationary. It was true that in 1845 an active demand took place, in consequence of a revival through railway speculations, but after the cessation of these it declined again. Among the very ablest shipmasters in the port of Liverpool were colonists who had left their own country on account of the stagnation of trade caused by the timber duties, while many more had been exiled to the ports of Boston and New York. Considering that the production of British North America and the Baltic countries of this particular kind of timber was pretty equal, for, although labour was cheaper in the Baltic, yet there was superior skill and enterprise in the British colonies, there were great difficulties for the latter to overcome. He found that freights from Gothenburg to Hull were 32s. 6d., while from New Brunswick to

Mr. Haliburton

Mr. Haliburton

Hull they were from 80s. to 85s. If the reduction of the relative duties should take place the result would be that the Baltic timber merchant would make his profit from it and would say that Nova Scotia would be ruined entirely. That, perhaps, was a small view to take, and not sufficient to justify a long speech, but he had listened to what sailors called "long yarns" about the want of a reserve for the navy while those who talked about it did not always seem to know how to get it. Every merchant and trading company which formed a reserved fund did so from its abundance after paying expenses and profits, but the reason why our reserves for the navy had not answered was because our navy was not sufficient for us. And if this country were to retain the supremacy of the seas, was it wise to cast off the third greatest shipping Power in the world—British North America, which ranked next to the United States? But while British shipowners were complaining, while British North America was being ruined, France was acting very differently. She gave bounties (which he did not ask England to give) for the deep-sea fisheries, and had now 30,000 seamen upon the banks of Newfoundland, which she was really annexing, while our attention was taken by an ignis fatuus in Savoy, which, however interesting, as it really was, did not so nearly affect us. He did not ask for bounties, but these small timber duties, these small favours to the sailors, who would be our help in time of need, might well be spared. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had talked of the protection afforded to the colonies by our army and navy, but they did not need that help. In time of peace two or three vessels to protect the fisheries would be ample. He was aware that nothing could be more distasteful to the people whose interests he was advocating or more unacceptable by the people of this country than anything which bore the appearance of a threat; but he must remind the House that the country he was speaking of had all the disadvantages of a connection with England without any of its advantages. The inhabitants were not people who should be trifled with; they were rather entitled to expect kind if not paternal usage. Persons of the calico school, who regarded nothing but the manufacture of cotton, said that the United States were better customers now than when they were colonies, and that it would be no great loss to get rid of

Mr. Haliburton

British North America. These at any rate were not patriotic sentiments, and they were not facts. The United States were in a great measure settled by rebels from the country—Cromwellians—but during the trying time of the American revolution, British North America remained true to the Sovereign, and when the revolution was over, thousands of loyalists passed from the States, and sought a home in the wildernesses of our present North American colonies, in order to have the honour and satisfaction of living and dying under the British flag. Those were the men who begot the present race, and who had transmitted their feelings of loyalty to the present generation. Nothing was so repugnant to the feelings of such people as to be treated with ridicule. In 1812, when Napoleon was marching to Moscow, and it was believed that the day of Great Britain's glory and power was declining, the United States declared war against the mother country. Who then repelled them in America? Was it the army or navy of England? Of the first we had none to spare, all our men being gloriously engaged in a life and death struggle in Europe. It was the Local Militia of Canada who drove back the hordes of invaders from those lands and pursued them beyond the borders. And at a later period, when French emissaries among a French population, and Radical Chartists who had left this country for one where they were taught to believe they would find no nobleman to whom they need take off their hats, made a hostile movement, what had happened? Who, let him ask, had repelled that invasion? The Militia of Canada; for when Sir G. Cockburn asked Sir F. Head if he could spare the services of the regular troops, that able and popular Governor, who was a standing testimony of the ingratitude of the statesmen of England, replied, "Take them all. I will place myself at the head of the Militia, and drive those men out of the country." The people of Canada, then, he contended, deserved some consideration at the hands of the English nation. In addition to the other claims which they possessed to it, he might mention the fact that the colonists had, as soon as they were able, relieved this country from bearing the expense of their local Government, and had taken it upon themselves to carry it on on a scale of munificence and liberality which was almost unequalled. They paid the Governor General whom England sent out to them, out of the meagre treasury of a young colony, a salary nearly double that which was received by the President of the United States; and the people of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and the other colonies acted in a similar spirit. And what was the return which was made to them? On a recent occasion, when the question of what names should be given to four different townships in our North American provinces had been referred to the Governor General for his decision, his wife had had the good taste to impose upon them the names of Tiny, Floss, Hops, and Emily—these being the names of the pampered lap-dogs of a pampered master. Against their enemies the colonists were able to protect themselves; he asked for protection for them against the repetition of such an insult as that which he had just mentioned. Why, the Americans acted better by their negroes than to treat them after such a fashion. Instead of naming them after lap-dogs, they called them Cato, Scipio, Venus, and Juno, after the heroes of antiquity, and the goddesses of the ancient mythology. Were our North American colonists the sons of dogs that they should be placed upon a lower level than the negro? He, for one, should enter his indignant protest against acts so insulting as that to which he referred. But it was urged by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the colonists imposed taxes upon English produce. Who was it, he would ask, that directed them to do so? Those who presided in that beautiful establishment in Downing Street, which operated as a nightmare upon our colonies, and who sent out instructions to the effect that the foreigner was not to be taxed, and that England would get into trouble with respect to her treaty engagements if there were not discriminating duties. Still, it was contended that the colonists taxed England; but it should be remembered that it was they themselves who virtually paid the tax. They had good reason, therefore, under all the circumstances which he had stated, to complain of the position in which they were placed. They were ridiculed by their American neighbours in a way which was most painful to their feelings. The people of the United States said to them, "You now belong to England, but associate yourselves with us, and you shall have 10 Members in the Senate and 140 in the House of Representatives. Instead of being encroached upon by us, you would become one of us, and we should take care that nobody should interfere with you. Instead of being excluded from a share in the patronage of our country, you would have open to you all the offices of an united empire. The negroes of St. Domingo have their sable representative at the Court of London; you have none. Will you longer submit to occupy a position so inferior?" Such were the taunts with which the people of Canada had to bear; let him beseech the House of Commons not to afford cause for their continuance, and not to place it out of the power of colonists to belong to this country. In using the language to which he had given expression he was not afraid of being misunderstood. The whole object of his life and writings had been to unite, by bonds firmer and more indissoluble, Canada with England, to unite the raw material of the new country with the manufacturing skill of the old, in order that, both possessing one language, one literature, one blessed system of freedom, they might grow together in prosperity and greatness under the ancient and glorious flag of Britain. To the sentiments which he had uttered that evening he had often before given expression, although in a form somewhat different, entertaining, as he did, an earnest hope that relations might endure for ever between the two countries which were calculated to be profitable to both.

Amendment proposed,—

"In line 31, after 'planed or dressed,' to insert the words, except deals, battens, and boards, which shall remain at the present duty."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was not necessary that he should detain the House for more than a few moments as it would be quite out of place to enter upon the wide field which the hon. and learned Gentleman had with so much ability traversed. He had entered upon the whole subject of the relations between Great Britain and the North American colonies, and had expressed with great frankness his views of what he conceived the ungracious treatment which the colonies had received at the hands of Great Britain. He had had, at any rate, practical experience, in doing so, of the disposition of the House to permit and encourage free discussion. He concurred with the hon. and learned Gentleman in the sympathy and respect which he felt towards the colonists of British North America, but he must confess he regretted some of the language the hon. and learned Gentleman had used, and the comparison he had thought it necessary to draw to their disadvantage. The opinion which the hon. and learned Gentleman had expressed, that the colonists of British North America were ungenerously treated, was not one which the Government entertained, nor did he think it would meet with any considerable expression of concurrence on the part of the Committee. Indeed, there was something of paradox in his comparison between the conduct of our forefathers at a time when the old Tory opinions, which he so much eulogised at the beginning of his speech, prevailed, in laying a tax on the British colonies, and the conduct of Parliament in relieving the people of England of a tax which they alone were paying. As regarded the question of the timber duties, there was no occasion for him (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) to enter into it; because the very brief and simple considerations which he thought would govern the policy of Parliament with respect to it were stated in a letter of his which the hon. and learned Gentleman had paid him the compliment to take as a text for a large portion of his speech. The hon. and learned Gentleman had been pleased to characterize that as a haughty and supercilious communication; but it was somewhat remarkable that he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had only yesterday received a reply to that letter from Mr. M'Avity, the gentleman to whom it was addressed, in which he particularly thanked him for the very courteous terms in which it was couched. But he was bound to say that he had no evidence, except in the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman, of that burning dissatisfaction—that rankling sense of wrong—which he described as prevailing among the people of British North America. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) took it to be an undoubted fact that Parliament had now been long engaged in the removal of differential duties, both at home and with respect to colonial produce, and that of all the interests with which it had had to deal there was no one with respect to which it had proceeded more gradually, tenderly, and cautiously than the timber trade of British North America. In 1842, 1850, and in other years, when protecting duties had been reduced, notice had been given; and he believed that this had long survived every other object of colonial protection. He believed the opinion of this country was fixed on this subject, and he had no evidence before him, except the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, that the very just and moderate measure of the Government was in any manner resented by the people of that colony. Indeed, the question was so thoroughly understood by the House and the country that it would not be necessary for him to discuss it at greater length, and without intending any disrespect to the hon. and learned Gentleman he should now leave the decision to the Committee.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

The Committee divided:—Ayes 24: Noes 91; Majority 67.

Clause agreed to, as was also clauses 13 and 14.

Clause 15,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved the insertion of the words:—

“That the extra rates above charged upon any goods which shall have been removed under bond shall not apply to removals under bond to warehouses in ports or places which now possess the privilege of bonding.”

He did not consider this Amendment represented the state in which the law should finally remain; but for the present, he was content to take the rate as applicable to new places.

Mr. KER objected to the clause as amended.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he should move that the Chairman report progress, as it was quite evident, from the right hon. Gentleman's admission, that the clause, as proposed, was not likely to settle the question.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER assented to the Chairman reporting progress.

House resumed.

Committee report progress.

House adjourned at half-after One o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, April 23, 1860.

NOTES.] Took the Oath.—The Earl Cowley.
PUBLIC BILLS.—2^a Inclosure.
3^a Municipal Corporation Mortgages, &c.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY TO FRANCE.
PRIVATE OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.
RESOLUTIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY rose to move to resolve—

"That it appears by the Papers lately laid before Parliament, and especially by a Despatch from Earl Cowley to Lord John Russell, dated 5th February, that the French Minister had stated, and truly, that the Intention of The Emperor of the French to take Possession of Savoy under certain Contingencies had been made known to Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris, and by him communicated to Her Majesty's Secretary of State on more than one Occasion between the 12th of July 1859 and the 25th of January 1860 in private Letters :

"That while this House fully recognizes the Necessity of a private Correspondence between the Secretary of State and Her Majesty's Representatives abroad, it is of opinion that all Facts of International Importance ought to be made Matter of official Correspondence, and as such to remain on record for the Use not only of the Government of the Day but of their Successors in Office, to be produced to or withheld from Parliament by the Ministers of the Crown on their Responsibility :

"That the Absence of any such Record, more especially if such private Correspondence is referred to in public Despatches, is injurious to the Public Service, unjust alike to the Foreign Minister who made the Communication and to official Colleagues at Home, and calculated to withhold important Matter from the full and free Control of Parliament."

The noble Marquess said, that it was some time since he had given notice of his intention to move his Resolution, but the discussion had been postponed from time to time by no fault of his. Before Easter he consented to postpone his Motion in consequence of a statement made in "another place" by the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign office, that any discussion on the affairs of Savoy at that time might prejudice the negotiations which were then pending; and more lately he had consented to a further postponement for reasons which would be fresh in the recollection of their Lordships. It was stated by the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) that the postponement would be convenient on public grounds, because it was considered by Earl Cowley that his Resolutions implied a censure upon him, and that his Lordship desired to be present at the discussion and was then at Calais detained by stress of weather. He (the Marquess of Normanby) assured the noble Earl that his Resolutions were not intended to convey any censure on his noble Friend, and expressed his intention to disavow any such purpose whenever he should be able to bring the subject before their Lordships' House. As his noble Friend could not be absent from his post at Paris without inconvenience to the public service, he thought these assurances might have rendered it unnecessary for him to come over.

However, his noble Friend was now present in the House, and their Lordships were all delighted to see him; and perhaps in the course of the evening they would receive from him some interesting explanation upon one or two points which required to be cleared up. His noble Friend, he could assure him, was under an entire misapprehension as to the intended effect of his Resolutions. He considered the Secretary of State alone responsible for the manner and form in which negotiations of this importance were carried on. The Ambassador's name was only mentioned as a witness as to the fact. The object of the Resolutions was general, they were entirely prospective, and their intention was to guard the public service from certain irregularities, which did injustice both to the Minister of the foreign Court, giving the information and to the colleagues of the Secretary of State at home as they had thereby no official record to refer to. It was obvious from their very phraseology that they did not apply personally to his noble Friend. It would be useless therefore to go further into that view of the subject, and he would only state for his own satisfaction that nothing could be more unpleasant to him than that it should be supposed that having himself held the same situation as his noble Friend now so ably filled, and having felt all its difficulties, he should have sought occasion, especially in his noble Friend's absence, to criticise any act of his in a hostile spirit or even in a manner that should be displeasing to him. And he had this further remark to make—that whatever might be the responsibility of an Ambassador, the moment his acts were approved of and adopted by his own Government his responsibility entirely ceased. Now, the Resolutions which he had laid before their Lordships contained a declaration of principles which had obtained from time immemorial; and the reason why he had called upon their Lordships to reaffirm those principles was, that in the course of these transactions a great excitement in reference to the relations between the two countries had been created through the act of the noble Lord now at the head of the Foreign Office in having made a serious departure from the established usage with respect to communications received from our diplomatic representatives abroad. It was his duty to put such important communications in a regular form, and those Resolutions clearly laid down such principles for the future. But he repeated, that neither the terms nor the intention of the Resolutions conveyed any censure:—yet to his surprise he was asked the other evening, incidentally to the conversation on the postponement of his Motion, whether it was his intention to turn out the Government? He was perfectly at a loss to conceive how such an interpretation could be put upon a proposition which merely implied, and that inferentially, that the proceedings of the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office had not been perfectly unassailable in point of regularity or of judgment. Surely noble Lords opposite did not wish to appear more susceptible for the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary than that noble Lord was for himself. Why, within the last few days the noble Lord himself, in a public despatch, had handsomely apologised to Baron Schleinitz for the grave error into which he had fallen by the publication of a despatch from our Ambassador at Berlin, containing an account of certain confidential conversations with Baron Schleinitz. Although he could not but regret that any Minister should have exposed himself to such a rebuke as was contained in the Despatch read to him by Count Bernsdorff, at the same time he was glad the noble Lord had made this admission; because if he had not done so it would have been impossible in any discussion on foreign affairs in that House to avoid characterizing the publication of that conversation as a flagrant violation of diplomatic usage. The noble Lord had apologized to Baron Schleinitz for that irregularity; but there was another person who had been placed in an invidious position by that act—namely, his noble relative, Lord Bloomfield, to whom he hoped the noble Lord had conveyed similar expressions of regret. Lord Bloomfield had only done his duty in conveying the particulars of the conversation in question to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who, on the other hand, had made a use of the communication which he had no right to do, thereby, as he was told by Baron Schleinitz, injuriously affecting the intimacy of the relations between the two countries. If the complaint of Baron Schleinitz under these circumstances was very properly accepted as a rebuke by the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, surely the Government had no right to consider that he (the Marquess of Normanby) was doing wrong in calling their Lordships' attention to another irregularity which was much more general in its tendency. It was therefore impossible to believe that any Government would cover themselves with ridicule by going to the country and saying that they had abandoned their posts because the House of Lords had chosen to express its opinion that the Foreign Secretary had not entirely acted to its satisfaction in the conduct of official correspondence. Their Lordships might, therefore, he thought, come to a decision on the Resolutions, free from any alarm as to ulterior consequences.

The Marquess of Normanby

Since he had given notice of the Resolutions he had examined the papers presented to both Houses of Parliament, and compared their dates with those of the information which their Lordships had at various times received from Her Majesty's Government. And as much of these affairs had been conducted by means of private correspondence, and the information afforded to them was very meagre, it was the more important that such information as they did receive should be accurate in all its bearings; but he had found it impossible to reconcile the discrepancies which were but too evident between the statements made, and the information shown to have been at that time in the possession of Government, he therefore thought it fair to give the noble Lords the occasion to make some further explanation, before these events passed into the domain of history. When one looks back to the discussions which took place at the beginning of the Session, not yet three months since, when one recollects the light and careless way in which so-called explanations were given by the Ministers in both Houses, one can hardly believe that they related to the same transactions which have now become accomplished facts. It was not his intention now to renew the debate on the Savoy question, except to say that he thought the suppression or the delay on the part of the Government in producing communications containing important facts might, in some degree, have contributed to that catastrophe which had excited the sympathy and indignation of the people of this country. The noble Lord, the Foreign Secretary, had expressed his satisfaction at the tone of the first debate which had taken place in their Lordships' House on the subject of Savoy. He (the Marquess of Normanby) was very happy to acknowledge the compliment on behalf of their Lordships, because he thought that they themselves had reason to be very much satisfied with the debate, because he thought nothing was now gained by the application of intemperate language to the Sovereign of a foreign country. But he now regretted very much that he had been induced to withdraw his Address moved at that early stage of the question, when there appeared to be a chance of their interference being useful. He had intended his Motion as a support to Her Majesty's Government; but they did not think fit to regard it in that light, and he gave way in deference to their request, and withdrew it. Therefore, up to the present time, no direct declaration of opinion had been made on this subject by either House of Parliament; but he could not help feeling that a firm and temperate Resolution on the part of that and the other House would, if pronounced in time, and having the concurrence of all parties, have produced a favourable and forcible impression both in France and elsewhere. His Resolution, however, was declined by the Government. And now what was the last Parliamentary stage of the affair. After it had become impossible for Parliament to interfere with advantage, they had witnessed in the other House that exhibition of helpless irritation by the noble Foreign Secretary, who assumed a tone towards a foreign Sovereign which was never before heard from a Foreign Minister. The noble Lord, amid inconsiderate cheers from those whom he had previously silenced on that subject, said—[Earl GRANVILLE: Order!] he admitted that he was not in order in referring to a debate in the other House, and he would therefore only say if such sentiments were supposed to have been addressed to an English assembly it was strange that at the same time he only addressed to the French Minister a wordy despatch which that Minister justly said did not amount to a protest. He had been induced on the third day of the Session, in consequence of the information he had received, to call the noble Earl's attention to the article which had appeared in the semi-official French paper called La Patrie, and the ground in which the annexation of Savoy to France was advocated in that journal—namely, that of nationality. He received on that occasion an incomplete and unsatisfactory reply; he was told that he had introduced extraneous matters, and that he had wasted their Lordships' time on the mere authority of newspaper paragraphs. But what was the fact? That discussion took place on the 27th of January. Their Lordships could not have been aware that at that very time the Patrie was at the Foreign Office, having been sent by Lord Cowley in a despatch dated the 25th and received by Her Majesty's Government on the 26th. Lord Cowley stated that it was more than probable that the Foreign Secretary would have been made acquainted with the rumour that there existed a secret treaty between France and Sardinia, entered into before the late war, by which the latter bound herself, in case her territory should be considerably increased in Italy by the event of the war, to cede Savoy to France. Lord Cowley added that he had no knowledge of the existence of the Treaty, and had many reasons for not believing it, but he was induced to call his Lordship's attention to the fact that the question of the annexation of Savoy to France was beginning to occupy the public mind very seriously, and that it was likely to be in the contemplation of the French Government if the Duchies, and more particularly the Romagna, were annexed to Sardinia. But this was not all. The same day brought another despatch, in which Lord Cowley said that Dr. Kern had stated to him he could not doubt that active measures were going on for the realization of the project, and hoping that Her Majesty's Government would remonstrate against the supposed intentions of the Emperor before it should be too late. That despatch also was received on the 26th. Judging from the reply of the noble Earl (Earl Granville) to his question on the 27th January his noble Friend never could have seen either of those despatches. He (the Marquess of Normanby) in putting the question said, that he was quite sure he should not be told that the Government had no information on the subject; as it turned out, however, he (the Marquess of Normanby) was better informed upon the matter than was the noble Earl himself. The answer, however, which he did receive was, that Her Majesty's Government had received no information as to the negotiations said to exist between France and Sardinia for the annexation of Savoy to France. From that answer their Lordships were probably inclined to believe that such a despatch as that to which he had referred, had never been written. He did think that Her Majesty's Ministers ought to be more careful in ascertaining the facts on which they had to reply before they gave an answer so eminently inconsistent with the exact state of affairs. But this was not all. The effect of all the answers which had been given on this subject in that and the other House of Parliament was to create an impression that this question of Savoy might have been spoken of in the month of July but had never been reverted to since. The first day that any glimmer of light broke through the profound darkness in which Her Majesty's Ministers sought to envelope the question was the 10th of February—a very important day in other respects, because it was on that evening that Mr. Gladstone introduced the Budget in the other House of Parliament. On that day, having received information of the most important character, he thought it necessary to ask the Government to give an immediate reply to a question he then put:—and he certainly used all the courtesy he could on the occasion, for he sent to the noble Lord a copy of the paper which contained it the evening before he put the Question. That Question was put, and he received the same reply of rather affected pleasantry, that Her Majesty's Government could not attend to newspaper paragraphs—that anything of that kind was unworthy the attention of the Government. But the effect of the information was that the rumours to which he had alluded on the former occasions were strictly true, and that all persons in Paris had become aware that the article in question had been inserted through the authority and under the inspiration of Count Walewski. For it was Lord Cowley who, in his despatch of the 5th of July, reported that Count Walewski had reminded him of the same facts stated in the newspaper cited by him, that between July and January he had repeatedly warned the Ambassador that if England succeeded in carrying out her policy of annexation in Central Italy, it must be “at the cost of Savoy and Nice,” which must in that case pass to France. This despatch was written on the 5th of February, it is docketed as received on the 8th. It would have been convenient to some, perhaps inconvenient to others, if it had arrived in the usual course on the 6th, because then the information would have been in possession of the Government the night of my Motion for an Address on the 7th. At any rate, it is docketed as arrived the 8th, and it must have been eight-and-forty hours accessible to the noble Lords opposite when I put my question on the 10th. I am perfectly ready to believe that from circumstances the President of the Council had not seen it, but one must also believe that the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State had not seen it, else he could never have volunteered to inform the House that the subject was, so to say, dropped between July and January. Their Lordships would recollect that it was on the very evening on which Mr. Gladstone brought forward his Budget he had thought it his duty again to introduce this question stating that he was sorry to detain their Lordships from hearing the interesting speech of Mr. Gladstone, but that he thought it was quite time that their Lordships should have some distinct information on the subject. But the fact was that it was with a view to the effect of that Budget, that both that and the other House of Parliament had been kept without any distinct information on this subject. The secret of the Cabinet was for that night kept, and the whole effect of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech preserved from all present contact with stubborn facts; true, no one believed his assertion that this was not to be a union of the Government but a union of the nations. All saw that on the part of the Emperor the Treaty was required to keep the commercial measure from any popular control which would be fatal to them. That on our part, all had been hurried on in order that the meeting of Parliament might find this country so far committed as to make it dangerous to recede; but when Mr. Gladstone went on to say, .

The Marquess of Normanby

“This is not to be an union of the Governments; it is to be an union of the nations; and I confidently say again, as I have already ventured to say in this House, that there never can be any union between the nations of England and France except an union beneficial to the world, because directly either the one or the other begins to harbour schemes of selfish aggrandizement, that moment the jealousy of its neighbour will powerfully react, and the very fact of their being in harmony will of itself be at all times the most conclusive proof that neither of them can meditate anything which is dangerous to Europe.”—[3 Hansard, cxi., 836.]

Every one who heard that statement believed that perfect harmony existed at that moment. That effort of oratorical art had cost the country something; but it was for the time successful, as it gave a Ministry which held the House of Commons by the slightest thread a strong temporary majority. But would the same effect have resulted had all the facts been known—had both Houses of Parliament been in possession of Lord Cowley's despatch—that measures for the promotion of what one of his colleagues afterwards called a scheme of selfish aggrandizement were at that time actually in operation, and that the harmony which was considered so perfect had been already broken? Had these facts been known the other House of Parliament would, in all probability, have thought the great national sacrifices they were required to make were not compensated by any counteracting advantages. Have the Ministers not been since found to avow that something was meditated, in their opinion, "dangerous to Europe?"

He now came to the part of the subject more directly involved in his Resolutions, namely, that part which affected the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in respect to the negotiations between France and Sardinia. No one knew better than Count Walewski how these proceedings would be scrutinized. Count Walewski is not unknown in this country. As French Ambassador he was for many years deservedly popular. It so happens that he was residing here in that character at a most extraordinary Ministerial catastrophe, which arose entirely from those irregularities in the conduct of diplomatic intercourse, of which I am now complaining. This was the cause of the summary dismissal of Lord Palmerston in 1851 by his present Foreign Secretary. When a very important communication is made to a Secretary of State by a Foreign Ambassador, it is the correct custom to record its substance to the English Ambassador abroad. Had Lord Palmerston adhered to this rule and communicated to him, as Ambassador at Paris, what he had said to M. Walewski, he would never have incurred the consequences unknown to any other Statesman of having been dismissed with the unanimous assent of all his colleagues. Count Walewski on that occasion justly estimated his diplomatic duty. That which was told him by the English Minister, he considered as the property of his Government, and wrote an official despatch reporting Lord Palmerston's language; and when he (Lord Normanby) read Lord Palmerston's despatch to the French Minister, which had been agreed to in the Cabinet, he naturally remarked, "this is not the language of Lord Palmerston as quoted by Count Walewski in his despatch." He would not allude any further to the consequences thus produced, but had cited it as a proof that Count Walewski had every reason to suppose that Lord John Russell would be regular himself on these points; and should be surprised if any one engaged in these transactions shall consider this a light matter, when they recollect that Lord Palmerston's defence on that occasion was, that he considered the conversation "a private one," which excuse was accepted by no one. Having mentioned that subject he would, with their Lordships' permission, refer to a paper which he held in his hand, and which was remarkable as containing an incident which, until it was published in a London journal, had never come to his knowledge. The paragraph was contained in a journal published in London, and supposed to have relations with the French government, and he expected it was not written without authority. It was, in fact, the Imperial answer to Lord John Russell's speech in the House of Commons on the 5th of April. He would quote two extracts from this article in The Morning Chronicle, which, both from its tone and its type, showed that it had been inspired by high authority. It begins:—

"We learn from Paris that the Emperor has been equally afflicted and hurt at finding himself accused of having been deficient in good faith towards England with regard to the union of Savoy and Nice to France."

"No Power is less entitled than England to be astonished at a result which was worked out, so to speak, by her own policy, when, in opposition to the counsels of the French Government, she laboured to bring about the complete annexation of the Duchies of Parma and Modena, of the Legations, and of Tuscany, to the kingdom of Sardinia. From the very moment that policy was manifested, Count Walewski never ceased, in his conversations with Earl Cowley, to point out the necessities that it would impose on France. The English Ambassador could not have left his Government in ignorance of the persistent and invariable nature of the declarations made to him on that subject; and if there is anything to be surprised at, it is that the blue-book contains not one trace of a communication which ought to be found in the archives of the Foreign Office, and of which the production would have served to prove that Lord John Russell was never ignorant that the system of annexations which he warmly patronized would have for its corollary and complement the union of Savoy and Nice to France. The latest warning given to him on that head was from the new Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. Thouvenel, a few days after his installation to office, when it was evident that the mode of solution proposed by the English Government would lead to the formation of a great State in the North of Italy.

"Here, in a few words, is a simple recital of facts. Where is the duplicity? We leave any sincere and honest man to judge."

He now came to the despatch of the 24th of January, which was missing when the papers relative to the annexation of Savoy and Nice were presented, which might not at the first blush appear to be of much importance, but in which Lord Cowley stated that he had no specific information on the subject. The "latest warning" seemed to have been given on the 25th, when Lord Cowley had for the first time an interview with M. Thouvenel, with respect to which there were two despatches which did not bear on the part of the case to which he was addressing himself. On the 25th of January, however, it was that Lord Cowley had written that first despatch to the Foreign Minister at home in which he distinctly stated that the annexation of Savoy and Nice would take place if Central Italy were united to Sardinia. It was very evident that Lord Cowley had then acquired information of which he was not possessed the day before, and it was also evident that instead of sending an official despatch he had forwarded an account of these transactions by means of private letters, and perhaps had been desired to do so. The explanation of the French Government in the matter, he might add, was that we had had repeated warning as to what was likely to occur, and that we ought to have been perfectly aware that the course which we had been pursuing since the signing of the Treaty of Villafranca must lead to the annexation which we deprecated. And what was that course? England, a Power which had objected to the war from the first, which had done so on the ground of respect to European treaties, which had professed neutrality and non-intervention, had, when the ink was hardly dry which signed the preliminaries between the belligerents, interposed her meddling intervention to mar the execution of the solemn engagements on the faith of which the curse of European war had been averted. On the 19th of July, a week only after the war was concluded, Lord John Russell wrote a despatch, recommending to the Provisional Government of Tuscany the immediate election of an Assembly to decide upon their future fate, though the Government of that country was still usurped by the Sardinian Commissioner, who had been recalled; therefore from the first the whole proceeding had not a semblance of legality. This course, all tending, as he knew, to the annexation of Savoy and Nice, the Foreign Secretary seems to have pursued by constant intrigues at Turin and elsewhere, up to the beginning of last month. There was much in the recent conduct of France which gave room for uneasiness as to the future, but he thought sufficient allowance had not been made for the necessities of the position made for the Emperor by the line pursued by the English Government. It had been asserted that at least one of the Cabinet was very early informed of this contingency, in the event of Venetia being annexed as well as Lombardy, and had not expressed any strong objection. But as far as French feeling was concerned, it would have been more fatal to Imperial prestige if, without compensation, he had consented to the creation of a new State, which should extend from the south of the Maremma to within forty miles of Lyons, with an uninterrupted coast line from near Civita Vecchia to the Var. Venetia annexed might have been more dangerous to Germany, but not so obnoxious to France. The last act of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary with reference to this question—the despatch of the 22nd of March, he (the Marquess of Normanby) was ready to admit was an able one; but at the same time he must express his opinion that it was certainly deficient in sincerity of statement. The noble Lord indulged in guess and hypothesis as to the line of the French Government on points upon which positive information had been furnished to him by the very agent he was addressing, and that was a course of which he (the Marquess of Normanby) must confess he could not approve. He believed that no advantage had been gained to Italy by the Treaty of Villafranca, still less by the violation of that treaty, to compensate for the misery, suffering, and bloodshed of the war. He had stated on previous occasions that he objected to the policy of all those measures; and, without reference to his own opinions, he thought there were indications that it was very possible the year 1860 might in its end resemble 1859, no more than the year 1849 resembled 1848. It was very possible that this newly constructed Italian kingdom might break down; the contingency would depend very much on the characters of the two persons under whose leadership the experiment had been made. With respect to the part which the King of Sardinia had acted in the matter, he believed that there never was a man of whom it might be more truly said than of Victor Emmanuel, who had grasped at the territories of his neighbours and given away his own, that he was alieni appetens, sui profusus. His conduct in abandoning Savoy, leaving Piedmont and adjourning its Legislature, had produced a great change in public opinion; and as to Count Cavour, he believed that neither in England nor elsewhere could he ever get over the fact, that when this barter was all settled he told his friend Sir James Hudson that Sardinia would never sell, exchange, nor surrender her territory. He wished by his Motion to cast censure on no man; but by refusing to adopt his Resolutions their Lordships would produce an impression that they approved transactions not sanctioned by the opinion of a great portion of the British public. He was well aware that any independent Member of their Lordships' House who took upon himself to introduce a question of this importance incurred a deep responsibility, but in the course which he had taken he was actuated by a strong sense of duty; and he therefore cordially recommended the subject to the attention of their Lordships. The noble Marquess concluded by moving the Resolutions.

The Marquess of Normanby

EARL COWLEY:—My Lords, before I make any comment on the Resolutions which my noble Friend has just submitted to your Lordships. I beg to thank you for the courtesy shown to myself in postponing this discussion in order to afford me the opportunity of being present. I am sure that none of your Lordships will be astonished at my wish to take part in this debate. When I first read the Resolutions proposed by my noble Friend they appeared to me to contain so distinct and so specific a charge against myself, of being in some way or other instrumental in keeping back from your Lordships matters of great importance that I felt it necessary to ask permission of the Secretary of State to present myself before your Lordships in order that I might answer so grave a charge. It is perfectly clear that it is something which I am supposed to have done—or rather that I have left undone—which has induced my noble Friend to move these Resolutions—Resolutions which, if approved by your Lordships, notwithstanding what he says to the contrary, cannot appear to me in any other light than a vote of censure. The best way in which I can meet this charge is by simply stating to your Lordships all that has taken place with reference to these transactions. In the month of March, 1859, I received a communication from my noble Friend then at the head of the Foreign Department, stating that he had received information of a Treaty having been signed in the January preceding between France and Sardinia for the cession of Savoy to the former country, and desiring me to make inquiries into the truth of the rumour. I accordingly addressed myself to Count Walewski on the subject, and was assured by him that no such treaty existed. On the 4th of July, a despatch from Her Majesty's Minister in Switzerland passed through my hands in which, on the part of the Federal Council, he expressed apprehensions lest there should be an arrangement of that nature subsisting between France and Sardinia. Without waiting for instructions from Her Majesty's Government, I again went to Count Walewski, and he then told me that there had been discussions between the Governments of those two countries with respect to a cession of territory to France, and that it had been laid down on the part of France that if the event of the war were to make considerable territorial additions to Sardinia in Central Italy, France might think it necessary to demand some extension on the side of Savoy. I conveyed this information to Her Majesty's Government, and on the following day, the 5th of July, Her Majesty's Secretary of State addressed to me the instructions which are included in the papers that I hold in my hands; and I may say, once for all, that up to the time when the question took a more serious shape these instructions guided my conduct and influenced the conversations which I held with the French Government. On the 7th news of the armistice reached Paris; and on the 8th Count Walewski, in a conversation which I had with him, of his own accord, and without any provocation on my part, made a declaration that if at any time the idea of annexing Savoy to France had been entertained by his Government, it was entirely abandoned. This declaration was made unequivocally and without any reserve whatever. Your Lordships are aware that on the 11th the preliminaries of peace were signed at Villafranca. Your Lordships are also aware that those preliminaries received no acceptance in general by the populations of Italy, who thought they would benefit by becoming part of Sardinia, and they preferred annexation to that country to the arrangements made under the provisions of that treaty. Your Lordships are also aware that Count Walewski, from the moment those preliminaries were signed, was most anxious to carry out the stipulations which they embodied. It is perfectly true that in various conversations which I had with him, but particularly on the 25th of August and the 3rd of November, he declared to me his private opinion—I had no authority whatever to convey it to my Government—but he stated that, in his opinion, if the annexation of the Duchies to Sardinia were to take place, such a step would be followed by a demand for the annexation of Savoy to France. This was not an official communication made to me by Count Walewski; it was an observation which passed in common conversation, and I certainly did not take it, nor was it meant to be taken, as an official declaration which I was to forward to the British Government. Still, I thought it advisable to make it known to Government, and I accordingly did so in my private letters. Now, what would have been the consequence had I acted otherwise? I was in possession of the solemn declaration which Count Walewski gave in July, and if I had made the observation the subject of an official communication I should have involved my Government at once in the fruitless discussion of a question which to all appearance was about to engage the attention of a Congress, and I should have given up the advantage of the previous declaration which had been made to me, as I have already stated, unequivocally, and without any qualification whatever. Another consideration which weighed very strongly with me was that, I could not conceive that, whatever the wish or intention of France might be, it was possible that Sardinia would give up its territory. I did not believe that the King of Sardinia could alienate what has been well called “the cradle of his dynasty,” and which, moreover, contains the last resting-place of his ancestors. My noble Friend, in the Resolutions which he has proposed, remarked that it is not usual to refer to private correspondence in public despatches. My Lords, I admit this; such a proceeding is undoubtedly irregular; but I think I can give your Lordships good reasons why I committed this irregularity. In the month of January last, when the change of Government, or rather the change in the Department for Foreign Affairs in France took place, I happened to be in this country on a short leave of absence. On my return to Paris I found the whole aspect of affairs altered. The question of the annexation of Savoy, which had completely fallen to the ground, was in everybody's mouth, and it consequently became necessary for me to speak to the new Minister for Foreign Affairs on the subject. The Congress, moreover, was no longer expected to assemble. As soon, therefore, as M. Thouvenel had assumed the direction of French Foreign Affairs I went and spoke to him on this question; but M. Thouvenel, from his long absence in Turkey, was so totally unacquainted with what had taken place that he told me on various occasions that, until he had had an opportunity of informing himself fully, he would give me no information. It was not until the 5th of February that he gave me any notification with respect to the intentions of the French Government. It is true that I had received information in the meantime from other sources that the matter was under the consideration of that Government, but it was only on the 5th that anything like an official communication was made to me. It was necessary for me then to recall M. Thouvenel's attention to the declarations formerly made to me; but before doing so I went to Count Walewski, who admitted the accuracy of my representations, but pointed out that on more than one occasion allusions had been made to the possibility of a demand by France for the annexation of Savoy in the event of territorial additions being made to Sardinia. In making my public report to the Secretary of State it seemed to me that it would be unfair not to make mention of Count Walewski's observations. I had the choice of doing that which was irregular or unfair. I could not hesitate between the two; and I think I have said enough to show to your Lordships that what I did was justifiable and proper, and I trust your Lordships will clearly understand that throughout these transactions there has been no communication withheld from Her Majesty's Government, and that the observations between Count Walewski and myself were proper subject-matter for private communication and not for official report. With regard to that part of the noble Marquess's Resolution which says that the “absence of any such record, more especially if such private correspondence is referred to in public despatches, is injurious to the public service, and unjust alike to the Foreign Minister who made the communication." My noble Friend who has so long been an ornament to the diplomatic service, must know that when a foreign Minister wishes to make a communication to a foreign Government, he has his own Ambassador or Minister to do it by, and that it is generally in that way that such communications are made. Now it does not appear that any communication of Count Walewski's opinion was ever made to M. de Persigny, and this is one of the greatest proofs that he had no intention to make it as official. My Lords, I am not sufficiently conversant with Parliamentary usages to know in what manner this Motion ought to be met; but I hope I have said enough to convince your Lordships that throughout the whole of these transactions no important communication was ever withheld by me from Her Majesty's Government, and that in making this particular communication by a private letter, and not in a public despatch, I did that which was most in conformity with the best interests of Her Majesty's service.

Earl Cowley

EARL GRANVILLE:—My Lords, I really think that, after the very clear, candid, and satisfactory answer given by the noble Earl to this Motion, and seeing that no Peer has risen to support it, I am only doing my duty in moving the Previous Question. The noble Marquess commenced by saying that no attack whatever was intended on the noble Earl by this Motion, and that he regretted extremely that it should have the appearance of it. I know enough of the good feeling of the noble Marquess to be assured that it must have been very painful to him to be compelled, by a sense of public duty, twice during this short Session to attack the two persons who succeeded him in the two diplomatic posts which he has last held. In one case, where the censure affected a young man who was comparatively unknown to your Lordships, and whose professional abilities were not generally known beyond the world of diplomacy, such an attack in his absence was much to be deprecated; but it cannot be of the slightest importance in regard to a person in the position of the noble Earl. He would not, in the noble Earl's presence, speak of his well-known good qualities, except to say that his abilities have secured him the confidence of every Minister by whom he has been instructed, and of every Foreign Minister with whom he has had diplomatic communications. The noble Marquess assured us, too, that he did not make his Motion with the slightest intention of turning Her Majesty's Ministers out of office. This declaration is exceedingly satisfactory; but considering that his speech was a series of personal attacks on the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office, and of general hostilities against the Government, and that he had raked up, for the second time this Session, a story ten years old, evidently in the vain hope of throwing an apple of discord between two of the most distinguished Members of the Government, I am afraid it is not the will to turn us out which is wanting, but simply that the noble Marquess feels that he is utterly powerless to accomplish that object. The noble Marquess has complained, certainly in no very courteous terms, of two answers which I gave him early in the Session on this subject of Savoy; and he expresses his astonishment how, after reading Lord Cowley's despatch of the 25th of January, I could say that the Government had received no official information with regard to certain negotiations between France and Sardinia. Now, if the noble Marquess will turn to that despatch, he will see that Lord Cowley writes in it—

"It is more than probable that your Lordship is acquainted with a rumour in Paris that there existed a secret treaty between France and Sardinia before the late war. I have no reason to believe in its existence, and for many reasons I am inclined to doubt it; still I could not take upon myself to affirm that some sort of engagement or understanding respecting Savoy does not exist between the two Governments."

How can it be affirmed on the strength of this despatch that I had the slightest semblance of a foundation for saying that we had received any official information of the existence of the Treaty? I do not think it is any part of my duty, representing Her Majesty's Government in this House, to give any answer to a statement on a point affecting France which has appeared in a journal in a third country, without, so far as I could be aware, any official authority; therefore, to that part of the noble Marquess' charge I shall make no reply. The noble Marquess then went into a long discursive attack on the conduct of Lord John Russell in encouraging an appeal to the population of Italy—which by the way he entirely failed to connect with his Motion—and, as far as I could make out, he endeavoured to show that by favouring the annexation of the provinces of Central Italy to Piedmont we were responsible for the annexation of Savoy to France. I appeal to my noble Friend here whether he has ever received the slightest instruction, direct or indirect, from the Government to favour any particular mode of settling Italy. [Earl Cowley: None whatever.] There is no indiscretion in saying now that, abstractedly speaking, different Members of Her Majesty's Government held different opinions as to what would be the best mode of distributing the provinces of Italy; but on this we were unanimously resolved, that the real policy of the Government was to insist on the Italians being left to themselves to decide for themselves on the mode of settlement which they might think best adapted for their future interests as a nation. I am personally too well acquainted with the facility with which we fall into a shipslop style of Parliamentary talking to take exception to forms of expression in speeches; but when the noble Marquess seeks to commit the House of Lords to such Resolutions as these I do think, with great respect for him and for what he has written, that he ought to put them into tolerable English. These Resolutions are to show the whole world what are our views upon the mode of conducting diplomatic correspondence. The noble Marquess moves,

"That it appears by the papers lately laid before Parliament, and especially by a despatch from Earl Cowley to Lord John Russell, dated 5th February, that the French Minister had stated, and truly,"—

This makes it appear as if it were an extraordinary fact that the French Minister should have stated truly—what?—

"That the intention of the Emperor of the French to take possession of Savoy under certain contingencies had been made known to Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris, and by him communicated to Her Majesty's Secretary of State, on more than one occasion between the 12th of July, 1859, and the 25th of January, 1860, in private letters."

The noble Marquess makes it perfectly impossible for the French Minister to have stated truly with regard to all the correspondence between the Ambassador of England and the Secretary of State "on more than one occasion" between July and January. The next Resolution contains the gist of the matter. I do not think it goes far enough. If it be necessary to lay down the principle on which diplomatic correspondence should be carried on, I would go the fullest length in saying that all important communications between foreign agents and the Secretary of State should be by public despatches. But that is not the question. The real question before us is whether, in the particular case which the noble Marquess censures, it would be a right application of the principle or not. But if it be necessary to lay down an abstract proposition, I should wish to see it framed in clearer language. The noble Marquess proposes in his last paragraph,

Earl Granville

"That the absence of any such record, 'more especially if such private correspondence is referred to in public despatches,' is injurious to the public service."

I do not know who is the author of the words between inverted commas quoted by the noble Marquess; but he goes on,

"Is injurious to the public service, unjust alike to the Foreign Minister who made the communication and to official colleagues at home."

Who are the official colleagues? Are they the official colleagues of Lord Cowley, who has got no colleagues at home? Or are they the official colleagues of Count Walewski, who, I flatter myself, has no colleagues in this country? I must apologize to your Lordships for having treated the matter thus lightly; but I think both in substance and in form it is not desirable to adopt these Resolutions. I have no wish to negative the general proposition. I quite agree that a rule should be laid down; but I do not think it applicable in the present instance, and, therefore, the more becoming way to treat the Resolutions will be to agree to what I shall now propose—namely, the Previous Question.

Motion objected to; and a Question being stated thereupon, the previous Question was put, "Whether the said Question shall be now put?"

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, I am anxious to express the feeling that prevails on this side the House that there is no intention whatever to express any censure of the noble Earl who has come over to meet us on this occasion. We are all conscious of the ability and zeal which he has always fulfilled the duties of that important mission, and certainly no man is more competent than myself to bear witness to that zeal and ability. This we are all perfectly conscious of; but I must add that the clear and straightforward statements of the noble Earl, do, in some respects, justify the observations of the noble Marquess, because the noble Earl has not attempted to deny that certain conversations, and information consequent upon those conversations, were sent by him to the Government, not in an official, but in a private form. My noble Friend (Earl Cowley) has even admitted that it may be on his part an irregularity so to act; but what I wish to point out to the House is that the result of that irregularity has been, in the first place, to enable the Government by a sort of quibble to state that they had no official information with respect to these subjects. It was correct to say that they had no official information; but it was a quibble to use the words so as to lead your Lordships to believe they had no information at all. I understood the noble Earl the President of the Council to ground his answer upon that; and he quoted a despatch, in which, no doubt, there was no official information, because, in fact, the information was given to the Government in private letters.

EARL GRANVILLE: The noble Marquess said, that if I had read a certain despatch I was inaccurate in stating to him that I had no official information, and I read the despatch to show your Lordships that there was no official information in it.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: As I understood him, the noble Earl to a certain extent deceived the House, and gave the impression that the Government had not received any information to excite apprehension in their minds as to the annexation of Savoy. Another result of the course taken by Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris is that apparent injustice is done to Count Walewski, because the noble Earl has always spoken and acted as if Count Walewski had not communicated to my noble Friend at Paris all the intentions and views of the French Government. I therefore cannot help saying that I regret that my noble Friend at Paris did not put in the form of a public despatch, or what is called in the Foreign Office a separate or confidential despatch, the whole conversation which he had with Count Walewski, although the words of that conversation expressed only the private opinions of the French Minister. Your Lordships must be aware that the private opinions of a Minister placed in the position of Count Walewski bring with them a weight and importance which do not attach to the opinions of ordinary individuals; and when I was at the Foreign Office if a Foreign Minister had said so and so is my private opinion with regard to a great public question, I should have deemed these words as words to be remembered, to be acted upon, and to be repeated to my colleagues. I therefore cannot accept as a valid excuse for an irregularity in the usual manner of carrying on diplomatic business that private conversations with a Foreign Minister are to be thought of less consequence than conversations of a formal and official character. I think the whole amount of the charge which can be brought against my noble Friend is that he should have put the conversation in an official form, which might or might not have been published; and I think the Secretary of State is much to blame that he did not ask my noble Friend to put it in that form, so that it might be a document to be left in the Foreign Office for the use of his successors. But with respect to private letters your Lordships must not suppose that private letters and private communications cannot be converted by the Secretary of State into official information. On the contrary, it is constantly done. I have done it myself several times. Private letters have been made public and printed in blue-books—in fact, it is entirely in the discretion of the Secretary of State to make use of information conveyed in private letters in any way which he pleases, and, therefore, it is unfair to make any charge against the Ambassador. I should not have said another word if the noble Earl (Earl Granville) had not gone a little into the question of Savoy, and if some observations had not been made by the leading members of the Government in the other House with respect to what passed when we were in office. My accusation against the Government is of a much graver nature than what relates immediately to the question before your Lordships. It is that they were neither watchful nor jealous enough upon this question of Savoy. It is quite clear that in the private information sent from Paris in regard to this matter there was plenty of cause for alarm; but they might have gone still further back. The noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Department had a document within his reach sufficient to rouse the attention of the Government and prepare them for what was to come. There is a despatch now in the Foreign Office, dated as long back as October, 1858—a month after the agreement, or, I will rather call it, the conspiracy, between two great personages at Plombières—from the President of the Swiss Republic stating that he had reason to believe that some conditional or contingent agreement had been come to between the Emperor of the French and Count Cavour with respect to Savoy. We tried to discover what had taken place, but were unable to do so. We were told by my noble Friend (Earl Cowley) that he believed that no treaty had been signed. I do not believe that any treaty was signed; and the reason that no document was signed by either of those potentates—for I may call them both so—probably was that they might be able, without any violation of the truth, to say that nothing had been signed, and that there was no treaty in existence. It is, however, my conviction, amounting almost to knowledge, that a verbal and conditional agreement was then made, which has since been carried out. What was the conduct of the Government of that day? I know that I was myself so much alarmed that I communicated my fears to my colleagues, and was determined to take the earliest opportunity of showing how jealous England would be of such an event, and of warning France what would be the opinion of this country of such an act as the annexation of Savoy. Not only that—but for so doing I was taunted by the noble Viscount now at the head of the Government with uselessly offending France. What did the late Government do when the French troops marched through Savoy into Sardinia? When the French troops were about to march through Savoy into Sardinia the Swiss Government, true to the neutrality upon which depends its independence, referred to the treaties of 1815, and objected that those troops had no right to pass through the neutralized territory. Subsequently, there being some question as to whether the line of railway did not avoid the neutralized portion of Savoy, the Swiss Government withdrew their objection, and allowed the troops of France to pass. We thought that they were wrong in doing so. We thought the maintenance of the neutrality of that territory of such European consequence—we thought the exact, if you choose it, the pedantic, observance of the treaties of 1815 of such importance that we protested against the passage of those troops to Sardinia. On the 28th of April, 1859, I wrote as follows:—

“Her Majesty’s Government are aware from the communications which have reached them that the Swiss Government do not propose to raise any objection founded on the treaties to the passage of French troops along the road which passes through the neutralized portion of Savoy; but, as parties to the treaties by which the neutrality of that district was recognized, Her Majesty’s Government feel it their duty to place on record that the march of the French troops through that district has been effected contrary to the treaty engagements to which France in common with other Powers was a party.”

The Earl of Malmesbury

That shows how jealous we were, and how early we became jealous of this question concerning Savoy; and yet for having written that, I was taunted by the present Prime Minister of this country with having uselessly offended the French Government. Is it not fair, then, for me to say that the jealousy and apprehension which the former Government entertained with regard to this question were entirely set aside by the Government which followed, and that, in some degree, the event which has taken place may be attributed to their supineness, neglect, and indifference, or to their disbelief in the intelligence which they received from abroad? What has occurred would be perfectly incredible were it not witnessed by the evidence of facts and events. Who that knows that Savoy is annexed, and that the neutralized territory will be annexed to France and that in that annexation every principle that has been considered sacred in treaties has been violated, and that the whole act is a crime, could believe that only about two months ago the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs said, (he believed he should not be out of order in quoting Hansard) in answer to a question from Sir Robert Peel:—

“We have inquired of the Sardinian Government whether there was any engagement or intention to yield Savoy to France, and the answer has been generally that there was no engagement upon the subject, and that Sardinia had no intention to cede Savoy to France. That is the general nature of the answer which has been given. We have not communicated to the French Government the opinion entertained by other Powers, because we have had no communications with other Powers to ascertain what their opinions may be—

What, no communication with the other Powers your co-trustees under the Treaties of Vienna, not even so much as to ask their opinions? It is evident that the Government either cared not what was about to happen, or utterly disbelieved the information which they had received upon the subject.

With regard to the last question of the hon. Baronet, ‘Whether, in the event of the annexation of Savoy to France being effected, Her Majesty’s Government are prepared to abandon the neutrality of Switzerland, a guaranteed by Great Britain in common with other European Powers?' I have to say that the Swiss Government have asked us whether, in case of such annexation, we are prepared to maintain the neutrality of Switzerland, and to provide in such a manner that the neutrality should in no way be injured; and we have always replied that we had determined to do so. It appears that the districts of Chablais and Faucigny more especially are guaranteed by the Treaty of Vienna in the same manner as Switzerland; that they are, in fact, part of the general arrangement for the guarantee of Switzerland," [3 Hansard, clvi. p. 1133.]

I hope that the Government will, if it is not too late, redeem that pledge. The neutrality of Switzerland is materially threatened by destroying the neutrality of this part of Savoy. If I take the declaration of the Government literally, I can have no doubt that they are as anxious as I am for the neutrality of Switzerland; but what has become of the neutrality of Savoy? Who would have believed, after the speech which I have just quoted as delivered two months ago, that the results which have happened could have occurred, as far as I know, without any opposition on the part of the Government? I have referred to this matter because "in another place" I have been taunted with not having acted with greater energy upon the Savoy question, and with having, when I did act, acted in a manner which was likely to promote ill-feeling on the part of France. The noble Earl's explanation having been entirely satisfactory, he having admitted that there was some irregularity in his mode of correspondence, and that important information should always be conveyed in an official manner, and there being no intention to embarrass Her Majesty's Government, I should recommend my noble Friend the noble Marquess to withdraw his Resolution, or, at all events, to assent to the course which has been proposed by the noble Earl opposite.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, he would not have troubled their Lordships but for one observation of the noble Earl who had just sat down, who said that the Government had deceived the House in the statement made by his noble Friend the President of the Council. Now, so far from having at any time misled their Lordships, his noble Friend in the speech which had been referred to said that he was not in a position to deny that some conversation had passed upon the subject between the late French Minister for Foreign Affairs and Lord Cowley, so that his noble Friend's statement was strictly in accordance with the facts. He himself (Lord Wodehouse), afterwards stated that there were no despatches, no communications of a formal character upon the subject (as in fact there were not), but that he did not deny that there had been communications between the French Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and Lord Cowley. His noble Friend the Ambassador at Paris had given so full an account of what had happened that it was unnecessary for him to add a word to it. He had fully confirmed what he (Lord Wodehouse) had said upon a previous occasion, that the French Government had attached no importance to the conversations which had taken place, because if they had done so they would have addressed a despatch upon the subject to the French Ambassador in this country. He had no intention to follow the noble Earl who had just sat down into the general question of the annexation of Savoy; but he must remind the noble Earl that however important the late Government might have considered the matter they were undoubtedly satisfied with very little being done. He maintained it was perfectly unjust to say that Her Majesty's Government had not seriously opposed that annexation. Those who had read the despatches which had been laid before Parliament would scarcely agree with the opinion of the noble Earl on that point. The question of the annexation of Savoy had undoubtedly produced great disquiet throughout Europe, and he could assure their Lordships that the part which Her Majesty's Government had taken with regard to that question had not left the impression on the mind of any Power that they were indifferent to what had taken place. The noble Earl who spoke last had referred to the position of the neutralized provinces of Savoy. That important point was at the present moment the subject of negotiation with all the great Powers of Europe; and therefore it could not now be conveniently discussed by their Lordships. The noble Earl expressed regret that steps had not been taken in time, in concert with the other Powers, to prevent the annexation of those provinces to France. He could only say that all the Powers who were parties to the guarantees given by the Treaty of Vienna had been consulted by Her Majesty's Government, and the proposals which had been made relative to that subject were still under consideration. He had every confidence that if the Motion were pressed their Lordships would adopt the Previous Question.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY must begin by reminding the noble Lord who had just spoken that his explanation, by which he endeavoured to establish the accuracy of the answer given to the question formerly put to the noble Earl the President of the Council failed, inasmuch as it related to a different reply given upon another occasion. What he had complained of was, that on the 27th of January, he had been told that the Government had no information as to the state of these negotiations, with no qualification of the denial for the use of the word official, though the day before a despatch had been received from Lord Cowley stating, that "Dr. Kern trusted Her Majesty's Government would remonstrate against the Emperor's intention before it shall be too late." He did not think it necessary to notice the pertinacity with which the noble Earl had attributed to him an intention to censure the Ambassador at Paris, although he had disclaimed such an intention, stating that the whole blame rested with the Foreign Secretary; the fact was that the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary had taken no means of meeting the charge made against him by the French Minister, which charge amounted to this—that the noble Lord had done all in his power to prevent the execution of that basis of peace which he had admitted to be a blessing in Europe. Not having in any respect defended himself against that accusation, on him only rested the responsibility. With respect to the circumstances which led to the dismissal of the noble Viscount now at the head of the Government from the Ministry of Lord John Russell, he had introduced that topic because it furnished the strongest possible example of the evil produced by these irregularities in the conduct of diplomatic correspondence. Count Walewski, whose name was mixed up with the present affair, also knew how much Lord John Russell then disapproved of the abuse of private communications, because he was a witness of how he had visited it on the noble Viscount. He had always viewed the conduct of the noble Viscount on that occasion as a great blot in his character. Nor was he singular in that opinion, for the noble Viscount's colleagues had regarded the matter in the same light, having unanimously concurred in his dismissal from the Cabinet. Certainly, the noble Earl opposite must have been gravely dissatisfied with the noble Viscount's proceedings, because he had been induced to take his place at the Foreign Office. It was very convenient for the present Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary last year to forget the disagreement which had occurred between them on the most important subjects; but at this moment there was scarcely an European statesman—certainly, there was not a single French statesman—who could not pass a civil service examination as to every one of the points which led to what was supposed at the time to be the final separation between those two noble Lords. The result of the debate had been to elicit a clear admission that a most important matter—one likely to compromise the two countries had been made known to our Ambassador, and by him communicated to the Foreign Secretary by means of a private communication instead of having been made in a public despatch, and placed in the Foreign Office for the information of all future Secretaries of State. He was quite satisfied with the result he had already obtained. What he wished was to show to Europe that their Lordships' House did not sanction any of those irregularities in the mode of conducting diplomatic affairs to which he had alluded. He had not heard any objection to the principles he had laid down; and he had no doubt, from what had fallen from the noble Earl opposite, that they would be adopted in future by Her Majesty's Government. He would not withdraw the Resolutions, but he had no objection to accept the Previous Question on them, on the understanding that his Motion was founded on principles which their Lordships would be always inclined to sanction.

Lord Wodehouse

The Previous Question was then put, "That this Question be now put."

Resolved in the Negative.

House adjourned at Half-past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, Half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, April 23, 1860.

MINUTES.] NEW MEMBER SWORN.—For Clare, Francis M'Namara Calcutt, esquire.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Charity Trustees.

2° Registration of Births, &c.; Fisheries (Scotland).

MR. MASSEY AND THE REFORM BILL.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, that it might be for the convenience of the House if the hon. Member for Salford would state whether it was his intention, after the second reading of the Reform Bill, to persevere with the Motion of which he had given notice for referring the Bill to a Select Committee.

MR. MASSEY said, he had only to say that as the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs had announced on a former evening, in answer to a question put to him by an hon. Member, that he should consider his (Mr. Massey's) Motion as equivalent to one for the rejection of his Bill, and as he had no such object nor intention as to reject the Bill, he was left without any other alternative than to abandon his Motion. He would, therefore, give notice that it was not his intention to proceed with his Motion.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE
BILL. SECOND READING.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. THIRD NIGHT.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [19th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he rose to renew a debate, which had certainly been of a rather languid and uninteresting character, and had been somewhat delayed. Before making the few observations which he had to offer on the Bill itself, he wished to advert to the speech delivered by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Whiteside), who immediately preceded him in this debate. The whole tendency of the arguments of the right hon. and learned Gentleman appeared to be, that the extension of the franchise, as proposed by the noble Lord, to the occupiers of £6 houses in boroughs, was calculated to create a great preponderance of the democratic element, and was of a dangerous and revolutionary character. But it must have struck every one who heard that speech that if the measure were of such a dangerous and revolutionary character, and if the working classes were not fit to be trusted with the franchise, it behoved hon. Members on the other side of the House to have met the question for the second reading of the Bill with a direct negative. The right hon.

Gentleman had followed the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines), who, in an able and edifying speech, had proved by statistics, the prudent habits, increased intelligence and advancement in education of the working classes; but the whole of the arguments of the speech were met by the right hon. and learned Gentleman with a sneer; and he was the more surprised at that, because, on referring to the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman in the debate of 1859, he found that the right hon. and learned Member, when speaking in behalf of the measure then brought forward by Her Majesty's Government, pronounced the Bill calculated to enfranchise the working classes, and read a letter from one whom he described as an influential inhabitant of the borough of Marylebone, stating that the Bill was entitled to credit at the hands of the working classes, as the lodger franchise would add 15,000 skilled artisans to the electors of the borough. Whence, then, had the right hon. and learned Gentleman this new-born dread of the enfranchisement of the working classes? He appealed from that right hon. Gentleman to the right hon. Baronet the Member for Hertfordshire now sitting near him (Sir E. B. Lytton). That right hon. Baronet declared that the Government to which he belonged were not afraid of the working man, and that for his own part he was proud of the English workman, whether as the simple English peasant with his homely virtues, or the skilled mechanic of the manufacturing towns with his thirst for knowledge, and with his dreams of a political Utopia quite as rational as that of Plato. The right hon. Baronet, he presumed from his writings, had a better acquaintance with the working people of this country than the right hon. Gentleman, and he had no fear of them, and yet they were told by the latter that this Bill was dangerous and revolutionary because it would extend the franchise to so many of the working classes. The right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire had argued that the Bill, by conferring the franchise on £6 and £10 occupiers in boroughs and counties, would create an homogeneous constituency. He did not understand the precise meaning of that expression; but he thought the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman was open to the same objection of creating a homogeneous constituency, because it would have conferred the county franchise on a £10 occupier, and the borough franchise on a £10 occu-

[Third Night.]

pier also. Assuredly in conferring the franchise they must take some status—they must take people living in houses; and, except that the Bill was deficient in not creating other franchises, he could not comprehend the objection urged to the homogeneous character of the constituency. As everybody must live in a house, there was, under the £10 occupation franchise, every variety in the constituency, and one street might comprise both professional and commercial men. Until some celestial constituency that did not live in houses, but descended to the earth at election times for the purpose of voting, were obtained, he should be unable to understand the argument of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington), who never omitted the opportunity of having a fling at a metropolitan constituency, told the House that a great number of the Marylebone electors very seldom voted. He had observed, since he had the honour of a seat in the House, that nothing told so well in a debate as a species of imaginary conversation; and they had been told of an imaginary conversation which the right hon. Baronet had with a sulky resident in Marylebone, who assured the right hon. Baronet that he had not interfered in the election for the borough, whether on the side of Colonel Romilly or of Mr. Edwin James.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: It was an extract from a pamphlet by Sir John Walsh.

MR. EDWIN JAMES: This was an imaginary conversation—[SIR JOHN WALSH: No, it is a fact] with a retired optician, a Conservative elector. But why should such an elector vote if the Liberal interest preponderated there? Might not the same imaginary conversation be represented as having occurred at Droitwich? A Liberal elector living there might very well be made to say,—“Sir John Pakington is a Conservative, and he commands such influence that it is not the slightest use for me to oppose him. I listen, therefore, to his speeches in which he talks a good deal about politics and sometimes about himself, but I do not vote.” Such a person might very well be described as sulky and disgusted with the whole system of politics, but this furnished no argument against the extension of the franchise when applied to boroughs in which the Liberal interest preponderated. Having said so much, he would now venture to make a few observations on what he presumed to call the defects of the measure introduced by the noble Lord. Firstly, this Bill was defective on account of its non-enfranchisement. Secondly, it was defective on account of its non-enfranchisement, which was a consequence of its other defect. It was most defective in not varying the constituency by giving a lodger franchise, by which the Government would have secured a great deal of the intelligence, and a great deal of the intellect, of the country, which he did not hesitate to say would, to a certain degree, be a safeguard and a ballast to the vessel of the State against what appeared to be a too democratic element. The Bill was extremely defective again, because it hampered the franchise by exacting the payment of rates as a condition precedent to a vote; because pretending to be the adjustment of a great question, it was the mere skeleton of a Bill; and because it provided no system for the revision of registration, which he believed to be essential in any extension of the franchise. A great deal had been said about the extent to which the franchise under the proposed Bill would be conferred. Now, Her Majesty's Government, through the noble Lord, had stated that the increase of numbers by the £6 franchise would be somewhere between 157,000 and 160,000 electors in boroughs, exclusive of counties. He believed that statement to be entirely fallacious, the principle on which the returns were made to be fallacious, and that the noble Lord was not himself aware how far the franchise would be extended by his proposed measure. He ventured to affirm that the statement put forth by the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) did not give to the House anything like a true view of the extent of the new franchise if the Bill should pass. [Opposition cheers.] Those cheers came from the opposite side of the House, whence he supposed they would make the fact an argument to show the danger of so increasing the constituency. He had no such fear, and he drew from the fact an argument of the very opposite character. It was essential, in a question of reform, when endeavouring, after the lapse of a quarter of a century, to adjust the representation of the people, to have that adjustment based upon a sound and permanent foundation. He was not one who thought it necessary every year or two to have an extended suffrage bill; but that the measure, in order to be permanent, should leave no reasonable objections on the part of any class who were really entitled to be included in the electoral body. The Returns upon which the Government relied set forth the number of male persons resident within any Parliamentary city or borough in England or Wales, or within seven miles thereof, who were assessed to the poor rate. But in taking the names of persons assessed, they took merely those whose names actually appeared on the rate-books, whereas everybody acquainted with electioneering matters knew that under the Compounding Acts the names of thousands of tenants who would have the franchise could not appear. A Return moved for by the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Williams), and printed in August, 1857, would have enabled the noble Lord to approximate much more closely to the numbers which would be enfranchised by his Bill. This Return gave the whole number of houses rated in six metropolitan boroughs; and then getting the number of houses rated, and making the necessary deductions, they would arrive at something like the number of occupiers. In Marylebone it had been stated that 500 persons only would be enfranchised under the new Bill; but he had ascertained that in St. Pancras alone 3,760 £6 tenants would receive votes. He was delighted at this, but the noble Lord, though he professed to be pleased at the operation of the Bill, would probably be startled at such a result. At all events, it was right that before legislating on the subject the House should distinctly know the effect of the proposed measure. As hon. Members were aware, an occupier, in order to vote must be rated and must pay the rates; but there were two Compounding Acts in force, the provisions of which were resorted to in the metropolitan districts and in many of the large boroughs in thousands of instances. The first of these Acts, the 59th of George III., after reciting that in large and populous towns payment of the rates was often evaded, went on to enact that in the case of rents between £20 and £6 the owners should be assessed instead of the occupiers. The rate-books, therefore, in these cases merely gave the names of owners, who might be rated for 50, and as in St. Pancras, sometimes for 100 houses, and the names of the tenants were not given at all. The Return of 1857 purported to supply the number of houses rated for the relief of the poor in six metropolitan boroughs; and, taking Finsbury alone, there appeared to be there 39,621 houses (not tenements) rated for the relief of the poor. There were no houses under £6 annual value, as he had ascertained from inquiry. Prima facie it would appear that there were 39,000 occupiers who were entitled to vote, but the fact was that there were in many instances two, three, or four £6 tenants in each house. Making then the deduction fixed on by the Government—namely, 27½ per cent for changes of residence and occupancy by females, the result would show that the calculation of the noble Lord as to the numbers which would be added to the constituency by giving persons who paid £6 a year a vote was very much too narrow. The noble Lord's Return set out the existing constituency of Finsbury at 20,951, and the noble Lord informed the House that the addition which would be made to the constituency by his Bill was 515. If they deducted 27½ per cent from 39,801, the number of rated houses, they would find that the noble Lord's calculation was ridiculously absurd. Take next the Tower Hamlets. From the Returns it appeared that there were 28,483 £10 voters, and the noble Lord calculated the increase by the £6 franchise at only 5,488; but it appeared from a calculation by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets that the number of houses, none of which were rated under £6 was 88,327; which, with the deduction of 27½ per cent, would be the number of voters under the new Bill. Then take Marylebone. The Returns showed that constituency to be 21,031; and the addition by the £6 franchise would only be 406. He was struck by the small amount of the expected increase, and made inquiries, from which he learned that the total number of rated houses in the borough, none less than £6, was 43,880. He found that in the parish of St. Pancras alone the number of houses for which the owner and not the occupier was rated was no less than 3,796, and therefore there was the number of persons who would by very simple means obtain a right to vote. Without going into greater details, he would only add that, according to the Government Returns, the total addition to the aggregate constituencies of Finsbury, the Tower Hamlets, Marylebone, Westminster, Lambeth, Southwark, and Greenwich would be only 13,992: while, taking the number of rated houses in those boroughs, and making a deduction of 27½ per cent for female occupiers, change of residence, &c., he found the actual increase would be 109,960. He had not confined his inquiries to the metropolis, but had addressed letters to the authorities of about eighty other towns, and the result of the information he obtained was that it was impossible to accept the Government Returns as showing the real number of persons who would be enfranchised. In Blackburn the Government Returns showed an expected addition of 1,110, but the town clerk informed him that there were 3,796 tenements in that town for which the owners were rated and not the occupiers. He found that in Macclesfield there would be an increase of 2,760 plus that assigned by the Government Returns, and in Bolton the increase would be 2,074. In Ashton-under-Lyne the real increase would be 2,000. [Mr. GIBSON was understood to dissent.] He (Mr. James) had a letter from an intelligent gentleman of that town stating that had the Government chosen to ask for proper Returns they could have obtained the information that was needed, but they had chosen to mix up the question of estimated value with that of rating, which had produced a series of the grossest blunders. That was the statement of a strong supporter of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gibson), who was favourable to an extension of the franchise, but who thought that the real facts ought to be made known. The errors in the Government Returns arose from taking the persons assessed instead of the occupiers. He would state how tenants not assessed might become voters. When the owner compounded for the rates the tenant had a right, under the 30th Section of the Reform Act, to claim to be placed upon the rate-book; and a subsequent Act, passed at the instance of Sir William Clay, facilitated that proceeding. But it had been held in a Court of Law that where the owner was rated for a house, if he charged any amount, even one shilling, of those rates to the tenant, the payment of the rates inures to the benefit of the occupier, who was entitled to a vote. It had appeared to him extremely material that the House and the country should know something of the extent to which the franchise would really be extended by the Bill under consideration. The very footnotes in the Government Returns, however, pointed out that the exact numbers could not be ascertained with regard to Norwich, Pontefract, and Finsbury. One of the great defects of the Bill was its principle of non-disfranchisement. It appeared to him that the Government had not had the courage to deal with the Bill as a great question ought to be dealt with. If public opinion did not back them in the great question of Parliamentary Reform it would have been almost better to wait until public opinion was strong enough to aid them. An imperfect attempt unsettled a great deal and settled nothing. It might have been naturally expected that the noble Lord (Lord John Russell), the parent of Reform in this country, and who had, moreover, taken a very active part in defeating Her Majesty's late Government on the question of Reform, would bring in a measure, to some extent at least, satisfactory. But the Bill of 1854, which that noble Lord introduced, was a far more satisfactory measure, because, while it to some extent tempered a large extension of the franchise by giving intelligence, property, and wealth a preponderating influence, it was a far bolder Bill as regarded the question of disfranchisement. The noble Lord proposed, in 1854, to disfranchise 19 boroughs. By that measure he would have had 63 seats to dispose of. He appeared to have then taken as the basis of his calculations not merely the principle of considering population, or that of the number of electors, but he combined the two as objects of consideration, which appeared to him (Mr. James) precisely the proper principle to adopt. There were many large populations, in which from their position there were not likely to be many new electors grow up, and therefore he thought the proper principle was to combine population and electors, both for enfranchisement and disfranchisement. The noble Lord, whom he believed to be a most sincere Reformer, had not, perhaps, that influence which he might have had in another Cabinet. He (Mr. James) could not fail to remember how, in the course of the debate on the Reform Bill introduced by the late Government, the right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer stood up as the vindicator of nomination boroughs. Hon. Members who heard that able speech might have imagined that they were carried back into the time when Mr. Croker, the mere creature of a rotten borough himself, stood up, in 1831, for Aldborough and for rotten boroughs. The right hon. Gentleman's speech was a mere reiteration of the arguments which Mr. Croker adduced. Mr. Croker was the creature of the rotten borough system—he never ventured to breathe the pure atmosphere of a Liberal constituency. Mr. Croker, who established a great reputation, by the arguments which he used with extreme ability, expired with the system, and his political reputation was embalmed in the undying satire of the author of Coningsby. But the right hon. Gentleman, and the noble Lord as well, to some extent repeated his arguments, and the noble Lord invoked the name of Edmund Burke and of Lord Macaulay, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer did also, to support the argument for the preservation of nomination, or what were called rotten boroughs. Now, there never was a greater mistake made in a debate than to invoke the name of Lord Macaulay in support of an argument for nomination boroughs. The noble Lord the Member for the City of London sat by the side of Lord Macaulay in December, 1831, and he could not have forgotten his eloquent denunciation of rotten boroughs in opposition to the arguments of Mr. Croker. Lord Macaulay said—

Mr. Edwin James

Mr. Edwin James

“You close against men of talent the broad entrance which ought to stand open to them, and in exchange open to them a by-entrance, always narrow, always obscure, often filthy, through which they often have to pass by crawling on their hands and knees. The representative of a nomination borough comes into this House wearing the badge of slavery. He cannot speak of his independence without exciting a panic. That,” said Lord Macaulay, “is what your system of rotten boroughs has done for men of talent.”—[See 3 Hansard, ix. 383.]

How, then, could the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman invoke such a name in favour of such a system? Immediately that Lord Macaulay had emerged from the bondage of Calne he sat for the large constituencies of Leeds and Edinburgh, and never dreamed, he (Mr. James) ventured to think, to the last moment of his existence, of adducing an argument in favour of the rotten borough system. In 1839, Lord Macaulay wrote to Mr. Black, “I shall be able to take part in politics as an independent Member of Parliament, with the weight and authority of a man who speaks in the name of a great and intelligent body of constituents.” The Chancellor of the Exchequer had also alluded to Mr. Pitt. What did Mr. Pitt say in his speech on the Motion for an inquiry into the state of the representation of the country? He said: “I avow myself the enemy of close boroughs. They are the strongholds of corruption, to which I attribute many of the calamities of the country.” The noble Lord had spoken of nomination boroughs as a kind of harbour of refuge for great men ostracised by some sudden caprice of a popular constituency. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke of them as the nurseries of rising statesmanship. What sort of harbours of refuge had Thetford, Harwich, Ashburton been, and to what eminent statesmen had they given seats in that House? He asked the noble Lord to point to a single statesman of whom a rotten borough had been a nursery since 1832? [AN HON. MEMBER: Tiverton?] Tiverton a nursery. It surely was not an infant statesman who was nursed at Tiverton, but a statesman whom they were all proud to see in that House. The system of disfranchisement proposed by the noble Lord in the present Bill seemed not only extraordinary but incomprehensible. Tiverton, for instance, was still to return two Members. Tiverton, taking the noble Lord's return, had 750 electors. And yet one Member was to be taken away from Guildford, which had a constituency of 937. There was another borough, Tavistock, in which it was supposed that a noble Duke had some interest. Tavistock was to keep its two Members—it had 467 electors. Hertford was to lose one Member, and it had 1,803. Malton, where it was supposed the Whig interest predominated, was to keep its two Members, with 789 electors. Maldon, however, was to lose one, with 1,213. Wycombe was to keep two Members, with 521 electors. Dorchester on the other hand was to lose one, with 551. He protested that he could not understand the principle on which those changes were made. If he was told that it was founded entirely upon population—then he declared such a principle was quite wrong. The principle of 1854 was far better. The proper way was not to consider the amount of population alone but to look to the number of persons likely to grow into electors. The result, however, of the principle adopted appeared to have been singularly fortunate for Whig boroughs. In the metropolitan boroughs there was a large number of respectable and intelligent persons occupying portions of houses. Many hon. Members must have received letters from persons of various classes occupying apartments, perhaps for seven years, paying perhaps £50 or £100 a year for them, and yet having no vote—persons managing schools among the rest, or persons occupying rooms in public institutions. The noble Lord would not it seemed condescend to take a lesson from the

Reform Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, and yet it contained a most valuable principle—that of the lodger franchise. Vulgar epithets might be applied to such a principle—it might be termed a “fancy franchise”—but it was a franchise of a large and an intellectual portion of the community, which would fairly counter-balance the very great extension proposed in the Bill. That principle was entirely ignored in the present Bill. The Bill of 1854, which was, no doubt, to some extent a precedent for the Bill of the right hon. Member for Bucks, contained that franchise, which he believed to be a safe one, but the noble Lord, for reasons which he could not comprehend, had omitted it from his present measure. Then there was another defect, which would seem very considerable in the eyes of persons really attached to the Liberal cause—it preserved a constant impediment to the exercise of the franchise, by exacting as a condition the payment of rates, which in the Bill of 1854 was given up. In 1854 the noble Lord stated that the payment of rent was a sufficient evidence of solvency. By insisting on the payment of rates persons were often disfranchised, not through their own fault. It was a monstrous injustice that persons should be disfranchised for no fault of their own, and no one could doubt that under the present Bill great numbers of voters, both in counties and boroughs, would be disfranchised for not having paid their rates at a particular day. This he believed would have the effect of destroying one-half of the proposed extension of the suffrage, by shackling, as it would do, the exercise of the voter's privilege. He thought this Bill, if it passed with all those defects, could hardly lead to a settlement of this question. It did not appear that it was to meet with any opposition on the second reading in that House. The Bill would probably go into Committee, and then, he hoped, efforts would be made to amend and improve it. What fate might be reserved for it in “another place” it was impossible to say, but he thought there would be considerable hesitation before the responsibility was incurred of rejecting it. A large number of intelligent persons were anxiously awaiting—not pressing by turbulence or violent excitement—the passing of a Reform measure. He believed that both parties in the House were deeply interested in having the question of Reform in the representation of the people satisfactorily set at rest. He trusted that on going into Committee they would be able to introduce clauses which would make it a Bill something worthy of the name of a Bill to amend the representation of the people, and he trusted, too, that there would be considerable hesitation before the responsibility was incurred of rejecting the measure. On a former occasion a great statesman, now passed away, had warned his Peers in the House of Lords to be careful how they interfered in the mighty Corn-law struggle, between the people and their food. He trusted some statesman equally judicious would advise them to be cautious how they interfered between the people and their just political rights. Her Majesty's Government had not brought forward a measure equal to the occasion. They were bold, some thought them reckless, in their financial measures—they were cowards on the question of political reform. The present Parliament, which would be memorable for great measures of social and financial interest, gave a remarkable opportunity for adjusting for a quarter of a century the great question of Parliamentary Reform. The Government had lost the opportunity of which they had not the courage to avail themselves, and upon them must rest the responsibility of having disappointed, as they had done, the just expectations of a forbearing and intelligent people.

Mr. Edwin James

MR. HARDY said, that although he had listened with attention to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone, he found a difficulty in understanding on which side it had been made. The facts he had adduced and the arguments founded on them, seemed to put him in a dilemma in which the hon. and learned Gentleman wished to place hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House, and to impose on him the duty of moving a direct negative to the second reading of the Bill, as one wholly insufficient to meet the necessities of the times. But the course adopted with regard to the Bill was in his opinion one due to the importance of the subject, for it showed that there was no disinclination on the part of the Conservatives to consider a proper measure of reform; and if they criticised the measure of the noble Lord, that did not preclude them from saying that they were as anxious as he could be to carry out a Reform of the representation of the people. If they described this measure as reckless and revolutionary it was because they found that it tended downwards, and that its ultimate effect would be to destroy the existing constitution altogether. But it was not necessary to adopt the Bill in its present shape, nor was it necessary for the House at that moment to express an opinion as to how it was to be amended. The noble Lord called on this Parliament — the very Parliament to which the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. James) had appealed, to do justice to the people—to commit suicide, to destroy itself, and to destroy itself for what? was it to produce a better Legislature than that which was then sitting? The House had not yet heard from any Member of the Government what was the object of the Bill, whether it was simply to admit within the pale of the constitution certain persons now excluded from it, or whether it met the object to which the right hon. Secretary of State for the Home Department referred in a speech which he made some time previous, when he said it would be incumbent on any individual who proposed a Reform Bill to show what were the grievances to be remedied and what were the objects to be obtained, and to show also that better government would be secured by the change than was attained by the operation of the existing Parliament. He (Mr. Hardy) confessed that it was with no little astonishment he saw this Bill produced as the result of the deliberations of the Cabinet, because he could not forget the words of the right hon. the Home Secretary, nor could he forget what fell from the noble Viscount at the head of the Government, when that noble Viscount, speaking of what was necessary for a Reform Bill, totally ignored the principle now put forward, repudiated what had been stated by the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, and sketched out a scheme totally at variance with that now before the House. But since that time there had been a compact. In former times they had heard of the “Lichfield House compact;” now they had the “Willis’s Rooms compact.” There was a meeting in Willis’s Rooms. But it seemed that the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone had not been consulted on the subject; the whole affair had been given into the hands of one hon. Member of the House, who, according to his own friends, ruled the Cabinet, and was the “out-door agent” of the Government, as one of his friends at Manchester had called him. And what said the right hon. Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who was the only Member of the Government that had spoken? Did he speak of the Bill as one strengthening the constitution and benefiting the people? On the contrary, he spoke of it “with bated breath and whispering humbleness;” and he stated that they “had been asked” to bring in a measure, and that no Government could sit on those benches which did not bring in a Bill to amend the representation, that no Bill would be satisfactory which contained “much less” than the present. That was all he said in its favour; and then he went on to say that he hoped it would be “a safe and satisfactory” settlement of the question. The House had heard from the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone what he considered satisfactory, and that as far as he was concerned the Bill would not be in any sense satisfactory. Hon. Members also on that side of the House were of opinion that the Bill was not safe, and he wished to know whom the present Bill was introduced to conciliate. The great masses of the people were in favour of a moderate measure of Reform. Was this measure, then, to be given to them as a satisfactory measure, or was it given to those who looked beyond it, who looked to something ulterior? The Bill was avowedly a Bill not for the better quality of the constituency, but simply to add to them in numbers. It was quantity, not quality, that was proposed to be brought into the Constitution. It was said that the working classes ought to be added to the voters. It had been assumed throughout the debate—he would not say by those who spoke in favour of the Bill, for, with a slight exception, no one had spoken in favour of it—that the working classes were at present excluded. He denied, however, that the working classes were excluded from taking their part in the working of the constitution. Even under the £10 franchise there had always been working men admitted, and by the raising of rents and the decrease in the value of money, many constituencies were largely increasing and many were being added to the constituent body by their industry and their prudence. The object of the Reform Bill of 1832 was, that by giving a franchise of £10 a constituency would be secured, not of men living from hand to mouth, not of men living by daily labour, but men who had acquired something by their thrift and their prudence, and had some stake in the country. It was distinctly put forward as one of the advantages of the Bill that it would not give the vote to those living by day labour, because it was supposed that that class was more liable to corruption and to be influenced by demagogues than persons in the class above. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone had spoken of the present state of the constituencies as not being homogeneous; but the effect of the present Bill would be that a single class of voters would overbear and override all the constituency. The hon. and learned Member, took exception to a statement made by his right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington), who pointed out the large number of electors in great constituencies who did not vote. But it would be found that upon several occasions a majority of the electors for Marylebone, to the number of 11,000, did not vote, and that the whole business was done by 9,000 voters. It was clear, therefore, that partizan clubs could influence the more active part of the electors who governed the election, and that the more respectable part of the electors kept back from the poll. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster told the House that the object of this Bill was to give admission to the working man; but the coarse process of lowering the franchise was not the way in which this object ought to be attained. He agreed with Mr. Austin in his pamphlet, that as they went down the social scale it would be impossible to resist a further influx on the same principle of lowering the franchise. Mr. Austin contended that "every extension of the franchise, in the direction of universal suffrage, tended to introduce it, for the jealousy and ambition of the excluded classes were inflamed by the admission of those whose place in the social scale was not higher than their own." He agreed with this opinion, and had no doubt that if the principle were laid down, that the great body of the working classes were to be admitted without selection, those who did not live in £6 houses would also claim to be enfranchised. Parliament would be unable to stop; and this was the only reason why the Bill was supported by any party in the country. He was wrong in saying that no one had supported it, for two hon. Members had spoken in favour of the Bill. The hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), an earnest Radical reformer, spoke in its favour. But how? Not as a safe and satisfactory settlement of the question, but as a means by which he could place the lever of reform on a better footing to rouse the masses to put down what he considered to be a system of class government injurious to the country. In this he was followed by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), whose support alone rendered this a most suspicious Bill. The hon. Member had interrupted his hon. Friend the Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Ker Seymer) by exclaiming, "I never said that this Bill would not settle the franchise." That was true; but did the hon. Member for Birmingham ever say that it would settle the franchise? That hon. Gentleman was cautious in the House, but bold out of it. If the Bill was to settle the franchise, why did the hon. Member in his speech upon it threaten the House with the indignation of 20,000,000 of people, and of 6,000,000 of adult males? Did the hon. Member wish the House to give the franchise to those 6,000,000 of adults? His argument, if that were not his meaning, seemed to be a little difficult to understand. He called on the House to say whether they were for reform or not, and then they would see whether or not he could get up a storm in the country. He (Mr. Hardy) replied, that though not adverse to reform, they were not for such a reform as the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bright) wished, because they saw that he supported the Bill, not as a settlement, but to get a standing-ground with an immensely-increased constituency, and so to overbear and override the property and intelligence of the country. And then the hon. Member for Birmingham out of the House threatened something more. Surrounded by the great manufacturers he declared that if Parliament did not pass this Bill there would be delegates from every trades' union in the country sitting in London. What did that mean? Did he mean to say that the trades unions represented the £6 householders only, or the whole of the working classes? The hon. Member took exception to the representations of his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Whiteside) with respect to the views of the working classes on trades' combinations and political economy. Curiously enough, about that time he received the speech of a Canadian gentleman recently published, who quoted a document that showed that the right hon. and learned Gentleman and his right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli) were not wrong as to the views of the working classes in trades unions. The document was issued in 1850 by the Metropolitan trades delegates, who said that,

[Third Night.

Mr. Hardy

"The middle classes, whose predominant influence and power were acknowledged and accepted, had introduced as principles of action the meanest incentives and motives that can animate the human mind, namely, the free and full action of unenlightened self-interest, the unqualified love of wealth and the gratification of this love; and that their political philosophy was wholly mercantile."

The whole document justified the statement of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli) that the views of the working classes had been in favour of protection to native industry as against free trade, for it contained these words:—

"We advance and maintain the principle that established and home trade should first be considered and preferred, and that changes and foreign trade should only be undertaken by means of that value or capital which may be over and above what is required for maintaining in their employments the members of each nation."

Such was their political economy, which he only threw in by the way, as allusion had been made to the subject. Again, the hon. Member for Birmingham, at many meetings and by a regular scheme had shown himself favourable to a rating suffrage throughout the country. He used this Bill as a stepping-stone to giving a vote to every man who was rated. But had they not had some warning on this subject? A Committee had been sitting in the other House of Parliament, which had communicated to that House the result of their investigation. And what did they find as the result? The inquiry was directed to the effect of the Small Tenements Act. The result was just what might have been anticipated from any such rash and reckless extension of the suffrage as was proposed, and was looked forward to by the hon. Member for Birmingham. What, he would ask, had been the result even of the original Municipal Corporations Act? Were men chosen who were fitted by their intelligence and wealth to regulate municipal affairs, or were not agitators rather elected, who made the town-councils the means of influencing the elections of Members of Parliament? But under the extension caused by the Small Tenements Act what was the result? In one constituency the Committee found that rate-payers who were rated at £26,000 were in the minority, while the majority, which returned the members of the town-council, were only rated at £4,000. In another case the minority were rated at £16,000, while the majority, who determined the whole election, were rated at only £661. In another town of 5,300 electors, 1,000 represented £27,000; while 4,300 only represented a rating of £7,000.

Had the present system of municipal elections checked expenses in boroughs? On the contrary, the borough rates were frequently so heavy, that persons were driven out of boroughs, and resided in the neighbourhood to get out of the way of the increasing borough rates. If they gave immense powers of taxation into the hands of those who paid little towards it, the result would naturally be that they would lay the burden on their richer neighbours. The hon. Member for Birmingham laid great stress on the connection between numbers and property, as shown in the income tax, and similar Returns, as proving the rights of the large towns to additional representatives. But these Returns became wholly fallacious when they were made a ground for extending the suffrage by lowering the franchise, because it would put into the hands of those who had no property, the power of controlling those who paid the very income tax on which the hon. Member founded the claims to an increased representation; they were, in fact, about to make the persons who did not pay, control those who did. When they found that it worked in this deplorable manner in the municipal franchise was it not enough to make them pause before they introduced it also into the Parliamentary? Was there anything else that they had discovered in this inquiry by the Lords' Committee into the working of the municipal franchise? Had they not discovered, and was it not confirmed by other inquiries which had been instituted, that an extended franchise directly tended to increase corruption to an unbounded extent? The Report of the Committee spoke of it in strong terms. Hired canvassers were employed, electors were bribed with drink and small payments of money; and it was abundantly proved that large expenditure was thus incurred in connection with the municipal elections, with the view of influencing the return of Representatives to Parliament. What, then, would be the effect if those very electors, who were so corruptible in municipal elections, were to be brought in a mass into the Parliamentary elections—as brought in a mass they would be, because in the great boroughs at least there were rated houses below the value, few if any of £6; and if the people chose to take upon themselves the payment of the rates, which they might easily do without increasing their rent, they would all be admitted to the franchise, and so the whole municipal constituency, part of which was now excluded from the Parliamentary elections, would come in and influence those elections to an inconceivably greater extent than they did now. The Committee of the Lords further said that no trifling deterioration of the constituency was caused by this arrangement in towns, by which the direct ratepayers were outnumbered by those who paid no rates or paid them only indirectly, and urged that the actual, direct, and continuous payment of rates should be made the indispensable condition of municipal suffrage. There was nothing in the evidence bearing on the municipal which did not equally apply to the Parliamentary suffrage, and yet it was already proposed that the actual payment of rates, which formed so important a check upon the admission of improper persons, should now be swept away. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone showed conclusively that the Returns submitted by the Government were quite fallacious as the basis of any estimate of the proposed additions to the constituency, and that the occupants of small tenements might, by an arrangement to pay their own rates, which they could easily make, claim to be registered as voters in incredible numbers. He would now view these Returns in another light. They were, he understood, founded on what was called the gross estimated rental column of the poor-rate book; but a correspondent of the leading journal, who he supposed had had some connection with their compilation, asserted that they represented also the rental actually paid to the landlords. That assertion he disputed in the strongest terms. He was sure it was not correct. Now for the proof. The proof in the first place, was manifest on the face of these Returns, because there were several towns where the £10 householders were fewer than the £10 voters; and therefore, there were men who enjoyed votes as occupants of £10 houses, but whose names were not entered in the columns devoted to gross estimated rental in the rate-book. They would find that the number of £10 houses, as given in that column, was fewer than the number of £10 voters. There were no fewer than forty boroughs where that was the case. An hon. Friend had given him an instance of what took place in his own borough. A man claimed before the revising barrister to vote on a £10 house. There was produced against him the rate-book, from which it appeared that he was assessed at the sum of £4 10s. This would not give more on the gross estimated rental than £6; and yet he proved to the barrister that he paid a rent of £10, and was admitted on the register. How was it that there was such a difference between the actual and the estimated rental? It arose partly from this cause, that in boroughs which consisted not of one parish but of many, there was a continual struggle going on between the parishes to keep the rating as low as possible in order to lessen their respective proportion of the borough rate. In the same way an effort was made in county parishes to keep down the gross estimated rental, in order that each might escape from paying its fair proportion of the county rate; and the consequence was that in the majority of cases the gross estimated rental did not represent the actual rental. He could give one or two instances in cases where he had himself made inquiries. The borough which he had the honour to represent (Leominster) was divided into two portions—the main parish, in the town itself, and what was called the out parish. In the borough parish there had been no column of the gross estimated rental kept for a number of years; so that the only return for the borough was in point of fact the rateable value, which it was clear was much below the actual amount. In the out parish the gross estimated rental was fixed, as far as it could be ascertained, at the actual rental paid to the landlord with a deduction of 15 per cent. With regard to the town of Banbury, he had received a letter from a gentleman on whose statements he could rely, in which it was stated:—

[Third Night.]

Mr. Hardy

“In the township of Nethercop, the most populous part of the Borough of Banbury, the gross estimated rental stated in the rate-book is, on an average, only three-fourths of the actual rental, and, in some instances, not half that amount. The consequence is, that a great number of houses which are really of the value of £6 are excluded from the overseer's return. Lord John Russell estimates the additional electors in Banbury at 194, but in reality there will be about 400.

He believed he might appeal to every Gentleman who represented a large constituency to confirm his statements. He would like to appeal to the hon. Member for Nottingham on this subject, because he had heard, not indeed from the hon. Member, but from other sources, that the state of things in the town of Nottingham had been wholly misrepresented. He believed the same would be found to be the case over almost the whole country. The gross estimated rental was perhaps three-fourths of the actual rental, and sometimes much less. If so those Returns must be wholly fallacious, and he must say that the Government itself did not seem to have entire confidence in those Returns, or why had they not made the slightest opposition only a few evenings ago to the appointment of a Committee of inquiry in the House of Lords. He might be told that it was part of the arrangement that the inquiry should not interrupt the progress of the Bill. It might be also said that the noble Lord had confidence in his Returns, and no fear of their standing the proof. But when the noble Lord took upon himself to declare, on his responsibility as a Cabinet Minister, that a Motion for referring the Bill to a Select Committee in that House would be equivalent to a rejection of the Bill, why should the Committee in the other House be sanctioned—at least not resisted by the whole Cabinet—unless they felt that there were, after all, some grounds for inquiry. Either the inquiry was needful or it was not; and he wished to ask the noble Lord to say whether the whole Cabinet had confidence in the accuracy of these Returns or not? If they had not, then inquiry was needed, and it was monstrous, after the manner in which the accuracy of the Returns had been questioned, to press the House to pass the Bill before they were furnished with reliable data on which to form their judgment of what would be its effect. They were told they ought not to represent what was proposed as a homogeneous addition to the franchise, but he contended that this measure would be an actual transfer of power. It would take away the power from the present constituency and would give it to a class of which they knew comparatively nothing—a class into whose character and position the noble Lord and his colleagues had sanctioned an inquiry in the other House of Parliament, though they were to be allowed none in that House. Surely the noble Lord could never mean to ask them to legislate blindfold on so important a subject, on the ground that any errors they might fall into would be corrected elsewhere, or was the inquiry in the other House nothing but a mockery, a delusion, and a snare? He appealed from the noble Lord to the noble Viscount at the head of the Government, and he asked him whether it was fair or just to press the House to legislate without sufficient means of information. He appealed to him to allow the House an opportunity of weighing this question in nicer and more accurate scales than his noble Colleague had offered them; and to give them the same opportunity for obtaining accurate information as the Government had granted to noble Lords in “another place.” The noble Viscount, pressed either by the arguments or by something else on the part of his noble Colleague, had yielded those more Conservative sentiments which he entertained and expressed when sitting on the Opposition benches last year; while the noble Lord the Member for London had carried out all he expressed when he sat below the gangway, under his leading—but it was folly to talk of leading, it was dragging. The Government was dragged. They knew it well. There was not a Member in the House who, in spite of the insincerity of public men, did not know that those who sat on and behind the Treasury Bench were dragged reluctantly along; that they had no sympathy for the measure; that in their hearts they disapproved of it, though they dared not speak out their sentiments. But the time was coming when they must speak out, for hon. Members on his side of the House were determined that the Bill should be fully considered. It was folly to represent the opposition to the measure as manifesting a resistance to reform in any shape. What hon. Members said was, give us information; tell us what is your object; show us whether, by this Bill, we shall obtain a better Government for the country than we at present possess. The Secretary for the Home Department said he had prepared and was ready to bring in a Bill for making a proper valuation. That would be a means of ascertaining what sort of constituency, both in towns and counties, would be obtained; but meanwhile the Government called on that Parliament, which was elected not only to pass a Reform Bill, but to deal with other great questions of the country—they called on that Parliament, which they thought fit to deal with questions that were tantamount to a fiscal revolution—nay, a Parliament which had sanctioned a fiscal revolution—they called on that Parliament to declare that it was not fit to conduct the ordinary affairs of the country. The effect on hon. Members themselves was most disastrous. It led them away from the consideration of their proper duties, to consider what they were to say to their constituents next year, rather than what they were to do now; for it was obvious that in the whole of these debates hon.

[Third Night.

Members had been afraid to speak out lest they should have to appear hereafter before the new constituency of which they might have spoken. Yielding to the dictation of the hon. Member for Birmingham, the Government were about to swamp constituencies which had done justice to the interests of the country. Numbers, according to the hon. Member for Birmingham, were a cure for everything. They would enable us to live at peace with all the world, to place taxes on the right shoulders, to get rid of corruption. He ventured to say, on the contrary, that lowering the franchise in the mass, without consideration or selection, would promote war, extravagance, and corruption. The author of the Bill had said that he was going to effect his object in a direct and simple way, and made simplicity the merit of the Bill. He wished the noble Lord would confine his simplicity to foreign affairs. The Constitution of this country was a complex thing; it was not a Constitution made by the hon. Member for Birmingham; it had grown and adapted itself to the various wants of the people; it was full of what the hon. Member would call anomalies, but they were anomalies of the most valuable kind, which promoted the national interest and prevented the possessors of wealth and intelligence being overridden by mere numbers. There were great varieties of franchises prior to 1832, and what did the noble Lord himself say in 1854? He regretted that the Reform Bill of 1832 destroyed so many franchises, and that in confining themselves so much to one species of franchise only, he had not made it sufficiently various, and therefore not sufficiently comprehensive. Surely the noble Lord had arrived at years of discretion, in 1854, when he endeavoured to restore some of those complexities; surely the noble Lord was not then an infant legislator, and yet it appeared that now the noble Lord saw things in a different light, and simplicity was the only object to be aimed at. In like manner the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster said they could accomplish their object better by the direct and simple means of this Bill. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would tell them what their object was. He could understand and appreciate the views of the hon. Member for Birmingham. His view was an ulterior one; he told them so himself, not, indeed, in that House, but in other places. He meant to go on to a rating franchise; and he told his friends to accept of this disfranchisement of twenty-five Members for the present, as it would help them to get rid of all small nomination boroughs. But it did not follow that a small borough was a nomination borough. There was as much independence in many small boroughs as was to be found in some of the largest cities in the kingdom, and he for one would rather be the free choice of a small but independent constituency than the nominee of a public-house clique, which it was well known dictated the returns in many of the large towns. When all other arguments failed him the hon. Member for Birmingham assured them that in following the noble Lord the Member for London they were following a man who walked in the light of the Constitution, who valued what had been done by his ancestors, and who appreciated the advantages of an aristocracy. If that were so, how striking the contrast presented by the hon. Member himself. When he looked back, it was only to malign the aristocracy. But which of the noble Lords were they to follow—the noble Lord of 1852, the noble Lord of 1854, or the noble Lord of 1860—because anything more different than the schemes brought forward at those periods could not possibly be conceived. An interesting history had been given in “another place” of the circumstances connected with the Bill of 1852. It was said to have been predicted by a great statesman that the Act of 1832 would stand until the noble Lord was in extremis. That prediction was fulfilled to the letter, because it was only when the noble Lord felt himself in extremis that the Bill of 1852 was proposed. But could anything be conceived more opposed to each other than the noble Lord’s Bill of 1854 and the present measure? There they had a variety of franchises—they had the representation of minorities—they had rating clauses and residence to the extent of two and a half years. The noble Lord then said:—

Mr. Hardy

“Leaving out, therefore, those who have not a certain degree of independence, or at least those who, not having given sufficient proof of it by continued occupation to entitle them to vote—that is leaving out all those living in houses rated under £6 and taking in all those who are rated above £6 a year, provided they shall have fulfilled the municipal term of residence (i.e., two years and a half before registration). By this means we should obtain an extensive representation of the country, which will include within its limits a large number of the working men, those who are most remarkable for steadiness of conduct, &c., and are enabled to inhabit dwellings of a better character than those occupied by the great mass of their fellow-workmen.”

The present Bill was a very different measure. It contained no rating, but a £6 rental franchise—no representation of minorities, no franchise from payment of income tax, no lodger franchise, no degree at the university franchise, no savings bank franchise—though all these were put in as checks on the lowered franchise in 1854; and yet he would venture to say that the noble Lord's intellect was as keen and his abilities as great when he proposed that measure in 1854 as they were now. Yet they were asked to take the noble Lord as their leader, the noble Lord who was dragging after him those who should be his ready followers, the noble Lord who, according to the hon. Member for Birmingham, would be sure to lead them in the path of the Constitution. He could not help thinking that upon this question of Parliamentary Reform the hon. Member for Birmingham was something like the giant of old, the renowned Cacus, who dragged his victims backwards to his cave, so that their footsteps might point the other way. The hon. Member had got his spoil by the tail, but though he might say, pointing to the footsteps, that they were in the path of the Constitution, everybody knew whither he was leading his dupes. Though the footsteps might point outwards, he was dragging them down into the democratic abyss. They knew well that the hon. Member for Birmingham did not walk in the light of the Constitution. He maligned the aristocracy. Now, he maintained that in this country it was essential for liberty that there should be a strong and powerful aristocracy. The hon. Member for Birmingham might exult in what he called the social liberty of a neighbouring country, he might prefer despotism with equality and social liberty to constitutional liberty. But there could be no doubt that if his policy were adopted we must have democracy, or despotism founded upon democracy. Burke—a greater man than, probably, any that now sat in the House—said, speaking of the House of Commons as a link connecting the Crown and the House of Lords with the masses,—

“That artificial representation being once discredited and overturned all goes to pieces, and nothing but a French democracy or arbitrary monarchy can possibly exist.”

In 1854 there was an apathy to which the apathy of that time was not to be compared. They did not then view with the dread they did now the indiscriminate lowering of the franchise, for they had not had so much experience of the evils resulting from the system, and the operation of a widely extended suffrage in America and Australia. Since that period, however, they had been obliged to look to what was passing in those countries, and it was found that so vast an extent of the suffrage did not produce to reflective minds results so satisfactory as the hon. Member for Birmingham had previously assured them would be the case. Again they were now told that the Bill was but a step in disfranchisement. But, as he had said, he believed many of those small boroughs were as independent as the larger ones. Allusion had been made to the different views expressed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on this point last year and those he now held; the Proteus-like changes of that hon. Gentleman were such that it was idle to dwell upon one case as an illustration, but upon this particular point the best and only real refutation of his present views would be, if the House could bear them unenlivened by the telling delivery of the right hon. Gentleman, that the Clerk at the table should read the various speeches that had been made by the right hon. Gentleman from time to time upon the subject. The right hon. Gentleman, however, had not spoken in favour of nomination boroughs, but in favour of small boroughs, as admitting Members of ability who might not have an opportunity of coming through the larger boroughs. An American writer and lawyer of the greatest eminence, Mr. Justice Story, saw the real excellence of the British constitution:—

“In England” (he says) “the House of Commons, as a representative body, is founded on no uniform principle, either of numbers, classes, or places, such diversities being important checks upon undue legislation as facilitating the representation of different interests and opinions, and securing a well-balanced and intelligent representation of all the various classes of society.”

That view was borne out by the results arrived at in this country. The disfranchisement proposed by the Bill proceeded on no distinct principle. Disfranchisement should be carried so far only as it was thought advisable to enfranchise, but with no ulterior objects. There was, however, a provision in the present Bill which appeared to be most objectionable, and a step in the direction in which the hon. Member for Birmingham desired to proceed. The proposition to give three Members to large towns was the beginning of that course which the hon. Member for Birmingham wished to be completed; for that hon.

[Third Night.]

Member had put forward schemes for allotting six, seven, or eight Members to large constituencies. He maintained, then, that giving three Members to boroughs would inevitably lead to population being taken as the ground for apportioning the number of representatives. He doubted whether it was prudent ever to create what were called unicorn counties, and the increase in many of those counties was now sufficient to justify their being formed into two divisions. An important point omitted in the Bill related to the question of the boundaries of boroughs. This ought to receive consideration, as it was a question whether, where boroughs had considerably extended beyond the limits fixed in 1832, but where the population beyond the boundaries were of a homogeneous character, those boundaries ought not to be re-adjusted so as to include them in the list of voters. He would not, however, dwell upon this point. Then the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. E. James) had spoken upon the question of registration. Certainly, if they were going to have such vast constituencies, it would be essential to have a cheap and easy form of registration, or the expenses would be enormous; and it was idle to carry a Bill without due provision for giving full effect to its objects being made in it. There was one point, by the way, in which the hon. and learned Member needed correction. He had spoken of Mr. Croker as the representative of a nomination borough; but the fact was that Mr. Croker was at the time the representative of the University of Dublin, and was not, therefore, personally interested in nomination boroughs. He confessed that one of his chief objections to the present Bill, which had been allowed to proceed without meeting with any distinct opposition, arose out of the mode in which it was supported. He found that the only real supporters of the Bill were those who wanted to carry it further. It was because he believed that they were right in their anticipations who thought and desired that the Bill would create a fiscal revolution, so that the taxes should be laid entirely on one class, that he was opposed to it; and he believed also that the Bill would give power to those who paid no taxes to involve this country in difficulties with other nations which would occasion no burden to themselves. In reference to such views as were expressed by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Lord Brougham had said:—

Mr. Hardy

“So if our friends of the ultra-free trade persuasion were to be humoured in their fancy that by imbibing their doctrines all men are becoming virtuous, and especially all Governments peaceful, and some fifteen or sixteen millions were struck off our revenue, while the army was disbanding to lower the wages of labour, and the navy breaking up to be sold for old stores, the certainty is apparent to all but these lay preachers that we should forthwith taste the sweets, not, perhaps, of cheap commodities, but of rebellion, civil war, revolution at home, and of eventual subjugation by such of our neighbours as had not yet become converts to the true faith.”

But in fact there could be no doubt as to the ultimate objects and intentions of the hon. Member for Birmingham and those who united with him in supporting this Bill. Those objects were openly and fully avowed at a recent great meeting in Manchester, at which the hon. Member was present, by Mr. Wilson, the chairman, who usually acted as fugleman in the Free Trade Hall, and afterwards by the hon. Gentleman himself. The speech of Mr. Wilson gave some indications of the really revolutionary tendency of this measure, and it was evident that if they admitted these great masses to the franchise, revolutionary designs would be much more easily carried out. One man might govern them; they would be carried away by demagogues who, obtaining a powerful influence over their passions, might, in some sudden burst of enthusiasm, sweep away the most stable of our institutions. In such case they knew the result, for as it had been said, “Democracy is like death; it takes, but never gives back.” Mr. Wilson had said he was “well inclined to the present Government. With Cobden as commercial traveller and plenipotentiary in foreign affairs, with Bright taking the out-door department, and Gladstone and Gibson inside, the firm was doing a roaring business.” The firm had certainly drawn some very long bills, as firms who did a “roaring business” were accustomed to do. They had drawn on acceptors not trusted by everybody; they had speculated a little too largely, and, as it would be proved next year, in a manner not very satisfactory to the people of this country. At all events, he was sure the payers of direct taxation would not like it. The hon. Member for Birmingham, adopting the resolution which was carried at this meeting, was of opinion “that no measure of Parliamentary reform will be satisfactory to the country less than that which will confer the franchise on every male person rated in boroughs, or entitled to be rated, to the poor; which will more equally distribute Members in proportion to population and property, and will give the voter the protection of the Ballot." The present measure was described by its promoter as a safe and satisfactory settlement; but the only voices raised in favour of it were those of persons who declared that nothing could be safe or satisfactory which did not go this great length. On the occasion to which he was referring the hon. Member for Birmingham, after a speech of great eloquence and power, which was no doubt calculated to produce a great effect on the minds of the seven or eight thousand persons who heard him, came at last to his peroration. "I do not address the Court," he said: "My voice is too honest and unfaltering for courtly ears." How it happened that his voice did not falter after such extraordinary calumnies and misrepresentations as he had uttered against the aristocracy he (Mr. Hardy) could not imagine. He said, however, that his voice was too honest and unfaltering for courtly ears—that he did not address the Court. What schemes in the hon. Member's mind must those be which were unfit to be addressed to a constitutional monarch? What schemes must he be brooding over if his honest voice could not be heard by that Sovereign who had been always ready to hear every voice that spoke in the spirit of the Constitution. The hon. Member in lauding his own honesty reminded him of what was said of the Ear of Kent in King Lear :—

"He cannot flatter, he !—

An honest mind and plain—he must speak truth :
An they will take it, so ; if not, he's plain.
This kind of knaves I know, which in this plainness Harbour more craft, and more corrupter ends
Than twenty silly ducking observants,
That stretch their duties nicely."

The aristocracy, said the hon. Gentleman, were "so wrapped in luxury" that they would not listen to him. But was it not the glory of this country that a large portion of the aristocracy had sprung from the same class as that to which the hon. Gentleman himself belonged? At what time, then, did that aristocracy cease to be identified with the common interests of the country and the welfare and happiness of the people at large? Was it when they became possessors of landed estates? When they had raised themselves did they lose the estimation of their countrymen? Did they lose their love of their country because they had a title attached to their names, or their names annexed to the land? Did they forget those classes from whom they had risen? The aristocracy ought not so to be spoken of. They had done much for liberty in this country; they had been a kindly race, knitting together the rich and the poor; they had bound together with indissoluble bonds the various classes of the people whom the hon. Member had affected to represent, but could not stir up. The aristocracy, whom the hon. Member maligned, and with regard to whom he had said that they would not listen to a voice which, if honest, was too unfaltering—the just rights of that aristocracy, the just rights of the people, and the just rights of the Crown, was the foundation of the Constitution which the hon. Member was endeavouring to destroy, dragging after him in so doing a Government, many of whose Members were as much opposed to his schemes as he (Mr. Hardy) was. The hon. Member dragged after him also many Members of that House who had no confidence in this measure, or the results it would attain, and he (Mr. Hardy) regretted the fact, for the sake of the honour of public men; he regretted to see the insincerity which had prevailed throughout the House upon this subject. He trusted, however, that there were some hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition benches, who would not care what the result might be of doing their duty to their country, and honestly expressing their sentiments according to the dictates of their own consciences. For his own part, no man valued more than he a seat in that House, but he should consider himself degraded if because he valued that seat he withheld his opinion upon any question that came before him. He felt it his duty, therefore, to say that the hon. Member for Birmingham was dragging the Government and those hon. Gentlemen who supported them down a slope, tending inevitably to an abyss, from which there was no return. It was because he believed in the truth of what the hon. Member said, as to the effects of a Bill like this, should it ever pass, that he appealed to the supporters of Her Majesty's Government, and he asked those Members, some of whom had grown grey in the service of their country, and who, though opposed in politics to those on his own side of the House, had done their duty honourably, and endeavoured to advance the interests of the country—he asked them, if they believed with him that this scheme tended to radicalism and revolution, to put forth their energies to arrest its progress. Let them not be deterred by the fear that the Government would treat any Motion as a vote of want of confidence from performing their duty. Whether the Bill ought to be referred to a Select Committee or not was another question, but he could not suppose that the hon. Member for Salford had placed a Motion to that effect on the paper without due reflection, and he was astonished that the hon. Member should be threatened into abandoning it, because the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) had said he should take the carrying of such a Motion as equivalent to the rejection of the Bill. The position which that hon. Gentleman occupied in the House ought to have prevented him, unless he were thoroughly in earnest, from placing on the paper a most important Motion, which at a whisper from the noble Lord he now withdrew. With the experience of years the noble Lord had only been able to produce this miserable abortion—after the expectations which, when on the benches below, on the Opposition side of the House, he shadowed forth to the Radical party as the result of his accession to office. In truth the noble Lord had yielded himself in his old age as a prey to demagogues, and had allowed them to lead him against his own will, and that of many Members behind him, into a course which they had not the courage to denounce. But he would remind the House that they were not legislating for this Parliament, nor for the next, nor for any particular period, but they were legislating for one of the greatest nations that had ever influenced the destinies of the world; for a country that had made its impression on every part of the civilized globe. Let them look back into history with somewhat different feelings from those expressed by speakers at such meetings as he had referred to; let them consider whether the aristocracy had really led them into wars and expenditure, or whether the people had not gone heart and soul with them in all their wars, and notably in the late Russian war, which was, he might say, almost forced upon the Government by the people, and in despite of the efforts of the hon. Member for Birmingham. He would not ask the House to give a factious vote. This was no party question; he desired that no unfair advantage should be taken, that no combinations such as those directed against his own party when in office should be formed; but he and those acting with him wished to retain that which was so vital to the constitution of this country—they wished that each class—property, wealth, intelligence, and numbers—should retain their due place, and that no one class should be placed in a position of such predominant power as to override all the others. They believed that their present combined Constitution had advanced the country to that height of civilization at which it stood, and had contributed to the establishment of a free Parliament, where they could freely express their sentiments; and he believed that the more freely they spoke, even if for the moment some of their constituents disapproved of their sentiments on this subject, the more they would be honoured for their integrity. Lastly, he would call upon them to remember they represented a Constitution which would be destroyed by the measure the noble Lord proposed; and believing that Constitution to be sufficient to protect this country and advance its interests, he trusted they would defend it, and not allow themselves to be led astray, but that they would combine heart and hand with him and those who held the same views, in maintaining and upholding, in all their integrity, the well-defined rights of the people, the aristocracy, and the Crown.

[Third Night.

Mr. Hardy

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Sir, a considerable portion of this debate, especially during the present evening, has turned upon the statistical Returns relating to the representation which have been laid on the Table by the present Government. Now, when Her Majesty's Government undertook last autumn to bring forward a Reform Bill it was their desire to ascertain the best data which could be obtained for the construction of so important a measure. They accordingly framed instructions, which were sent round to the country overseers from the Poor Law Board, in order to procure the most accurate returns which could be prepared for their guidance. These instructions were framed with deliberation and care. If necessary, they could be laid on the Table, and in our opinion the returns obtained are correct and complete returns, so far as the rate-books furnish the means of obtaining them. The rate-books form, the only basis upon which it is possible that such returns can be founded. It was not possible to institute a new valuation of the country, and to obtain the results within the time during which they could be used for purposes of legislation. The Government could therefore only address themselves to a digestion of the facts recorded in the rate-books. My belief is that these results are, as I have stated, accurate and complete for the purposes of legislation. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. E. James) in his somewhat tessellated speech has said that we have made important errors both in framing the Returns and in the inferences we have deduced from them. I maintain in contradiction to the hon. and learned Member and in the most confident manner that the Returns are substantially correct, and that the Government have not made any serious error in the inferences they have founded upon them. I rejoice to think that a Committee has been appointed by the other House which is likely to inquire into these Returns. It is a matter well fitted for the investigation of a Select Committee, rather than for debate in this House, and I believe that when those Returns are deliberately examined they will be found to be worthy of the confidence which the Government has placed in them. The hon. and learned Gentleman has accused the Government of making a blunder in their use of these Returns. I retort the charge, and say the blunder is on the part of the hon. and learned Gentleman. Let me first call attention to the case of Finsbury, upon which the hon. and learned Member rested a good deal of his case. If he looks at the note at the bottom of the page he will see that the returns from the parishes of Islington and St. Luke's do not contain the number of persons occupying tenements which are rated to the owners instead of to the occupiers. That is the only case in which the return does not comprise those occupiers whose landlords are rated instead of themselves; it is an exceptional case, and the fact is stated in the return, but which the hon. and learned Member abstained from mentioning. If the House will refer to the notes C D, referring to Hull and Norwich, they will find they are also cases where these omissions occurred, but where they did occur the fact was stated on the face of the Returns; and their total amount is insufficient to affect materially the aggregate results of the Returns. The hon. and learned Gentleman told us that the Returns did not include occupiers whose tenements were rated to the landlord. I affirm, on the contrary, that these Returns do contain an accurate account of all occupiers—not of all tenements, but of all occupiers whose rates are compounded for and paid by the landlords. If the hon. and learned Member will refer to the places marked "A" in the first page he will find a note that the places thus marked contain the number of tenements, and not of male occupiers, thus showing that in other cases the male occupiers are returned, which is the correct return. In those places marked "A" there are numbers in excess of the number of male occupiers, and if the Returns had been laid before the House as the Government received them they would have shown a number greater than the truth, and not less. In these cases an estimated deduction has been made on account of unoccupied tenements, female occupiers, and other causes. The hon. and learned Member assumes that the total number of occupiers whose rates are compounded for and paid by the owners below £10 will naturally be placed upon the register. That argument is wholly fallacious, and upon that fallacy his estimates are founded. But there is no reason to suppose that a greater proportion of occupiers below £10, whose rates are compounded for, would under the Bill find their way upon the register than of the occupiers above £10 in a similar condition. Compare one or two cases where we have returns of the persons rated above £10 and the number of names on the register. In Liverpool the number upon the register is 18,779, but the number of persons rated above £10 is 39,730. No doubt a large part of that difference is due to the fact that those whose rates are compounded for do not claim to pay the rates themselves, and therefore are not placed upon the register. In like manner in the Tower Hamlets the number on the register is 28,843, but the number of houses rated above £10 is 67,859. I might multiply these examples, but they are sufficient to show the utter futility of the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman, who seeks to make us believe that every person occupying a house below £10 will actually be placed on the register under the new system. It must be obvious to any one who takes the trouble to consider the matter, that all those causes which tend to prevent occupiers above £10, whose rates are compounded for, from finding their way upon the register will operate with increased intensity upon occupiers below £10. Changes of residence, not claiming to be rated, and other causes will apply to those below £10 as well as to those above, and I will take upon myself to affirm, that if this Bill should come into operation, we shall find that the number we have stated is a max- imum, and one which is liable to very serious deductions. Therefore I say that the theory advanced by the hon. and learned Gentleman, supported by perverted facts and by the suppression of material statements appearing upon the face of the Returns, is utterly untenable. The hon. Gentleman who spoke last said the Returns were fallacious, and he particularly adverted to the column containing the gross rental as not exhibiting the real annual value. When Returns are declared to be fallacious, I apprehend any one would understand that there was some intentional deceit imputed to the person who brought them forward. If that be the intention of the hon. Gentleman I can only say nothing can be further from the fact. It was the sincere wish of Her Majesty's Government to obtain an accurate foundation for legislation, and it is their belief that in a vast majority of cases the first column of the rate-book does accurately exhibit the rent paid by the tenant to the landlord. We have sent circulars to the auditors of the Poor Law unions, before whom the rate-books come, and their answer generally is, that throughout the country the first column in the rate-books is not the rateable value, with which I am inclined to fancy some hon. Gentlemen confound the entry in that column, but that it does correctly exhibit the rental actually paid. I am quite aware of particular instances to the contrary, and if in Leominster the return is not filled up from the first column of the rate-book, then that return is incomplete. There may be parishes, too, in which a small rateable deduction may have been made, but I believe the practice is generally to enter in the first column the total annual rental. The hon. Gentleman, referring to some words I used at a meeting in the country, has called upon me to state the policy with which this Bill was introduced to the House. He reminded me that I had said it was incumbent upon those who proposed a Reform Bill to state what were the evils which it was proposed to remedy, and to show that the remedy proposed was adequate and suited to the evil. I accept the challenge of the hon. Gentleman, and if the House will bear with me I will state the grounds upon which I support the Bill on the table. Now, Sir, the object of the Reform Act of 1831, and of the previous Motions for Parliamentary Reform, was, I conceive, to guard against the following evil,—namely, the representation of thinly inhabited towns, and the non-representation of populous counties and large manufacturing towns. If any Gentleman will examine the Motions which were made from the year 1780 to the year 1831, he will find the evils which I have stated explained in different forms, and also that the different plans of Parliamentary Reform were almost exclusively directed to the removal of those evils. Those who remember the debates on the Reform Bill of 1831 will, doubtless, bear in mind that it was Schedule A by which small nomination boroughs were disfranchised, to which almost exclusive attention, both of the House and the country, was directed. Comparatively little attention was paid to the places to which the franchise was transferred; the great fight of that day turned on Schedule A. Although the plan was a comprehensive one, the principal attention of the House was directed to the disfranchisement of boroughs and the enfranchisement of boroughs and counties. The uniform £10 suffrage, then introduced with respect to boroughs, was accepted at the time as a sufficiently popular suffrage; but comparatively little contest took place on that question. I think it material, with respect to the present Bill, that we should know what was the effect of the change of the suffrage at the time of the Reform Bill, because the public attention has been almost exclusively directed to another effect of the Reform Act of 1831, and little attention has been paid to its effect upon the suffrage. A Return (No. 129) has been laid on the table which enables the House to test the figures I am about to read. The total number of voters in boroughs in England in 1830, the year before the Reform Bill, was 168,375; and the registered electors in boroughs in 1832-33, according to the first registration after the passing of the Bill, was 286,234. But to make the comparison fair it is necessary to compare only those boroughs which existed both before and after the Reform Bill; I deduct, therefore, the voters in the disfranchised and enfranchised boroughs. After making that deduction, and confining the comparison to boroughs existing both before and after the Act, the number of voters would stand thus:—in 1830, 162,640, and in 1832-33, 201,794; showing, under the operation of the Reform Act, an increase of 39,154. The operation, therefore, of that Act in increasing the total number of voters in boroughs, existing both before and after the Act, was not very considerable. There were many places in which under the unre-formed Act the number of voters was very great, owing to the scot-and-lot voters, and the effect of the Reform Bill in those boroughs was to diminish the total number of voters. In Scotland the measure of 1831 produced an entire change. With regard to Ireland the change was less considerable. The Act of Union, which was itself an important Reform Act, disfranchised no less than eighty-four boroughs. In attempting to form a judgment of the probable consequences of the Reform Bill now on the table, it is material that we should look to the Reform Act of 1831, for it is by doing that, and by comparing the period since 1831 with the previous period, that I ground to a great extent my support of the measure, believing the time has come when it is desirable that some further progress should be made in the same direction in which we made so great an advance in 1831. I will not weary the House with a reiteration of the admitted effects of the Reform Act of 1831. We know how extensive has been the legislation of Parliament since that period. There is scarcely a Department of legislation affecting the interests of England, of Scotland, or of Ireland, or of the Colonies, or of India, which has not undergone a most important and, I think I may say, a most wholesome change. Therefore, those who predicted in 1831 the most lugubrious and fatal consequences from the Reform Bill—consequences much more dangerous and calamitous than any which are anticipated from the present measure—were clearly wrong, and have been refuted by the operation of that measure. With regard to the internal state of the country, and to the relations in which the different classes of the community stand to one another, can any one who remembers the period in question entertain a doubt of the more sound and solid condition of the community at present, of there being a more firm and close union of classes, a greater loyalty to the Crown, a more wide and general diffusion of wealth than at the period to which I refer? Hon. Members whose memory goes back to that period will recollect the alarm which was seriously entertained at that period; but the predictions as to the injurious results of the Bill of 1831 went far beyond anything we hear as to the probable consequences of the present measure—far beyond the somewhat animated speech of the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Hardy), who, I must say, considerably exceeded the alarm expressed on his side of the House by hon. Gentlemen more entitled to command the attention of the House than even himself, at an earlier period of the debate. With regard to the union of classes, what has been the unquestionable result of the Reform Act of 1831? Do not let us underrate its importance, or lightly cast aside any measure the tendency of which is to bring within the constitution a large number of persons, and thus give them an interest in the existing state of things from which they are at present excluded. I dare say many Members may have been occupied in reading the last volume of an eminent historian of France, containing an account of the first downfall of Napoleon. If any person reads with care that interesting and admirably composed volume he must come to this conclusion, that if it had not been for the detestation with which the great body of the people of France regarded the wars in which the Emperor Napoleon had so long involved them—if it had not been for the almost universal unpopularity with which the Emperor was regarded by his own people at that period of the contest—an unpopularity to which the rank and file of the army alone formed an exception, for even marshals and generals were sighing for the return of peace—if it had not been that the population of France looked upon the Allies as their liberators from a tyranny which had become wellnigh intolerable, it would have been impossible even for the vast armies which entered Paris to capture that city. The natural inference from this important example is, that when we are looking out for security against invasion, and called on to assent to large Estimates for fortifying our shores, a far-sighted politician will not overlook the enormous advantage which, for the purpose of repelling invasion, is to be derived from the joint action of a united people. It is my firm conviction that nothing would tend more to promote a union of classes in this country as the Reform Act of 1832 has most powerfully tended to produce,—than a measure framed in a similar spirit, and carried to such limits which wisdom and prudence dictate. Sir, there is another circumstance which weighs heavily with me in recommending to the House to choose the present as a fit moment for passing this measure. That circumstance is, the absence of popular excitement. No doubt, the policy of the Gentlemen opposite is to alter nothing, to remain motionless as long as they can, never to move till they are driven, to wait till a popular agitation arise as strong as that of thirty years ago, and then, when they have no option, to legislate under coercion. That is the legitimate policy which the hon. Gentleman who last addressed the House would advocate; but it seems to me that those who wish that a safe and prudent measure should pass through the House ought to rejoice in the circumstance that they can now debate the matter freely; that there is no pressure from without; that they can act without Birmingham Unions, or any of those association that existed in 1832; without those thunders of The Times that became in that year proverbial, and that it will be possible for this House to go deliberately into Committee, to consider the Bill proposed by the Government, to adopt such portions as seem to them reasonable, and to modify such as they think require alteration. It is my belief that the measure is one calculated to guard against evils, now of slight magnitude, but increasing every year, and that for these purposes it is a safe and moderate measure. Its contents are simple—it is divided into three portions—each of which can be dealt with separately in Committee. It has been framed studiously so as not to complicate the subject—not to embarrass it with subordinate and irrelevant matter, but to raise in a distinct form for the decision of the House the three main subjects on which every Reform Bill must turn—namely, the enlargement of the franchise in counties, the enlargement of the franchise in boroughs, and the disfranchisement, or partial disfranchisement, of constituencies. I cannot understand the objection taken to this measure, at one time that it is revolutionary, and at another that it is an insignificant measure, a mere abortion. If an person carefully examines this Bill he will come to the conclusion that it deals with all the most important parts of the subject in a clear and decisive manner. There may be subordinate questions which may well be reserved for future consideration, but the Bill before the House exhausts all the more important parts of the subject. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. James) said the Bill was defective because it did not propose a revision of the system of registration. The system of registration is now established under an Act of Parliament distinct from the Reform Bill. It may be desirable that the system should be revised,

[Third Night.

Sir George Lewis

Sir George Lewis

but that can be done more conveniently by a separate measure, and, accordingly, the present measure leaves the system of registration exactly as it finds it, for it cannot be said that because we enlarge the suffrage any necessity exists for altering the system of registration. The hon. Member (Mr. Hardy) says the Bill is defective because it does not contain a lodgers' franchise. That is a question for the Committee rather than for the second reading, but the objection does not come with a good grace from those who complain that the Bill is unnecessarily enlarging the franchise; for the idea that this would be an aristocratic franchise and introduce a high class of persons is a mere chimera. The lodgers' franchise would not have that effect. The persons in lodging-houses who would obtain the franchise would belong mostly to the working classes—persons flitting about from one place to another, and less fitted in many respects for the exercise of the franchise than householders subject to residence and paying rates. A large portion of the speech of the hon. Gentleman opposite was an argument against any extension of the borough franchise; but, if I understood the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire last Session, he stated that the Earl of Derby's Government were prepared to assent to an extension of the borough franchise—therefore, the hon. Gentleman is in complete antagonism with the leader of his party on the principles of maintaining the borough franchise unchanged. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) in bringing forward his Bill stated that, according to his views, there would be an addition of 500,000 to the constituency. The late Government did not produce any statistical data to support this statement, and it is my belief that the estimate of the right hon. Gentleman was a mere conjecture. At all events the present Government do not allege that their Bill will add a number at all approaching 500,000 to the existing constituency. According to the best calculations which I am able to make of the probable addition to the borough electors, I do not place it at much more than 160,000. At all events, the calculation of my noble Friend when he introduced the Bill, that the number would be 190,000 erred on the side of excess; as from a paper now on the table, there is no reason to expect that for the present the addition will amount to 190,000. That is my opinion, founded on the most careful investigation. As to the counties, there is a Return moved for by the hon. Member for Surrey (Mr. L. King) which limits the number of persons rated at £10 and under £50, at 415,517; but it is necessary to make large deductions in order to arrive at a probable estimate of the increase of voters in counties. The first deduction I have to make is 15 per cent in respect of female occupiers, non-payment of poor rates and assessed taxes, insufficient residence and double residence, this gives a deduction of 62,327. The second deduction gives those who are entitled to vote as freeholders, copyholders, and leaseholders, who are already included in the 415,517 as persons rated between these two amounts at £10 and as under £50. On the best calculation we are able to make, that number is not less than 50 per cent. This will make a deduction of 195,411. If you add, therefore, 15 per cent for the one ground of deduction and 50 per cent for the other, the total will be 257,738, which, being deducted from the 415,517 rated at £10 and under £50, leaves for the county electors an addition of 157,779 electors. Adding that to the number of borough electors, the total estimated addition of electors under the present Bill will be 321,913. Putting both numbers at the highest estimate that would be at all fair, the total estimated addition both to counties and boroughs under the present Bill falls short of 400,000 electors. Well, Sir, these are the two main objects of the Bill. The number of borough voters added to the constituency in England under the last Reform Act was not great. In the county constituency no change, or scarcely any change, was proposed. [Lord JOHN RUSSELL: The copyholders.] The Chandos Clause gave a vote to occupiers of £50, but that was the only enlargement which the county constituency underwent. The two main objects of the present Bill are to enlarge the county and borough franchise, and thus supply what seems a defect, not in the sense of a fault, but an imperfect enactment in the Reform Bill of 1831. The next object of the Bill is the disfranchisement and transfer of seats. Under that head a complaint has been made that this Bill is deficient, and undoubtedly it does not go the length of the last measure of 1831, of which the disfranchisement of seats was the main—I do not say the exclusive object. I think the House will see that the circumstances of the country with respect to small boroughs are entirely altered since that time.

There were then a considerable number of boroughs that were close in the strictest sense of the word. They had scarcely any voters, and these few were in absolute dependence upon the patrons of the boroughs. The number of voters in some of the present boroughs may be small, but there are none in that condition. I beg to call the attention of the House to the numbers of the voters in a few boroughs in 1830. Banbury had 18 voters, Bramber 17, Buckingham 13, Calne 19, Gatton 7, Launceston 17, Malmesbury 13, Marlborough 11, St. Michael's 7, Old Sarum 11, Winchelsea 11, Yarmouth 11. Old Sarum, indeed, if we take literally Mr. Burke's expression, that "it had more representatives than voters," had somewhat increased. But these places may be really said to have been boroughs without voters. That is not the case now. There may be small boroughs under the influence of the property of one or several persons, but there is not a single borough which at a time of strong popular feeling might not exercise a choice in the selection of its representatives. The four smallest boroughs—Arundel, Honiton, Ashburton, and Lyme Regis—have a joint population of 13,123, and the electors number 841. The House will see that there can be nothing more delusive than to put upon the same footing the nomination boroughs of 1830, and what are called nomination boroughs now. Her Majesty's Government have determined not to propose a disfranchisement on a large scale in the present Bill, but to limit it to no very considerable number of seats, and in selecting the places of disfranchisement they have followed the example of the Bill of the late Government—which has been so much praised to-night by an hon. Gentleman who we might have supposed would not have been a great admirer of it—by drawing a line of population, and taking away one Member with regard to all the boroughs beneath that line. There were strong grounds for adopting that course, one of which is that, although the list includes twenty-five boroughs, there is, for the most part, a remarkable uniformity in all those boroughs disfranchised of one Member beneath the line of 7,000 population. In order to explain that briefly I will call attention to four boroughs that had in 1851 a population of more than 6,000 and less than 7,000. They are—Devizes, 6,554; Chippenham, 6,283; Huntingdon, 6,219; Ripon, 6,080. The number of electors (minus the freemen) on the register was in 1859-60—Devizes, 337; Chippenham, 375; Huntingdon, 335; Ripon, 343. These are among the most populous boroughs in the list to be disfranchised. I will now take four boroughs having from 4,000 to 5,000 inhabitants—Leominster, Richmond, Harwich, and Totness. The number of electors, omitting freemen, on the register of last year was—Leominster, 385; Richmond, 338; Harwich, 316; Totness, 314. There is, therefore, a considerable uniformity of character in the number of electors in the boroughs below 7,000, notwithstanding the diversity of their population. It will also be seen that among the boroughs now returning one Member are some that have as many electors as others returning two Members. There are five boroughs now returning one Member—Liskeard, 437 voters; Launceston, 430; Horsham, 380; Thirsk, 449; Reigate, 588. Take next five boroughs returning two Members—Honiton, 283 voters; Thetford, 217; Wells, 257; Andover, 247; Knaresborough, 266. The result is, that with regard to boroughs having a population of less than 7,000 there is no remarkable diversity, and it is fair to place them on the same level in having one Member. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone says there are certain absurd results to which this rule has led, as there are some towns with a larger population than 7,000 which have a smaller number of electors than those below 7,000. The inference was that we ought to have taken, not population, but the number of voters; but if we had taken that test of the number of electors, we should have been told that we had committed precisely the same absurdity with respect to population. We should have been told that the population of these towns was greater, although the number of electors was less, and the same objection with an inverse argument would have been made if we had taken the rule of the number of electors that is now taken to the rule of population. The principle of population is fair, and having been adopted by the late Government it cannot be said that we have been actuated by a feeling of partiality in adopting it also. I cannot help thinking, therefore, that when the subject is examined any other alternative principle which might be proposed would be found to be open to as great, if not greater, objection than that which is embodied in the Bill. But there is also another reason why it appears to me it would not be expedient to fix upon the number of electors as a standard. If we were to do so we should be asked why it was that we proposed to disfranchise certain places in accordance with the number of existing electors when by the Bill itself we proposed to enlarge that number. I am, under these circumstances, strongly of opinion that the House will find on investigating the matter that no principle preferable to that upon which we have proceeded can be adopted. The main ground on which we base the present disfranchising Schedule is that there are no considerable unenfranchised places to which an additional Member is not added. But then it may be said that stronger claims might be pointed out on the part of other localities than those which are put forward by the position of the particular places whose representation we propose to extend. It may be contended that an additional Member ought to be given to the Tower Hamlets and to Salford, and I readily admit that if those two boroughs stood apart from other towns the demand made on their behalf would not be unreasonable. It must, however, be borne in mind that the Tower Hamlets forms a portion of London, and that its representation cannot be taken as an isolated fact, but must be regarded as involved in the question whether the metropolis is adequately represented. That is a point, no doubt, deserving of consideration, and one with respect to which we may reverse the decision at which the Government have arrived. That decision was, however, come to after due examination, and I believe the more the matter is considered the more undesirable will it seem to make any addition to the representation of the metropolis beyond that of giving a Member each to Kensington and Chelsea. Salford stands in a similar position with the Tower Hamlets, inasmuch as it also constitutes a portion of another large city (Manchester), to which we propose that an additional Member should be given. The hon. Member who spoke last condemns, I may here observe, the conferring the right to return an additional number of Members on large towns, contending that such a course would ultimately lead to the adoption of the opinions of the hon. Member for Birmingham, who thinks it expedient that such places should have six or eight Members. The hon. Member evidently thinks that would be the first step on the path to perdition, but the argument that, because we advance a certain distance, we are bound to follow up our onward movement to the remote conclusions which those who hold certain opinions may deem right, involves a style of reasoning which I thought had long since been exploded in this House. Besides, while objecting to the third Member being given to Manchester or Liverpool, the hon. Member said nothing against our adding a third Member to a long list of counties and even divisions of counties. But to return to the case of Salford, I may remark that if we were to give to that borough another Member, it might be very fairly urged that it formed part of Manchester, and that we should in reality be giving two additional representatives to that city, whereas we are giving only one to Liverpool. Such, then, were the grounds upon which we dealt with Salford, which, if it were a separate town, would stand on an entirely different footing; but if the House should dissent from the justice of that view, the point is one which can be otherwise disposed of in Committee. I have, in alluding to it, been simply actuated by the desire to show that the Government have manifested no caprice or levity in dealing with it as they have done. On the subject of the transfer of seats I can only say that we do not seek to ignore the existence of certain anomalies. We have not endeavoured to produce a system perfectly symmetrical. Our object has been to leave the Constitution substantially as we found it, removing its more patent defects, and acting in the spirit of those maxims which have been rightly extolled by the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Hardy),—maxims sufficiently trite in this House, for they were originally properly directed against those who framed paper constitutions during the French revolution, not destined to last two months—maxims of which the truth cannot be disputed, but which are totally inapplicable to a cautious and prudent measure like that of Her Majesty's Government, the details of which, should any one of them be thought to go beyond the limits of discretion, it is competent for this House to amend. The representative system, everybody must admit, is mainly founded on three important elements—population, property, and intelligence. Hon. Members, on whichever side of the House they may sit, do not, I apprehend, wish that that system should rest on any one of these elements, but desire it should be founded on a combination of the three. In addition to these, however, there is another to which I trust the House of Commons will always firmly adhere, inasmuch as it ought, I contend, to be recognized in every wise system of representation—I allude to locality. The people of every district, however unimportant in respect of population or wealth it may be, have certain interests and feelings in common which would not be represented in this assembly if it were to be mixed up with an aggregate constituency of great extent. The poorer and more remote districts of Scotland and Wales, and the North of England and Ireland, ought not, therefore, to be overlooked in any judicious arrangement of our representative system. In illustration of this principle—that of giving adequate representation to local interests, which might otherwise be overlooked in the pressure of a great population—and which I regard as one of cardinal importance, I will for a moment suppose the opposite rule to be carried out to its fullest extent. I will suppose the whole system of local representation abolished, and that all the 652 Members of this House were elected by a list, all the electors of the country voting for that list. The result would be that two election Committees sitting in London would each propose a list of names for adoption by the electors, the whole body of whom would vote for all those names. In that case the electors would be unable to make any individual choice, and the political party predominating in the country would elect the House of Commons, without any mixture or modification, consisting exclusively of Members of one or the other party. They would be elected under the influence of some strong popular feeling prevailing at the moment, and would proceed to accomplish their objects without check or obstacle, without any of those securities for fair discussion and good legislation which the present system of local representation affords. It seems to me, if we could conceive the House of Commons elected on that principle, a mode of Government and system of legislation would be introduced so intolerable that in a very short time addresses would come up to Her Majesty imploring her to declare herself a dictator and put an end to a popular rule impossible to endure. I put this to illustrate by an extreme case what would be the probable effects of the total destruction of the local system of representation. I do not wish to go to the other extreme, with the system of locality; but I must impress on the House my opinion that no sound system of representation can exist that does not to a great extent, even with regard to towns of moderate magnitude, recognize the principle of a local franchise. I have detained the House at great length; but I am particularly desirous to lay before it the authentic grounds on which this measure may be defended. The moment is favourable to calm deliberation within these walls, and throughout the country there is a reasonable estimate of the measure itself; the time is peculiarly fitted for the consideration of a wholesome measure of reform and a wise decision on the part of this House upon it. I trust, whatever may be the fate of the Bill, whether it ultimately receives the sanction of Parliament or fails to secure it, that, at all events, this House will meet it fairly; that we may have a fair stand up fight upon it; that no attempt will be made to defeat a measure of this magnitude by delay, by introducing dilatory Motions, or attempts to discuss other measures at unnecessary length, in order to prevent its consideration. Though rumours have reached me of intentions to adopt these tactics against the Bill, and pursue a policy of delay which I will not dignify with the name of Fabian, I cannot believe that any large number of Members of this House will combine in support of a course so ignoble, and so little suited to its character and dignity. Let it be observed that the whole month of June can be devoted to the consideration of the Bill in Committee; if a month will not suffice for that consideration, it is scarcely possible to conceive any measure of reform simple enough to receive the assent of the House at all. If the final decision of the House is given at the beginning of July it will afford full time for the discussion of the measure in the House of Lords. It is impossible, therefore, for any one who considers the state of the Session to say there is not ample time for the consideration of the Bill. In fact, it is impossible to conceive circumstances more favourable for the introduction of so ample a measure, and, as such, I trust it will receive the sanction and hearty support of this House.

Sir George Lewis

[Third Night.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU admitted that the measure was a simple one; but it would be found very difficult to carry any simple theory of popular representation into effect without creating numerous contradictions and anomalies, and meeting with various complications. But as we are called upon to pass judgment on this measure it would be the simplest course to consider the effects of the Reform Bill of 1832—which he believed were very different from those the right hon. Gentleman had enumerated—and thus to arrive at some theory to guide our judgment of the present measure. He did not oppose it merely from party feeling nor because it emanated from the opposite side of the House. The Conservative principle was not one of blind and indiscriminating resistance to all change and Reform. On the contrary, it welcomed changes that added to the vigour and strength of the Constitution. Conservatives are only pledged to maintain the institutions transmitted to them by their ancestors, and to oppose those revolutionary changes that tended to subvert the order and destroy the balance of the Constitution. He did not deny that great good may have been done by the Reform Bill of 1832; but it did not follow that a measure that was good then would be good now, nor that a constant repetition of good measures might not work harm. That which has been successful in remedying an evil, may, by being frequently administered, engender the opposite evil. A settler in a new country might improve the land by draining the sour soil and cutting away the thick and tangled brush-wood; but he might continue to drain till the soil became parched and arid, and to cut down the trees till there would be no shade nor shelter against the scorching summer's sun. The noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) had lowered the franchise once; if he made it any lower there would be no defence left against the fickleness of popular opinion, or the heat of popular fury. When the first Reform Bill was passed, there was much agitation and disturbance; in several towns there were riots and tumults. Throughout the country there was disquietude and alarm because Charles X. had just been hurled from the throne; it was said that the “only chance for the safety of England was a concession to public opinion”; and the Reform Bill was wrung from the fears of a reluctant legislature, and justified on the ground that it was to “satisfy the people.” It could not therefore be defended on principle, as it was based on temporary expediency. The present, however, was said to be a favourable moment for a change, because the public mind was calm and there was no agitation. It would be more true to say there was an utter apathy and indifference to the measure. No one wished for Reform; few hoped for any good to result from it, but many feared what its consequences might be. The noble Lord (Lord

Sir George Lewis

John Russell), in a letter to the electors of Stroud, described the organic change that took place twenty-eight years ago as a "final and permanent settlement of a great constitutional question." But was any one satisfied with that arrangement? Had it been final or permanent? It had been continually doctored. One quack scheme after another had been proposed to amend it, and they were now asked to model the whole system anew. Up to the passing of the last Reform Bill the old Constitution was most warmly defended, because this time-honoured institution was venerated and admired. But this reformed Constitution has not found a defender; at least no one has entered on the books, an Amendment to the second reading of this Bill. The friends of Reform did not seem to care for the Constitution the Reform Bill created; for every novelty which is introduced, and every change which is effected in an ancient institution must destroy the veneration with which it is regarded. Yet attachment to the Constitution is a bond of union for us; it was that which (under God's providence) has preserved us for centuries, while foreign Governments have gradually died and decayed, or been suddenly destroyed by violence. The effect of the Reform Bill was observable, immediately after its passing, during the Grey and Melbourne Administrations in a certain pliancy, and giving way to the suggestions of the opposition, and the demands of the populace. Yet the moral influence of a Government depends on a conviction of its sincerity; mutual compromises in a Cabinet destroy its ascendancy. Since the passing of the Reform Bill, and the consequently increased pressure from without, Government has necessarily become a system of compromises, and the art of governing consists in the skilful adaptation of measures to secure the popular favour. The Government have to consider, not so much the merit of a measure, as the practicability of carrying it through the House; they are obliged to think how this party will receive it, how those below the gangway will view it, and what Dissenters will say to it. The principal consideration is not the right and wrong of a Bill, but the calculations for conciliating favour and support. Thus it is that public men come to take for their guide, not principles, but the mere expediency of the moment; and hence the shifts to which they resorted and the inconsistencies they committed. Another evil was, that hon. Members were too apt to sink into mere local delegates, and to forget that they represented the interests of the nation at large. This want of fixed principles it is which breaks the House into sections, which destroys party and prevents large majorities; for there can be no great party without a great principle to bind it. But now parties are divided not so much by differences of conviction as by selfish interests and personal rivalry. To the old unreformed House men were sent to watch over great principles; but now constituencies neglect great principles and send their representatives to carry certain specific measures, in favour of which they have happened to contract a prejudice. Formerly two volumes of Hansard were sufficient to contain the debates of a Session; but now the flashy speeches which Members made to please their constituents filled as many as four or five volumes a Session; and to please their constituents Members often fear to declare their real opinions. In 1848 the noble Lord said the "House of Commons always responded quickly and readily to public opinion;" and, in truth, it did so only too quickly and too readily; for Members did not act sufficiently upon their own unbiassed convictions, but were under the pressure of their constituencies. If the House was the highest deliberative assembly, it ought to lead and not be led by public opinion; it should govern, and not be governed, if it really consists of the wisest of the nation. But that this is not the case is seen by what the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) said in the Debate on Church Rates.

"Looking at the state of public opinion out of doors he was obliged to vote contrary to the way in which for thirty years he had spoken and voted. He did this not because he had changed his opinions, not because he had come to view the question in another light, because of public opinion."

And, again, when introducing this Bill, he said, speaking of the representation of minorities—

"As that proposition was not very popular, although I think it was a fair and just one, I shall not attempt to renew it upon the present occasion."

He (Lord J. Russell) acknowledged that it was fair, but he rejected it because it was not popular; he confessed that he did not what was just, because it did not meet with favour out of doors. He did not say this in blame of the noble Lord; on the contrary, his argument was stronger by not doing so; but he said that, if the noble Lord found himself controlled in that way, what must be the case of Members of less weight and influence?—what must others be forced to do, when even the noble Lord was driven to such miserable shifts to obtain favour, and had to sue on bended knee for leave to hold his power. Occasionally a measure disagreeable to almost every party was entertained in deference to noisy opinion out of doors, advanced amidst a hot debate to a second reading, and then mysteriously burked, it had achieved an inglorious triumph worse than defeat, and all the talking was mere waste of time. Strenua nos exercet inertia—they were exceedingly busy in accomplishing nothing. All these shifts and inconsistencies have sprung from Reform; for too much weight was attached to the opinion of the crowd, who had neither knowledge to understand nor calmness to consider any great question properly; and Members, instead of receiving support from their constituents, were hampered and tyrannized over in proportion to the importance of the borough they represented. When the Bill of 1832 was passed, the wildest expectations of the blessings it would confer were entertained by its supporters; great promises were lavished on it at its birth, the grandest predictions were hazarded. For instance, it was to extinguish bribery and corruption; but had it done so? They had only to look at the returns of the boroughs convicted of bribery since 1832 to see that it had not. On the contrary, bribery had gone on increasing year by year. They had only to look at the return of the expenses of candidates to see that it is he who has the most open hand and most bountiful heart who achieved success; the winning candidate was always he who had paid most highly. They had only to remember Norwich, and Wakefield, and Gloucester, where reigned the “pure atmosphere of liberal boroughs” to see the same. Now how did bribery begin? Hallam says that “in the general elections of 1747 and 1754, bribery was first begun in earnest by the rich capitalists, who sought to counteract the influences of the territorial aristocracy.” These tactics were attended with success, and thus the trading classes carried the Reform Bill; the nomination boroughs of the territorial aristocracy were disfranchised, and the power passed from the upper to the middle classes; and now, in order to secure your return for a borough, you must flatter the prejudices of the electors, or else use a systematic corruption.

[Third Night.

Lord Robert Montagu

So that Reform had left the representation “to men with the most accommodating consciences and the longest purses.” Then the Reform Bill, it was said, would lead to retrenchment and economy. “Peace, Reform, and Retrenchment” was the watchword of those days. Now has Reform induced retrenchment? Sir R. Peel said in March, 1850, that the House is attacked with alternate hot and cold ague fits of expenditure, and vacillates between the two extremes of a most lavish expenditure and a parsimonious, shabby thrift. Now during the ten years before 1832 the burden of taxation was lightened by £18,000,000 (I mean the balance between the taxes imposed and those remitted). But during the ten years after the Reform Act, it was only £4,000,000. It was during this period that the Whigs were in power; and the Governments of Lord Grey and Lord Melbourne established a permanent deficit, and it was not till the Conservative Administration of Sir Robert Peel that the deficit was removed and the industry of the country relieved from much burdensome taxation. So that these promises of retrenchment were not fulfilled by Reform, but by the opponents of Reform. These great expectations and sanguine hopes were therefore disappointed. Did Reform then succeed? If not, why try again a dangerous experiment which had already so signally failed? Or did it fail then merely because that particular Bill was framed in ignorance, and does it therefore require remodelling now? But perhaps this Bill would still more grievously disappoint any who entertain hopes of benefit as its result. Perhaps this Bill also is framed in ignorance and enveloped in uncertainty. In a machine if an alteration is proposed in some part, we should ask what would be the effect of this alteration and how it would influence the other parts. If we received no account of this matter, we should deem him but a sorry engineer; particularly if a similar experiment of his had failed before. But if he could not even tell us what evil he proposed to remedy, and on what principle the alteration was based, we should reject his proposal with scorn. Now we do not know the precise effect of this measure. We are not acquainted with the particular evils which the noble Lord by his Bill sought to remedy, or the anomalies which he proposed to remove; yet the noble Lord in his work on the British Constitution laid it down that “the chief maxim of a statesman should be not to propose more alterations than were necessary to cure the evil." On what principle was the proposed legislation to be based? What are the evils which he hopes to cure? What is the object to be sought? Were they to aim at producing an efficient Legislature, or were they merely to amuse themselves in creating constituencies; disfranchising some towns, and giving Members to others, clipping some boroughs and stretching others, after a Procrustean rule; and, in order to satisfy the fancy for symmetry and sameness, indulging in what he might fairly call "fancy franchises." The only legitimate object of Reform was to improve legislation by elevating the character of the House. Did hon. Members think their character was not so good as it might be? and is such a Bill as this calculated to elevate it? By lowering the franchise they were not elevating the character of the House, but merely conferring power on entirely new classes. Before giving power to the working classes, who were so numerous that any franchise which was low enough to take them in would give them the preponderance, and make them swamp all the other classes, they should have some security as to the mode in which those classes would employ it. The word "Reform" signified a departure from some original form, from some essential idea. Now what is the original form of the Constitution? What is the idea and object of representation? The hon. Baronet had mentioned three different theories on this subject, but he should be inclined to increase the number to five. The first was that the representation of the country ought to be according to the taxation paid. But this was not the system at present in vogue, for, according to return No. 491, published two years ago, he found that the assessed taxes in counties amounted to £1,062,564, and in boroughs to £803,986; at the same time the boroughs possessed twice as many representatives as the counties. The noble Lord admitted that taxation was not the principle of his Bill, for he said in framing the Bill he merely took into account the numbers that would be respectively added to the constituencies by lowering the franchise to different rates. The right hon. Baronet also declared that population seemed to Her Majesty's Government "the only preferable principle which can be adopted." Besides, the tendency of taxation at present was towards an income tax exclusively; and these new electors were precisely the persons who did not pay this tax at all. So that this Bill, so far from proceeding on the principle of taxation, virtually gives the representation to one class, and lays taxation on another. If taxation were adopted as the basis of representation, a man ought to be entitled, as in railways, banks, and other joint-stock undertakings, to a number of votes equal to the amount of property which he had at stake. Next was the theory that representation ought to depend on the possession of property, that the land ought to be represented; because that no stability or permanence can be expected, unless the electors have something at stake. That was the old Tory theory. [Cries of "No, no!" from the Opposition.] Well, whether it might be the theory of the party in the present day he would not pretend to say, but it was the principle under which our liberties had taken root and grown up. This was proved by an old Act, the 8th of Henry VI., c. 7, declaring "what sort of men shall be choosers, and who shall be chosen knights of the Parliament;" the preamble of which stated:—

"Whereas the elections have been made by very great, outrageous, and excessive number of people, of which most part was of people of small substance and of no value, whereof every of them pretended a voice equivalent with the most worthy knights and esquires, whereby riots and divisions among the gentlemen and other people shall very likely rise and be, unless convenient and due remedy be provided in this behalf, &c."

It was a little after this (in 1264) that burgesses of towns first had seats in Parliament; at this time the House consisted of knights of the shire only. This principle was carried to even a greater length, for in the same reign a petition was presented from the County of Huntingdon against the return of a Member of the name of Gimber on the ground that he was not a gentleman. The counties still choose their representatives from among the landed proprietors, while the towns select those who look after their local interests, or rather those who flatter their prejudices and corrupt their mobs. In the representation of counties the property element preponderates, in that of towns the element of numbers, and in that of the universities that of intellect and education. The third theory was first propounded by an eminent philosopher of the last generation, by one whose views many modern writers had adopted; he declared that a balance should be maintained between the party of permanence and the party of progression—that was to say, between the interests of landed property and those of the trading community. The noble Lord the Member for the City of London seems to have accepted this distinction in 1848, when he spoke of the "counties returning agricultural Members, and the large cities commercial Members, or representatives of the manufacturing interest." So, in 1831, he argued that "the last effect which the Reform Bill could have was to disturb the influence of the country gentlemen." Experience had illustrated the value of that prophecy. If another Reform Bill were now required, it must be, he presumed, to restore the balance which had been lost. If so, on which side was the preponderance? Proportion of representation at the present time in England and Wales is as follows:—The Members for boroughs amount to 337, while those for the counties are only 159. This difference of representation is not in accordance with the difference of value, for the rental of counties is £54,762,081; that of boroughs is only £31,315,595; the rateable value of counties is £46,103,215; that of boroughs is only £25,737,056. Nor is it in accordance with the population, for the population of counties is 9,865,061; while that of the boroughs is only 7,432,587. A return issued in 1858 gave the total of county constituencies at 504,065, but of these there were 95,471 who had merely borough qualifications, so that in manufacturing districts these electors, having chosen their own representatives in the boroughs, went out into the counties, where they overbalanced the voting and determined the elections likewise, so that the representation of the counties was even more circumscribed than he had already stated, and the preponderance is greatly in favour of the town populations. Lord Macaulay, who first acquired fame by his Reform speeches in that House, in an essay on Machiavelli, writes of the Italian States, that—

[Third Night.]

"Their early greatness and their early decline are principally to be attributed to the same cause—the preponderance which the towns acquired in the political system."

And this preponderance the last Reform Bill gave to our political system. The fourth theory was the liberal one; namely, that the representation should be distributed according to population. The popular notion of Reform was merely a reduction of franchise and a re-distribution of seats not according to any principle, but merely according to a sum in arithmetic. It held that all men had a right to share in the suf-

Lord Robert Montagu

rage; it was in accordance with this fourth theory that Mr. Hume in 1848 moved a Resolution declaring "that the apportionment of representation should be rendered more equal to population." This proposition—this liberal principle of representation—was resisted by the noble Lord (Lord John Russell), on the ground that "it is essential that those who have the franchise should be possessed of intelligence and independence;" and he said also that "much of the corruption arose from a want of the intelligence which is essentially necessary in a constituent body." He here adverts to a totally different ground and principle of representation, to which I will presently allude. The hon. Member for Birmingham assumed that representation should be according to population, adding that "the tide had already swept away the footmarks of the Liberals, while those of the Conservatives had long been submerged," (I quote from recollection); and he prophesied that the new Parliament, "after the passing of this Bill, would contain a still more powerful party, to demand a more extended Bill." I can fancy him using those words of Canning's:—

"Parties with us do not excite enough rage, Our boasted law I hate and curse,
Bad from the first, by age grown worse,
Oh, how I pant for universal suffrage."

Let me remind him that France established despotism by universal suffrage, while the liberties of England have grown up under a more aristocratic constitution. Moreover, this numerical system that a numerical majority is the only sound principle of Government, and that wealth, learning, and intellect must submit to mere numbers could not be carried out without falling into absurdities and contradictions. At the last election for South Derbyshire, 3,184 voters voted one way, and 3,185 the other; so that all the 3,184 had to submit to the casting vote of one man. It all hung upon his will. Mr. Hume laid it down that "every man ought to have a share in making the laws by which he was governed, and his having it or not having it constituted the sole difference between a free man and a slave." But these 3,184 could not be said to have any share in making the laws by which they were governed; so that, according to Mr. Hume's doctrine, the half of that constituency necessarily were all slaves. Again, the most advanced Liberals did not propose to give votes to women, paupers, or children, or lunatics, because they said they were not fit. This was of itself a departure from the ground of natural right, and the laying down of a qualification apart from it—that of fitness. Hence this doctrine is necessarily self-contradictory. Besides, the Liberals shrink from carrying out boldly the doctrine they proclaim. For if they took away Members from boroughs which were too small, they ought to give them to the counties, which, as he had shown already, were more populous than the boroughs; in fact, they ought to proclaim equal electoral districts (which, however, they knew very well the country would never put up with). For what equity is there in transferring representatives from one borough to another, except on the ground that a Member is worth exactly so many votes? Besides, if this democratic theory were carried out, it would indeed be most baneful; for it was the small boroughs which returned the best Members. [A laugh.] Well, there might be exceptions, but the large boroughs generally elected declaimers—men who had made themselves conspicuous by flattering the passions of the mob. Large boroughs are impatient of originality of thought and superiority of intellect; they prefer a safe mediocrity and commonplace; they cannot bear a Member to act independently on his own convictions. The moment he steps out of this region they reject him. On this principle Ledru Rollin, in the Paris election of 1848, advised the electors by all means to avoid returning men of ability and education. Lord John Russell, in bringing in this Reform Bill, when speaking in favour of small boroughs, said—

“You have, from time to time, seen men of the greatest ability, and fitted to render the greatest service to the country, but who, representing a great popular body, incur the momentary displeasure of their constituents, and are thereby deprived of their seats in Parliament. That, Sir, was what happened to Mr. Burke, because he contended for the great principles of liberty, both here and in Ireland, as well as in America.”

He instanced Lord Macaulay also. Sir John Cam Hobhouse is another instance. He was a warm Reformer; but he, unfortunately, distinguished himself above the commonplace, and was made Minister at War; and, therefore, he was immediately ejected from Westminster. The large boroughs of Birmingham and Rochdale have not elected ministers for war. The right hon. Member for Ashton, too, had lost his seat for a large constituency not long ago; the Member for Birmingham shared his fate, and our great Ambassador the Member for Rochdale had also been rejected by a great constituency at the same time. Even the noble Viscount at the head of the Government had met with similar treatment at one period of his career, as well as the right hon. Baronet the Member for Morpeth, and the Secretary of State (Sir G. C. Lewis). He had taken the trouble of drawing up a list of the most distinguished Members of the House, and, with very few exceptions, he found they all represented small boroughs. The hon. Member for Birmingham was, it might be said, an exception; but, though he would not presume himself to pass a judgment on that hon. Member, he would remind him that one greater than himself—the noble Lord the Member for the City—on one occasion used these words in reference to him:—

“What I have to find fault with in the hon. Member (Mr. Bright) and those who agree with him is, that they are so exceedingly narrow-minded. When we come to discuss large questions, such as concern the fortune of our Empire, then I see that they have an intellect and understanding bound up in such a narrow round that it is quite impossible to get them to understand the great principles on which our ancestors founded the Constitution of this country.”

MR. MACKINNON rose to order. He believed it was not competent to refer to former debates.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU apprehended that he was perfectly in order. It is out of order to refer to a debate of the same Session upon a different subject; but he was then referring to a debate of a former Session, and, he believed, on the same subject. But he felt he ought to apologize to the hon. Member for alluding to him. It was too much the fashion to have a shy at him; he had become the regular “Aunt Sally” of the House. He supposed it sufficiently proved, therefore, that this democratic theory of Representation, if carried out boldly, must not only lead to contradictions and absurdities, but must end in bane and detriment. Before passing to the fifth theory, it would be well to consider the Bill before the House, which was framed on the democratic theory. Now, by thus extending the franchise, what class of voters do you create? Are they educated or uneducated? Are their votes liable to be influenced? If so, to what influences will you thus add weight? To the moneyed classes, without land or home, without any permanence or tie to bind them to the country in which they were born, without that loyalty and patriotism which will remain unswayed by hope of gain or advantage? This large extension of the franchise does not extend admitted principles nor pretend to remove any anomalies ; but tends to subvert the present distribution of power, and to place it in the hands of the mob—to raise a mere scum to the surface—to enable the poor to tax the rich—the artizans who worked with their hands to place on those who sat still the burden of raising the Revenue—a power which they might not be tempted, perhaps, to use in quiet times, but which in times of excitement would hold out to them an irresistible temptation. According to a Return lately laid on the table, the number of electors rated in the counties above £50 was 198,163, and the number between £10 and £50 was 415,517. The number of electors on the register was 529,213, and subtracting from that the number of £50 voters would leave 331,050, the number of £10 voters and 40s. freeholders now on the register. Adding to that the number of new electors, it would be seen that there would be 746,567 voters below £50 to balance 198,163 £50 voters. In many boroughs, such as Manchester, Salford, Stoke, Bury, Bolton, Blackburn, Derby, South Shields, Gateshead, Warrington, Sheffield, Portsmouth, Stockport, Dudley, Ipswich, Yarmouth, &c., the new electors would outnumber the present electors ; in others, Wolverhampton, Walsall, Macclesfield, Preston—the new class would be twice as numerous as the old ; in Birmingham, to a constituency of 9,222 would be added 19,600 new electors, and in Kidderminster and Merthyr Tydvil the new class would be three times as numerous as the present constituency. As to the character of this new class of voters, in Liverpool a large number of £15 householders were excused the payment of their rates on account of their poverty, and yet 15,068 electors below £10 were now to be added to the constituency. Are the classes to whom you thus give preponderance more judicious than those who now possess it ? For the representation will thus be put in the hands of a new class ; the power will be as completely transferred as in a revolution. The present constituencies will be subordinated to those who now, for the first time, receive the franchise ; to a majority who are guided by a penny newspaper ; who will adjudicate questions without knowing, and prejudge without inquiry ; among whom evil is contagious and self-restraint but little prevails, to whom passion is more seductive than truth and justice. By all means give representatives to the working classes as classes, or create “ pot-walloping ” boroughs again for them (as there were before 1832) ; or, if you must have universal suffrage, try the experiment in Birmingham but do not give to any class the preponderance, let not any body have overwhelming influence. He had no distrust of the working classes ; on the contrary, he thought they had a perfect right to be represented, but they ought not to gain paramount importance. No one class should be allowed to rule all other classes. The working classes are generally moderate and reasonable and in possession of wonderful knowledge, considering the opportunities they have. But certain Gentlemen had on the other side professed no very exalted opinions of the intelligence of the working classes, particularly on economical questions. They accuse them of believing that the rate of wages depends upon the will of the employer, and that the price of provisions depends on the will of the seller, and that the wealth of the capitalists is somehow subtracted from the workman’s pocket. If you accuse them rightly, you should not give them the franchise ; if you accuse them falsely, you condemn your own conduct in the late strikes. Agricultural labourers were attached to the country gentlemen, but the working classes did not entertain the same feelings towards their employers. In cotton-mills, mines, collieries, and factories, you may see the relations of the workmen towards the capitalists, they were ready to sacrifice their comfort and their savings, and to see their families ruined and their children die, in a fierce struggle with the capitalists who employed them. They had many defeats to avenge, and much despotism of capital to repay. The Reform Act of 1832 took the power from the aristocracy and gave it to the trading community ; this Bill takes it from them and gives it to the working classes. The employers would perhaps be the first victims marked for destruction, if once they evoked a spirit and a power which they could neither command nor control. Look at other nations where they ‘ enjoy ’ such a franchise, and learn from their experience. In Sydney, the other day, the Ministry had fallen by a large adverse majority upon an educational question. The leader of Opposition who came into office had no compact party, and found it hard to maintain his ground, and was forced to accept defeats on minor points, and the Speaker had resigned because his health was affected by the long and disorderly sittings of the Assembly. In Melbourne according to the account in The Times—

[Third Night.]

Lord Robert Montagu

“In Melbourne and Sydney ministry has succeeded ministry with inconceivable rapidity, till at last the normal state of things seems to be that the Opposition is stronger than the Government, and that the first act a Minister ought to perform on attaining office, is to prepare to leave it. A democratic franchise, and a division of electoral districts made with the most obvious regard to the principle of numbers, have created assemblies of which we will say nothing worse than that the wealthiest and the best educated colonists are gradually withdrawing from any participation in their proceedings.

Where there was plenty of land to be had, and freedom for the discontented, no Established Church to raise their spleen, no nobility to excite their envy, and no restriction on the suffrage to call up rancour, democracy was much less dangerous than it would be in this country. The South American Republics were renowned for wars, conspiracies, turmoils, and bad government. Yet a great empire was among them, the Empire of Brazil, as a standing testimony against Republics. In the United States there is plenty of waste land, and high wages, and no great separation between class and class; but yet, with such a suffrage, is life and property secure? Why have they vigilance committees? In New York obnoxious persons were shot, and the perpetrators of such deeds escaped because the votes of these bands of ‘rowdies’ were so valuable as to secure the owners from receiving offence. Honest men abstained from voting because they would not expose themselves to insult when they knew that their votes were of no value. In France democracy had obliterated all distinction of classes, and the result was a pervading despotism. Napoleon I., when at St. Helena, threw on Necker the blame of the subsequent calamities, because he said that doubling the representation of the tiers état was the proximate cause of the two chambers being merged into one assembly. The noble Lord by his Bill would more than double the tiers état in this country. Besides democracy can never be permanent; those who taste it cannot endure it, but seek refuge in despotism. The Republic of France was administered by an eminent man, Cavaignac, but democracy took refuge in Louis Napoleon. He was elected President by 6,500,000 votes, and Emperor by 8,000,000 votes. Yet they knew his opinions; for his Idées Napoléoniennes was certainly opposed to republicanism and democracy. Of course, it was impossible to impute bribery or intimidation, for the votes were given by the vaunted Ballot. This Bill would transfer power to a different class, and thus give every Member a fresh democratic impulse by increasing the number of those who exerted pressure upon him. Constituents would dictate to their delegates; these would flatter the prejudices of their constituents, and Government would curry favour with the multitude. This House would be swayed by numbers without regard to the magnitude of interests. They would find what a capricious master the public is, and how apt to run into extremes. Such a distribution of power would cause violent opinions to prevail. In quiet times the wealthy would rule, but in seasons of agitation, the power would fall to demagogues, and they would see in our days the truth of what Thucydides said of the Republic of Athens “they took for just that which pleased, and for honourable that which profited.” Even since the last Reform Bill they had seen the effects of popular clamour. Members in private spoke one way, but openly they voted another. He believed they were guided less by principles than by envy of power and by interest of party. They voted for a Budget which they all condemned, and spoke for a Reform which in private they all concurred in damning. Such was the opinion of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, who, in a debate on the Ballot, said he would like to see the experiment of the Ballot tried in that House on that question. The noble Lord meant that there were those who voted in favour of the Ballot who would vote differently if there were the secrecy of the ballot to shield them from the observation of their constituents. He would like to submit the Reform Bill to a vote by Ballot, and he would undertake to say that there would be only two votes for it. He contended that the extension of the franchise was not only bad, but undesired. The number of electors in large boroughs who polled was only 60 per cent, and in small boroughs only 90 per cent, the non-voters being the most thoughtful men, whose votes were most worth having. During the general election of 1852,

		On register.
In Berks only	1971	polled out of 5,129
N. Northampton	614	„ 3,900
Middlesex	8,721	„ 14,610
E. Surrey	8,784	„ 18,181

[Third Night.

Similarly in W. Kent, S. Northamptonshire, &c. In boroughs the facts are the same; only half the constituencies came to the poll in Dorchester, Cheltenham, Southampton, Leeds, Westminster, City of London, Finsbury, Tower Hamlets, &c., &c. General Election of 1857:—

Beds. only 2,881	polled out of 4,376	on register.
Berks "	2,948	" 4,945 "

Only half the constituencies polled in E. Kent, Macclesfield, Derby, Norwich, Nottingham, Banbury, Finsbury, City, Tower Hamlets, Lambeth, Southwark. In Ireland the same neglect of the franchise is apparent. The disregard of the franchise is more apparent from the following particulars. In Birmingham there are 11,860 £10 householders who have not cared to place themselves on the register; and yet there are only 9,222 on the register, and 19,600 householders below £10 are to be added to the constituency. In Liverpool there are 18,779 on the register, and 20,951 £10 householders and others qualified who have not placed themselves on the register. In Marylebone 20,000 qualified persons have not registered themselves; and yet the number on the register is 21,000, and of these only one-fourth cared to vote in the severe contest of last year. An actual majority of those qualified did not care to be in a position to vote. There was the same disregard of the present franchise in a host of other boroughs, and also in Ireland. The payment of taxes did not insure good government, nor yet mere numbers, nor property, nor yet the balance of power. The fault was that an educated man had not more votes than an ignorant man. The few learned men in a constituency were swamped. The vote of the Secretary of State had no more weight than that of a clown or shallow-pated demagogue. Yet the matured and deliberate judgment of such a man was better than the hasty opinions of 10,000 bores. It was according to nature that the strong should always rule. In the early stages of society, in rude and barbarous times, it was the strong in muscle, strong in wisdom, because might was right, theory of reproach should guide measure? It remembered that a law and rule was, of course, headed justice, or, rather, reason was the consciousness of a rule independent of the human will. They could not make laws; all they could do was to make statutes, which meant to declare or assert laws. Law-making was merely the search after justice; laws were merely the declarations of reason apart from passion or interest, and depended neither on the will of the Legislature nor on the opinions of those who elected the Legislature. There was, therefore, no sovereignty in the people, nor sovereignty in any class. The right to rule did not reside in one class nor in another class, but depended on whether a person was guided by reason and was uninfluenced by prejudice and passion. Tyranny, on the other hand, meant merely the rule of a person, or of a class, or of a people, when not guided by reason, but when turned about by caprice. They could govern men only through their reason, and gain their confidence only by moral ascendancy. And as the will of the people could not change the nature of truth and right, the electors might not say, as had been assumed they might, "Such is our will, so this shall be the law." They had only to judge as to which candidate was the most influenced by reason and least by prejudice, for that man had most right to sovereignty whose words and actions were in the highest degree the inspirations of reason. Moreover, to say that "no one is bound to obey laws to which he has not given his consent, and which he has not had a share in making," amounted to what the Americans called "the divine right of insurrection," and assumed that law is not independent of his will. If this were true, then it would follow that the only object of Government was to put into effect the will of the people—that Government was a mere executive. Constituencies, then, should not be formed of those who merely claimed a right to a share in the representation, but those should be selected who would best discharge their legislative duties; for the franchise was not a property, it was not a right, but a trust for the public benefit. Every man had a right to the best Government, but to nothing else. And it was educated and intellectual men who would elect representatives that would elevate the tone of the House, that would be unshackled by fear of constituencies, and be unbending towards popular favour. In order not to swamp the few learned in every constituency; that one class might not override another, let every class have its own representatives, let trades-unions, the clergy of dioceses, each of the learned bodies, doctors, retired officers, and tradesmen have their own representatives; but let no one particular class have entire sway as was now proposed in this Bill. Why should they be called upon to repeat an experiment which had failed already? They should first, at least, obtain the information necessary to secure a more successful issue. The former Reform Act had destroyed party, and produced unstable Governments, and had allowed expediency to usurp the throne of right. It had been the cause that Governments represented only majorities, because they could not represent principles. It had made constituencies act as drags on the straightforwardness of their Representatives. These were some of the effects of Reform. Moreover, it did not fulfil the expectations which were entertained of it; for bribery had increased, and the expenditure of the State had grown to great excess. Could any one, then, assert that the Reform Bill of '32 had met with success? And was such another Bill wanted at the present time? Would it now elevate the tone of the House, when its only effect before had been to lower that tone? The representation of the country should not depend on taxation, nor on the possession of property; and the theory that it should depend on population, if honestly carried out, must result in absurdities and contradictions; nay, even in insubordination and ruin. Other countries had proved this by their sad experience; and in this country they had a warning in the different character of the representatives of small and large boroughs. He said, then, that a law, independent of our will, encircled us, and that the only business of the Legislature was to see and declare what that law was; that the only business of constituencies was to elect those who were the most guided by it; and that the best franchise was that which would most secure this object. Yet now, even in the present state of things, selfish interests were the mainsprings of politics; and these were so evenly balanced, that those who were caught by beer could generally turn the scale in an election. Moreover, the continuous growth of bribery proved that electors did not vote on public grounds, but valued the franchise only as a means of forwarding their own petty interests. And when the franchise was lower than it was now, who then would be the favoured of the constituencies? It would be those endowed with glibness and shallowness; those who could lie most smoothly and flatter most pleasantly; those who could stoop the lowest to court the prejudices of their constituents at the expense of public interests. These new electors would never choose the clever financier, nor the sound political economist, to represent them. They could not even judge of a man's financial abilities or political acumen. No! They would rather fix their choice on the indefatigable bore of the borough, on the man with the narrowest views of things, and the most unbounded admiration of himself; for, as was already the case in America, the most worthy men would abstain from a franchise which had been so far debased, and would leave the power to be abused by that class which now, for the first time, obtained it. When there was no evil which called for cure, and no abuse which cried for redress, were we wantonly to alter under the guise of amending, and wilfully to obliterate admitted principles under the name of reforming institutions? When the present franchise was so large that not half the constituencies cared to exercise it, were we to increase it yet further by adding those who would override the present electors. If we did so, then "Moderate Liberals" would no longer be heard of, and "Whig" would be a name of the past; for the floor of that House would become the arena for the struggles of faction like those which disgraced the Senate of Washington.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, the speech of the noble Lord had certainly been full of declamation against the Bill. Nothing could be worse than his opinion of it, and his opinion was confirmed by that of every Gentleman on the opposite side of the House. The hon. and learned Member for West Gloucestershire (Mr. Rolt) had denounced it as all that was horrible and detestable. The hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Hardy) had followed in the same strain, and charged hon. Gentlemen on his (Mr. Berkeley's) side with cowardice as being afraid to utter their real opinions of the Bill. That charge of cowardice should not remain upon him. But it struck him as surprising that such eloquent and bitter speeches should be made with no result whatever. It seemed unnatural that there should be indulgence in such declamation without the second reading being opposed. Yet so it was. He found himself in this position that he could not agree that the measure was a Reform Bill. It had no pretence to be called a Reform Bill in the common acceptation of the word. It might be termed a measure of Reform. It was a forward measure, and as such he was compelled in consistency to give it his support; but he entered his protest against its being regarded as a measure of finality or a measure that would put a stop to all questions of reform for the next twenty-five years, as had been said. He objected to the Bill simply on account of its deficiencies. It might be called a measure of progress, but as a measure of Reform it was the most infinitesimal dose ever offered to the House. He took it as he would the globule of a homœopathic practitioner, and he swallowed it in the full belief that it was calculated to do him neither good nor harm. There were three points which a Bill having any pretence to be a measure of reform ought to have dealt with, and as the present Bill did not deal with them, he considered that it failed in its character as a Reform measure. The first objection which he took was, that an extension of the franchise was made to a class of men less calculated, if possible, than the present constituencies to bear up against the effects of intimidation and corruption, while the obvious remedy against intimidation and corruption—the Ballot—was denied to them. The objection he took to the present Reform Bill was exactly the objection taken by Lord Macaulay and Mr. Grote to the Reform Bill of 1832, who considered it a failure because protection was denied to the electors. The House had heard a great deal about the absence of electors from the poll, but how often had he shown by evidence that the electors of this country were subject in voting to pains and penalties, which they did not think proper to incur? The non-attendance of electors at the poll was not caused by apathy, but the dread of consequences; thousands rather than vote against their consciences, refused to vote at all? The next point to which he should advert was the absence of any provision in the Bill dealing with nomination boroughs. He did not think that the noble Lord the Member for London showed due consideration to his character as a reformer when he turned his back on that question. Such excuses as that put forward by the hon. Member for Birmingham—that he could not carry a large measure, and that he was prudent in attempting to carry only that which he could—were unworthy of the noble Lord's great character. He should have told the House, "I will destroy these nomination boroughs as far as in me lies, and go to the country to see whether they will stand by me." It was from the absence of such a spirit as this that the country had become apathetic; for, certainly, if he had thrown himself upon the country he would have found an ample response to his appeal. It had been said that Macaulay and Burke were returned for nomination boroughs, and an inference was attempted to be drawn that those distinguished men approved of rotten boroughs. About Burke he would say nothing, as not coming within the category of a reformer, but he would ask, had the House forgotten Lord Macaulay's speech to the electors of Edinburgh? In that speech he expressed his opinion that the nomination boroughs, continued by the Reform Bill of 1832, were the worst species of them; that the better sort had been destroyed when such places as Old Sarum and Gatton were disfranchised. Lord Macaulay held that it was better for the morals of the people, if we were to have nomination boroughs, that they should consist of a mound and four old walls, or anything to describe elective power, than that 150, 200, or 300 electors should be reduced to the condition of voting machines. Here were the words used by Lord Macaulay:—

[Third Night.

Mr. H. Berkeley

"If men are returned to Parliament not by popular election but by nomination, then I say without hesitation that the ancient system was much the best. Both systems alike send men to Parliament who are not freely chosen by independent constituent bodies, but under the old system there was little or no need of intimidation, while under the new system we have misery and disgrace produced by intimidation. I prefer the nomination that used to take place at Old Sarum to the nomination that now takes place at Newark. In both cases you have the Members returned by the will of the landlords, but in Newark there were 200 ejections into the bargain, to say nothing of the mortification and remorse of those who were not ejected, but who voted against their consciences for fear of being ejected."

It was very clear, therefore, what Lord Macaulay's opinion was touching nomination boroughs—and he (Mr. Berkeley) regretted that the noble Lord, the Member for the City, had not the courage to deal with that question. The next point of omission to which he begged to call attention had reference to the tribunals appointed by the House to try election petitions. There was no system that caused greater abuses, required more alteration, and had less of the confidence of the country. They could not read the evidence taken before the Committees without raising their eyes in astonishment at finding that any set of Gentlemen could come to such conclusions as they arrived at. Nothing could be more plain than that, on viewing the manner in which various Committees dealt with the evidence, the two Committees were of the same mind. The late Royal Commission that went forth made some extraordinary disclosures touching the judgment of those Committees; but as that was one of the serious cases which every Gentleman in the House must feel to be most faulty, he could not say one word more on the question. He had stated the three points which he considered should be included in any measure of Reform, and he must say that the most independent portion of the party who supported the noble Lord found themselves in anything but a pleasant position. Honestly and fairly they opposed the Reform Bill brought in by the hon. Gentleman opposite. They threw out that Bill, and turned out the Ministry that introduced it. They went to the country, and what did they say to their constituents? They could find that this was the language generally used on the hustings—"The Conservative or Tory party are a set of ruffs—they knew hardly anything about Reform or a Reform Bill, and all they know we taught them—they are taking lessons from us—they are mere tyros and do not understand the art or mystery of Reform—let us take the thing in hand—let our noble leader take the thing in hand, and you will see the sort of Reform Bill he will introduce." They proclaimed their confidence in the noble Lord, and said they relied upon him. In consequence of the former measure of Reform introduced by the noble Lord, they thought he was the man to give to the people of England such a Reform Bill as they required. Wait, said they, until the noble Lord the Member for the City of London resumes office, and a proper Reform Bill you shall see. And now he (Mr. Berkeley) would ask were not the Gentlemen opposite able to say, "and what went you forth for to see?" "You have been tried and what have you done?" This was the general feeling from one end of the country to the other, and the people would take the present Bill as an instalment of Reform only because they could take nothing better. The noble Lord, who commenced his reform career at Brobdignag, had ended it at Lilliput.

His sun of reform rose with great promise, and at noonday it was brilliant, but now it was setting amid watery clouds and in a manner the most disastrous for his reputation. Admitting the past services of the noble Lord, which must for ever entitle him to the gratitude of all sincere Reformers, he (Mr. Berkeley) regretted very much that he had not taken the high stand on this question which he had assumed at the beginning of his political career.

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, that no speeches were delivered in favour of this Bill save those which proceeded from the Treasury bench, and the opponents of the measure therefore only found themselves called upon to answer Treasury arguments. But there was one statement made by the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken which it might be necessary to notice. The hon. Gentleman wanted to convince the House that electors at present stayed away from the poll because they were afraid of voting. Now, the greatest sinners in this way were the electors of Marylebone, and nobody could suppose that they were the subjects of intimidation. [MR. BERKELEY: Oh!] Well, he (Lord R. Cecil) was himself an elector of that borough, and he felt certain that if intimidation or coercion was exercised, it was only exercised entirely on the part of the owners of public-houses. He wished, however, to make the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department the subject of special notice upon that occasion. The right hon. Baronet had to make a speech on behalf of the Government, and he had performed the duty with great ingenuity, because, as the representative of a divided body, he had devoted the first part of his address to a statement of the views of the Radical portion of the Cabinet, and the second part to a statement of the views of the Conservative portion of his Colleagues. The right hon. Gentleman had enlarged on the necessity of preserving the principle of locality in apportioning the representation; and it should be remembered on this point that the question of the boundaries of electoral districts was a vital one as affecting representation. There were many counties, such as Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Kent, where, though the mass of the population was agricultural, it was swamped by the town voters. It was to be hoped, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to propose in Committee clauses restoring the distinction between the urban and rural constituencies which the gradual growth of population and the neglect of successive Governments had effaced. The right hon. Gentleman described the old Reform Bill as the model of the present measure, and pointed out that as it had produced no dangerous results, the Bill now before the House might be expected to be equally harmless. But, then, as far as could be ascertained from the statistics, this measure would have a wider operation than a careless observer would believe. The old Reform Bill enfranchised 88,000 borough electors; but this measure, according to the lowest calculation, would enfranchise 200,000, and went, therefore, twice as far in a Radical direction as the Act of 1832. But there was another distinction between the two measures. The Act of 1832 was a settlement of a complex character—a thing of counterpoises and of balance—what it took away in one direction it gave in another. If it disfranchised certain classes of voters it established a new class by the operation of the Chaudes clause; but the present Bill was merely an advance in one direction, there was no attempt to palliate the results which it would entail. The old Reform Bill added to the constituencies, but it did not follow that it would be proper now to repeat the same process. The old Bill adjusted a balance which was faulty; the present Bill upset a balance which was just and equal. It would so increase the power of the poor that it would be impossible for the richer and more respectable classes to make their influence felt. The hon. Member for Birmingham had treated that argument with contempt, and asked if any such swamping process had resulted from the old Reform Bill, and if Mr. Croker's prophecies that the £20 would be swamped by the £10 voters had been realized. But that was rather a dangerous question to ask. Let the hon. Member look back at the poll-book of the last election for Birmingham and see how many £50 householders there were among his majority. He (Lord R. Cecil) should be sorry to say anything disrespectful to the hon. Gentleman, although he said things that were very little respect-to the party to which

ed. But he thought
man presumed too
e of the House when ave that the Reform eponderance in any r class of constitu-he borough of Mary-of the existing sys-

it

tem. It was full of magnificent squares and splendid streets, inhabited by a large number of wealthy and of educated people. Such persons, it might be thought, would certainly command great influence in the choice of Members, and their doing so might be taken as a crucial test of the working of the electoral system. Yet the whole of that class were as absolutely unrepresented in this House as though they had no voice at all in the election of a Member. Hon. Members talked of apportioning representation to wealth, and said, "Here is the borough of Marylebone—it is a very wealthy borough, and contributes enormously to the taxation, and, therefore, it ought to have so many Members;" and then what did they do? They gave the franchise to those who had no wealth at all. In respect to the future, the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary spoke in a manner which he should not have expected. He talked about progress, and used language which excluded any idea of finality. Now, he did not suppose that any one attached any idea of finality to this Bill—indeed, the hon. Member for Birmingham and others had assured them that anything like a settlement of the question by this Bill was quite out of the question; but he was surprised that the prospect of the future had not caused the right hon. Baronet to hesitate before giving the weight of his authority to this Bill. He spoke with great contempt of the argument that, because you went to a certain extent in a given direction, therefore you were bound to go to the end, and to accept the logical consequences which persons of peculiar opinions might draw from the principles upon which you acted; but he forgot that, though in ordinary cases that argument must have no weight, this was an extraordinary one to which it did apply. This was a measure which affected the legislating body, and, therefore, contained within itself the germ of further progress. They talked of making a stand. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle last year recommended a certain suffrage, because they could make a stand upon it; but they would not be there to make the stand. When this measure had passed there would be a far different House of Commons—one far less inclined to resistance and much more disposed to make common cause with the poor class of society, and to push on more rapidly the stone which they had set rolling. The right hon. Gentleman was therefore in error when he denied it was a case for the application of the principle obsta principies. Then they were asked what they thought that the persons now proposed to be admitted to the franchise would do. The hon. Member for Birmingham said that they ought to take them by the hand and hail them as brothers, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wilts talked about having confidence in the people, and the Secretary of State to the Home Department pointed to the utility of the alarms created by the first Reform Bill. He admitted that he was not afraid that any Parliament, however democratic, would dethrone the Queen or abolish the House of Peers, so long as that body was content to pursue the same harmless and innocuous course which it had of late years adopted, exercising its legislative functions upon minor questions, and upon matters of greater moment calmly registering the decrees of that House. He did not believe that any democratic assembly would fly at the mere semblance of power; but they would fly at the control of taxation. The lower classes felt, and would be brought to feel, the pressure of taxation. Everybody was anxious to shift his burden from his own shoulders to those of his neighbours. The hon. Member for Birmingham had himself said that no plummet could fathom the selfishness of a class entrusted with irresponsible power; but they were going to entrust to a class, and that the poorest and rudest in the country, the irresponsible management of the engine of taxation. Could they expect that selfishness would not exert its influence upon the members of that class. They had already precedents how indirect taxes could be converted into direct ones, and those precedents would be used. There was no concealment about it. The hon. Member for Birmingham was anxious that this Reform Bill should leave its mark upon our legislation, and should alter our financial system. Only the other day, at Liverpool, he expressed a hope that indirect taxes would disappear, and that a property tax would take their place. This would offer a very substantial temptation to the working classes to unite. They had their trades' unions, and the House knew both how they could use them and how the hon. Member for Birmingham had urged them to employ them. Could it be supposed that they would not, for the purpose of throwing upon the shoulders of the rich a burden which they had often announced that they ought not to bear, combine and use every engine in their power? It was this question of taxation which made the power of swamping so truly dangerous. Upon every other question he admitted that the lower classes would probably be divided like the upper ones, but this was a matter which appealed to their deepest interest, which came before them every day, and the House must anticipate that with regard to it they would use the enormous preponderance which was about to be placed in their hands. Perhaps the best test of what they would do was what they had done. A municipal borough was a sort of microcosm, showing on a small scale what the working classes were likely, if this Bill passed, to do on a large one. As they managed the finances of a municipality so were they likely to manage the finances of an Empire. The Committee of the House of Lords upon the Small Tenements Act, ascertained that at Newcastle there had been a very improvident sale of town property, and when the question was asked whether this was at all attributable to the influence of the small tenement holders, the reply was that that certainly was the case; there was great agitation; public meetings were held, at which representations were made that this sale would be of great advantage to the working classes, that the work would furnish employment to them for several years, would enable them to keep the wolf from the door, and other expressions of that sort. Would not similar expressions be used on every hustings in the country directly the working classes formed a majority of the electors; and if those classes once obtained the control of the finances, taking from and giving to whom they pleased, would they not exercise that power to keep the wolf from the door? But they were told that there would always remain the influence of wealth. The influence of wealth got many different names in that House. When the hon. Member for Bristol was speaking it was called corruption, coercion, intimidation, and all sorts of hard names; but when they were discussing a Reform Bill it suddenly assumed the shape of a constitutional guarantee. He believed that in one point of view the influence of wealth would be increased by this Bill. By the last Reform Bill they destroyed the pot-wallopers because of their corruption, but they now proposed to extend the franchise to the very stratum of society to which that class of voters belonged. The experience of Election Committees had shown that corruption haunted places where there were freemen almost as certainly as the cholera haunted a black ditch. What were these freemen? They were a small selection from that great stratum of society which this Bill proposed to import bodily into the constituency. What was now the case in a few towns would be the case in all boroughs if this Bill passed. Except that particular power of wealth he did not see what other influence of wealth could be relied upon to bind that political power which they were now about absolutely to give away. If they trusted to the reputation of the higher classes and the gratitude of the lower classes they must remember that there stood between them a class of men who made it their business to disparage and defame the aristocracy. As a specimen of the attacks that were now made, and which must be expected to be made more frequently hereafter, he would quote the language of one hon. Member, who said,

"The more you examine this foreign policy (of England) you will come to the conclusion that I have arrived at, that this regard for the liberties of Europe, this cry for Protestant interests, this excessive love of the balance of power is neither more nor less than a gigantic system of out-door relief for the aristocracy."

That was the language of the hon. Member for Birmingham, and might they not expect other hon. Members for Birmingham to spring up in every town in the kingdom if this Bill passed? He would give another specimen of the hon. Member's language. He said to his constituents:—

"You who have been in the gallery of the House of Commons know that I have sitting opposite to me a phalanx, when all are there, of 300 Members, and I am not going entirely to exclude all the Members on our side of the House; but I undertake to say and to prove, that if you take those 300 men, and add together everything they pay directly or indirectly to the taxation of the State, and put it on one side of a ledger, and then place on the other side everything which they or their immediate relatives receive from the State in salaries or pensions, you will find they receive three times, I believe five times, and I think I might say ten times, as much as they pay. Why am I to be asked to go to that stolid phalanx of tax-receivers and tax-expenders, and implore them to be more moderate?"

There was a charge of embezzlement against a great party! He could not characterize such language, because there were limits to the expressions that might be used in that House. But, whatever might be the motives, and they were not permitted then to question the motives, of the hon. Gentleman who used it, he would say that it was a false and a groundless calumny. The hon. Member for North Staffordshire had taxed the hon. Gentleman with misrepresentations, and challenged him to prove them; but although many Fridays had intervened, no attempt had been made to prove those statements. The hon. Gentleman made the statements; he was challenged to prove them; he had not proved them; and it was therefore, unnecessary to characterize the statements further. He did not, however, wish to blame the hon. Member for Birmingham; but rather desired to turn his statements into specimens of what they might expect when they called a whole race of agitators into existence. The hon. Member for Birmingham could scarcely be blamed; he had acted according to his light; it was in accordance with his profession; it was his trade. Agitators never had many facts, and therefore they must take fictions. But the wholesome truth to be drawn from such speeches was that if such groundless assertions as to the character of the aristocracy, of Members of the House of Commons, and of the upper classes were to be made by men who possessed influence among the working classes, then the House must not expect that those working classes would be guided or restrained in their conduct by any sense of the merits of the upper classes. He was not surprised that such an apathy as that which had been remarked throughout the country had been evinced. The experience of successive years must have taught the people that as long as they had a just and equal Government, so long they would not have much to hope for from any change. But he could not express a similar satisfaction at the political apathy evinced in that House. The present was no ordinary measure; it was a crisis as great as that which occurred in 1688 or that of 1832. In the first, the power was transferred from the Crown to the aristocracy; in the second, from the aristocracy to the middle classes; and now in the third crisis (if it was to be so decided) that power was to be transferred from the middle classes to the lower classes. It was possible that the views of those who advocated this measure might be correct, and that it was one of a prudent and cautious character, and that by the influence of wealth or of beer, or some other influence, it might prove utterly nugatory. But there was another possibility.

Lord Robert Cecil

It was possible that the apprehensions he had expressed might prove true, that it would prove another transfer of power; that that power would be placed in the hands of those who were too needy and too ill-instructed to be able to use it wisely, to whom the political independence of the other classes would be sacrificed, and who would not regard those other classes in the use of the power placed in their hands. If such were the case it could never be reversed. Whatever else might happen, whatever conceivable hypothesis were suggested it was more probable than the possibility of retracing the step they were now about to take. It was an absolute, final, and irrevocable step—a transfer of power to new rulers, who would never yield up the power conferred on them except through the influence of the sword.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he addressed himself to the consideration of this subject in a spirit of affection and reverence for our Constitution, for in no other spirit could it be approached in that House. Unless a question of this kind came before the House with a strict political object, either in respect of evils to be remedied, or benefits to be conferred, they would be overwhelmed with all kinds of theories and devices. He supported the Bill because he believed it to be not the revolutionary scheme it was described by some to be, but a simple step in the ancient path of our Constitution, and nothing more than a development of those Constitutional principles which, under Providence, had had such a marvellous effect in this country, and had produced a combination of liberty and order such as the world had never seen before. The noble Lord who had just spoken had talked of the baneful effects of transferring the Government of his country to another stratum of society. He (Mr. Milnes) entirely disbelieved in the social geology of the noble Lord. He thought it would have been better if the two noble Lords who had addressed the House that night had talked less about the upper classes, to which they belonged, and had treated the lower classes with less—he would not say contempt, but with less disrespect. It was disrespectful to any class of Englishmen to impute to them that if political power were placed in their hands they would use it for their own immediate and selfish interests, without regard to the interests of the community generally. The best proof that the dreadful consequences which some expected to follow if this Bill were passed would not ensue was to be found in the little interest which existed upon the subject. He believed that a good explanation of the apathy which existed on this subject was to be found in the general contentment of the people with the Government under which Providence had placed them. The people of this country were every day conscious that they were living under a respected Sovereign, tolerant religious institutions, and with a Parliament in the main obedient to the desires of the people. Notwithstanding all they might say with respect to the distribution of political power, if the mass of the people were discontented, if there was a spirit of disbelief in the institutions, or in their stability, they would not go on as peacefully as they now did with their present limited suffrage. If they had any cause for discontent they would have little difficulty with the power which they now possessed of exhibiting their dissatisfaction. If more power were given to them he did not think they would make a worse use of it than they did of the power they already enjoyed. He thought, after the political events of the last few years, the House ought not to be overconfident in political foresight. When they thought of the financial prophecies of the last few years, and how unfulfilled they had been in this year of our Lord, it was clear that the predictions of the acutest and wisest statesmen might be stultified by events in matters of induction that rendered necessary such an enormous number of facts, that they should approach the question in a spirit of humility as to the probable consequences. But he could not divert his attention from the good results which he thought would flow from the Bill. In the education of the people, in which he had always taken a great interest, he could not conceal from himself that the political element formed a very material part. He did not think that in any country there would be a highly educated class of artisans unless they were enabled to participate in the political duties and privileges incident to its Constitution. They would either separate their political from their intellectual life, or in proportion as their intellectual life was developed they would become discontented at being excluded from the political machine to which they belonged. There were a great number of people who believed they could get on without politics at all. He should be sorry to see that feeling predominate. The spectacle of any large class of society

[Third Night.

separating themselves from the political action of that society was always fraught with danger, especially when that was an educated, literary, and accomplished class, whose influence ought, if properly directed, to improve the political condition of their countrymen. When the House went into Committee on the Bill he should take the liberty of moving the introduction of a clause which would give the suffrage to members of Universities, of scientific bodies, of the Inns of Court, and indeed, to all persons whose influence could not be supposed to be otherwise than advantageous to the commonweal. There were some friends of his below the gangway that did not seem inclined to admit the claims of education in these matters; but could they prove that any disadvantage would arise from men of education having a vote, and be compelled to exercise it? In old times the English constitution was looked upon as a phenomenon that could not be explained, while at the same time it was admired; and some such anomaly predominated still. But perhaps the greatest political anomaly connected with this Bill was that a £6 franchise would really include a very different class of people in the different boroughs throughout the country; but he did not believe that the measure was likely to effect any great change in the character of the Members sent to that House. For example, were not the larger boroughs already represented by men holding what were called Radical political opinions? Were they not almost always men of popular instincts and interests, and who really owed their election to popular feeling? He owned he should be glad if the effect of the change should be that Members were returned to that House from the lower classes of the people. If some artisan, for instance, who had made himself respected among his own class for intelligence and wisdom, were to be sent there, he believed such a man would receive a hearty welcome. They all knew, in dealing with popular questions affecting the poorer classes, how much they were at a loss to know what those classes really required. The individuality so prominent among Englishmen in the upper classes was equally distinct among their poorer fellow-subjects. He should be glad if anything could be done to bridge over that chasm. With that view he should welcome the presence in that House of a certain number of men who really understood and would honestly and sincerely represent the opinions of the lower classes, and he believed the expression of the opinions of such men would be received there with the greatest deference. He gave his adhesion to the Bill as it stood. He did not wish in any degree to take it as an instalment. The great body of the people of this country had advanced and were still advancing in intelligence and power; and, with the education of the community placed on a safer basis, he was not the man to be alarmed at the introduction to the exercise of political power of any number of men whatever. He should give his support to the Bill, believing that it would tend to the development of the political education of the people, and that the extension of the suffrage did not necessarily carry danger with it. Let them disabuse men's minds of the impression that their interests and their politics were selfish; and the time would come when, the privileges which they now enjoyed being also extended to their less favoured countrymen, no Member of that House would grudge to any one Englishman his share of political power.

Mr. Monckton Milnes

MR. PEACOCKE said, he should have been perfectly ready to give a silent vote if no hon. Gentleman had spoken on the opposite side except the hon. Member who had just sat down, for that hon. Gentleman had delivered at once an epic poem and a philosophical essay on the happiness and content which prevailed under our constitution as it now existed. But various attacks had been made on the class of boroughs one of which he had the honour of representing—the small boroughs, more especially by the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. E. James), in whose mind there appeared to be a great confusion between close boroughs and small constituencies. The hon. and learned Gentleman was peculiarly unhappy in the illustrations he adduced in support of his argument. He asked whether Harwich had ever elected a great statesman? Let him remind the hon. and learned Member that Harwich had been represented by no less a person than Mr. Canning. Lord Macaulay had been quoted as a great authority against close boroughs, although it was well known that he owed his introduction to public life to the close borough of Calne. The hon. and learned Gentleman also asserted that no statesman of the present day was under obligations to that species of constituency. Why, one illustrious statesman now no more, and whose irreparable loss they all deplored—the late Sir Robert Peel—during the whole of his political career from the passing of the Reform Bill, sat for the small borough of Tamworth. If we look to the Statesmen who more happily survive, and commence with the Members of the present Government, we find that the noble Viscount at its head sits for the small borough of Tiverton; the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary sat for the Radnor boroughs; the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, again, sits for what the hon. and learned Gentleman would probably characterize as one of the closest of nomination boroughs—namely, Morpeth. The noble Foreign Secretary, the author of this very Reform Bill, owed his introduction to public life to the small borough of Tavistock; as did also the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford, one of the greatest ornaments of that House, to the constituency of Newark. The right hon. Member for Oxford City (Mr. Cardwell) was indebted for his entrance into public life to Clitheroe; and early in his career the Secretary of State for India sat for Wareham. An enumeration of the leading Members of the late Administration would exhibit the same result. The late Secretary of State for War (General Peel) sits for the small borough of Huntingdon, and the late First Lord of the Admiralty (Sir John Pakington) for Droitwich. The right hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Walpole) was introduced to public life through the borough of Midhurst, the late Colonial Secretary (Sir E. B. Lytton) through St. Ives, the late First Commissioner of Works (Lord John Manners) through Newark, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer through Maidstone, and the right hon. Member for Wiltshire (Mr. S. Estcourt) through Marlborough. Indeed, every Cabinet Minister, except three in the last two Governments, owed his introduction to public life to some borough more or less small. The three exceptions were the present Secretary of State for War (Mr. S. Herbert), the present President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Villiers), and the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley). And of these only one (Mr. Villiers) was introduced into public life by a populous town. If he wished for a stronger testimony in favour of the smaller constituencies he should call the right hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham), who, when rejected in 1837 from Cumberland, for his unbending Conservatism, sought refuge in the nomination borough of Dorchester, then shifted his somewhat fugitive political existence to Pembroke, and finally found an asylum in Ripon, until he was returned by Carlisle. If that right hon. Gentleman had been consistent on any question it was on the Ballot. Yet the other evening, though not absent from the House, he was absent from the division on that subject. That division on the Ballot also told another similar tale. The noble Lord the Member for London, too, had always held that the suffrage was a trust and not a right; and he who had convinced so many of his followers by this unanswerable argument that the only constitutional course was to oppose a system of secret suffrage, appeared the other evening to have convinced himself that the more constitutional course was to avoid the division. The inference he drew from these facts was, that noble Lords and right hon. Gentlemen when ambitious of election by populous boroughs became rather delegates than representatives, and were obliged to make compromises between their convictions and their constituencies; and I for one consider it to be neither beneficial to the interests of the country nor to the character of in a position in which they are unable to our public men, that they should be placed give effect to those convictions which they conscientiously entertain. If the House destroyed small boroughs it must in common justice have recourse to electoral districts. At present one small town pretty much agreed in political sentiment with another; and roughly, but virtually, the small towns which did not send Members to Parliament were represented by those which did. There were nineteen agricultural towns in the county with which he was connected (Essex), and among which were Brentwood, Barking, Braintree, Chelmsford, Coggeshall, Dunmow, Epping, Halstead, Manningtree, Romford, and Saffron Walden, which had as much right to be represented as the most populous places. They contained, according to the census of 1841, an aggregate of 76,000 inhabitants, or what would now be equivalent to from 100,000 to 110,000. If, therefore, Maldon and Harwich were disfranchised, the inhabitants of all those nineteen small towns, far exceeding in number the population of Salford, whose wrongs had been so pathetically recited, would be practically disfranchised with them. Neither the character nor the business capacity of that House would be elevated by the sweeping away of the small boroughs. By dividing the representation exclusively between the counties and the large towns they would have the House divided into two hostile and extreme camps, with no moderate men softening down the bitterness between them. What was their experience of the populous constituencies? Unquestionably there was a vast amount of property in Marylebone, which was assessed at upwards of £2,600,000 a year; but were the wealth, intelligence, and respectability of Marylebone, or of the rest of the metropolis, represented in that House. Out of 21,031 electors in Marylebone, only 7,620 polled at the last election. The hon. and learned Gentleman who sat for that borough accounted for that fact by stating that those who abstained from voting were Conservatives. If, then, two-thirds of the hon. and learned Gentleman's constituency were Conservatives, surely he could hardly be said to represent the opinions of the constituency. The only metropolitan constituency where a contest occurred was Middlesex, with a constituency of 15,300; of which only 4,800 voted, or not one-third of the number of electors. No doubt much of the wealth, intelligence, and the respectability of the metropolitan boroughs, found seats within the walls of Parliament, but not for metropolitan constituencies. There was, for instance, an hon. Gentleman influentially connected with the City of London (Mr. Baring), whose name inspired confidence both in the House and the country, who found a borough to represent in Huntingdon. There was also the hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard); he found a seat in what he supposed would be called on the other side of the House one of the decayed market places of England. Nor were those Gentlemen ostracized for their political opinions. On the other side of the House he found the same result. There were the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Carr Glyn) and the hon. Member for Shaftesbury (Mr. Grenfell Glyn), whose names commanded great respect in the City, and placed on the back of a Bill would gladden the heart of its fortunate holder; but they were not prophets in their own country—they did not find metropolitan constituencies to return them. Then there was the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Hankey) connected with more than one metropolitan constituency, who acted as political godfather to the noble Lord, the Member for the City of London, and proposed liberal candidates for Maryle-bone, who presided at metropolitan meetings and dined at metropolitan festivals, but did not find a seat for a metropolitan constituency; and thus they found generally that the unrepresented minority of the metropolitan boroughs, their intelligence, wealth, and respectability, found in small constituencies that expression of their opinions which was denied them by the majority of the constituencies among which they lived. If he wanted a further illustration of the benefit of small constituencies, he should point to the right hon. Gentleman who filled the chair with so much ability and courtesy, who was introduced by Newcastle-under-Lyne, and sat sixteen years for Malton. But what he had already said proved sufficiently that the small constituencies had not been unmindful of the trust which the Constitution had confided to them. It was owing to them that the House still possessed within its walls many whose names added lustre to their body, and whose intellect gave influence and value to their discussions. But before he went into the question of the franchise, he must beg leave to enter his dissent in the strongest terms against a doctrine promulgated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, when he said that minorities ought not to be represented in that House, and that the only way in which minorities should be represented was by their becoming a majority. He had always understood from the highest and most eminent authorities that the great object of the Constitution was to secure within the walls of that House the representation of every class and of every variety of opinion. The Reform Bill of the late Government was a great mistake, in so far as it was based on the most mischievous principle that ever was introduced into that House, uniform suffrage. Uniform suffrage was not the principle of the British Constitution; and should not be adopted by the great Conservative party, who ought to be the guardians of the traditional franchises of the country. The fault of the Reform Bill of 1832 was that it destroyed those traditional franchises, and reduced every constituency in the kingdom to the dead level of the £10 uniformity; and the great fault of the present Bill was that it substituted the uniformity of the £6 for the uniformity of the £10 franchise. The working class had no special representative in that House, and, therefore, he should be content to see a greatly extended suffrage in some of the large towns, particularly where there were large bodies of working men. Before the Reform Bill there were no fewer than thirteen or fourteen kinds of franchise; and what he desired to see was as great a variety of suffrage as possible. The hon. Member for Birmingham complained that 5,000,000 of adults were unrepresented, and that under the present Bill boroughs of 7,000 inhabitants were to return as many Members as Wolverhampton and Salford. Now, if there was any truth in the doctrines of the hon. Gentleman and numbers were to form the basis of representation, to be logical he ought to support a Bill founded only on manhood suffrage and electoral districts. Did he do so? No; the truth was that the equal distribution of political power would place it in those hands where the hon. Gentleman did not wish to see it. The hon. Gentleman had introduced a Bill, if not to the House, to the country, in which he left anomalies as great and discrepancies as striking as those which he denounced. He proposed that a borough of 16,000 inhabitants should return as many Members as a county with 160,000. He left 4,000,000 of adults without the suffrage. Was their condition improved because the hon. Gentleman added a million to the number of those who now had a right to vote? Monopoly was not the less oppressive because it was extended. The hon. Gentleman seemed entirely to ignore the rural population. He must say he would infinitely prefer a system of manhood suffrage and electoral districts to the Bill of the hon. Gentleman. Such a system was at once more just, equal, logical, and fixed. There were two systems of representation: the one recognized prescriptive rights and respected traditional influences, the other recognized no principle but the direct representation of mere numbers; the one sought to make that House the great council of the nation, in which all opinions might be represented and all grievances considered; the other sought to make it a mere assemblage of delegates, proclaiming the popular will and registering the popular edicts; the one was based on a variety of constituencies and a variety of franchises, the other on uniform suffrage and uniform electoral districts; the one was the English, the other the American system. Both systems, he believed, found admirers in that House, and to those who might prefer the more logical precision of the latter he could only say, in the language of Mr. Canning:—

[Third Night

Mr. Peacocke

“ My lot has been cast under the British monarchy; under that I have lived, under that I have seen my country prosper, and I am not prepared to sacrifice or even to endanger the fruit of centuries of experience, of centuries of struggles, and of more than one century of liberty, as perfect as ever blessed any country upon earth, for visionary schemes of ideal perfectibility, or for doubtful experiments of possible improvement.”

MR. THOMPSON said, that the principal objection which had been urged against this measure was that it contained no new or original principle, and that its only distinctive feature was a lowering of the franchise without any test of the fitness of the newly enfranchised voters to exercise that franchise with advantage to the State; and further, that even the money standard fixed upon was taken at random, and without any good reason for the selection of £6 rather than £7 or £5. If that objection could be sustained it would be fatal to the character of the Bill. The introduction of the £6 and £10 franchises, however, did provide a principle of selection, and he would show to what extent it would sift the population, and what were the peculiar merits of the proposed plan. From the Returns laid before Parliament this Session, it appeared that by lowering the borough franchise from £10 to £6, the borough constituencies would be increased by 272,000; but of these, 135,000 or about one half would be added to the constituencies of the twenty most populous boroughs. The population of these twenty boroughs in 1851 exceeded 4,000,000, of whom 255,000 were electors; so that if this Bill passed, the whole constituencies of these twenty boroughs would consist of about 400,000 electors out of a population considerably exceeding four millions. In those cities and large towns, therefore, where the franchise would descend the lowest in the social scale, a very large majority of the working classes would still be excluded from the franchise. What was the principle on which the selection was made? It turned upon the amount of rental—in other words, those who occupied the better class of houses were to have the franchise. Did these few words carry no further meaning? Did they not convey the idea that those men had raised themselves to the upper station of their class? Did they not also convey the idea that those men had raised themselves to that point by their intelligence, industry, and economy? Could the working classes raise themselves at all without the possession of those qualities? It followed, then, as a matter of course, that those who were selected because of their living in better houses must have possessed the highest qualities as workmen before they could have received the wages which enabled them to inhabit better houses than the majority of their class. They must also have exercised economy in husbanding their resources, and self-denial in not expending their earnings solely on animal enjoyments. There might be some defects in such a system of selection, but, on the whole, what better mode could be devised? It would be impossible to introduce a competitive examination, or any mode of ascertaining individual merits or qualifications. There was reason to believe that the class the Bill would enfranchise mainly contributed to the deposits in savings banks, which were now increasing at the rate of £1,000,000 a year, the total amount of deposits being £39,000,000. It had been already shown that those who lived in £6 houses were the richer portion of their class; that this was presumptive evidence of industry, skill, and economy, and when to this was added the fact that these men possessed a considerable stake in the accumulated wealth of the country, and would naturally, therefore, desire the maintenance of order and the security of property, the proof was complete that the Bill did make a fitting selection of those who ought to possess the franchise, and would be likely to make a good use of it. He trusted that the Bill would pass the House, and become law during the present Session, and he had great pleasure in voting for the second reading.

[Third Night.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he rose to address a few words to the House upon this subject. He had always hoped that when a Reform Bill should be proposed the Conservative party would apply themselves to discuss it in no party sense; and that the course would be adopted which was now about to be adopted, that of having no division on the second reading of the Bill; but at the same time he had trusted that an opportunity would be afforded of eliciting that talent of which they had had some striking exhibitions that night. The hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. M. Milnes) complained of the apathy of the country, but he (Mr. Newdegate) could not understand a Liberal complaining of apathy. If that party did not exist for the interest of the country of course the measures intended to promote the interests of the party would be received with apathy. But his own conviction was that the introduction of a Reform Bill was attributable in the first instance to the abandonment by the noble Lord the Member for London of the measure by which he made his name. When the noble Lord decided, in 1852, that there should be a Reform Bill, he decided also the course of the Conservative party, for it was totally impossible that that party could undertake to defend a measure which they had strongly opposed when its very parent gave it up. But the position they now stood in was very different. He had always thought it better that a measure of this kind should be decided upon in a kind of convention not much open to popular influence. But instead of that this question had been for years the very football of faction. Under its influence an agitation had been enacted out of doors, and although that agitation had not succeeded in effecting the objects of its promoters, it has nevertheless constituted a sort of out-of-door Parliament which had in effect decided the action of the Government. It was all very well for those within doors to reply to the harsh observations with which the hon. Member for Birmingham assailed this House out of doors. He thought they were perfectly right in doing so. If a man, as a Member of that House, attacked their privileges, the House had a right to call on him for an account of his conduct in making statements affecting the character of some of its Members. He hoped that that principle would be preserved. He observed a delicacy on the part of hon. Members in alluding to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Birmingham reflecting upon the action of the House and upon their conduct as Members. He (Mr. Newdegate) thought that that delicacy was totally misplaced. The hon. Gentleman was no doubt entitled to all the privileges of a Member, but he had a name with two mysterious letters attached to it, by which circumstance additional influence was given to him wherever he went. And he (Mr. Newdegate) said that the Members of that House, if they regarded their position in the House, were bound to call him to an account for what he said in disparagement of them elsewhere. Having risen for a practical object, he wished to point attention to the fact that throughout all those discussions scarcely any allusion had been made to the great change that the present Bill would make in the country franchise; and nevertheless at this moment they were totally without the means of judging of its effect. Certain Returns had been promised by the noble Lord, who declared that all information that could be obtained would be furnished, and yet those Returns, which he (Mr. Newdegate) knew were prepared in the public offices, had not been laid upon the table. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, in a speech intended, he thought, to cloak this subject rather than to elucidate it, told them that the addition to the county franchise would be only 160,000. Now he (Mr. Newdegate) had paid some attention to this subject, and was in a position to show that such a calculation was erroneous. He had heard the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) state the addition to be 200,000. Well, he had information on the subject which was also accessible to the two right hon. Gentlemen, and with the permission of the House he would state as briefly as he could the result of the inquiries which he had made. He could not by any possible calculation reduce the increase of the county constituency below 300,000. Hon. Members might say it did not matter how many men were qualified to vote or added to the constituency provided they were fit to exercise the franchise. He, however, submitted that this question of numbers was a most vital element in the consideration of a measure of this kind, because every one who knew anything of a constituency must be aware of the fact that if they aggregated numbers out of proportion to the power of property they would ultimately merge the representation of property. That was an acknowledged fact. If in any locality they created a mob of voters they would not only annul the influence of property, but, as it was exemplified in the case of Marylebone, they would reduce the constituency to such a condition that a large proportion of them would decline to exercise the franchise. This Bill had that tendency. It was called a simple measure, but he looked upon it as a bad and mischievous measure. The noble Lord introduced a Bill into the House in 1854, but the present measure did not correspond with it. In 1854 the noble Lord adopted, it was true, the principle of the enlargement of the franchise; but he did more, he proposed a change in the form of elections, by which no less than fifty-six seats in that House would be affected. The noble Lord proposed what he called a counterbalancing change in regard to the suffrage. He (Mr. Newdegate) believed that the delusion under which the House was then labouring as to the increase of the borough constituencies was counterbalanced by the delusion that was practised on them in respect to the increase of the county constituencies. They had some Returns before the House. One of them in particular, the most useful, had been granted on the Motion of the hon. Member for Bath, and was printed in 1859. It gave the number of persons rated to the relief of the poor of the counties beyond the limits of the boroughs, and holding tenements of rateable value from £8 to £40. That number was 787,383. According to the Return of that Session, No. 124, the rateable value was below the real value by 17·8 per cent. For the sake of convenience and calculation he had taken the difference at 20 per cent, but would make the allowance of the 3 per cent afterwards. In Return 124 of that Session it was shown that the number to be deducted as females was 20 per cent, and for males, incapacitated or unwilling to register themselves, 27 per cent, making 47 per cent. Deducting then 47 per cent from 787,383 the number remaining was 418,215 as the addition to the county constituency. The variety of the county franchise was such that it was probable that a large number of those persons were otherwise qualified. According to Return 118, Session 1859, the total number of persons assessed to the poor rate at £40 and upwards—that was, at £50 real value, was 336,078. From Return 280, Session 1854, it appeared that the occupying tenants of holdings of that value, who were on the register for that year, were 106,579. If that proportion were applied to the whole number of persons holding tenements of from £10 to £50 value, which had been previously ascertained to be 787,383, the number shown would add 249,729. Add to this 750, or 3 per cent for the difference between the 20 per cent assumed, and the difference between the rateable and the real value, and the 17 per cent stated in the Return of this Session, and the result was 250,479. But it was a known fact that among the occupiers of tenements of £50 and upwards a very large proportion of freeholds were held, and that it was much more common for them to register than for a tenancy. Therefore, upon striking an average between the results obtained between those two modes of calculation, the result of the first calculation was 418,215, and that of the second calculation 250,479; which made together 668,694, the mean result of which was 334,347. He stated fearlessly to the House that the addition to the county constituency under this Bill would be between 250,000 and 330,000 instead of 160,000, as was asserted by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary. The noble Lord (Lord John Russell) was aware that as early as 1852 his (Mr. Newdegate's) attention was turned to the subject. When the noble Lord introduced his Bill he (Mr. Newdegate) asked him what constituency he was about to create. The noble Lord then stated his inability to inform him of the number that would be enfranchised by his measure; but he was kind enough to call him out of the House, and to refer him to certain Returns which were the basis of those Returns from which he had just quoted. The origin of this Bill might be undoubtedly traced to the hon. Member for Birmingham—the hon. Gentleman who proposed to the country to deal most liberally with the principle of enfranchisement and disfranchisement, and talked of adding seventy Members to the House. But he did not intend to let the majority of the county population have any more representatives than they had at present. With the permission of the House, he would state the circumstances of the case at present. The representation of England and Wales, under the Reform Act of 1832, according to the Census of 1857, was as follows:—

Mr. Thompson

[Third Night.]

COUNTIES.
Property, annual value	...	£60,564,288
Inhabited houses	...	2,063,998
Population	...	10,495,930

19

TOWNS.

...	£42,898,247
...	1,383,300
...	7,431,679

17 represented on population; and or 22,052.

Column.]

if property the 131, according and according to was not about wished only to noble Lord pro-

An equal distribution of seats would give—

	Counties and Towns not returning Members to Parliament	Boroughs and Cities returning Members.	Increase to Counties and Towns not returning Members to Parliament
	Seats.	Seats.	Seats.
According to property ..	290	306	131
According to number of inhabited houses ...	296	200	137
According to population	301	200	131

posed to allot forty-six seats to counties, when he proposed to reduce the franchise according to the present plan. By the present Bill he proposed to allot fifteen Members to counties. He hoped when the noble Lord rose he would assign some reason for this. When the House went into Committee he certainly should propose to the House that the schedule of the Bill of 1854 should be adopted, as the reduction of the franchise was to be to the same extent, and he should also propose some of the other clauses of the Bill of 1854, because he had heard no adequate reason for the noble Lord's abandoning his proposition of that year; but if no addition was made to the county representation, he should feel fully justified in voting against the third reading of the Bill; and if not rejected in that House it would be rejected by the House of Lords, for this reason, that the course of recent legislation pointed already to the confiscation of real property by taxation. The hon. Member for Birmingham declared that the House of Lords represented the land and the counties. Every one knew that no Member in that House respected the House of Lords more than he did, but if they wished to place themselves in danger they would do this—that after having increased the influence of numbers enormously, they would accept the responsibility of representing the counties of England, having no power according to the Constitution to deal with the taxation. If they wished to place themselves in danger they would do that, because if another Parliament persevered in the course of confiscation (he could call it nothing else) which he anticipated from the system of direct taxation, the best friends of the House of Lords would turn upon them for any attempt to assume the representation of the counties, having, at the same time, no power to deal with the question of taxation. He wished to show that the increase to the county constituency was not likely to be of the proportion indicated either by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire or the Home Secretary; that they were about to increase very considerably several of those constituencies. If it seemed good to Parliament to reduce the qualification of the counties to the level at which the boroughs had hitherto stood, the counties ought to have an approximation to the full representation which the boroughs had hitherto had, but which had been denied to counties. He had much else to say, but he doubted not that other opportunities would be afforded him—he doubted not that it would be proposed to arrest the county franchise at £20. He should heartily support that proposal; but if the decision of that House were to reduce the county franchise to what the borough franchise was at present he should deem it his duty to claim that justice for increased representation to which the noble Lord gave the sanction of himself and the Government of which he was a Member in 1854; and he could see no grounds of justice or policy for the refusal of that claim.

MR. BLACK moved the Adjournment of the debate.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON expressed his readiness to assent to the Motion, and observed that, as several orders stood for discussion the next day, and as it was not desirable that the debate on the Reform Bill should be resumed at the fag-end of the evening, he should suggest its Adjournment until Thursday, when he hoped it would be brought to a close. He could not help thinking that to seek to delay the progress of the Bill was hardly a worthy mode of dealing with a great question, with respect to which it was announced that no division was to be taken. If the case were otherwise, and it was proposed that the second reading of the Bill should not be acceded to, he could, of course, understand why hon. Gentlemen should desire that the debate should be prolonged.

MR. DISRAELI said, he thought the noble Lord acted wisely in assenting to the adjournment of the debate until Thursday. As to whether it could conveniently be brought to a close on that day, the noble Lord was, of course, as good a judge as any hon. Member on the Opposition side of the House could be supposed to be, inasmuch as those who sat on the same side as the noble Lord had hitherto taken the chief share in the discussion. The noble Lord did not, he was sure, when he spoke of delay, mean to make any personal or party allusion; but he must remind the noble Lord that he seemed altogether to misapprehend the character of a discussion which he (Mr. Disraeli) had, he believed, commenced about six weeks ago. He had then stated, for his own part, and on behalf of those with whom he acted, that they would not object to the second reading of the Bill; but in making that statement he had by no means intended to express his approval of the measure, or to give his adhesion to its principles. All he wished to imply was simply that in assenting to the second reading they were willing to consider the subject of the reconstruction of the House of Commons, and the principle on which that reconstruction should proceed. He therefore desired that the noble Lord should clearly understand that, in speaking on behalf of himself and his Friends—the noble Lord could, of course, answer for his own—he did not seek for delay, but by a full discussion of all the principles involved in the Bill so to prepare themselves to deal with a question of immense importance that when they went into Committee upon it the mind of the House and the country might be fitted to grapple with it as it deserved, and that hon. Members might not be then compelled to launch into serious and lengthened discussions; but, having cleared the way by preliminary debate, might be enabled to proceed with greater facility than would otherwise be the case. He therefore begged the noble Lord not for one moment to imagine that delay was the object of the Conservative party, while, of course, it would be presumptuous on his part to touch upon the question of what were the wishes in the matter of the supporters of the Government. He and his friends desired, in short, not delay, but that deep and deliberate investigation of a great subject which was in accordance with the freedom of discussion by which the Parliament of England was characterized.

MR. BENTINCK said, he had often protested against arrangements between the two front benches as to when debates were to come forward, and he had trusted that he should be able, with the support of a great number of independent Members, to stop such an unconstitutional practice. He for one had risen several times that night in the hope of catching the Speaker's eye, but had failed in so doing. Under these circumstances he was only exercising his indisputable right as a Member of that House when he said he should use his utmost endeavours to prevent the debate from being brought to a termination until he had a full and ample opportunity of expressing to the best of his ability his opinion on the Bill; for however unimportant that opinion might be, he should be wanting in his duty to the numerous constituency which he represented if he did not express it. He hoped, therefore, that the demonstration which had taken place on a former occasion was not a mere flash in the pan, and that the front benches would not be allowed to dictate to the House in matters of this kind. The noble Lord at the head of the Government seemed to assume, in consequence of a statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire on a former evening, that there would be no division; but the noble Lord must remember that any hon. Member would have the power to divide the House on the second reading. Disclaiming entirely the right of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire to interfere with the progress of the debate, he (Mr. Bentinck) concurred to the full with the right hon. Gentleman in his observation that what the Conservative Members wanted was discussion, not delay; and it seemed to him unaccountable that the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) should object to a careful discussion of the Bill, seeing that if it had those merits which the Government said it possessed, discussion could only have the effect of making those merits apparent to the House.

[Third Night.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that the hon. Member who had just addressed them appeared to have mistaken his noble Friend at the head of the Government. His noble Friend had never intended the front benches to agree as to the debate coming to a close. He had only put it to the consideration of the House whether it might not think it convenient the debate should terminate on Thursday. There was a very great convenience in hon. Members knowing when a debate was likely to come to an end. Of another observation of the hon. Gentleman he must take some notice. He stated that his noble Friend had assumed from what had passed in this discussion that there was to be no division against the second reading. The debate had lasted three or four nights; and it would certainly be usual, and due in courtesy, not only to the Government, but to the House, that if any hon. Gentleman intended to divide against the second reading some notice should be given of that intention. It should be publicly known, or many hon. Members might be absent in the country, or, if in London, might stay away from the House under the conviction that no division would take place; and then a division might be taken by surprise, when least expected. This was not usual even as to Measures of minor importance, and certainly not on a Measure so important as the present Bill. The hon. Gentleman had a perfect right to express his sentiments at any length he thought proper; but, according to the practice of the House and by courtesy, if a division was to be taken, some notice of it should be given.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he was glad to hear the declaration of the noble Lord, because when he had once remonstrated with the noble Lord for bringing on a Bill of 132 Clauses without notice, the noble Lord told him somewhat peremptorily that it was the duty of every hon. Member to be always in his place.

MR. FELLOWES said, he, for one, protested against any understanding being entered into that the debate should close on Thursday.

MR. KNIGHTLEY said, that the Government ought not to charge hon. Members with delay after they had themselves been guilty of such laches in respect of this Bill. There had only been an evening and a half's discussion of the Bill before Easter, whereas the measure might have been brought in as long ago as January. When the Government were asked the other evening whether the debate would be resumed, the noble Lord, with his usual sweet smile, assured them that it would if more important business had been disposed of—the more important business being the repeal of Sir John Barnard's Act, of which probably not one person in ten, unconnected with the Stock Exchange, had ever heard.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he wished to call attention to the fact that no Irish Members had yet spoken. It might be said that they had no concern in the English Bill, but there was an old proverb to the effect that when your neighbour's house was on fire it was decidedly your affair. It might be thought that they who were advocates of an extension were obliged to accept anything that was offered them for that purpose; but the Bill might possibly be opposed on the ground that a more satisfactory one might be substituted for it. As the Bill based the franchise upon the principle of population, and as it went very close to manhood suffrage, he should vote for it, thinking that the franchise could not be too much extended. But still, believing that the Bill would not satisfy the just expectations of the country, he hoped a Resolution would be passed containing a distinct protest on the part of the House against its being treated as a finality measure.

Mr. Bentinck

Debate further adjourned till Thursday

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND)

BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CARDWELL said, that he would move to postpone the second reading of this Bill.

MR. HENNESSY complained that it had not yet been printed.

MR. CARDWELL explained that the delay in circulating the Bill arose from proofs having to be sent for revision to his right hon. Friend in Ireland.

MR. WHITESIDE observed that it was trifling with a subject of great importance to have introduced this measure—as was shrewdly suspected—before it was prepared. The Government had no right to bring in a Bill which was not ready for the printers.

Second Reading deferred till Friday.

House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock.

APPENDIX.

A BILL

FURTHER

To Amend the Laws relating to the Representation of the People in England and Wales.

WHEREAS it is expedient to make further Provision for the due Representation of the People in Parliament: Be it enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the Authority of the same, as follows:

I. Every Male Person of full Age, and not subject to any legal Incapacity, who shall occupy within any County, or Riding, Parts, or Division of a County, in England or Wales, except within the Limits of a City or Borough which shall return a Member or Members to serve in Parliament, or of a place sharing in the Election for such City or Borough, as Owner or Tenant, any House, Warehouse, Counting-house, Shop, or other Building, being either separately or jointly with any Land within such County, Riding, Parts, or Division (except within such limits as aforesaid) occupied therewith by him as Owner, or occupied by him therewith as Tenant under the same landlord, of the clear yearly Value of not less than Ten Pounds, shall, if duly registered, be entitled to vote in the Election of a Knight or Knights of the Shire to serve in Parliament for such County, Riding, Parts, or Division: Provided always, that no such Person shall be so registered in any Year unless he have resided for Six Calendar Months next previous to the last Day of July in such Year within such County, Riding, Parts, or Division.

II. The Provisions herein-after mentioned with reference to the Right to vote in the Election of a Member or Members to serve in Parliament for a City or Borough, in respect of the Occupation of Premises in such City or Borough, and to be registered in respect of such Right, that is to say, the Provisions now in force as to the Time of such Occupation, as to being rated, claiming to be rated, and Payment of Rates, and as to successive and joint Occupation, shall be applicable to the Right to vote in the Election of a Knight or Knights of the Shire conferred by this Act, and to be registered in respect of such Right, as if such Provisions were re-enacted, mutatis mutandis, with reference thereto.

III. The Occupation of Premises within a City or Borough which shall return a Member or Members to serve in Parliament, or within a Place sharing in the Election for such City or Borough, of the clear yearly value of not less than Six Pounds, shall confer a Right to vote in the Election of such Member or Members, in like Manner as such Right is now conferred in respect of the Occupation of Premises of the clear yearly Value of not less than Ten Pounds; and all Provisions now in force concerning such Right in respect of such Occupation shall, save as herein otherwise provided, be applicable to the Right hereby conferred, as if Six Pounds were mentioned in Section Twenty-seven of the Act of the Session holden in the Second and Third Years of King William the Fourth, Chapter Forty-five, and were mentioned or referred to in all other the Provisions concerning such right, instead of Ten Pounds.

IV. No Person shall be entitled under this Act to vote in the Election of a Knight or Knights of the Shire for any County, or Riding, Parts, or Division of a County, or, under the said Act of the Second and Third Years of King William the Fourth and this Act, to vote in the Election of a Member or Members for any City or Borough, in respect of his Occupation, jointly with any Land, of any Building other than a Dwelling House in which he himself resides, unless such Building separately be of the clear yearly Value of not less than Five Pounds in a County or than Three Pounds in a City or Borough, although the same, jointly with the land occupied therewith, be of the clear yearly Value of not less than Ten Pounds or Six Pounds, as the Case may require.

V. Sections Twenty-four and Twenty-five of the said Act of King William the Fourth, dis-entitling Persons in the Cases therein mentioned to vote in the Election of a Knight or Knights of the Shire in respect of their Estates and Interests as Freeholders, Copyholders, or Customary Tenants, or Tenants in Ancient Demesne, or as such Lessees or Assignees, or as such Tenants and Occupiers as in the said Act mentioned, shall not be applicable in the Case of any Building and Land occupied therewith, where, by reason of the foregoing Enactment, the Occupier shall not be entitled to vote for any City or Borough in respect thereof.

VI. So much of Sections Twenty-seven, Twenty-eight, and Twenty-nine of the said Act of the Second and Third Years of King William the Fourth, and so much of an Act of the Session holden in the Eleventh and Twelfth Years of Her Majesty, Chapter Ninety, and of an Act of the Session holden in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Years of Her Majesty, Chapter Fourteen, as requires as a Condition of the Registration in any Year of any such Occupier of Premises as therein mentioned, or of his Title to vote in the Election for any City or Borough, that he shall have paid on or before the Twentieth Day of July in such Year all the Assessed Taxes which have become payable from him as therein mentioned, shall be repealed.

VII. Each of the Boroughs mentioned in the Schedule (A.) to this Act shall, from and after the End of this present Parliament, return One Member and no more to serve in Parliament.

VIII. The Parishes of Chelsea and Kensington in the County of Middlesex shall, for the Purposes of this Act, together form a Borough, to be called the Borough of Chelsea, and such Borough shall, from and after the End of this present Parliament, return Two Members to serve in Parliament.

IX. Each of the Places mentioned in the Schedule (B.) to this Act shall for the Purposes of this Act be a Borough, and shall as such Borough include the Places and be comprised within the Boundaries of such Boroughs as such Boundaries shall be settled and described in an Act to be passed for that Purpose in this present Session of Parliament, which Act when passed shall be deemed and taken to be Part of this Act as if the same were incorporated herewith; and each of the said Boroughs named in the said Schedule (B.) shall, from and after the End of this present Parliament return One Member to serve in Parliament; and if no Act to settle and describe the Boundaries of the said Boroughs be passed before the First Day of June One thousand eight hundred and sixty, then, until Parliament otherwise provide, each such Borough shall comprise such Places and include such Boundaries as are specified and described in connection with the Name of such respective Borough in the said Schedule.

X. In all future Parliaments the West Riding of the County of York shall return Four Knights of the Shire instead of Two to serve in Parliament.

XI. In all future Parliaments the County, Riding, Parts, and each of the Divisions of Counties mentioned in the Schedule (C.) to this Act shall respectively return Three Knights of the Shire instead of Two to serve in Parliament.

XII. In all future Parliaments each of the Boroughs mentioned in the Schedule (D.) to this Act shall return Three Members instead of Two to serve in Parliament.

XIII. In all future Parliaments the University of London shall return One Member to serve in Parliament.

XIV. Every Person, not subject to any legal Incapacity, on whom the Degree of Master of Arts, Bachelor of Laws, Doctor of Laws, Bachelor of Medicine or Doctor of Medicine shall have been conferred by the University of London, or who shall be a Bachelor of Arts in such University of not less than Three Years' standing, shall be entitled to vote in the Election of any Member to serve in Parliament for the said University.

XV. The Sheriff for the Time being of the County in which each of the Boroughs constituted by this Act is situate shall, within Two Months after the passing of this Act, and in every subsequent Year in the month of March, by Writing under his Hand, to be delivered to the Clerk of the Peace of the County within One Week, and to be by such Clerk of the Peace filed and preserved with the Records of his Office; appoint for such respective Borough a fit Person being resident therein to be, and such Person so appointed shall accordingly be, the Returning Officer for such respective Borough until the Appointment to be made in the succeeding March; and the Provisions contained in Section Eleven of the said Act of the Second and Third Years of King William the Fourth, providing for the Event of the Death or Incapacity of any Person appointed as Returning Officer for any Borough, as therein mentioned, and exempting any Person so appointed from serving again in the same Office, and disqualifying certain Persons from being so appointed, and Persons so appointed from being appointed Churchwardens or Overseers, and providing for the Case of a Charter of Incorporation being granted to any Borough, shall extend and be applicable to and for the Appointment of Returning Officers for the Boroughs constituted by this Act, and to the Returning Officers to be appointed for the same under this Enactment, and to the Case of a Charter of Incorporation being granted to any Borough constituted by this Act; and for the Purposes of this Provision the Borough of Stalybridge shall be deemed to be situate in the County of Chester.

XVI. The Vice-Chancellor of the University of London shall be the Returning Officer for such University, and the Writ for any Election of a Member to serve in Parliament for such University shall be directed to such Vice-Chancellor.

XVII. The Vice-Chancellor of the University of London shall proceed to Election, in pursuance of any Writ to be directed to him as herein-before mentioned, within Three Days after the Receipt of such Writ, giving Three clear Days' Notice of the Day and Place of Election, exclusive of the Day of Proclamation and the Day of Election, and shall after such Election certify the same, together with such Writ, according to the Directions thereof.

XVIII. At every contested Election of a Member to serve in Parliament for the University of London the Polling shall commence at Eight o'Clock in the Morning of the Day next following the Day fixed for the Election, and may continue for not more than Three Days, Sunday, Christmas Day, and Good Friday being excluded; but no Poll shall be kept open later than Four o'Clock in the Afternoon.

XIX. At every such Election of a Member for the University of London the Vice-Chancellor shall appoint the Polling Place, and also shall have Power to appoint Two or more Pro-Vice-Chancellors, any One of whom may receive the Votes and decide upon all Questions during the Absence of such Vice-Chancellor; and such Vice-Chancellor shall have Power to appoint Poll Clerks and other Officers, by One or more of whom the Votes shall be entered in the Poll Book or such Number of Poll Books as shall be judged necessary by such Vice-Chancellor; and such Vice-Chancellor shall, not later than Two o'Clock in the Afternoon of the Day next following the Close of the Poll, openly declare the State of the Poll, and make Proclamation of the Member chosen.

XX. Every Person on whom, under the Provisions herein-before contained, a Right of voting at any Election of a Knight or Knights of the Shire to serve in Parliament for any County, Riding, Parts, or Division of a County, or of a Member or Members to serve in Parliament for any City or Borough, is conferred, shall, subject to the Conditions affecting such Right, be entitled to vote at any Election of a Knight or Knights of the Shire to serve in Parliament for such County, Riding, Parts, or Division, or of a Member or Members to serve in Parliament for such City or Borough, which takes place after the last Day of November One thousand eight hundred and sixty, and, subject to the Conditions affecting his Right to be registered in any Year, shall be entitled to be registered in any Register of Voters to be formed for such County, Riding, Parts, or Division, or for such City or Borough, in or after the Year One thousand eight hundred and sixty.

XXI. Registers of Voters shall be formed in and after the Year One thousand eight hundred and sixty, notwithstanding the Continuance of this present Parliament, for or in respect of the Boroughs constituted by this Act, in like Manner as if they respectively were Boroughs now returning Members to serve in Parliament.

XXII. No Person shall be registered in the respective Registers of Voters to be formed during this present Parliament for the Counties and Divisions of Counties in which the Boroughs constituted by this Act may be respectively situate, who would not be entitled to be so registered in case the same were now Boroughs returning Members to serve in Parliament.

XXIII. Nothing in this Act shall affect the rights of Persons whose names are on any Register of Voters in force at the Time of the passing of this Act to vote at any Election which takes place before the First Day of December One thousand eight hundred and sixty.

XXIV. In case a Dissolution of this present Parliament take place before the Day at and from which the Registers of Voters to be first made for the Boroughs constituted by this Act begin to be in force, the Writs for the Election of Members to serve in Parliament for such respective Boroughs shall not be issued until such Registers begin to be in force.

XXV. The Provisions of the said Act of the Second and Third Years of King William the Fourth, relating to the Construction thereof, shall be applicable to the Enactments herein-before contained; and all other the Provisions of the said Act, and of any Act amending the same, now in force, and not hereby repealed, so far as the same are not inconsistent with the Enactments herein-before contained, shall be construed with such Enactments as One Act.

XXVI. In the Precept of the Town Clerk and Notice by the Overseers, of which Forms (numbered 1. and 2.) are given in Schedule (B.) to the Act of the Session holden in the Sixth and Seventh Years of Her Majesty, Chapter Eighteen, "the clear yearly Value of Six Pounds" shall be substituted for "the clear yearly Value of Ten Pounds," and in the said Notice the Words "and Assessed Taxes" shall be omitted; and at the End of the Headings of the Lists numbered 3. and 4. in the same Schedule add "and of an Act passed in the Twenty-third Year of Her Majesty, intituled [insert the Title of this Act]."

XXVII. The Provisions of the said Act of the Sixth and Seventh Years of Her Majesty, as amended by this Act, shall be applicable for the Registration of Persons entitled to vote, and to the Rights of voting under this Act, and to the Proceedings in Elections to be had in pursuance of this Act, in like Manner as such Provisions are now applicable for the Registration of Persons entitled to vote, to Rights of voting, and to Proceedings in the Election of Members to serve in Parliament.

XXVIII. All Laws, Statutes, Usages, Provisions, and Penalties now in force respecting the Election of Members to serve in Parliament for England and Wales, except so far as the same are hereby repealed or are inconsistent with the Provisions of this Act, shall be and remain in full Force, and shall apply as well to the Election of Members to serve in Parliament in pursuance of this Act as to other Elections of Members to serve in Parliament.

XXIX. All Writs to be issued for the Election of Members to serve in Parliament, and all Mandates, Precepts, Instruments, Proceedings, and Notices consequent upon such Writs, shall be framed and expressed in such Manner and Form as may be necessary for the carrying the Provisions of this Act into effect.

XXX. If any Person duly elected a Member of the House of Commons in any future Parliament hold, at the Time of his being elected, any Office the Acceptance of which after his Election would have made void his Seat, his Acceptance while he continues such Member of any other Office, upon or immediately before his Resignation of the Office holden at the Time of his Election, or upon or immediately before the Revocation or Avoidance of his Appointment to the Office so holden, shall not, nor shall any like Change only of Office from Time to Time, make void his Seat in Parliament, unless the Office so accepted be an Office the holder of which is incapable of being elected a Member of the House of Commons.

SCHEDULES.

SCHEDULE A.

Boroughs now returning Two Members, which are to return in future Parliaments One Member each.

Guildford
Hertford
Devizes
Marlow
Dorchester Bodmin
Chippenham

Huntingdon
Cirencester
Ripon Maldon
Tewkesbury Knaresborough

Andover
Ludlow
Lymington
Leominster Marlborough
Richmond

Wells Evesham Harwich
Totnes Thetford
Honiton

SCHEDULE B.

Places to be Boroughs to return One Member each.

County.	Places to be Boroughs.	Temporary Contents and Boundaries.
Cheshire - - -	Birkenhead - - -	The extra-parochial Chapelry of Birkenhead, the several Townships of Claughton, Tranmere, and Oxtun, and so much of the Township of Higher Bebbington as lies to the Eastward of the Road leading from Higher Tranmere to Lower Bebbington.
Lancashire - - -	Burnley - - -	The District within the Improvement Boundary as fixed by the Act passed in the Session holden in the Ninth and Tenth Years of Her Majesty, Chapter 119. (Local and Personal), Section 98.
Cheshire and Lancashire -	Stalybridge - - -	The District within the Police Boundary of the Town of Stalybridge, as fixed by an Act passed in the Ninth Year of King George the Fourth, Chapter 26. (Local and Personal.)

SCHEDULE C.

County, Riding, Parts, and Divisions of Counties, now returning Two Knights of the Shire, which are to return in future Parliaments Three Knights of the Shire each.

Lancashire, Southern Division.	Lincolnshire, Parts of Lindsey.
Lancashire, Northern Division.	Essex, Southern Division.
Middlesex.	Somersetshire, Eastern Division.
Kent, Western Division.	Norfolk, Western Division.
Devonshire, Southern Division.	Cornwall, Western Division.
Staffordshire, Southern Division.	Essex, Northern Division.
Yorkshire, North Riding.

SCHEDULE D.

Boroughs now returning Two Members, which are to return in future Parliaments Three Members each.

Manchester.	Birmingham.
Liverpool.	Leeds.

INDEX

TO

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

VOLUME CLVII.

SECOND VOLUME OF SESSION 1860.

EXPLANATION OF THE ABBREVIATIONS.

1R. 2R. 3R. First, Second, or Third Reading.—Amend., Amendment.—Res., Resolution.—Com. Committee.—Re-Com., Re-committal.—Rep., Report.—Adj., Adjourned.—cl., Clause.—add. cl., Additional Clause.—neg., Negatived.—l., Lords.—c., Commons.—m. q., Main Question.—o. q., Original Question.—o. m., Original Motion.—p. q., Previous Question.—r. p., Report Progress.—A., Ayes.—N., Noes.—M., Majority.—1st Div., 2nd Div., First or Second Division.

When in the Text or in the Index a Speech is marked thus *, it indicates that the Speech is reprinted from a Pamphlet or some authorised Report.

When in the Index a † is prefixed to a Name or an Office (the Member having accepted or vacated office during the Session) and to Subjects of Debate thereunder, it indicates that the Speeches on those Subjects were delivered in the speaker's private or official character, as the case may be.

When in this Index a * is added to the Reading of a Bill, it indicates that no Debate took place upon that stage of the measure.

"ACCRINGTON" Transport, The
c. Question (Mr. Ald. Salomons), 446

ADAM, Mr. W. P., Clackmannanshire, &c.
Timber Duties—Drawback, 1022

ADDERLEY, Rt. Hn. C. B., Staffordshire, W.
Colonies, Defence of the, 1637
Militia, Disembodied, 1162
Religious Worship, 2R. 533
Representation of the People, 2R. 1059, 1061
Sir John Barnard's Act Repeal, 2R. 2039

Adulteration of Food Bill,
c. Com. cl. 4, 543; cl. 5, 546;
cl. 11, [A. 101, N. 88, M. 13] 547;
cl. 2, 547, [A. 123, N. 16, M. 107] 548; 3R.* 1885
l. 1R.* 1919

ADVOCATE, The Lord, (Rt. Hon. J. Moncreiff), Edinburgh
Foreshores (Scotland), 727
Representation of the People (Scotland), 728
Universities (Scotland), Leave, 68

Aggravated Assaults Act Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* 15

AGNEW, Sir A., Wigtonshire
Bribery—Conveyance of Voters, 339
Parks, Shrubs in the, 111

VOL. CLVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

Agreements, &c.—Ways and Means,
c. Com. Res. 9, 1228

AIRLIE, Earl of Elections, &c., Returns moved for, 1110

ARCHDALL, Capt. M. E., Fermanagh Co.
"Great Tasmania," Mortality on board the, 1153

ARGYLL, Duke of (Lord Privy Seal), France, Commercial Treaty with, 337; Address moved, 608; Explanation, 717
India—Progress of, Papers moved for, 13;—Financial Statement of Mr. Wilson, 1230;—Banks and Currency, Papers moved for, 1326, 1327, 1484, 1490, 1491;—Licensing System, 1585
Parliamentary Reform—Com. moved for, 1939, 1952, 1958
Savoy, Annexation of, 102
Tuscany, Provisional Government of, Papers moved for, 213, 216 Valuation of Rateable Property (Ireland), Com. 715

Army,
Armstrong Gun Factory, c. Question (Sir D. L. Evans), 2056
Artillery, Officers of, c. Question (Capt. Jervis), 834, 1156
Barrack Masters, c. Question (Col. French), 2057
Cape Rifles, c. Question (Col. P. Herbert), 933

Army—cont.

- Cavalry and Infantry Commissions, c. Question* (Sir H. Stracey), 16
Cavalry Chargers, c. Question (Mr. Griffith), 447 Commissions, Sale and Purchase of, c. Address moved (Sir D. L. Evans), 17; Amend. (Capt. L. Vernon), 31; Amend. withdrawn, 68; [m. q., A. 59, N. 213, M. 154] ib.; Question (Col. Smyth), 342; Capt. Stackpole, 932 Estimates, c. 1468; Question (Maj. Gen. Peel), 1889
Examination Papers, Fraudulent Sale of, c. Question (Mr. Gregory), 2056
Military Organization, c. Question (Col. P. Herbert), 343 Regimental Establishments, c. Returns moved for, (Maj. Gen. Peel), 1240 Sandhurst Military College, c. Question (Sir F. Smith), 736 Staff Appointments, c. Question (Capt. L. Vernon), 1154; (Mr. Ellice), 1156;—Col. Connolly, Explanation; (Mr. Ellice), 1241 Transport of Troops—The "Himalaya," c. Question (Mr. Papillon), 1327 War Establishments, Organization of the, c. Question (Sir D. L. Evans), 1496;—See Militia—Rifle Corps—Yeomanry

ASHLEY, Lord, Cricklade, &c.

- Religious Worship, 2R. 540
 Rifle Volunteers—Shooting a Dog, 1495

Asia, Central, Trade in

- c. Question* (Mr. W. Ewart), 733

ATHERTON, Sir W., see SOLICITOR GENERAL TheATTORNEY GENERAL, The (Sir R. Bethell), Wolverhampton

- * Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Leave, 649, 675, 680, 683, 1494
 Chancery Evidence Commission, 1152
 France, Commercial Treaty with, 445
 Probate, Registry of the Court of, 932
 Stamp Duties, 3R. 1704
 Ways and Means, Com., Res. 9 (Stamps on Agreements), 1228

Attorneys, Solicitors, &c., (No. 2) Bill

1. 2R. 9; 3R.* 814
c. 1R. 964*;
 2R. 1905; Amend. (Mr. Knight), 1908, [o. q., A. 191, N. 29, M. 162] 1910

Australian Elections,

- c. Question* (Mr. Wyld), 1808

Australian Magistrates,

- c. Question* (Mr. G. W. Hope), 1242

Australian Naval Station,

- c. Question* (Lord A. Churchill), 645

AYRTON, Mr. A. S., Tower Hamlets

- Adulteration of Food, Com. cl. 4, 544
 Business, Public, Res. 1737
 Customs Acts, Res. (Hops) 695; Res. 20, 1755

[cont.]

AYRTON, Mr. A. S.—cont.

- Income Tax, Consid. 1580
 London Corporation, 1893
 Paper Duty Repeal, Com. cl. 1, Amend. 2089, 2093
 Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R. 1301, 1315; Adj. moved, 1317, 1792
 Religious Worship, 2R. 527, 586
 Representation of the People, 1802
 Stamp Duties, Com. cl. 9, 1584
 Ways and Means, Com. 1189; Res. 9 (Stamps on Agreements), 1228

BAILLIE, Mr. H. J., Inverness-shire

- Beaulay and Ness Fishery, 3R. 1239
 China, Expedition to, 647
 India—Paper Currency—The Army, 1153
 Representation of the People, 2R. 863, 866.

BAINES, Mr. E., Leeds

- Endowed Schools, 2R. 985
 France, Commercial Treaty with, Address moved, 131
 Registration of Voters, 2R. 73, 75
 Religious Worship, 2R. 539
 Representation of the People, 2R. 1090

BALL, Mr. E., Cambridgeshire

- Customs Acts, Report, 701

Ballot, The

1. Res. (Lord Teynham), 818, [Contents 4, Not-Contents 89, M. 35] 831
c. Leave, 935, [A. 147, N. 254, M. 107] 957

Bank of Ireland Bill,

- c. 1R.* 1491*

Bankrupt Law (Scotland) Amendment Bill,

- c. 1R.* 103*; 2R.* 833; 3R.* 1718
1. 1R. 1792*

Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill,

- c. Leave*, 649; 1R.* 683;
 Question (Mr. Vance), 1494;
 2R.* 1491

BARING, Rt. Hon. Sir F. T., Portsmouth

- Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Res. 1343, 1383, 1416
 Post Captains on the Reserved List, 1832
 Ways and Means, Com. Res. 1 (Income Tax), 1219

BARING, Mr. T., Huntingdon

- Customs Acts, Res. 20, 1746, 1748; Res. 21, 1760
 Stamp Act, The new, 2063
 Stamp Duties, Consid., 1607.

BARING, Mr. T. G. (Under Secretary for India), Penryn, &c.

- India—Reorganization of the Army, Papers moved for, 1521, 1522

BARROW, Mr. W. H., Nottingham, S.

- Conveyance of Voters, 2R. 1904
 Income Tax, Consid., 1670
 Ways and Means (Income Tax), Report, 1288

BASS, Mr. M. T., Derby
 Customs Acts, Report, 71
 Paper Duty Repeal, Com. cl. 1, 2092
 Religious Worship, 2R. 532

BATH, Marquess of Dwellings for Labouring Classes (Ireland), 2R.
 9; Com. 1018, 1475
 Valuation of Rateable Property (Ireland), Com.
 716

BAXTER, Mr. W. E., Montrose, &c.
 Representation of the People, 2R. 866

BAZLEY, Mr. T., Manchester
 Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Leave, 681
 India, Medical Officers in, 726
 Lambert, Capt., Murder of, 1495

BEALE, Mr. S., Derby
 Registration of Voters, 2R. 75

Beaulay and Ness Fishery Bill, 3R.* 1239; Amend. (Major C. Bruce), [o. q., A. 148, N. 93, M. 55] ib.

BEAUMONT, Mr. W. B., Northumberland, S.
 Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R.
 1819

BEECROFT, Mr. G. S., Leeds
 Endowed Schools, 2R. 987

Benefices, Union of, Bill,
 l. 1R.* 1471

Benefit Societies Rules Amendment Bill,
 l. 1R.* 330; 2R.* 440; 3R.* 703
 c. 1R.* 1142; 2R.* 1827; 3R.* 1491
 l. Royal Assent, 1897

BENTINCK, Mr. G. W. P., Norfolk, W.
 Army Estimates, 1469
 Business, Public, Res. 1028, 1729, 1739
 Church Rates Abolition, 3R. 2041
 France, Commercial Treaty with, Address moved, 273;—Differential Duties, Address
 moved, 1549
 Income Tax, Com. cl. 1, 1471; Consid. 1582
 Navy Estimates, 1869, 2014, 2021, 2026, 2031, 2036
 Norwich, New Writs for, 1148
 Post Captains on the Reserved List, 1848
 Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R.
 1821
 Representation of the People, 1799; 2R.
 2284
 Sir John Barnard's Act, Repeal, 2R. Amend.
 2037
 Stamp Duties, Com. cl. 1, 1583; Consid. cl. 17, Amend. 1085
 Ways and Means, Com. Res. 2. (Contract Notes), 1223; Report, 1296

BERKELEY, Hon. F. H. F., Bristol
 Ballot, The, Leave, 935, 939, 956
 Representation of the People, 2R. 915, 2206

Berwick-upon-Tweed Election,
 c. Report, 1491

BETHELL, Sir R., see ATTORNEY GENERAL,
 The

Beverley Election,
 c. Report, 833

Bills of Exchange, &c.—Ways and Means,
 c. Com. Res. 5, 1227; Report, 1800

BLACK, Mr. A., Edinburgh
 Paper Duty Repeal, 2R. 377; Com. 2084
 Preventive Service (Scotland), 984
 Representation of the People, 2R. Adj. moved, 2233

BLACKBURN, Mr. P., Stirlingshire
 Adulteration of Food, Com. cl. 2, 547
 Paper Duty Repeal Com. cl. 1, 2087, 2389

BLAKE, Mr. J. A., Waterford City
 Adulteration of Food, cl. 2, 547
 Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland),
 Leave, 1574
 Ways and Means (Income Tax), Report, 1274

Bleaching and Dyeing Works Bill,
 c. 2R. 993; Amend. (Mr. Turner), 996, [o. q.,
 A. 226, N. 39, M. 187] 1005

BONHAM-CARTER, Mr. J., Winchester
 Representation of the People, 1803

Book Post in the Colonies,
 c. Question (Mr. Peacocke), 1151

Borough Voters,
 c. Question (Mr. Griffith), 1243;—see Repre- sentation of the People Bill

Boroughs, Disfranchisement of
 c. Question (Sir M. Farquhar), 1805;—see Re- presentation of the People Bill

BOUVERIE, Hon. E. P., Kilmarnock, &c.
 Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Leave, 682
 Business, Order of, 1498
 Business, Public, Res. 1023, 1738
 Customs Acts, Report, 70
 Ecclesiastical Courts Jurisdiction, Leave, 1807, 1808
 France, Commercial Treaty with, Address
 moved, 195
 Friday Adjournments, 762
 Norwich, New Writs for, 1146
 Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Res. 1399, 1407
 Piers and Harbours, 2R. Adj. moved, 70 Religious Worship, 2R. Amend. 531

BOVILL, Mr. W., Guildford
 Attorneys, Solicitors, &c., 2R. 1913
 Coroners, 2R. 88
 France, Commercial Treaty with, Address
 moved, 163
 Paper Duty, Repeal, 1166; Com. Res. 2080

BOVILL, Mr. W.—cont.

Petitions of Right, Com. cl. 2, 2095

Sir John Barnard's Act, Repeal, 2R. Amend. 2038, 2039

Stamp Duties, Consid. cl. 17, 1696

Ways and Means, (Contract Notes), Report, 1300

BOWYER, Mr. G., Dundalk

Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Leave, 679

Confessional, The, 235

Italy—The Papal States, 1330, 1493

Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland), 1574

Bribery—Conveyance of Voters

c. Question (Sir A. Agnew), 339

BRIDGES, Sir B. W., Kent, E.

Customs Acts, Res. (Hops), 687 ; Report, 702

BRIGHT, Mr. J., Birmingham

Business of the House, 965

Business, Public, 1892

Income Tax, Consid. 1660

India—Re-organization of the Army, Papers moved for, 1516, 1522

Newdegate, Mr., and Mr. Cobden, 718, 725

Norwich, New Writs for, 1144

Paper Duty Repeal, 107 ; Com. cl. 1, 2091

Representation of the People, 2R. 894, 1086, 1097, 1098

Savoy, Annexation of, 1260, 1270

Supply—China—Naval and Military Operations, 779

BRISCOE, Mr. J. I., Surrey, W.

Navy Estimates, 2024

BRISTOW, Mr. A. R., Kidderminster

Coroner's Inquest in Kent, 1492

Navy Estimates, 2013

Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R. 1321

British Columbia—Island of San Juan,

c. Question (Mr. Longfield), 1616

BRUCE, Major C. L. CUMMING, Elgin and Nairnshire

Adulteration of Food, Com. 547

Beaulay and Ness Fishery, 3R. Amend. 1239

Supply—China—Naval and Military Operations, 800

Universities (Scotland), Leave, 68

BRUCE, Mr. H. A., Merthyr Tydvil

Navy Estimates, 2035

BUCHANAN, Mr. W., Glasgow

Coroners, 2R. 89

Customs, Com. cl. 12, 2096

BUCKLEY, Lieut.-Gen., E. P., Salisbury

Stamps on Newspapers, 1792

Business of the House,

l. Res. (Lord Redesdale), 1611

c. Question (Sir S. Northcote), 342 ; Statement (Lord J. Russell, 965

Business, Order of

c. Motion (Chancellor of the Exchequer), 1497 ; Motion withdrawn, 1500

Business, Public

l. Observations (Duke of Newcastle), 1231

c. Res. (Mr. Paull), 1022 ; Motion neg. 1029 ;

Res. (Lord J. Russell), 1720 ; Amend. (Sir

G. Grey), 1736, [A. 150, N. 126, M. 24] ;

[m. q., A. 142, N. 117, M. 25] 1739 ; Question (Mr. T. Duncombe), 1890

BUTT, Mr. I., Youghal

Stamp Duties, Consid. cl. 17, 1694

BUXTON, Mr. C., Maidstone

India—Reorganization of the Army, Papers moved for, 1504

BYNG, Hon. G. H. C., Middlesex

Church Rates Abolition, Com. add. cl. 1467

France, Commercial Treaty with, Address moved, 121, 343 ; Conference, 354

"Caesar"—H. M. Ship

c. Explanation (Sir C. Napier), 111

CAIRNS, Sir H. M., Belfast

Bleaching and Dyeing Works, 2R. 1003

Customs Acts, Res. 20, 1748 ; Res. 21, 1760

France, Commercial Treaty with, Address moved, 164, 182

Stamp Duties, Consid. cl. 17, 1690 ; 3R. 1701, 1703, 1704, 1707

CAMBRIDGE, Duke of, (General Commanding-in-Chief)

Mutiny, 2R. 1140

CAMPBELL, Lord, see CHANCELLOR, THE LORD

CAMPBELL, Hon. W. F., Harwich

Representation of the People, 2R. 882

CAMPERDOWN, Earl of

Whitworth Arms, 1611, 1615

Cape Rifles

c. Question (Col. P. Herbert), 933

CARDWELL, Rt. Hon. E. (Chief Secretary for Ireland), Oxford City

Business, Order of, 1500

Destitution in the West of Ireland, 1895

Ecclesiastical Courts (Ireland), 1168

Education (Ireland), 218, 1496, 1975

Evictions in Mayo, 339

Irish Business, 1022

Land Improvement (Ireland), Leave, 1807

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland), 1890 ; 2R. 2237, 2238

Londonderry, Lord Lieutenantcy of, 1625

Manor Courts (Ireland), 217

Paupers Removal, 1241

Representative Peers, Irish, 110

Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland), Leave, 1558, 1567, 1576

CARNARVON, Earl of

Savoy, Annexation of, 91, 707, 816
Spain and Morocco, 1322
Yeomanry Cavalry, 1476

CASTLEROSSE, Viscount, (Vice Chamberlain of the Household), Kerry Co.

France, Commercial Treaty with, Her Majesty's Answer to Address, 833

CAVE, Mr. S., New Shoreham

Customs Acts, Res. 20, 1750
East Indian Indentured Labourers, Papers moved for, 112
Foreign Policy of the Government, 109
France—Differential Duties, Address moved, 1547
Oyster Fisheries, 727
Ways and Means, Com. Res. 3 (Dock Warrants), 1225, 1226

CECIL, Lord R. T. G., Stamford

Jews Act Amendment, Leave, 961
Oxford University, Com. 90
Paper Duties Repeal, 2R. 386, 390
Religious Worship, 2R. 520
Representation of the People, 2R. 2210

Census (England) Bill,

c. 1R.* 1809

Census of 1861,

c. Question (Sir S. Northcote), 1151

CHANCELLOR, The LORD (The Right Hon. Lord Campbell),

Attorneys, Solicitors, &c., 2R. 11
Criminal Law Consolidation, Nomination of Com. 1873
Divorce Court, 816; 2R. 1873, 1882
France, Commercial Treaty with, Address moved, 634, 637
Municipal Corporation Mortgages, 2R. 1885
Savoy, Annexation of, 2043, 2044

CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, (Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone), Oxford University

Book Post in the Colonies, 1151
Business of the House, 342
Business, Order of, 1497, 1499
Business, Public, 1722
Currency, 2005
Customs Acts, 106; Explanation, 218; Res. (Hops) 684, 695, 701; Report, 702; Res. 20, 1742, 1745, 1747, 1753; Res. 21, 1755, 1759, 1760, 1761, 1792
Customs, Com. cl. 12, 2095, 2096, 2097, 2110; cl. 15, Amend. 2112
Divorces (Ireland), 704
Eating House Licences, 647, 746
France, Commercial Treaty with, Address moved, 309, 329
Income Tax, 648, 649; Com. 1469, 1470; cl. 1, 1471; Consid. 1580, 1582, 1583, 1664, 1672, 1684; 3R. 1697, 1700
Income Tax Collectors, 2004
Inland Bonding Warehouses, 2004
Malt Duty, 729

CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER—cont.

Newspaper Conveyance, Leave, 2071
Newspaper Stamp, 646
Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Res. 1407
Paper Duty Repeal, 108; 2R. 417, 418, 421, 436; Com. 1579, 2085; cl. 1, 2087, 2089, 2093; cl. 2, 2094
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R. 1301, 1302, 1315, 1317, 1767, 1771
Religious Worship, 2R. 522
Savings Banks and Friendly Societies Investment, 2064
Savoy, Annexation of, 351, 1185
Sir John Barnard's Act Repeal, Leave, 1708, 1710; 2R. 2037, 2040
Stamp Act, The New, 2064
Stamp Duties, Com. cl. 1, 1583; cl. 9, 1584, 1694, 1697; 3R. 1701, 1702, 1703, 1707, 1708
Supply—China—Naval and Military operations, 814
Timber Duties, The, 239, 1022
Ways and Means, Com. 1189, 1191; Res. 1 (Income Tax), 1194, 1211; Res. 2 (Contract Notes), 1222, 1223; Res. 3 (Dock Warrants), 1224, 1225, 1226; Res. 5 (Bills of Exchange), 1227; Res. 9 (Stamps on Agreements), 1228; Report, 1300, 1301, 1275, 1282, 1283, 1287, 1290, 1297, 1298
Wine Duties, Drawback on, 647

Chancery, Court of

c. 1R.* 216; 2R.* 718

Chancery Evidence Commission,

c. Question (Mr. Horsfall) 1152

Charities, Public, Bill,

c. 1R.* 1718

Charity Trustees,

c. Leave, 2066

CHELMSFORD, Lord

Attorneys, Solicitors, &c., 2R. 9
France, Commercial Treaty with, Address moved, 635
Qualification for Office Abolition, 2R. Amend. 1009 Selling and Hawking Goods on Sunday, 1R. 440; 2R. 832

CHICHESTER, Bishop of

Qualification for Offices Abolition, 2R. 1015

CHILDERS, Mr. H. C. E., Pontefract

Customs Acts, Res. 20, 1752, 1754; Res. 21, 1758, 1760

Children, Imprisonment of

c. Observations (Mr. T. S. Miller), 2048

Children in Workhouses, Religious Instruction to

c. Question (Mr. Kinnaid) 341

China,

Correspondence with, c. Question (Mr. B. Cochrane), 105

[cont.]

[cont.]

China—cont.

Elgin's, Lord, Mission, c. Question (Mr. B. Cochrane), 341 Expedition to, l. Estimate moved for (Earl Grey), 1586; Motion withdrawn, 1610
 c. Question (Mr. Baillie), 847 Supply—Naval and Military Operations, c. 766; Amend. (Sir D. L. Evans), 770; Motion withdrawn, 813; Report, 915 Tarrant, Mr., Liberation of, c. Question (Mr. E. James), 1808

Church Rates Abolition Bill,

c. Com. 1419; Amend. (Mr. Newdegate) 1430, [o. q., A. 222, N. 49, M. 173] 1458;
 cl. 1, 1460;
 add. cl. (Sir M. Peto) 1461; cl. withdrawn, 1463;
 add. cl. (Sir G. Grey) 1463; Motion neg. 1468; Question (Mr. Hadfield) 1893; 3R. 2040; Adj. moved (Lord J. Manners), [A. 76, N. 131, M. 55] 2041; Adj. moved, (Mr. Lygon), [A. 73, N. 124, M. 51] ib.;
 Question (Mr. S. Estcourt), 2046

CHURCHILL, Lord A. S., Woodstock
 Australian Naval Station, 645

CLANRICARDE, Marquess of

Divorces (Ireland), 704
 Dwellings for Labouring Classes (Ireland), 2R. 8, 9; Com. 1018, 1020, 1471, 1475
 Grand Canal, &c., Railway Companies, 5, 8
 India—Progress of, Papers moved for, 14;—
 Finance, Papers moved for, 1490, 1491;— Licensing System, 1586
 Parliamentary Boroughs (Ireland), Returns moved for, 1711, 1714
 Piers and Breakwaters, Returns moved for, 1233, 1238
 Police (Ireland), 711
 Savoy, Annexation of, 1115, 2042, 2043
 Tuscany, Provisional Government of, Papers moved for, 210, 332
 Tyne Harbour of Refuge, 1710

Clare Election,
 c. Report, 543

CLAY, Mr. J., Kingston-upon-Hull

Business, Public, 1730
 Franco, Commercial Treaty with, Address moved, 145

CLIFFORD, Mr. C. C., Isle of Wight
 Foreign Relations, 1995

CLIVE, Mr. G. (Under-Secretary of the Home Department), Hereford
 Coroner's Inquest in Kent, 730
 Registration of Voters, 2R. 75
 Toll Gates, 933

COBBETT, Mr. J. M., Oldham

Bleaching and Dyeing Works, 2R. 999
 Coroners, 2R. 77, 90

COCHKANE, Mr. A. D. Baillie, Honiton

Business, Public, Res. 1739
 China, Correspondence with, 105;—Lord Elgin's Mission, 341
 France, Commercial Treaty with, Address moved, 145
 Italy, Affairs of, 472
 Sardinia and the Duchies, 1741
 Savoy, Annexation of, 1184, 1328
 Supply—China—Naval and Military Operations, 812

COLEBROOKE, Sir T. E., Lanarkshire

Conveyance of Voters, 2R. 1902
 Customs Acts, Res. 21, 1761
 India—Reorganization of the Army, Papers moved for, 1520

COLLIER, Mr. R. P., Plymouth

Conveyance of Voters, 2R. 1895, 1905
 Coroners, 2R. 84

COLLINS, Mr. T., Knaresborough

Norwich, New Writs for, 1147
 Sir John Barnard's Act Repeal, 2R. 2039
 Turkish Medals, 835

Colonies, Defence of the

c. Question (Mr. Adderley), 1637

Commissions, Cavalry and Infantry,

c. Question (Sir H. Stracey), 16;—Sale and Purchase of, Address moved (Sir D. L. Evans), 17; Amend. (Capt. L. Vernon), 31; Amend. withdrawn, 68, [m. q., A. 59, N. 213, M. 154] ib.; Question (Col. Smyth), 342

Companies (1860) Bill,

c. 1R.* 1142; 2R.* 1491

Confessional, The

c. Question (Mr. Bowyer), 235

CONINGHAM, Mr. W., Brighton

Church Rates Abolition, 2047
 Jews Act Amendment, 2R. 1917
 Religious Worship, 2R. 541

CONOLLY, Mr. T., Donegal Co.

Bleaching and Dyeing Works, 2R. 1004

Consolidated Fund—Ways and Means

c. Com. Res. 91, 921

Consolidated Fund (£407,649) Bill,

l. 2R.* 91; 3R.* 195
 Royal Assent, 330

Consolidated Fund (£4,500,000) Bill,

c. 1R.* 216; 2R.* 338; 3R.* 645
 l. 1R.* 708; 2R.* 814; 3R.* 1005
 Royal Assent, 1110

Consolidated Fund (£850,000) Bill,

c. 1R.* 964; 2R.* 1020; 3R.* 1239
 l. 1R.* 1230; 2R.* 1322; 3R.* 1584
 Royal Assent, 1697

Consular Service,

c. Question (Mr. M. Milnes) 110

Contract Notes—Ways and Means,
c. Com. Res. 2, 1223; Adj. moved (Mr. Bentinck) ib.; Motion withdrawn, 1224; Report, 1296

Conveyance of Voters Bill,
c. 2R. 1895, Amend. (Mr. Newdegate) 1898;
Adj. moved (Mr. Henley), [A. 94, N. 81, M.
13] 1905;—see Bribery

CORK, Earl of France, Commercial Treaty with, Address
moved, 558

Cornwall, Duchy of (Limitation of Actions), Bill,
Com. 2071;
cl. 2, 2072; Amend. (Mr. Kendall), 2074, [A. 17, N. 69, M. 52] 2080

Coroners' Bill,
c. 2R. 77; Amend. (Mr. E. James), 81

Coroner's Inquest in Kent,
c. Question (Mr. T. S. Duncombe), 729; (Mr.
Bristow) 1492

Corrupt Practices Prevention Act,
c. Withdrawal of Motion (Mr. Craufurd), 121

CORRY, Rt. Hon. T. L., Tyrone Co.
Navy Estimates, 2012, 2016, 2035

County Prisons (Ireland) Bill,
c. 2R.* 338

Courts Martial,
c. Question (Capt. Jervis), 1243

COWLEY, Earl
Savoy, Annexation of, Res. 2125, 2131

COWPER, Rt. Hon. W. F. (Chief Commissioner of Works), Hertford
Edinburgh Post Office, 1150
Lightning Conductors, 726
Nelson Monument, The, 103
Pall Mall, Pedestal in, 1887
Parks, Shrubs in the, 111, 233
Westminster, New Palace at—The Great Bell, 108;—Stonework in, 232

CRANWORTH, Lord
Divorce Court, 2R. 1879
France, Commercial Treaty with, Address
moved, 638

CRAUFURD, Mr. E. H. J., Ayr, &c.
Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, Withdrawal of Motion, 121

CRAWFORD, Mr. R. W., London
Customs Acts, Res. 20, 1748, 1754; Res. 21, 1761
Income Tax, 648
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R.
1317

[cont.]

CRAWFORD, Mr. R. W.—cont.
Stamp Duties, Com. cl. 9, 1584
Ways and Means, Com. Res. 8 (Dock Warrants) 1226

Criminal Law Consolidation,
l. Nomination of Com., 1873

CROOK, Mr. J., Bolton
Bleaching and Dyeing Works, 2R. 993
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R.
Amend. 1762
Ways and Means (Income Tax), Report, 1295

CROSS, Mr. R. A., Preston Church Rates Abolition, Com. 1430; cl. 1, 1460; add. cl. 1463
Religious Worship, 2R. 529

CROSSLEY, Mr. F., Yorkshire, W. Riding
Representation of the People, 2R. 1080

Cruelty to Animals (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill,
c. 1R.* 15

Currency,
c. Question (Mr. Ald. Salomons), 2002

Customs Acts,
c. Report, 70;
Explanation (Chancellor of the Exchequer), 218;
Com. Res. (Hops), 684; Amend. (Mr. Dodson), 687, [o. q., A. 138, N. 104, M. 34] 701;
Report, 701; Adj. moved (Mr. Lygon), [A. 58,
N. 93, M. 35] 702, 835;
Com. Res. 17 (Drawback on Wood and Timber), 925;
Res. 20, 1741;
Res. 21, 1755; Amend. (Mr. Dalglish), [o. q.,
A. 64, N. 50, M. 14] 1758

Customs Bill,
c. 2R.* 15;
Com. cl. 12, 2095; Amend. (Mr. Haliburton), 2110, [A. 24, N. 91, M. 67] 2112;
cl. 15, Amend. (Chancellor of the Exchequer), 2112

Customs Resolutions,
c. Question (Mr. Horsfall), 106

DALGLISH, Mr. R., Glasgow
Customs Acts, Res. 21, Amend. 1758

DAWSON, Mr. R. P., Londonderry Co.
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland), 1890

DEASY, Rt. Hon. R., (Attorney General for Ireland), Cork Co.
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland), 1576, 1577
Tenure and Improvement of Land, (Ireland),
Leave, 1573

Debate, Conduct of,
c. Observations (Mr. Kinglake), 1188

Declarations—Ways and Means,
c. Com. Res. 12, 1229

DEEDES, Mr. W., Kent, E.

Boroughs, Disfranchisement of, 1806
 Business, Public, Res. 1027, 1729
 Coroners, 2R. 87
 Coroner's Inquest in Kent, 731
 Customs Acts, Res. (Hops), 690 ; Report, 702
 Norwich, New Writs for, 1150
 Ways and Means (Income Tax), Report, 1273
 Whitby Rectory, Papers moved for, 684

DE GREY AND RIPON, Earl, (Under Secretary for War)

Ballot, The, Res. 831
 France, Commercial Treaty with, Address moved, 590, 591
 Militia Artillery, 927, 929
 Municipal Corporation Mortgages, 2R. 1884
 Mutiny, 2R. 1118, 1123
 Oxford University, 2R. 1883
 Whitworth Arms, 1613
 Yeomanry Cavalry, 1477

Delivery Orders—Ways and Means, *c. Com. Res. 4, 1227DENISON, Rt. Hon. J. E., see SPEAKER, THE*DENMAN, Lord

Tuscany, Provisional Government of, Papers moved for, 211

DENMAN, Hon. G., Tiverton

Attorneys, Solicitors, &c., 2R. 1915

DERBY, Earl of

Business, Public, 1231, 1232
 France, Commercial Treaty with, 4 ; Address moved, 616
 Naples, Kingdom of, 706
 Oxford University, 2R. 1883
 Parliamentary Reform, Com. moved for, 1951, 1952
 Qualification for Offices Abolition, 2R. 1013
 Savoy, Annexation of, 4, 100

DICKSON, Col. S. A., Limerick Co.

Cavalry and Infantry Commissions, 16
 Commissions, Sale and Purchase of, Address moved, 31
 Navy Estimates, 2026
 Staff Appointments, 1158

DILLWYN, Mr. L. L., Swansea
 Endowed Schools, 2R. 965, 990DISRAELI, Rt. Hon. B., *Buckinghamshire

Business, Order for, 1498
 Business, Public, Res. 1724, 1737, 1739, 1891
 Church Rates Abolition, 2046
 Cornwall, Duchy of (Limitation of Actions), Com. c/l. 2, 2079
 East Indian Indentured Labourers, Papers moved for, 112
 Easter Recess, 1660
 France, Commercial Treaty with, Address moved, 156, 289
 Income Tax, Consid. 1678, 1680
 Italy, Affairs of, 490, 511

DISRAELI, Rt. Hon. B.—cont.

Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R. 1317
 Regimental Establishments, 1240
 Representation of the People, 2R. 839, 866, 915, 1109, 2238
 Savoy, Annexation of, 17, 344, 346, 1177, 1181, 1182
 Stamp Duties, 3R. 1704
 Supply—China—Naval and Military Operations, 814
 Ways and Means (Income Tax) Report, 1279, 1283

Divorce Court Bill,

l. Question (Lord Lyndhurst), 815 ; 1R.* 1109 ;
 2R. 1873

Dock Warrants—Ways and Means

c. Com. Res. 1224 ; Amend. (Mr. Hankey) 1225 ; Motion withdrawn, 1226

DODSON, Mr. J. G., Sussex, E.

Customs Acts, Res. (Hops), Amend. 681, 695, 697
 Stamp Duties, 3R. 1702

DOUGLAS, Sir C. E., Banbury

Business, Public, Res. 1734
 Conveyance of Voters, 2R. 1904
 Election Returns, 1165
 Newdegate, Mr. and Mr. Cobden, 722

Dover Election,

c. Report, 216

Drainage,

c. Question (Sir W. Miles) 1496

DUFF, Mr. M. E. G., Elgin, &c.

Foreign Relations, 1988

DUNCOMBE, Rear-Adm., Hon. A. Yorkshire, E. R.

Navy Estimates, 1855, 1859, 1867

DUNCOMBE, Hon. W. E., Yorkshire, N. R.

Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R. 1322
 Ways and Means, Com. Res. 1, (Income Tax), 1222

DUNCOMBE, Mr. T. S., Finsbury

Business, Public, 1890
 Coroner's Inquest in Kent, 729
 Jews Act Amendment, Leave, 960, 962 ; 2R. 1916, 1918
 Naples, Kingdom of, 339
 Norwich, New Writs for, 1143, 1149
 Registration of Voters, 646
 Toll Gates, 933

DUNGANNON, Viscount

Dwellings for Labouring Classes (Ireland), Com. 1019, 1473 Rochester, Diocese of, 711, 715

[cont.]

DUNNE, Col. F. P., Queen's Co.

Income Tax, Com. 1470; Consid. 1579, 1580;
Amend. 1661

Irish Paupers Removal, 740

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland), Leave, 1577

Mutiny, Com. 926

Supply—China—Naval and Military Operations, Report, 928

Tangiers, 1162

Dwellings for Labouring Classes (Ireland) Bill

l. 2R. 8;

Com, 1017; Amend. (Marquess of Westmeath), 1018; Amend. and Motion withdrawn, 1020, 1471; Amend. (Lord Redesdale) 1474, [o. q., Contents 24, Not-Contents 26, M. 2] 1476

3R.* 1710

East Indian Indentured Labourers,

l. Papers moved for (Earl of Ellenborough), 195

c. Papers moved for, (Mr. Cave), 111

Easter Recess,

c. Question (Mr. Spooner), 834; (Mr. Disraeli), 1660; Notice (Viscount Palmerston), 1793

Eating House Licences,

c. Question (Mr. Hardy), 647; (Mr. M. Milnes), 745

EBURY, Lord

Rochester, Diocese of, 712

Smithfield Market, 1715

Ecclesiastical Commission Bill,

c. 1R.* 645

Ecclesiastical Courts Jurisdiction Bill,

c. Leave, 1807; 1R.* 1974

Education (National) Ireland,

c. Question (Mr. Scully), 218; (Mr. Maguire), 1496; (Mr. Hennessy), 1974

EDWARDS, Major H., Beverley

Wakefield Commission, 447

EGERTON, Hon. A. F., Lancashire, S.

Bleaching and Dyeing Works, 2R. 1004

EGERTON, Hon. W., Cheshire, N.

India—Army in, 734

Whitworth Gun, The, 105

EGERTON, Mr. E. C., Macclesfield

France, Commercial Treaty with, 1616

EGLINTON, Earl of

Parliamentary Reform, Com. moved for, 1919

Elections, &c.

l. Returns moved for, (Earl of Airlie), 1110

c. Question (Sir C. Douglas), 1165

Electoral Returns

c. Question (Sir J. Pakington), 648

ELGIN, Earl of (Postmaster General)

China, Expedition to, Estimate moved for, 1601

ELLENBOROUGH, Earl of China, Expedition to, Estimate moved for, 1606, 1610

East Indian Indentured Labourers, Papers
moved for, 195, 196

France, Commercial Treaty with, 335, 337, 338

"Great Tasmania," Mortality on board the, 1005, 1006, 1007

India—Progress of, Papers moved for, 14, 15;

—Financial Statement of Mr. Wilson, 1230;

—Banks and Currency, Papers moved for, 1327, 1477, 1487, 1489, 1490, 1491

Militia Artillery, 928

Naples, Kingdom of, 704, 705

Savoy, Annexation of, 1, 98

ELLICE, Rt. Hon. E., Coventry

Commissions, Sale and Purchase of, Address
moved, 54, 59

Staff Appointments, 1156;—Col. Connolly, Explanation, 1241

ELLICE, Mr. E., St. Andrews

Beaulay and Ness Fishery, 3R. 1239

Universities (Scotland), Leave, 68

Wakefield, Bribery and Corruption at, 1632

ELPHINSTONE, Sir J. D. H., Portsmouth

Harbours of Refuge, 226

India—Reorganization of the Army, Papers
moved for, 1516

Naval Reserve, 2011, 2016

Navy Estimates, 1861, 1865, 1868, 1869, 2022, 2035, 2037

Post Captains on the Reserved List, 1820

Supply—China—Naval and Military Operations,
773, 777, 787; Report, 928

Emblements, &c. (Ireland) Bill,

c. 1R.* 1491

Endowed Schools Bill (Mr. Dillwyn),

c. 2R. 965; Amend. (Mr. Selwyn), 983, [o. q.,
A. 120, N. 190. M. 70] 991

Endowed Schools Bill (Lord Cranworth)

c. 2R.* 718; 3R.* 1142

l. Royal Assent, 1697

ESTCOURT, Rt. Hon. T. H. S., Wiltshire, N.

Attorneys, Solicitors, &c., 2R. 1915

Business, Public, Res. 1024, 1736

Church Rates Abolition, Com. add. cl. 1464;
3R. 2041, 2046, 2047

Conveyance of Voters, 2R. 1901

Piety and Virtue—Royal Proclamation, Address
moved, 2068

EVANS, Lieut. Gen. Sir De Lacy, Westminster

Armstrong Gun Factory, 2056

Commissions, Sale and Purchase of, Address
moved, 17, 67

India—Reorganization of the Army, Papers moved for, 1511;—Transport Ships, 1887

[cont.]

EVANS, Lt.-Gen. Sir D. L.—cont.

Staff Appointments, 1156

Supply—China—Naval and Military Operations, Amend. 766

War Establishments, Organization of the, 1496

EVANS, Mr. T. W., Derbyshire, S.
Church Rates Abolition, Com. 1450

EWART, Mr. J. C., Liverpool
"Great Tasmania," Mortality on board the, 934
Stamp Duties, 3R. 1706

EWART, Mr. W., Dumfries, &c.
Asia, Central, Trade in, 733
France, Commercial Treaty with, Address moved, 148
Hyde Park, 231
Prize Fighting, 2051
Stamps on Newspapers, 1792

EWING, Mr. H. E. Crum, Paisley
Customs Acts, Res. 21, 1760

EXCHEQUER, CHANCELLOR of the, see Chancellor of the Exchequer

FARQUHAR, Sir W. M. T., Hertford
Boroughs, Disfranchisement of, 1805
Business, Public, Res. 1732
East Indian Indentured Labourers, Papers moved for, 117
Income Tax, Consid. 1671
Lucknow Prize Money, 1493

FELLOWES, Mr. E., Huntingdonshire
Representation of the People, 2R. 2236

FENWICK, Mr. H., Sunderland
Beaulay and Ness Fishery, 3R. 1239
Customs, Com. cl. 12, 2095
France—Differential Duties, Address moved, 1541

FERGUSON, Sir J., Ayrshire
Carnatic, Nawaub of the, 733
Edinburgh Post Office, 1150
India—The Army, 1162, 1188
Representation of the People (Scotland), 728

FERMOY, Lord, Marylebone
Ecclesiastical Courts (Ireland), 1167
Endowed Schools, 2R. 984
Londonderry, Lord Lieutenantcy of, 1630
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R. 1320
Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland), Leave, 1566

FINLAY, Mr. A. S., Argyllshire
Foreshores (Scotland), 727
Piers and Harbours, 2R. 70

Fisheries (Ireland) Bill,
c. 1R. 1835

Fisheries (Scotland) Bill,
c. 1R. 1718

FITZGERALD, Mr. W. R. S., Horsham
Foreign Relations, 2002
Italy, Affairs of, 506, 512
Savoy, Annexation of, 353
Stamp Duties, 3R. 1706

Foreign Policy of the Government,
c. Question (Mr. Scully), 108; Observations (Mr. Horsman), 1975

FORTESCUE, Mr. C. S. (Under Secretary for the Colonies), Louth Co.
Australian Elections, 1809
Australian Magistrates, 1242
Ballot, The, Leave, 951
Tarrant, Mr., Liberation of, 1508

Fortifications, see National Defences

France

Commercial Treaty with, l. Notice (Duke of Newcastle), 4; Conference, 335; Question (Earl of Ellenborough), ib.; Address moved (Lord Taunton), 548, [Contents 68, Not-Contents 38, M. 30] 644; Notice (Lord Steward), 703; Explanation (Duke of Argyll), 717; Her Majesty's Answer, 818
c. Address moved (Mr. Byng), 121; Amend. (Lord A. V. Tempest), 163; Amend. withdrawn, 195; Adj. moved (Mr. Horsman) ib.; Adj. Debate, 247; Amend. (Mr. Horsman), 268, [A. 56, N. 282, M. 226] 327, 343; Conference, 354; Notice, 765; Her Majesty's Answer, 833;
Question (Mr. Newdegate), 444; (Mr. E. C. Egerton), 1616 Differential Duties, c. Address moved (Mr. Lindsay, 1528; Her Majesty's Answer, 1719 —see Savoy, Annexation of

Franchise, The Six Pound

c. Question (Mr. Steel), 884; (Mr. Griffith), 1020

FREELAND, Mr. H. W., Chichester
Lightning Conductors, 726
Navy Estimates, 2016, 2033

FRENCH, Col. F., Roscommon Co.
Barrack Masters, 2057
Business, Public, Res. 1024, 1729
Cornwall, Duchy of (Limitation of Actions), Com. cl. 2, 2079
Ecclesiastical Courts Jurisdiction, Leave, 1806
Irish Business, 1022
Londonderry, Lord Lieutenantcy of, 1806

Friday Adjournments,

c. Observations (Mr. E. P. Bouverie), 763; —see Business, Public

GARNETT, Mr. W. J., Lancaster
Ways and Means, Com. Res. 1, Income Tax, 1197

Gas, Sale of

- l. Petition (Lord Redesdale), 716
- c. Question (Mr. H. B. Sheridan), 761

GEORGE, Mr. J., Wexford Co.

- Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland), Leave, 1574

GIBSON, Rt. Hon. T. M., (President of the Board of Trade), Ashton-under-Lyme

- "Accrington," Transport, The, 446
- France, Commercial Treaty with, Address moved, 180, 183;—Differential Duties, Address moved, 1539
- Gas, Sale of, 762
- Harbours of Refuge, 227, 1152
- Lights and Buoys, 1720
- Oyster Fisheries, The, 110, 727
- Paper Duties Repeal, 2R. 393, 407
- Stamp Duties, 3R. 1705
- Telegraphic Arrangements, 340

GILPIN, Col. R. T. Bedfordshire

- Mutiny, Com. 926

GLADSTONE, Rt. Hon. W. E., see CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUERGOLDSMID, Sir F. H., *Reading

- Adulteration of Food, Com. cl. 4, Amend. 543
- Registration of Voters, 2R. 76
- Religious Worship, 2R. 521

GRAHAM, Lord M. W., Herefordshire

- Tenant Farmers—Income Tax, 224
- Ways and Means, Com. Res. 1 (Income Tax), 1195

Grand Canal, &c. — Railway Companies Bill

- l. Petition (Marquess of Clanricarde), 5

GRANVILLE, Earl (President of the Council)

- Divorce Court, 2R. 1882
- Italy, Affairs of, 334
- Parliamentary Reform, Com. moved for, 1965
- Savoy, Annexation of, 2042, 2043; Res. Previous Question moved, 2129, 2133

"Great Tasmania," Mortality on Board The

- l. Question (Earl of Ellenborough), 1005
- c. Question (Col. P. Herbert), 934; (Capt. Archdall), 1153

Greenwich Hospital

- c. Question (Mr. John Locke), 2045

GREGORY, Mr. W. H., Galway Co.

- Army Examination Papers, Fraudulent Sale of, 2056

GREGSON, Mr. S., Lancaster

- Singapore, 216

GREVILLE, Col. F. S., Longford Co.

- Volunteer Adjutants, 885

GREY, Earl

- China, Expedition to, Estimate moved for, 1586, 1610
- France, Commercial Treaty with, Address moved, 565, 643
- Militia Artillery, 929
- Mutiny, 2R. 1136
- Naples, Kingdom of, 707
- Parliamentary Reform, Com. moved for, 1920, 1969
- Savoy, Annexation of, 94, 100

GREY, Rt. Hon. Sir G. (Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster), Morpeth

- Business, Public, Res. 1027; Amend. 1735, 1737, 1891
- Census of 1861, 1151
- China—Lord Elgin's Mission, 341
- Church Rates Abolition, Com. 1452; add. cl. 1463, 1465, 1467
- Coroners, 2R. 87
- Income Tax, Consid., 1583
- Jews Act Amendment, Leave, 962
- Lunacy Laws, Committee on, 1329
- Norwich, New Writs for, 1147
- Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R. 1319
- Representation of the People, 2R. 1047, 1098, 1798
- Wakefield, Bribery and Corruption at, 1635

GRIFFITH, Mr. C. DARBY, Devizes

- Borough Voters, 1243
- Business, Public, Res. 1735
- Cavalry Chargers, 447
- Conveyance of Voters, 2R. 1902
- Debate, Conduct of, 1189
- France—Differential Duties, Address moved, 1551
- Franchise, The Six Pound, 1020
- Income Tax, 3R. 1700
- Italy, Affairs of, 479
- Norwich, New Writs for, 1143, 1147
- Stamp Duties, 3R. 1707

HADFIELD, Mr. G., Sheffield

- Attorneys, Solicitors, &c., 2R. 1915
- Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Leave, 683
- Business, Public, 1891
- Church Rates Abolition, 1893
- Heenan and Sayers, Fight between, 1889
- Inland Bonding Warehouses, 2004
- Piety and Virtue—Royal Proclamation, Address moved, 2067
- Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R. 1316

HALIBURTON, Mr. T. C., Launceston

- Adulteration of Food, Com. cl. 5, 546
- Customs, Com. cl. 12, Amend. 2097
- St. Pierre, French Fortifications on the Island of, 749
- Timber Duties, The, 237, 239, 240, 241

HAMILTON, Rt. Hon. Lord C., Tyrone Co.

- Army Estimates, 1468
- France—Differential Duties, Address moved, 1543

[cont.]

HAMILTON, Rt. Hon. Lord C.—cont.

Income Tax, Com. 1470 ; Consid. 1582
Representation of the People, 2R. 2236
Savoy, Annexation of, 1266
Stamp Duties, Consid. cl. 17, 1696

HANBURY, Mr. R., Middlesex

Smithfield Market, 2050
Ways and Means (Income Tax), Report, 1289

HANKEY, Mr. T., Peterborough

Customs Acts, Res. 20, 1749
Nelson Monument, The, 103
Ways and Means, Com. Res. 3 (Dock Warrants), Amend. 1225, 1226

Harbours of Refuge

c. Question (Mr. Lindsay) 225 ; (Mr. Danby Seymour), 1152 ;—see Tyne Harbour

HARDINGE, Viscount

Mutiny, 2R. 1141

HARDWICKE, Earl of

France, Commercial Treaty with, Address
moved, 637
Piers and Breakwaters, Returns moved for, 1237

HARDY, Mr. G., Leominster

Customs Acts, Res. (Hops), 699
Eating House Licences, 647
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R.
1317, 1775
Religious Worship, 2R. 540
Representation of the People, 2R. 2153

Heenan and Sayers, Fight between

c. Question (Mr. Hadfield), 1889 ; (Mr. W. Ewart), 2051

HENLEY, Lord, Northampton

Ballot, The, Leave, 945
Church Rates Abolition, Com. 1441, 1442

HENLEY, Rt. Hon. J. W., Oxfordshire

Attorneys, Solicitors, &c., 2R. 1916
Church Rates Abolition, Com. 1441
Conveyance of Voters, 2R. Adj. moved, 1900
Coroners, 2R. 84, 85
Customs, Com. cl. 12, 2096
Income Tax, 3R. 1698, 1701
Jews Act Amendment, 2R. 1919
Navy Estimates, 1864, 2021, 2022, 2028, 2030
Piety and Virtue—Royal Proclamation, Address moved, 2070
Post Captains on the Reserved List, 1833
Stamp Duties, Consid. 1695 ; 3R. 1703, 1707
Tenant Farmers, 245
Ways and Means, Report, 71

HENNESSY, Mr. J. P., King's Co.

Destitution in the West of Ireland, 1885
Education (Ireland), 1974
Irish Business, 1618
Italy—Central States, 1617
Land Improvement (Ireland), Leave, 1807
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland), 2R. 2238

[cont.

HENNESSY, Mr. J. P.—cont.

Manor Courts (Ireland), 217
Sardinia and the Duchies, 1740
Savoy, Annexation of, 2066
Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland),
Leave, 1575

HERBERT, Rt. Hon. H. A., Kerry Co.

Irish Paupers Removal, 741

HERBERT, Rt. Hon. S., (Secretary of State for War,) Wiltshire, S.

Armstrong Gun Factory, 2058
Army Estimates, 1468, 1469, 1889
Army Examination Papers, Fraudulent Sale of, 2058 Artillery, Officers of, 834 Barrack Masters, 2060
Business, Public, 1740
Cape Rifles, 933
Cavalry and Infantry Commissions, 16
Cavalry Chargers, 448
Colonies, Defence of the, 1641
Commissions, Sale and Purchase of, Address
moved, 47, 342, 933
Military Organization, 343
Militia, Disembodiment of the, 1162
Mutiny, Com., 926
Polish Refugees in the Crimean War, 1642
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R.
1318 Regimental Establishments, Returns moved for, 1240, 1241
Sandhurst Military College, 736
Staff Appointments, 1158
Supply—China—Naval and Military Operations, 766, 786, 813, 814 ; Report, 920, 921, 923
Transport of Troops—"The Himalaya," 1336
Turkish Medals, 110, 738, 835
Volunteer Adjutants, 835
War Establishments, Organization of the, 1496
Whitworth Gun, The, 105, 108

HERBERT, Hon. Col. P. E., Ludlow

Army Estimates, 1468
Business, Public, Res. 1740
Cape Rifles, 933
Commissions, Sale and Purchase of, Address
moved, 44
"Great Tasmania," Mortality on Board the, 934
India—Reorganization of the Army, Papers
moved for, 1510
Military Organization, 343
Mutiny, Com. 926
Supply—China—Naval and Military Operations, Report, 924

Herring Fisheries (Scotland Bill)

c. 1R.* 103 ; 2R.* 1327

HEYGATE, Sir F. W., Londonderry Co.

Londonderry, Lord Lieutenancy of, 1638

Highland Roads and Bridges Bill

c. 1R.* 1491

HOLMESDALE, Viscount, Kent, W.

Customs Acts, Res. (Hops), 636

HOPE, Mr. G. W., Windsor

Australian Magistrates, 1242
 Norwich, New Writs for, 1149, 1150
 Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Res. 1418
 Supply—China—Naval and Military Operations, 798

Hops—Customs Acts,

c. Res. 684; Amend. (Mr. Dodson), 687, [o. q., A. 138, N. 104, M. 34] 701

HORSFALL, Mr. T. B., Liverpool

Chancery Evidence Commission, 1152
 Customs Acts, Res. 20, 1752
 Customs Resolutions, 106
 France—Differential Duties, Address moved, 1539
 Pawnbrokers Act Amendment, 2R. 1578
 Religious Worship, 2R. 526, 534

HORSMAN, Rt. Hon. E., Stroud

Business, Public, Res. 1026, 1892
 China, Expedition to, 648
 Church Rates Abolition, Com. 1436; add. cl. 1466
 Foreign Relations, 1975
 France, Commercial Treaty with, Address moved, 194; Adj. moved, 195; Amend. 274, 326
 Italy, Affairs of, 474
 Paper Duty Repeal, 108; 2R. 407, 417, 418
 Savoy, Annexation of, 350, 1182, 1183, 1184, 1186, 1187, 1244

HUBBARD, Mr. J. G., Buckingham

Income Tax, Consid. 1667
 Stamp Act, The New, 2063
 Stamp Duties, Consid. cl. 17, 1692
 Ways and Means (Income Tax) Report, 1292; (Bills of Exchange), 1300

HUMBERSTON, Mr. P. S., Chester City

Pawnbrokers Act Amendment, 2R. 1579

Hyde Park—see Parks, TheIncome Tax,

c. Question (Mr. Crawford), 648

Income Tax Bill,

c. 1R.* 1239; 2R.* 1327;
 Com. 1469; cl. 1, 1471; Consid. 1579; Adj. Debate, 1660; Amend. (Col. Dunne), 1664; Motion Neg. 1666; Amend. (Mr. W. Williams), 1667, [A. 24, N. 174, M. 150] 1685 3R. 1697; Bill passed, 1701
 l. 1R.* 1697;
 2R. 1718; 3R. ib.
 Royal Assent, 1792

Income Tax Collectors,

c. Question (Sir S. Northcote), 2004

Income Tax—Ways and Means,

c. Com. Res. 1, 1194; Amend. (Sir H. Willoughby) 1211, [A. 132, N. 187, M. 55] 1219; Report, 1271

Inclosure Bill,

c. 1R.* 338; 2R.* 645; 3R.* 964
 l. 1R.* 1005; 2R.* 2112

India,

Army, Reorganization of the, c. Papers moved for (Col. Sykes), 514; House Counted out, 515; Question (Mr. A. Mills), 733; (Mr. H. Baillie), 1153; (Sir J. Fergusson), 1162; (Col. Sykes), 1164; Papers moved for (Col. Sykes), 1500; Motion neg. 1528

Banks and Currency, l. Papers moved for (Lord Monteaule), 1325

Carnatic, Nawab of the, c. Question (Mr. Smollett), 732

Delhi Prize Money, c. Question (Mr. Way), 234

Dhar, State of, c. Question (Lord Stanley), 445

Financial Statement of Mr. Wilson, l. Question (Earl of Ellenborough), 1230; Papers moved for (Earl of Ellenborough), 1477

Government of, c. Question (Lord Stanley), 1793

Licensing System, l. Petition (Lord Overstone), 1584

Lucknow Prize Money, c. Question (Mr. Vance), 1493

Medical Officers, c. Question (Mr. Bazley), 726

Paper Currency, c. Question (Mr. H. Baillie), 1153

Progress of, l. Papers moved for (Lord Monteaule), 12

Revenue, c. Question (Mr. Vansittart), 1886

Singapore, c. Question (Mr. Gregson), 216

Transport Ships to, c. Question (Sir D. L. Evans), 1887

Troops, British, c. Question (Gen. Peel), 217; —See East Indian Indentured Labourers

India House Museum,

c. Question (Col. Sykes), 783

INGHAM, Mr. R., South Shields

Confessional, The, 237

Coroners, 2R. 88

Inland Bonding Warehouses,

c. Question (Mr. Hadfield), 2004

Ireland,

Business, Irish, c. Question (Col. French), 1022; Observations (Mr. Hennessy), 1618

Clare Election, c. Report, 543

Destitution in the West, c. Question (Mr. Hennessy), 1885

Divorces, l. Petition (Earl of Wicklow), 704

Ecclesiastical Courts, c. Question (Lord Fermoy), 1167

Education, c. Question (Mr. Scully), 218; (Mr. Maguire), 1496; (Mr. Hennessy), 1974

Evictions in Mayo, c. Question (Mr. Maguire), 338

Londonderry, Lord Lieutenantcy of, c. Observations (Mr. Whiteside), 1620; Question (Col. French), 1805

Manor Courts, c. Question (Mr. Hennessy), 217

Parliamentary Boroughs, l. Returns moved for, (Marquess of Clanricarde), 1711

Paupers' Removal—The English Poor Law, c. Question (Mr. Lanigan), 738, 1021; (Mr. Maguire), 1241

[cont.]

Ireland—cont.

Police, l. Question (Marquess of Clanricarde), 711 Representative Peers, c. Question (Mr. Longfield), 110

See

Bank of Ireland Bill,
Dwellings for Labouring Classes (Ireland) Bill Emblements, &c. (Ireland) Bill
Fisheries (Ireland) Bill
Grand Canal, &c.—Railway Companies Bill
Land Improvement (Ireland) Bill
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Bill Lodging Houses, Common (Ireland) Bill
Marriages (England and Ireland) Bill
Poor Relief, &c. (Ireland) Bill
Spirits (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill
Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Bill Valuation of Rateable Property (Ireland) Bill

Italy, Affairs of,

l. Papers moved for, (Marquess of Normanby), 196 ; Motion withdrawn, 216 ; Explanation, 330
c. Correspondence presented (Lord J. Russell), 449 ;—Diplomatic Establishments, Question (Lord H. Lennox), 1242 ;—The Papal States, Question (Mr. Bowyer), 1330, 1493 ;—Central States, Observations (Mr. Hennessy), 1617 ;—see Savoy, Annexation of

JACKSON, Mr. W., Newcastle-under-Lyme

Naval Reserve, 2012
Navy Estimates, 2014, 2016, 2019, 2020, 2026
Navy Expenditure, 1020

JAMES, Mr. E., Marylebone

Attorneys, Solicitors, &c., 2R. 1910
Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Leave, 677
Coroners, 2R. Amend. 79
Income Tax, Consid. 1582
Pall Mall, Pedestal in, 1887
Pawnbrokers Act Amendment, 2R. Amend. 1578
Probate, Registry of the Court of, 931
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R. 1316, 1318
Registration of Voters, 2R. Amend. 73
Representation of the People ; 2R. Adj. moved, 1109, 1797, 2060, 2141
Sir John Barnard's Act Repeal, Leave, 1708
Stamp Duties, Com. cl. 9, 1584 ; Consid. cl. 17, 1688 ; 3R. 1706
Tarrant, Mr., Liberation of, 1808
Ways and Means, Com. Res. 9 (Stamps on Agreements), 1228

JERVIS, Capt. H. J. W., Harwich

Artillery, Officers of, 834
Commissions, Sale and Purchase of, Address moved, 39
Courts Martial, 1243
Militia Artillery, 1156
Norwich, New Writs for, 1148

Jews Act Amendment Bill,

c. Leave, 960 ; 1R.* 1020 ; 2R. 1916 ; Amend. (Mr. Newdegate), 1917,
 [o. q., A. 117, N. 75, M. 42] 1919

JOHNSTONE, Hon. H. B., Canterbury

Navy Estimates, 1868

JOLLIFFE, Rt. Hn. Sir W. G. H., Petersfield

Adulteration of Food, Com. cl. 6, 546
Navy Estimates, 2027, 2032

JONES, Mr. D., Carmarthenshire

Postage Service in Wales, 103

KELLY, Sir FitzRoy, Suffolk, E.

Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Leave, 672, 675
Confessional, The, 237
Conveyance of Voters, 2R. 1901
Customs Acts, Report, 70, 106, 702, 703
Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Res. 1376, 1387, 1392, 1411
Packet Service (Transfer of Contracts), 3R. 71
Sir John Barnard's Act Repeal, 2R. 2040

KENDALL, Mr. N., Cornwall, E.

Cornwall, Duchy of (Limitation of Actions),
Com. cl. 2, Amend. 2072, 2079

KER, Mr. D. S., Downpatrick

Adulteration of Food, Com. cl. 11, Amend. 546
Customs, Com. cl. 12, 2112
Stamp Duties, 3R. 1708

KING, Hon. P. J. L., Surrey, E.

Piety and Virtue—Royal Proclamation, Address moved, 2067, 2070
Religious Worship, 2R. 515, 542

KINGLAKE, Mr. A. W., Bridgwater

Debate, Conduct of, 1188
Foreign Relations, 1996
Italy, Affairs of, 504
Savoy, Annexation of, 104, 243, 344, 345, 751, 836, 1153, 1269 ; Notice of Motion withdrawn, 1329

KINNAIRD, Hon. A. F., Perth

Children in Workhouses, Religious Instruction to, 341
East Indian Indentured Labourers, Papers moved for, 120
India—Reorganization of the Army, Papers moved for, 1528
Italy, Affairs of, 480

KNIGHT, Mr. F. W., Worcestershire, W.

Attorneys, Solicitors, &c., 2R. Amend. 1907

KNIGHTLEY, Mr. R., Northamptonshire, S.

Jews Act Amendment, 2R. 1918
Representation of the People, 2R. 910, 2236

KNOX, Lt.-Col. B. W., Marlow (Great)

Army Estimates, 1468, 1469
Business, Public, Res. 1740
Lambert, Murder of Captain, 1244
Sandhurst Military College, 786

LAING, Mr. S., (Joint-Secretary to the Treasury), Wick, &c.

Customs Acts, Report, 70, 71

Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Res. 1364, 1368, 1369, 1370

Packet Service (Transfer of Contracts), 3R. 72

Postal Service in Wales, 104

Preventive Service (Scotland), 964

Stamp Duties, Consid. cl. 17, 1696; 3R. 1706

Stamps on Newspapers, 1798

Ways and Means, Report 71; Com. Res. 91 (Income Tax); Report, 1284

Lambert, Captain, Murder of

c. Question (Colonel Knox), 1244; (Mr. Bazley), 1495

Land Improvement (Ireland) Bill,

c. Leave, 1807; 1R.* ib.

Land, Titles to, (Scotland) Act (1850) Amendment Bill,

c. 1R.* 103; 2R.* 833

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Bill, (Mr. Deasy)

c. Leave, 1576; 1R.* 1577;

Question (Mr. Dawson), 1890;

2R. 2237; 2R. postponed, 2238

Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Bill, (Mr. Pollard Urquhart)

c. Leave, 1577; Motion neg. 1578

LANIGAN, Mr. J., Cashel

Irish Paupers Removal, 738, 1021

LAWSON, Mr. W., Carlisle

Ballot, The, Leave, 953

Leases, &c.—Ways and Means,

c. Com. Res. 10, 1229

LEATHAM, Mr. E. A., Huddersfield

Representation of the People, 2R. 858

LEEKE, Rear Adm. Sir H., Dover

Navy Estimates, 2014

Post Captains on the Reserved List, 1844

LEFROY, Mr. A., Dublin University

Religious Worship, 2R. 539

LEGH, Mr. G. C., Cheshire, N.

Whitworth Rifle, 108

LEIGHTON, Sir B., Salop, S.

Adulteration of Food, Com. cl. 5, 546

LENNOX, Lord H. G. C. G., Chichester

Italy—Diplomatic Establishments in, 1242

LEWIS, Rt. Hon. Sir G. C., (Secretary of State for the Home Department), Radnor

Adulteration of Food, Com. cl. 4, 543, 544

Boroughs, Disfranchisement of, 1806

Lewis, Rt. Hon. Sir G. C.—cont.

Bribery—Conveyance of Voters, 339

Business, Public, 1891

Children, Imprisonment of, 2053

Confessional, The, 236

Conveyance of Voters, 2R. 1899, 1901, 1902

Coroners, 2R. 81, 85, 89

Coroner's Inquest in Kent, 1492

Drainage, 1496

Ecclesiastical Courts Jurisdiction, Leave, 1807

Electoral Returns, 648

France—Differential Duties, Her Majesty's Answer to Address, 1719

Irish Business, 1620

Italy—Central States, 1620

London Corporation, 1893

Lunacy (Scotland) Act, 15

Oxford University, Com. 90

Petitions of Right, Com. cl. 2, 2094

Piers and Harbours, 2R. 70

Piety and Virtue—Royal Proclamation, Address moved, 2068

Porters, Rests for, 647

Prize Fighting—Heenan and Sayers, 1890, 2054

Registration of Voters, 2R. 74

Religious Worship, 2R. 534, 536

Representation of the People, 1799; 2R. 2172

Rifle Volunteers—Shooting a Dog, 1495

Roman Catholic Charities, 2056

Smithfield Market, 2055

Universities (Scotland), Leave, 69

Wakefield Commission, 447

LIDDELL, Hon. H. G., Northumberland, S.

France—Differential Duties, Address moved, 1543

Navy Estimates, 1868

Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R. 1315

Representation of the People, 2R. 891

Shipping, British, 448

Lightning Conductors,

c. Question (Mr. Freeland), 726

Lights and Buoys,

c. Question (Mr. Ridley), 1720

LINDSAY, Hon. Col. J., Wigan

Army Estimates, 1468

Commissions, Sale and Purchase of, Address moved, 42

LINDSAY, Mr. W. S., Sunderland

Business, Order of, 1497

Business, Public, 1721

Customs Acts, Res. 20, 1746

France, Commercial Treaty with, Address moved, 136; — Differential Duties, Address moved, 1528, 1552

Harbours of Refuge, 225

Navy Estimates, 1863, 1867, 2017, 2018, 2019, 2020; Amend. 2022, 2035

Post Captains on the Reserved List, 1823

LOCKE, Mr. JOHN, Southwark

Adulteration of Food, Com. cl. 4, 544

Attorneys, Solicitors, &c., 2R. 1908

Coroners, 2R. 86

Customs Acts, Res. (Hops), 688

[cont.]

[cont.]

LOCKE, Mr. John—cont.

Greenwich Hospital, 2045

Representation of the People, 1803, 1804

Sir John Barnard's Act Repeal, 2R. 2039

Ways and Means (Income Tax), Report, 1291

Lodging Houses, Common (Ireland) Bill,
c. 1R.* 645 ; 2R.* 1885

London Corporation Bill,
c. Question (Mr. Ayrton), 1893

LONDONDERY, Marquess of Dwellings for Labouring Classes (Ireland), Com.
1020, 1474

LONGFIELD, Mr. R., Mallow
Endowed Schools, 2R. 983
Representative Peers, Irish, 110
San Juan Question, 1616
Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland),
Leave, 1568
Ways and Means (Income Tax), Report, 1274

LOVAINE, Lord, Northumberland, N.
Militia, Disembodiment of the, 1155
Navy Estimates, 1852, 1854, 1855, 1856, 1858, 1863, 1866, 1867, 1868, 2019, 2020, 2021, 2023
Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Res. 1368, 1382, 1386, 1387

LOWE, Rt. Hon. R. (Vice-President of the Committee of the Privy Council for Education), Calne
Attorneys, Solicitors, &c., 2R. 1912
Endowed Schools, 2R. 971, 986
Stamp Duties, 3R. 1708

LUCAN, Earl of Grand Canal, &c., Railway Companies, 5
Mutiny, 2R. 1128

Lunatic Laws, Committee on
c. Question (Mr. Torrens), 1329

LYALL, Mr. G., Whitehaven
Spain—Navigation Laws, 2060

LYGON, Hon. F., Twokesbury
Church Rates Abolition, 3R. Adj. moved, 2041
Customs Acts, Report, Adj. moved, 702
Navy Estimates, 1860, 1866, 2014, 2023
Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Res. 1368

LYNDHURST, Lord
Divorce Court, 815, 816 ; 2R. 1877

LYVEDEN, Lord
India—Finance, Papers moved for, 1488

MACKINNON, Mr. W. A., Rye
Representation of the People, 2R. 2108

MAGUIRE, Mr. J. F., Dungarvan

Adulteration of Food, Com. 547

Business, Order of, 1499

Education (Ireland), 1496

Evictions in Mayo, 338

France, Commercial Treaty with, Address
moved, 151

Irish Paupers Removal, 742, 1241

Militia, Disembodiment of the, 1155

*Paper Duty Repeal, 2R. 378, 390

Polish Refugees in the Crimean War, 1640

Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland),
Leave, 1569

Malicious Injuries to Property Act Amendment Bill,
c. Leave, 1894 ; 1R.* ib.

MALINS, Mr. R., Wallingford
Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Leave, 679, 680
Business, Public, Res. 1740
Church Rates Abolition, Com. add. cl., 1463
Income Tax, Consid., 1583
Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Res. 1372, 1387
Representation of the People, 1801
Sir John Barnard's Act Repeal, 2R. 2039
Stamp Duties, Consid. cl. 17, 1696
Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland),
Leave, 1575
Ways and Means (Income Tax), Report, 1286

MALMESBURY, Earl of China, Expedition to, Estimate moved for, 1597, 1606
Dwellings for Labouring Classes (Ireland), Com.
1476
France, Commercial Treaty with, Address
moved, 584, 591
Militia Artillery, 928
Naples, Kingdom of, 706
Savoy, Annexation of, 97, 99, 710 ; Res. 2132, 2133
Tuscany, Provisional Government of, Papers moved for, 212, 215 ;—The Yacht "Medina," 1870

Malt Duty, The
c. Question (Mr. Packe), 729

Man, Isle of, Harbours Bill,
c. 1R.* 15 ; 2R.* 103

MANNERS, Rt. Hon. Lord J. J. R., Leicestershire, N.
Bleaching and Dyeing Works, 2R. 1003
Charity Trustees, Leave, 2066
Church Rates Abolition, Com. 1451 ; add. cl.
1466 ; 3R. Adj. moved, 2040
Customs, Com. cl. 15, 2112
Income Tax, Consid. 1581, 1582, 1583, 1661
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R.
1319
Savoy, Annexation of, 343, 1258

MARCH, Earl of, Sussex, W.
Beaulay and Ness Fishery, 3R. 1239

Marine Mutiny Bill,

c. 1R.* 515; 2R.* 645; 3R.* 964
 l. 1R.* 1005; 2R.* 1109; 3R.* 1322
 Royal Assent, 1897

MARLBOROUGH, Duke of Rochester, Diocese of, 713

Marriages (England and Ireland) Bill,

c. 3R.* 718
 l. 1R.* 814

Marriages (Extra Parochial Places) Bill,

l. 1R.* 1230; 2R.* 1471; 3R.* 2041

MARSH, Mr. M. H., Salisbury
 Ballot, The, Leave, 949

MARTIN, Mr. P. W., Rochester

Ways and Means, Com. Res. 1 (Income Tax), 1196

MASSEY, Mr. W. N., (Chairman of Committees,) Salford

Army Estimates, 1469
 Beaulay and Ness Fishery, 3R. 1239
 Church Rates Abolition, Com. add. cl. 1463
 Income Tax, Com. cl. 1, 1471
 Navy Estimates, 1852, 1868
 Representation of the People, 2R. 1067

Medical Acts Amendment Bill,

c. 3R.* 15
 l. 1R.* 91; 2R.* 330; 3R.* 1005
 Royal Assent, 1110

MELLOR, Mr. J., Nottingham

Charity Trustees, Leave, 2066
 Church Rates Abolition, Com. 1452
 Conveyance of Voters, 2R. 1901
 Pawnbrokers Act Amendment, 2R. 1578
 Religious Worship, 2R. 541

MILDMAY, Mr. H. F., Herefordshire

Coroner's Inquest in Kent, 730
 Hyde Park, Shrubs in, 230

MILES, Sir W., Somersetshire, E.

Coroners, 2R. 88
 Drainage, 1496
 Paper Duty Repeal, 2R. Amend. 354

Militia,

Artillery, l. Question (Earl of Shaftesbury), 927
c. Question (Captain Jervis), 1156 Disembodiment of the, c. Question (Mr. Maguire), 1155

MILLER, Mr. T. J., Colchester

Children, Imprisonment of, 2048

MILLER, Mr. W., Leith, &c.

Customs Acts, Res. 21, 1759

MILLS, Mr. A., Taunton

Attorneys, Solicitors, &c., 2R. 1912
 Business, Public, Res. 1737

VOL. CLVII. [THIRD SERIES.] [cont.

MILLS, Mr. A.—cont.

Church Rates Abolition, Com. 1454
 Endowed Schools (Mr. Dillwyn), 2R. 985
 India—Army in, 733; Papers moved for, 1520
 Paper Duty Repeal, 2R. 375

MILNES, Mr. R. M., Pontefract

Business, Public, Res. 1025
 Consular Service, 110
 Eating-Houses, Wine Licences to, 745
 Italy, Affairs of, 469
 Registration of Voters, 2R. 72, 76
 Religious Worship, 2R. 522
 Representation of the People, 2R. 2217
 Savoy, Annexation of, 1187

Mines Regulation and Inspection Bill,

c. 2R.* 1142

Mining Companies Cost Book—Ways and Means,

c. Com. Res. 7, 1227

MITCHELL, Mr. T. A., Bridport,

Customs Acts, Res. 20, 1751
 Stamp Act, The New, 2063
 Ways and Means, Com. Res. 3 (Dock Warrants), 1226

MONCREIFF, Rt. Hon. J., see ADVOCATE, the Lord

MONSELL, Rt. Hon. W., Limerick Co.

Business, Order of, 1500
 Navy Estimates, 2026
 Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland),
 Leave, 1571

MONTAGU, Lord R., Huntingdonshire

Representation of the People, 2R. 2187, 2198

MONTEAGLE, Lord

Business, Public, 1232
 France, Commercial Treaty with, Address
 moved, 572
 Gas, Sale of, 717
 Grand Canal, &c.—Railway Companies, 6
 India—Progress of, Papers moved for, 12, 15;— Banks and Currency, Papers moved for, 1325 Valuation of Rateable Property (Ireland), Com.
 715

Morocco, see Spain

MOWBRAY, Rt. Hon. J. R., Durham City

Adulteration of Food, Com. cl. 2, 547
 Church Rates Abolition, Com. add. cl. 1462, 1467

Municipal Corporation Mortgages Bill,

c. 3R.* 964
 l. 1R.* 1005;
 2R. 1884; 3R.* 2112

MURRAY, Mr. W., Newcastle-under-Lyme

Attorneys, Solicitors, &c., 2R. 1905
 Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Leave, 681

Mutiny Bill,

c. 1R.* 338 ; 2R.* 515 ;
Com. 926 ; 3R.* 964
l. 1R.* 1005 ;
2R. 1118 ; 3R.* 1322
Royal Assent, 1697

NAPIER, Vice-Adm. Sir C., Southwark

"Cæsar," H.M. Ship, Explanation, 111
Naval Reserve, 2008, 2010
Navy Estimates, 1855, 1856, 1858, 1860, 1862, 1865, 1866 ; Amend. 1867, 2020, 2021, 2025, 2032
Navy, State of the, 1809
Ways and Means, Com. Res. 1 (Income Tax), 1198

Naples, Kingdom of

l. Question (Earl of Ellenborough), 704
c. Question (Mr. T. S. Duncombe), 330

National Defences,

c. Question (Sir S. Northcote), 1329

Naval Reserve,

c. Observations (Sir C. Napier), 2008

Navy,

Chaplains, c. Question (Mr. Selwyn), 1492 Courts Martial, c. Question (Captain Jervis), 1243 Estimates, c. 1851, 2012 ; Amend. (Mr. Lindsay), 2023 ; Amend. neg. 2027 Expenditure, c. Question (Mr. Jackson), 1020 Greenwich Hospital, c. Question (Mr. John Locke), 2045
Post Captains on the Reserved List, c. Observations (Sir J. Elphinstone), 1820
State of the, c. Observations (Sir C. Napier), 1809

Nelson Monument, The

c. Question (Mr. Haukey) 103

NEWCASTLE, Duke of, (Secretary of State for the Colonies)

Ballot, The, Res. 827
Business, Public, 1231, 1232
Dwellings for Labouring Classes (Ireland), Com.
1018, 1472, 1475
Elections, &c., Returns moved for, 1115
France, Commercial Treaty with, 4, 5, 336, 337 ; Address moved, 638
Gas, Sale of, 716
Income Tax, 2R. 1718
Militia Artillery, 928
Parliamentary Boroughs, Return moved for, 1713
Police (Ireland), 711
Qualification for Offices Abolition, 2R. 1011
Rochester, Diocese of, 713, 714
Savoy, Annexation of, 3, 4, 92, 99, 709, 818, 931 Selling and Hawking Goods on Sunday, 2R.
832 Smithfield Market, 1716
Stamp Duties, 2R. 1717

NEWDEGATE, Mr. C. N., Warwickshire, N.

Business, Public, Res. 1738, 1893
Church Rates Abolition, Com. Amend. 1421, 1442, 1458 ; add. cl. 1461, 1463
Cobden, Mr., Explanation, 719, 721, 723, 725 Conveyance of Voters, 2R. Amend. 1898, 1900
Customs Acts, Res. 20, 1744
Endowed Schools (Mr. Dillwyn), 2R. 989
France, Commercial Treaty with, Address
moved, 326, 329, 444
Jews Act Amendment, Leave, 963 ; 9R.
Amend. 1916
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R.
1316
Religious Worship, 2R. 537
Representation of the People, 1804 ; 2R. 2227
Roman Catholic Charities, 2050
Ways and Means (Income Tax), Report, 1289

Newdegate, Mr., and Mr. Cobden,

c. Personal Explanation, 718

Newspaper Conveyance Bill,

c. Leave, 2071 ; 1R.* ib.

Newspaper Stamp,

c. Question (Sir S. Northcote), 646 ; (Mr. W.
Ewart), 1792

Nice, Annexation of, see SavoyNORMANBY, Marquess of Savoy, Annexation of, 94 ; Notice, 930, 931, 2041, 2042, 2043, 2044 ; Res. 2112, 2139

Tuscany, Provisional Governor of, Papers moved for, 196, 204, 209, 215 ; Explanation, 330, 334, 335 ;—Case of M. Tassinari, 1872, 1873 ;—Gen. Decavero, Explanation, 2044

NORRIS, Mr. J. T., Abingdon

Paper Duties Repeal, 2R. 372 ; Com. cl. 2, Amend, 2094

NORTH, Col. J. S., Oxfordshire

Commissions, Sale and Purchase of, Address
moved, 65
India—Reorganization of the Army, Papers
moved for, 1527
Staff Appointments, 1157
Ways and Means, Com. Res. 2 (Contract Notes), 1223

NORTHCOTE, Sir S. H., Stamford

Business of the House, 343
Census of 1861, 1150
Customs Resolutions, 106
Fortifications of the Country, 1329
France, Commercial Treaty with, Address
moved, 188
Income Tax Collectors, 2004
Newspaper Stamp, 646
Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Res. 1351
Paper Duties Repeal, Com. 1579
Telegraphic Arrangements, 340
Ways and Means, Com. 1193 ; Res. 1 (Income Tax), 1199 ; Report, 1296
Wine Duties, Drawback on, 647

Norwich Election,
c. Report, 338

Norwich, New Writs for
c. Motion (Mr. T. S. Duncombe) 1143

Oaths, Professional, Abolition Bill,
c. 1R.* 718

O'BRIEN, Mr. P., King's Co.
Commissions, Sale and Purchase of, Address
moved, 37

O'DONOGHUE, The, Tipperary Co.
Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland),
Leave, 1567

OSBORNE, Mr. R. B., Liskeard
Attorneys, Solicitors, &c., 2R. 1912
Italy, Affairs of, 510

OVERSTONE, Lord
*France, Commercial Treaty with, Address
moved, 596
India—Licensing System, 1584

Oxford University Bill,
c. Com. 90 ; 3R.* 216
L. 1R. 830 ;
2R. 1883

Oyster Fisheries, The
c. Question (Sir G. Pechell), 109 ; (Mr. Cave), 727

PACKE, Mr. C. W., Leicestershire, S.
Church Rates Abolition, Com. 1420
Customs Acts, Report, 702
France, Commercial Treaty with, Address
moved, 268
Malt Duty, 729
Tenant Farmers—Agricultural Prosperity, 243

Packet and Telegraphic Contracts,
c. Res. (Captain L. Vernon), 1331, [A. 117, N.
162, M. 45] 1419

Packet Service (Transfer of Contracts) Bill,
c. 3R. 71
L. 1R.* 91 ; 2R.* 440 ; 3R.* 1005
Royal Assent, 1110

PAGET, Lord C. E. (Secretary of the Admiralty), Sandwich
Australian Naval Station, 645
Chaplains in the Navy, 1492
Courts Martial, 1243
Greenwich Hospital, 2045
Naval Reserve, 2008
Navy Estimates, 1851, 1855, 1856, 1858, 1861, 1865, 1866, 1868, 1869, 2013, 2014, 2015, 2016, 2017, 2019, 2021, 2022, 2024, 2027, 2033, 2036, 2037
Navy Expenditure, 1020
Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Res. 1385, 1386, 1387
Piers and Harbours, 2R. 70

PAGET, Lord C. E.—cont.

Post Captains on the Reserved List, 1821, 1842, 1851
"Queen," H.M. Ship, 1151

PAKINGTON, Rt. Hon. Sir J. S., Droitwich
Borough Voters, 1243
Business, Public, Res. 1028, 1727
Children, Imprisonment of, 2049
Electoral Returns, 648
Income Tax, Consid. 1581
Navy Estimates, 1852, 1861, 2023, 2036
Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Res. 1386, 1416
Paper Duty Repeal, 2R. 434
Post Captains on the Reserved List, 1831
"Queen," H.M. Ship, 1151
Representation of the People, 2R. 1034, 1793, 1797, 2143
Savoy, Annexation of, 349
Supply—China—Naval and Military Operations, 790
Tenant Farmers, 244
Ways and Means, (Income Tax) Report, 1272, 1279

PALK, Mr. L., Devonshire, S.
Supply—China—Naval and Military Operations, Report, 922

Pall Mall, Pedestal in
c. Question (Mr. E. James), 1887

PALMERSTON, Rt. Hon. Viscount (First Lord of the Treasury), Tiverton
Ballot, The, Leave, 954
Business, Order of, 1498
Business, Public, Res. 1029, 1726, 1740, 1890, 1891
Church Rates Abolition, 3R. 2041 Commissions, Sale and Purchase of, Address
moved, 67
East Indian Indentured Labourers, Papers
moved for, 111, 112
Easter Recess, 835, 1660, 1793
Foreign Policy of the Government, 109, 1995
Fortifications of the Country, 1330
France, Commercial Treaty with, Address
moved, 194, 195
Income Tax, Consid. 1582, 1583
India—Reorganization of the Army, Papers
moved for, 1524, 1527
Italy, Affairs of, 481 ;—The Papal States, 1330
Londonderry, Lord Lieutenancy of, 1806
Navy Estimates, 1853, 1855
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R.
1317, 1322
Representation of the People, 2R. 915, 1109, 2233
Savoy, Annexation of, 347, 1180
Shipping, British, 448
Stamp Duties, Consid. c. 17, 1695 Supply—China—Naval and Military Operations, 803, 813
Ways and Means, Com. Res 2, (Contract Notes) 1228

PANMURE, Lord
Mutiny, 2R. 1118, 1142

Paper Duty Repeal Bill,

- c. Question (Mr. Bright), 107; 2R. 354; Amend. (Sir W. Miles), 365, [o. q.,
 A. 245, N. 192, M. 53] 436;
 Question (Mr. Bovill), 1166;
 Com. 1579, 2080; Amend. (Mr. Bovill), 2084;
 Amend. neg. 2087;
 cl. 1, Amend. (Mr. Blackburn), 2087; Amend. withdrawn, 2089; Amend. (Mr. Ayrton), ib.
 [A. 39, N. 147, M. 108] 2094;
 cl. 2, Amend. (Mr. Norris), 2094

PAPILLON, Mr. P. O., Colchester

Transport of Troops—The "Himalaya," 1827

Parks, Shrubs in the,

- c. Question (Sir A. Agnew), 111; (Mr. Mild-may), 230; (Mr. W. Ewart), 231

Parliamentary Reform,

1. Com. moved for, (Earl Grey), 1919;—see Representation of the People

PATTEN, Col. J. W., Lancashire, N.

Business, Public, Res. 1720, 1739

PAUL, Mr. H., St. Ives

- Business, Public, Res. 1022, 1029, 1733
 Malicious Injuries to Property Act Amendment, Leave, 1894
 Piers and Harbours, 2R. 69, 70

Paupers Removal,

- c. Question (Mr. Lanigan), 738, 1021; (Mr.
 Maguire), 1241

Paionbrokers Act Amendment Bill,

- c. 1R.* 1020;
 2R. 1578; Amend. (Mr. E. James), ib., [o. q.,
 A. 178, N. 32, M. 146] 1579

PEACOCKE, Mr. G. M. W., Maldon

- Adulteration of Food, Com. cl. 4, 545
 Book Post in the Colonies, 1151
 France, Commercial Treaty with, Address
 moved, 142
 Representation of the People, 2R. 2220
 Ways and Means, Com. Res. 2 (Contract Notes), 1224

PEASE, Mr. H., Durham, S.

- Coroners, 2R. 89
 Income Tax, Consid. 1671
 Registration of Voters, 2R. 75
 Ways and Means (Income Tax), Report, 1288

PECHELL, Rear Adm. Sir G. R. B., Brighton

- Conveyance of Voters, 2R. 1905
 Oyster Fisheries, The, 109

PEEL, Rt. Hon. Major Gen. J., Huntingdon

- Army Estimates—1889
 India, British Troops in, 217 Regimental Establishments, Returns moved
 for, 1240
 Supply—China—Naval and Military Operations, Report, 915

PEEL, Sir R., Tamworth

- France, Commercial Treaty with, Address
 moved, 280, 753
 Savoy, Annexation of, 845, 838, 1643, 1648

Peterborough Election,

- c. Report, 514

Petitions of Right Bill,

- c. Com. cl. 2, 2094; cl. struck out, 2095

PETO, Sir S. M., Finsbury

- Church Rates Abolition, Com. 1444; add. cl.
 1461
 Navy Estimates, 2033
 Ways and Means, Com. Res. 1, (Income Tax), 1206

PEVENSEY, Viscount, Sussex, E.

- Customs Acts, Res. (Hops), 692

PHILIPPS, Mr. J. H., Haverfordwest

- Church Rates Abolition, Com. 1443

Piedmont and the Duchies,

- c. Question (Mr. Hennessy), 1740;—See Savoy

Piers and Breakwaters,

1. Returns moved for, (Marquess of Clanricarde) 1233; Motion withdrawn, 1238

Piers and Harbours Bill,

- c. 2R. 69; Adj. moved (Mr. E. P. Bouverie), 70

Pisty and Virtue—Royal Proclamation,

- c. Address moved (Mr. L. King), 2067, [A. 112,
 N. 75, M. 37] 2070

PIGOTT, Mr. F., Reading

- Ways and Means (Income Tax) Report, 1288

Poison, Administering of, Bill,

1. 3R.* 440
 Royal Assent, 1110

Police and Towns Improvement (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill,

- c. 1R.* 1718

Polish Refugees in the Crimean War,

- c. Question (Mr. Maguire), 1640

POLLARD-URQUHART, Mr. W., Westmeath Co.

- Income Tax, Consid. 1671
 Landlord and Tenant (Ireland), Leave, 1577
 Ways and Means (Income Tax), Report, 1274

Poor Law Medical Relief Bill,

- c. 1R.* 1327

Poor Relief, &c. (Ireland) Bill,

- c. 1R.* 1491

Porters, Rests for

- c. Question (Mr. Slaney), 647

Postal Service in Wales,

c. Question (Mr. Jones), 103

Prisons (Scotland) Act Continuance Bill,

c. 3R.* 718

l. 1R.* 814

Prisons (Scotland), (No. 2) Bill,

c. 1R.* 1718

Prize Fight—Heenan and Sayers,

c. Question (Mr. Hadfield), 1889; (Mr. W. Ewart), 2051

Probate and Administration (India) Bill,

l. Royal Assent, 1110

Probate, Registry of the Court of,

c. Question (Mr. E. James), 931

Probates, &c.—Ways and Means,

c. Com. Res. 11, 1229; Report, 1301

PULLER, Mr. C. W. G., Hertfordshire

Rags, Foreign, Export Duty on, 840, 964

Ways and Means (Probates), Report, 1301

*Qualification for Offices Abolition Bill,*l. 2R. 1007; Amend. (Lord Chelmsford), 1011, [o. q., Contents 21, Not-Contents 44, M. 23]
1016*"Queen," H. M. Ship,*

c. Question (Sir J. Pakington), 1151

Rags, Foreign, Export Duty on,

c. Question (Mr. Puller), 840, 964

REDESDALE, Lord (Chairman of Committees)

Business of the House, Res. 1611

Divorce Court, 2R. 1880

Dwellings for Labouring Classes (Ireland), 2R.
8; Com. 1018, 1019, 1473; Amend. 1474

Gas, Sale of, 716, 717

Grand Canal, &c.—Railway Companies, 6

Municipal Corporation Mortgages, 2R. 1884

Naples, Kingdom of, 705

Rochester, Diocese of, 714

Valuation of Rateable Property (Ireland), 715

Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences Bill,

c. 1R.* 515;

2R. 1301; Adj. moved (Mr. Wyld), 1315,

[A. 122, N. 150, M. 28] 1317; Adj. Debate, 1762; Amend. (Mr. Crook), 1764; Adj.

moved (Mr. Ayrton), 1792

Registers of Births, &c.—Ways and Means,

c. Com. Res. 6, 1227

*Registration of Voters Bill,*c. 2R. 72; Amend. (Mr. E. James), 74; Amend. and Motion withdrawn, 77;

Question (Mr. T. S. Duncombe), 646

Religious Worship Bill,

c. 2R. 515; Amend. (Mr. E. P. Bouverie), 532,

[o. q., A. 131, N. 168, M. 37] 542

*Representation of the People Bill,*c. 2R. 839; Adj. moved (Mr. Stansfeld), 915; Adj. Debate, 1030; Adj. moved (Mr. E.
James), 1109, 2141; Adj. moved (Mr. Black).
2233;Question (Sir J. Pakington), 1793; (Mr. E.
James), 2060; (Mr. B. Osborne), 2141—See*Franchise, The Six Pound*

[Copy of the Bill, Appendix.]

Representation of the People (Scotland) Bill,

c. Question (Sir J. Fergusson), 728

RICH, Mr. H., Richmond

Business, Public, 1728

Commissions, Sale and Purchase of, Address moved, 20*RICHARDSON, Mr. J., Lisburn*

Bleaching and Dyeing Works, 2R. 996, 1004

*RIDLEY, Mr. G., Newcastle-on-Tyne*France, Commercial Treaty with, Address
moved, 159

Lights and Buoys, 1720

Navy Estimates, 2032

Piers and Harbours, 2R. 69

Rifle Volunteer Corps,

c. Adjutants for, Question (Col. Greville), 835—

Shooting a Dog, Question (Lord Ashley), 1495*ROBARTES, Mr. T. J. A., Cornwall, E.*Cornwall, Duchy of, (Limitation of Actions), Com. cl. 2, 2074*Rochester, Diocese of,*

l. Question (Viscount Dungannon), 711

*ROEBUCK, Mr. J. A., Sheffield*Adulteration of Food, Com. cl. 4, 544; cl. 5, 546

Bleaching and Dyeing Works, 2R. 996

Church Rates Abolition, Com. add. cl. 1464

Endowed Schools (Mr. Dillwyn), 2R. 986

Income Tax, Consid. 1668

Jews Act Amendment, Leave, 962

Norwich, New Writs for, 1145

Savoy, Annexation of, 1186

Tenant Farmers, 244

*ROGERS, Mr. J. J., Helston*Cornwall, Duchy of, (Limitation of Actions), Com. cl. 2, 2077, 2079*ROLT, Mr. J., Gloucestershire, W.*

Representation of the People, 2R. 871

Roman Catholic Charities,

c. Question (Mr. Newdegate), 2050

RUSSELL, Right Hon. Lord J. (Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs), London

Borough Voters, 1243

Business of the House, 965

Business, Public, Res. 1720, 1731

[cont.]

RUSSELL, Rt. Hon. Lord J.—cont.

China, Correspondence with, 105 ;—Expedition to, 647, 648

Consular Service, 111

East Indian Indentured Labourers, Papers moved for, 118

Foreign Relations, 1988

France, Commercial Treaty with, Address moved, 249, 1616

Franchise, The Six Pound, 834, 1021

Income Tax, Consid. 1661

Italy, Affairs of, 449, 512 ;—Diplomatic Establishments in, 1242 ;—The Papal States, 1493

Lambert, Captain, Murder of, 1244, 1495

Naples, Kingdom of, 339

Rags, Foreign, Export Duty on, 340, 964

Registration of Voters, 646

Representation of the People, 2R. 839, 1109, 2061, 2181, 2235

St. Pierre, French Fortifications on the Island of, 757

San Juan Question, 1616

Sardinia and the Duchies, 1741

Savoy, Annexation of, 16, 17, 104 ; Explanation, 245, 343, 344, 345, 350, 759, 838, 1153, 1173, 1252, 1719

Spain, Protestant Residents in, 758 ;—Navigation Laws, 2061

Supply—China—Naval and Military Operations, 770, 777

ST. AUBYN, Mr. J., Cornwall, W.

Cornwall, Duchy of, (Limitation of Actions), Com. cl. 2, 2075

ST. GERMAN, Earl of (Lord Steward of the Household)

France, Commercial Treaty with, Address, 703 ; Her Majesty's Answer, 818

Selling and Hawking Goods on Sunday, 2R. 832

ST. LEONARDS, Lord

Divorce Court, 2R. 1876

Savoy, Annexation of, 2044

St. Mary in Rydal Marriages Validity Bill,

l. Royal Assent, 330

St. Pierre, French Fortifications on the Island of,

c. Question (Mr. Haliburton), 749

SALOMONS, Mr. Alderman D., Greenwich

"Accrington" Transport, The, 446

Currency, 2002

Income Tax, Consid. 1670

Navy Estimates, 2015, 2022

Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R. 1322

Westminster, New Palace at—The Great Bell, 103

Sandhurst Military College,

c. Question (Sir F. Smith), 736

Sardinia—see Piedmont

Savings Banks and Friendly Societies Investments Bill,

c. Question (Mr. S. Estcourt), 2063

Savoy and Nice, Annexation of

l. Question (Earl of Ellenborough), 1 ; Observations (Earl of Carnarvon), 91, 707, 816, Notice (Marquess of Normanby), 930 ; Motion postponed, 2041 ; Question (Marquess of Clanricarde) 1115 ; Res. (Marquess of Normanby), 2112 ; Previous Question Moved (Earl Granville), 2132 ; Motion neg. 2140.

c. Question (Sir J. Walsh), 16, 104 ; (Lord A. Vane-Tempest), 241 ; Explanation (Lord J. Russell), 245 ; Question (Lord J. Manners), 343 ; (Mr. Kinglake), 751, 836, 1153 ; (Mr. H. D. Seymour), 1169 ; Observations (Mr. Horsman), 1244 ; Question (Mr. B. Cochrane), 1328 ; Observations (Sir R. Peel), 1643 ; (Lord J. Russell), 1719 ; (Mr. Hennessy), 2066 ;—see Italy, Affairs of—Tuscany

SCHOLEFIELD, Mr. W., Birmingham

Adulteration of Food, Com. cl. 4, 543, 545 ; cl. 5, 546 ; cl. 2, 547

Schools, Endowed Bill (Mr. Dillwyn)

c. 2R. 965 ; Amend. (Mr. Selwyn), 983, [o. q., A. 120, N. 190, M. 70], 991

Schools, Endowed Bill, (Lord Cranworth)

c. 2R.* 718 ; 3R.* 1142

l. Royal Assent, 1697

SCLATER-BOTH, Mr. G., Hampshire, N.

Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R. 1822

Scotch Bonds—Ways and Means

c. Com. Res. 8, 1228

Scotland,

Edinburgh Post Office, c. Question (Sir J. Fergusson), 1150

Foreshores, c. Question (Mr. Finlay), 727

Lunacy (Scotland) Act, c. Question, (Mr. Stirling), 15

Port Patrick and Donaghadee Harbours, c. Com. moved for, (Gen. Upton), 963 ; House counted out, ib.

Preventive Service, c. Question (Mr. Black) 964

See Bankrupt Law (Scotland) Amendment Bill
Cruelty to Animals (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill

Fisheries (Scotland) Bill

Herring Fisheries (Scotland) Bill

Highland Roads and Bridges Bill

Land, Titles to (Scotland) Act (1858) Amendment Bill

Police and Towns Improvement (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill

Prisons (Scotland) Act Continuance Bill

Representation of the People (Scotland) Bill

Universities (Scotland) Bill

Valuation of Lands, (Scotland), Act Amendment Bill

SCULLY, Mr. V., Cork Co.

Coroners, 2R. 83
 Education, National, (Ireland) 218
 Foreign Policy of the Government, 108
 Prize Fighting, 2052
 Representation of the People, 2R. 2236

Selling and Hawking Goods on Sunday Bill,

l. 1R. 440;
 2R. 832

SELWYN, Mr. C. J., Cambridge University

Chaplains in the Navy, 1492
 Church Rates Abolition, Com. add. cl. 1462
 Endowed Schools, (Mr. Dillwyn), 2R. Amend. 979

SEYMER, Mr. H. K., Dorsetshire

Business of the House, 342
 Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R. 1767, 1771
 Representation of the People, 2R. 1084, 1086

SEYMOUR, Rear-Adm., Sir M., Devonport

Navy Estimates, 2012
 Post Captains on the Reserved List, 1828
 Supply—China—Naval and Military Operations, Report, 925

SEYMOUR, Mr. H. Danby, Poole

Ecclesiastical Courts (Ireland) 1168
 Harbours of Refuge, 1152
 Religious Worship, 2R. 529
 Savoy, Annexation of, 1169

SEYMOUR, Mr. W. Digby, Southampton

France—Differential Duties, Address moved, 1546
 Naval Reserve, 2010
 Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R. 1816, 1764

SHAFTESBURY, Earl of

Militia Artillery, 927

SHELBURNE, Earl of

Grand Canal, &c.—Railway Companies, 7

SHELLEY, Sir J. V., Westminster

Conveyance of Voters, 2R. 1900
 Hyde Park, Shrubs in, 231

SHERIDAN, Mr. H. B., Dudley

Gas, Sale of, 761
 Income Tax, Consid. 1581, 1671

Shipping, British

c. Question (Mr. Liddell), 448

Singapore,

c. Question (Mr. Gregson), 216

Sir John Barnard's Act, &c., Repeal Bill,

c. Leave, 1708; 1R.* 1710;
 2R. 2037; Adj. moved (Mr. Bentinck), [A. 67, N. 156, M. 89] 2038; Adj. moved (Mr. Bovill), [A. 60, N. 153, M. 93] 2039

SLANEY, Mr. R. A., Shrewsbury

Children, Imprisonment of, 2050
 France, Commercial Treaty with, Address moved, 163
 Piety and Virtue,—Royal Proclamation, Address moved, 2070
 Porters, Rests for, 647
 Ways and Means, Com., 1193

SMITH, Major Gen. Sir J. M. F., Chatham

Commissions, Sale and Purchase of, Address moved, 37
 Harbours of Refuge, 226
 Sandhurst, Military College at, 736

SMITH, Mr. Augustus, Truro

Business, Public, Res. 17, 33
 Cornwall, Duchy of, (Limitation of Actions), Com. 2071; cl. 2, 2080

SMITH, Mr. Montague, E., Truro

Attorneys, Solicitors, &c., 2R. 1911
 Conveyance of Voters, 2R. 1903
 Cornwall, Duchy of, (Limitation of Actions), Com. cl. 2, 2078
 Coroners, 2R. 83

Smithfield Market,

l. Question (Lord Ebury), 1715
 c. Question (Mr. Hanbury), 2050

SMOLLETT, Mr. P. B., Dumbartonshire

Carnatic, Nawaub of the, 732

SMYTH, Col. J. G., York

Commissions, Purchase of, 342

SOLICITOR GENERAL, THE, (Sir W. Atherton,) *Durham City

Attorneys, Solicitors, &c., 2R. 1915
 Bankruptcy and Insolvency, Leave, 680
 Cornwall, Duchy of, (Limitation of Actions), Com. cl. 2, 2075, 2079
 Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Res. 1380, 1391
 Sir John Barnard's Act Repeal, 2R. 2038
 Stamp Duties, Consid., cl. 17, 1688

SOMERSET, DUKE OF (First Lord of the Admiralty)

China, Expedition to, Estimate moved for, 1592
 "Great Tasmania," Mortality on board the, 1006, 1007 Mutiny, 2R. 1132, 1142
 Naples, 705, 706
 Piers and Breakwaters, Returns moved for, 1236

SOMERVILLE, Rt. Hon., Sir W. M., *Canterbury

Norwich, New Writs for, 1150

Spain

Morocco, War with, l. Question (Earl of Carnarvon), 1322
 c. Question (Col. Dunne), 1162; Reply (Lord J. Russell), 1174 Navigation Laws, c. Question (Mr. Lyall), 2060 Protestant Residents in, c. Question (Mr. Whiteside), 757

SPE STA INDEX, 1860 STA TEN

SPEAKER, THE, (Rt. Hon. J. E. Denison) Nottinghamshire, N. Ballot, The, Leave, 939 Business of the House, 965 Business, Public, Res. 1737 Church Rates Abolition, Com. 1431, 1458 France, Commercial Treaty with, 444 Income Tax, Com. 1470; Consid. 1553 Newdegate, Mr., and Mr. Cobden, 721, 723 Norwich, New Writs for, 1148 Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Res. 1368, 1369, 1407 Paper Duties, 1166 Piety and Virtue—Royal Proclamation, Address moved, 2070 Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences Bill, 2R. 1303 Representation of the People, 1804 Savoy, Annexation of, 241, 242, 345, 1183, 1184, 1187, 1648 Sir John Barnard's Act Repeal, 2R. 2039 Stamp Duties, 3R. 1702, 1703	STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, Lord Grand Canal, &c.—Railway Companies, 7
Spirits (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill, c. 3R.* 103 L. 1R.* 195	STANSFELD, Mr. J., Halifax Representation of the People, 2R. Adj. moved, 915, 1030
SPOONER, Mr. R., Warwickshire, N. Easter Recess, 834 Jews Act Amendment, 2R. 1917 Religious Worship, 2R. 541	STEEL, Mr. J., Cockermouth Franchise, The Six Pound, 834
STACKPOLE, Capt. W., Essex Officers' Commissions, 933	STEUART, Mr. A., Cambridge Business, Public, Res. 1029 Representation of the People, 2R. 1076 Universities (Scotland), Leave, Adj. moved, 69
Stamp Act, The New c. Question (Mr. Mitchell), 2063 .	STIRLING, Mr. W., Perthshire Lunacy (Scotland) Act, 15 Savoy, Annexation of, 1170 University (Scotland), Leave, 69
Stamp Duties Bill, c. 1R.* 1239; 2R.* 1419; Com. cl. 1, 1583; cl. 9, 1584; Consid. cl. 17, 1685; Amend. (Mr. Bentinck), 1687; 3R. 1701 L. 1R.* 1687; 2R. 1717; 3R.* 1718 Royal Assent, 1792	STRACEY, Sir H. J., Great Yarmouth Cavalry and Infantry Commissions, 16 France—Differential Duties, Address moved, 1539
Stamps on Newspapers c. Question (Sir S. Northcote), 646; (Mr. W. Ewart), 1793	STUART, Major W., Bedford Turkish Medals, 119
STANHOPE, Earl France, Commercial Treaty with, 335; Address moved, 593	Supply, c. Army Estimates, 1468 China—Naval and Military Operations, 706; Amend. (Sir D. L. Evans), 770; Motion withdrawn, 813; Report, 915 Navy Estimates, 1851, 2012; Amend. (Mr. Lindsay), 2023; Amend. neg. 2027
STANHOPE, Mr. J. B., Lincolnshire, N. Paper Duty Repeal, 2R. 365 Ways and Means, Com. Res. 2 (Contract Notes), 1224	SYKES, Col. W. H., Aberdeen City India—Reorganization of the Army, Papers moved for, 514, 1164, 1500, 1528 India House Museum, 733 Religious Worship, 2R. 540 Universities (Scotland), Leave, 68
STANLEY, Rt. Hon. Lord, King's Lynn Business, Public, Res. 1730 Commissions, Sale and Purchase of, Address moved, 68 India—State of Dhar, 445;—Government of, 1708 Representation of the People, 1801	TAUN Fra n
	Teleg c. Q
	TEMI Fra n Ind n Sat Tex
	Tenai c. Ob F
	Tenai c. Le

TEYNHAM, Lord

Ballot, The, Res. 818

Qualification for Office Abolition, 2R. 1008

THOMPSON, Mr. H. S., Whitby

Representation of the People, 2R. 2226

Whitby Rectory, Papers moved for, 684

Timber Duties, The

c. Question, (Mr. Haliburton), 237; (Mr. Adam), 1022

Toll Gates,

c. Question (Mr. T. S. Duncombe), 933

TORRENS, Mr. R., Carrickfergus

India—Native Army, 1165

Lunacy Laws, Committee on, 1329

TRELAWNY, Sir J., Tavistock

Business, Public, 1890

Church Rates Abolition, Com. 1419, 1421, 1438; add. cl. 1462, 1466, 1894; 3R. 2040, 2041, 2046, 2047

Navy Estimates, 2015, 2016, 2021

Sir John Barnard's Act Repeal, 2R. 2039

TROLLOPE, Rt. Hon. Sir J., *Lincolnshire, S.*Paper Duty Repeal, Com. cl. 1, 2091Trustees, Mortgagees, &c., Bill

l. 1R.* 1710

Turkish Medals,

c. Question (Major Stuart), 110; Explanation (Mr. S. Herbert), 738; Question (Mr. Collins), 835

TURNER, Mr. J. A., Manchester

Bleaching and Dyeing Works, 2R. Amend., 993

Tuscany, Provisional Government ofl. Papers moved for (Marquess of Normanby), 196; Motion withdrawn, 216; Explanation, 330;—The Yacht "Medina," Question (Earl of Malmesbury), 1870:—Case of M. Tassinari, 1871;—Gen. Decavero, Explanation (Marquess of Normanby), 2044Tyne Harbour of Refuge,

l. Explanation (Marquess of Clanricarde), 1710

Universities (Scotland) Bill

c. Leave, 68; 1R.* 69

UPTON, Hon. Major-Gen., F. G., Antrim Co.

Port Patrick and Donaghadee Harbours, Com. moved for, 963

VALLETORT, Viscount, *Plymouth*Cornwall, Duchy of, (Limitation of Actions), Com. cl. 2, 2078Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill

c. 1R.* 1616

Valuation of Rateable Property (Ireland) Bill

c. 3R.* 15

l. 1R.* 91; 2R.* 440;

Com. 715; 3R.* 814

Royal Assent, 1110

VANCE, Mr. J., Dublin City

Bankruptcy, 1494

Customs Acts, Res. 21, 1759

Income Tax, Com. cl. 1, 1471

Lucknow Prize Money, 1493

VANE, Lord H. G., Hastings

Business, Public, Res. 1736

Conveyance of Voters, 2R. 1903

Coroners, 2R. 88

Italy, Affairs of, 478

Ways and Means (Income Tax), Report, 1294

VANSITTART, Mr. W., Windsor

India—Reorganization of the Army, Papers moved for, 1528;—Revenue, 1886

Norwich, New Writs for, 1148

Ways and Means, Com. Res. 1 (Income Tax), 1218

VERNEY, Sir H., Buckingham

India—Reorganization of the Army, Papers moved for, 1528

Supply—China—Naval and Military Operations, 813

VERNON, Capt. L. V., Berkshire

Commissions, Sale and Purchase of, Address moved, Amend. 24, 67

Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Res. 1331

Staff Appointments, 1154

VILLIERS, Rt. Hon. C. P. (Chief Commissioner of the Poor Law Board), *Wolverhampton*Adulteration of Food, Com. cl. 4, 544

Children in Workhouses, Religious Instruction to, 341

Irish Paupers Removal, 740, 1021

Representation of the People, 1795, 1797

VIVIAN, Lord

Parliamentary Reform, Com. moved for, 1951

VIVIAN, Mr. H. H., Glamorganshire

France, Commercial Treaty with, Address moved, 268

"Vixen"—Murder of Captain Lambert,

c. Question (Colonel Knox), 1244; (Mr. Baxley) 1495

Volunteers—see Rifle CorpsWakefield Commission, The

c. Question (Major Edwards), 447; (Mr. E. Ellice), 1632

WALCOTT, Rear Adm. J. E., Christchurch
Church Rates Abolition, Com. 1457
Navy Estimates, 1865, 1869, 2013, 2023, 2036
Post Captains on the Reserved List, 1846

WALPOLE, Rt. Hon. S. H., Cambridge University
Business, Public, Res. 1734
Church Rates Abolition, Com. add. cl. 1465
France, Commercial Treaty with, Address moved, 194
Income Tax, 649
Registration of Voters, 2R. 78
Religious Worship, 2R. 518

WALSH, Sir J. B., Radnorshire
Representation of the People, 2R. 2143
Savoy, Annexation of, 16, 104

WALTER, Mr. J., Berkshire
Church Rates Abolition, Com. 1455; add. cl. 1464
Endowed Schools (Mr. Dillwyn), 2R. 987

WATLINGTON, Mr. J. Perry, Essex, S.
Church Rates Abolition, Com. 1446

WAY, Mr. A. E., Bath
Delhi Prize Money, 234

WENSLEYDALE, Lord
France, Commercial Treaty with, Address moved, 637

WESTMEATH, Marquess of Dwellings for Labouring Classes (Ireland), 2R. 8; Com. Amend. 1017, 1019, 1472, 1474

Westminster, New Palace at—The Great Bell

c. Question (Mr. Alderman Salomons), 103;— The Stone Work, Question (Mr. Wise), 228

Ways and Means*,

c. Report, 71;
Com. Res. (Consolidated Fund), 91, 925;
Res. 1 (Income Tax), 1194; Amend. (Sir H. Willoughby) 1211 [A. 132, N. 187, M. 55], 1219;
Res. 2 (Contract Notes) 1223; Adj. moved (Mr. Bentinck), ib.; Motion withdrawn, 1224; Res. 3 (Dock Warrants), 1224; Amend. (Mr. Hankoy), 1225; Motion withdrawn, 1226; Res. 4 (Delivery Orders), 1227;
Res. 5 (Bills of Exchange, &c.), 1227;
Res. 6 (Register of Births, &c.), 1227;
Res. 7 (Mining Companies Cost Book), 1227; Res. 8 (Scotch Bonds), 1228; Res. 9 (Agreements), 1228;
Res. 10 (Leases, &c.), 1229;
Res. 11 (Probates), 1229;
Res. 12 (Declarations), 1229;
Report, 1244

WHITBREAD, Mr. S., (Lord of the Admiralty), Bedford
Naval Reserve, 2011
Navy Estimates, 1860

Whitby Rectory*,
c. Papers moved for, (Mr. Thompson), 684

WHITESIDE, Rt. Hon. J., Dublin University
Ecclesiastical Courts (Ireland), 1169
Endowed Schools (Mr. Dillwyn), 2R. 989
Income Tax, Consid. 1583
Italy, Affairs of, 456
Landlord and Tenant (Ireland), Leave, 1577; 2R. 2238
Londonderry, Lord Lieutenantcy of, 1620
Packet and Telegraphic Contracts, Res. 1403, 1407
Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R. 1320
Representation of the People, 2R. 1096, 1097, 1098
Spain, Protestant Residents in, 757
Supply—China—Naval and Military Operations, 810; Report, 922
Tenure and Improvement of Land (Ireland), Leave, 1572

Whitworth Gun, The

l. Question (Earl of Camperdown), 1611
c. Question (Mr. W. Egerton), 105; (Mr. C. Legh), 108

WICKLOW, Earl of Divorces (Ireland), 704
Dwellings for Labouring Classes (Ireland), Com. 1473

WILLIAMS, MR. W., Lambeth
Business, Order of, 1500
Income Tax, Com. 1470; Consid. Amend. 1666
Navy Estimates, 1858, 1859; Amend. 1860-1865, 2012, 2014, 2017, 2023, 2027
Post Captains on the Reserved List, 1842
Ways and Means (Income Tax), Report, 1291

WILLOUGHBY, Sir H. P., Evesham
Army Estimates, 1468, 1469
Business, Public, Res. 1738
Church Rates Abolition, Com. add. cl. 1467
France, Commercial Treaty with, Address, 343
Income Tax, Consid. 1667
India—Reorganization of the Army, Papers moved for, 1528, 1526
Navy Estimates, 1852, 1854, 1858; Amend. 1859, 2014, 2022
Norwich, New Writs for, 1149
Piety and Virtue—Royal Proclamation, Address moved, 2070
Supply—China—Naval and Military Operations Report, 922
Ways and Means, Com. Res. 1 (Income Tax), Amend, 1207; Report, 1271

Wine Duties, Drawback on
c. Question (Sir S. Northcote), 647

Wine Licences to Eating Houses*,
c. Question (Mr. M. Milnes), 745

WISE, Mr. J. A., Stafford
Parliament, New Houses of—The Stonework, 228
Sir John Barnard's Act Repeal, Leave, 1708

WODEHOUSE, LORD (Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs)

East India Indentured Labourers, Papers moved for, 196

France, Commercial Treaty with, Address moved, 579

Nice, Annexation of, 1118

Savoy, Annexation of, 96 ; Res. 2137

Spain and Morocco, 1325

Tuscany, Provisional Government of, Papers moved for, 202, 205, 334, 335 ;—The Yacht "Medina," 1870 ;—Case of M. Tassinari, 1871, 1872

Wood, Rt. Hon. Sir C. (Secretary of State for India), Halifax

Asia, Central, Trade in, 735

Carnatio, Nawaub of the, 734

"Great Tasmania," Mortality on Board the, 934, 1154

India—British Troops in, 218 ;—Delhi Prize Money, 236 ;—State of Dhar, 445 ;—Medical Officers, 727 ;—The Army in, 736, 1153, 1187, 1514, 1528 ;—Paper Currency, 1153 ;—Lucknow Prize Money, 1493 ;—Government of 1793 ;—Revenue, 1886 ;—Transport Ships, 1887

[cont.]

Wood, Rt. Hon. Sir C.—cont.

India House Museum, 735

Singapore, 217

Supply—China—Naval and Military Operations, Report, 924

Wood and Timber, Drawback on—Customs Acts

c. Res. 17, 925

WYLD, MR. J., Bodmin

Australian Elections, 1808

Paper Duty Repeal, Com. cl. 1, 2092

Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences, 2R. Adj. moved, 1315

WYNFORD, LORD

India—Finance Papers moved for, 1491

WYNNE, MR. C., Carnarvon

Army Examination Papers, Fraudulent Sale of, 2057

Yeomanry Cavalry—The Horse Tax, l. Question (Earl of Carnarvon), 1476

END OF VOLUME CLVII. AND SECOND OF SESSION, 1860.

ERRATA.

In the Speech of Col. SYKES, Page 515, line 15, for, "We had now 600," read, "We had now 6,000."

Page, 1020, line 24, for "2° Consolidated Fund (£850,000,000.)" read, "2° Consolidated Fund (£850,000.)"

